The establishment of the Normans in the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily[15] is an event most romantic in its origin, and in its consequences most important both to Italy and the Eastern empire The broken provinces of the Greeks Lombards and Saracens were exposed to every invader, and every sea and land were invaded by the adventurous spirit of the Scandinavian pirates After a long indulgence of rapine and slaughter, a fair and ample territory was accepted, occupied, and named by the Normans of France they renounced their gods for the God of the Christians [16] and the dukes of Normandy acknowledged themselves the vassals of the successors of Charlemagne and Capet The savage fierceness which they had brought from the snowy mountains of Norway was refined without being corrupted in a warmer climate the companions of Rollo insensibly mingled with the natives they imbibed the manners language [17] and gallantry of the French nation and in a martial age, the Normans might claim the palm of valour and glorious achievements Of the fashionable superstitions they embraced with ardour the pilgrimages of Rome Italy and the Holy Land In this active devotion their minds and bodies were invigorated by exercise danger was the incentive novelty the recompense and the prospect of the world was decorated by wonder credulity and ambitious hope They confederated for their mutual defence, and the robbers of the Alps who had been allured by the garb of a pilgrim were often chastised by the arm of a warrior In one of these pious visits to the cavern of Mount Garganus in Apulia which had been sanctified by the apparition of the archangel Michael [18] they were accosted by a stranger in the Greek habit, but who soon revealed himself as a rebel a fugitive and a mortal foe of the Greek empire His name was Melo a noble citizen of Bari who, after an unsuccessful revolt was compelled to seek new allies and avengers of his country The bold appearance of the Normans revived his hopes and solicited his confidence they listened to the complaints and still more to the promises of the patriot The assurance of wealth demonstrated the justice of his cause and they viewed as the inheritance of the brave, the fruitful land which was oppressed by effeminate tyrants On their return to Normandy they kindled a spark of enterprise and a small but intrepid band was freely associated for the deliverance of Apulia They passed the Alps by separate roads and in the disguise of pilgrims but in the neighbourhood of Rome they were saluted by the chief of Bari who supplied the more indigent with arms and horses and instantly led them to the field of action In the first conflict their valour prevailed but in the second engagement they were overwhelmed by the numbers and military engines of the Greeks and indignantly retreated with their faces to the enemy The unfortunate Melo ended his life a suppliant at the court of Germany his Norman followers excluded from their native and their promised land wandered among the hills and valleys of Italy and earned their daily subsistence by the sword To that formidable sword the princes of Capua, Beneventum Salerno and Naples alternately appealed in their domestic quarrels the superior spirit and discipline of the Normans gave victory to the side which they espoused and their cautious policy observed the balance of power lest the preponderance of any rival state should render their aid less important and their service less profitable Their first asylum was a strong camp in the depth of the marshes of Campania but they were soon endowed by the liberality of the duke of Naples with a more plentiful and permanent seat Eight miles from his residence as a bulwark against Capua the town of Aversa was built and fortified for their use and they enjoyed as their own the corn and fruits the meadows and groves, of that fertile district The report of their success attracted every year new swarms of pilgrims and soldiers the poor were urged by necessity the rich were excited by hope and the brave and active spirits of Normandy were impatient of ease and ambitious of renown The independent standard of Aversa afforded shelter and encouragement to the outlaws of the province to every fugitive who had escaped from the injustice or justice of his superiors and these foreign associates were quickly assimilated in manners and language to the Gallic colony The first leader of the Normans was Count Rainulf and in the origin of society, pre eminence of rank is the reward and the proof of superior merit [19]

Since the conquest of Sicily by the Arabs, the Grecian emperors had been anxious to regain that valuable possession but their efforts however strenuous had been opposed by the distance and the sea Their costly armaments after a gleam of success added new pages of calamity and disgrace to the Byzantine annals twenty thousand of their best troops were lost in a single expedition and the victorious Moslems

dended the policy of a nation which intrusted eunuchs not only with the custody of their women but with the command of their men [20] After a reign of two hundred years the Saracens were ruined by their divisions [21] The emir disclaimed the authority of the king of Tunis the people rose against the emir the cities were usurped by the chiefs each meaner rebel was independent in his village or castle and the weaker of two rival brothers implored the friendship of the Christians In every service of danger the Normans were prompt and useful and five hundred knights or warriors on horseback were enrolled by Arduin the agent and interpreter of the Greeks under the standard of Maniaces governor of Lombardy Before their landing the brothers were reconciled the union of Sicily and Africa was restored and the island was guarded to the water s edge The Normans led the van and the Arabs of Messina felt the valour of an untried foe. In a second action the emir of Syracuse was unhorsed and transpierced by the iron arm of William of Hauteville In a third engagement his intrepid companions discomfited the host of sixty thousand Saracens and left the Greeks no more than the labour of the pursuit a splendid victory but of which the pen of the historian may divide the merit with the lance of the Normans It is however true, that they essentially promoted the success of Maniaces who reduced thirteen cities and the greater part of Sicily under th obedience of the emperor But his military fame was sullied by ingratitude and tyranny In the division of the spoil the deserts of his brave auxiliaries were forgotten and neither their avarice nor their pride could brook this injurious treatment. They complained by the mouth of their interpreter their complaint was disregarded their interpreter was scourged the sufferings were his the insult and resentment belonged to those whose sentiments he had delivered Yet they dissembled till th y had obtained or stolen a safe passage to the Italian continent their brethren of Aversa sympathised in their indignation and the province of Apulia was invaded as the forfeit of the debt [22] Above twenty y ars after the first emigration the Normans took the field with no more than seven hundred horse and five hundred foot and after the recall of the Byzantine legions [23] from the Sicilian war their numbers are magnified to the amount of three score thousand men Their herald proposed the option of battle or retreat Of battle was the unanimous cry of the Normans and one of their stoutest warriors with a stroke of his fist felled to the ground the horse of the Greek messenger He was dismissed with a fresh horse the insult was concealed from the Imperial troops but in two successive battles they were more fatally instructed of the prowess of their adversaries In the plains of Cannæ the Asiatics fled before the adventurers of France the duke of Lombardy was made prisoner the Apulians acquiesced in a new dominion and the four places of Bari Otranto Brundusium and Tarentum were alone saved in the shipwreck of the Grecian fortunes From this era we may date the establishment of the Norman power which soon eclipsed the infant colony of Aversa. Twelve counts [24] were chosen by the popular suffrage and age birth and merit were the motives of their choice The tributes of their peculiar districts were appropriated to their use and each count erected a fortress in the midst of his lands and at the head of his vassals In the centre of the province the common habitation of Melphi was reserved as the metropolis and citadel of the republic a house and separate quarter was allotted to each of the twelve counts and the national concerns were regulated by this military senate The first of his peers their president and general was entitled Count of Apulia and this dignity was conferred on William of the iron arm who in the language of the age is styled a lion in battle a lamb in society and an angel in council [25] The manners of his countrymen are fairly delineated by a contemporary and national historian [26]

The Normans says Malaterra are a cunning and revengeful people eloquence and dissimulation appear to be their hereditary qualities they can stoop to flatter but unless they are curbed by the restraint of law they indulge the licentiousness of nature and passion Their princes affect the praise of popular munificence the people observe the medium or rather blend the extremes of avarice and prodigality and in their eager thirst of wealth and dominion they despise whatever they possess and hope what ever they desire Arms and horses the luxury of dress the exercises of hunting and hawking [27] are the delight of the Normans but, on pressing occasions they can endure with incredible patience the inclemency of every climate and the toil and abstinence of a military life [28]

The Normans of Apulia were seated on the verge of the two empires and according to the policy of the hour they accepted the investiture of their lands from the sovereigns of Germany or Constantinople But the firmest title of these adventurers was the right to conquest they nei ther loved nor trusted they were neither trusted nor beloved the contempt of the princes was mixed with fear, and the fear of the natives was mingled with hatred and resentment Every object of desire, a hor e a woman, a garden tempted and gratified the rapaciousness of the strangers [29] and the avarice of their chiefs was only coloured by the more specious names of ambition and glory The twelve counts were sometimes joined in a league of injustice in their domestic quarrels they disputed the spoils of the people, the virtues of William were buried in his grave and Drogo his brother and successor, was better qualified to lead the valour than to restrain the violence of his peers Under the reign of Constantine Monomachus, the policy rather than benevolence of the Byzantine court attempted to relieve Italy from this adherent mischief more grievous than a flight of barbarians [30] and Argyrus the son of Melo was invested for this purpose with the most lofty titles[31] and the most ample commission The memory of his father might recommend him to the Normans and he had already engaged their voluntary service to quell the revolt of Maniaces and to avenge their own and the public injury It was the design of Constantine to transplant this warlike colony from the Italian provinces to the Persian war and the son of Melo distributed among the chiefs the gold and manufactures of Greece as the first fruits of the Imperial bounty But his arts were baffled by the sense and spirit of the conquerors of Apulia his gifts or at least his proposals, were rejected and they unanimously refused to relinquish their possessions and their hopes for the distant prospect of Asiatic fortune After the means of persuasion had failed Argyrus resolved to compel or to destroy the Latin powers were solicited against the common enemy and an offensive alliance was formed of the pope and the two emperors of the East and West The throne of St Peter was occupied by Leo the Ninth a simple saint [32] of a temper most apt to deceive himself and the world and whose venerable character would consecrate with the name of piety the measures least compatible with the practice of religion His humanity was affected by the complaints perhaps the calumnies, of an injured people the impious Normans had interrupted the payment of tithes and the temporal sword might be lawfully unsheathed against the sacrilegious robbers who were deaf to the censures of the church As a German of noble birth and royal kindred Leo had free access to the court and confidence of the emperor Henry the Third and in search of arms and allies his ardent zeal transported him from Apulia to Saxony, from the Elbe to the Tiber During these hostile preparations Argyrus indulged himself in the use of secret and guilty weapons a crowd of Normans became the victims of public or private revenge and the valiant Drogo was murdered in a church But his spirit survived in his brother Humphrey the third count of Apulia The assassins were chastised and the son of Melo overthrown and wounded, was driven from the field to hide his shame behind the walls of Bari and to await the tardy succour of his allies

But the power of Constantine was distracted by a Turkish war the mind of Henry was feeble and irresolute and the pope instead of repassing the Alps with a German army was accompanied only by a guard of seven hundred Swabians and some volunteers of Lorraine In his long progress from Mantua to Beneventum a vile and promiscuous multitude of Italians was enlisted under the holy standard [33] the priest and the robber slept in the same tent the pikes and crosses were intermingled in the front and the martial saint repeated the lessons of his youth in the order of march of encampment, and of combat The Normans of Apulia could muster in the field no more than three thousand horse with a handful of infantry the defection of the natives intercepted their provisions and retreat and their spirit incapable of fear was chilled for a moment by superstitious awe On the hostile approach of Leo they knelt without disgrace or reluctance before their spiritual father But the pope was inexorable his lofty Germans affected to deride the diminutive stature of their adversaries and the Normans were informed that death or exile was their only alternative Flight they disdained and, as many of them had been three days without tasting food they embraced the assurance of a more easy and honourable death They climbed the hill of Civitella descended into the plain and charged in three divisions the army of the pope On the left and in the centre Richard count of Aversa and Robert the famous Guiscard attacked broke routed and pursued the Italian multitudes who fought without discipline and fled without shame A harder trial was reserved for the valour of Count Humphrey who led the cavalry of the right wing The Germans[34] have been described as unskilful in the management of the horse and lance but on foot they formed a strong and impenetrable phalanx and neither man nor steed nor armour could resist the weight of their long and two-handed swords. After a severe conflict they were encompassed by the squadrons returning from the pursuit, and died in their ranks with the esteem of their foes and the satisfaction of revenge. The gates of Civitella were shut against the flying pope and he was overtaken by the pious conquerors, who kissed his feet to implore his blessing and the absolution of their sinful victory. The soldiers beheld in their enemy and captive the vicar of Christ and though we may suppose the policy of the chiefs it is probable that they were infected by the popular superstition. In the calm of retirement the well meaning pope deplored the effusion of Christian blood which must be imputed to his account he felt that he had been the author of sin and scandal and as his undertaking had failed the indecency of his military character was universally condemned.[35] With these dispositions he listened to the offers of a beneficial treaty deserted an alliance which he had preached as the cause of God and ratified the past and future conquests of the Normans. By whatever hands they had been usurped the provinces of Apulia and Calabria were a part of the donation of Constantine and the patrimony of St. Peter the grant and the acceptance confirmed the mutual claims of the pontiff and the adventurers. They promised to support each other with spiritual and temporal arms a tribute or quit rent of twelve pence was afterwards stipulated for every ploughland and since this memorable transaction the kingdom of Naples has remained above seven hundred years a fief of the Holy See.[36]

The pedigree of Robert Guiscard[37] is variously deduced from the peasants and the dukes of Normandy from the peasants by the pride and ignorance of a Grecian princess[38] from the dukes, by the ignorance and flattery of the Italian subjects[39] His genuine descent may be ascribed to the second or middle order of private nobility[40] He sprang from a race of valvassors or bannerets of the diocese of Coutances, in the Lower Normandy the castle of Hauteville was their honourable seat his father Tancred was conspicuous in the court and army of the duke and his military service was furnished by ten soldiers or knights. Two marriages, of a rank not unworthy of his own made him the father of twelve sons who were educated at home by the impartial tenderness of his second wife. But a narrow patrimony was insufficient for this numerous and daring progeny they saw around the neighborhood the mischiefs of poverty and discord, and resolved to seek in foreign wars a more glorious inheritance. Two only remained to perpetuate the race and cherish their father's age their ten brothers as they successively attained the vigour of manhood, departed from the castle passed the Alps, and joined the Apulian camp of the Normans. The elder were prompted by native spirit their success encouraged their younger brethren and the three first in seniority William Drogo and Humphrey deserved to be the chiefs of their nation and the founders of the new republic. Robert was the eldest of the seven sons of the second marriage and even the reluctant praise of his foes has endowed him with the heroic qualities of a soldier and a statesman. His lofty stature surpassed the tallest of his army his limbs were cast in the true proportion of strength and gracefulness and to the decline of life he maintained the patient vigour of health and the commanding dignity of his form. His complexion was ruddy his shoulders were broad his hair and beard were long and of a flaxen colour his eyes sparkled with fire and his voice like that of Achilles could impress obedience and terror amidst the tumult of battle. In the ruder ages of chivalry such qualifications are not below the notice of the poet or historian they may observe that Robert, at once and with equal dexterity could wield in the right hand his sword his lance in the left that in the battle of Civitella he was thrice unhorsed and that in the close of that memorable day he was adjudged to have borne away the prize of valour from the warriors of the two armies.[41] His boundless ambition was founded on the consciousness of superior worth in the pursuit of greatness he was never arrested by the scruples of justice and seldom moved by the feelings of humanity though not insensible of fame the choice of open or clandestine means was determined only by his present advantage. The surname of Guiscard[42] was applied to this master of political wisdom which is too often confounded with the practice of dissimulation and deceit and Robert is praised by the Apulian poet for excelling the cunning of Ulysses and the eloquence of Cicero. Yet these arts were disguised by an appearance of military frankness in his highest fortune he was accessible and courteous to his fellow-soldiers and while he indulged the prejudices of his new subjects he affected in his dress and manners to maintain the ancient fashion of his country. He grasped with a rapacious, that he might distribute with a liberal hand his primitive indigence had taught the habits of frugality the gain of a merchant was not below his attention and his prisoners were tortured with slow and unfeeling cruelty to force a discovery of their secret treasure According to the Greeks he departed from Normandy with only five followers on horseback and thirty on foot, yet even this allowance appears too bountiful the sixth son of Tancred of Hauteville passed the Alps as a pilgrim and his first military band was levied among the adventurers of Italy His brothers and countrymen had divided the fertile lands of Apulia but they guarded their shares with the jealousy of avarice the aspiring youth was driven forwards to the mountains of Calabria and in his first exploits against the Greeks and the natives it is not easy to discriminate the hero from the robber To surprise a castle or a convent to ensnare a wealthy citizen to plunder the adjacent villages for necessary food were the obscure labours which formed and exercised the powers of his mind and body The volunteers of Normandy adhered to his standard and under his command the peasants of Calabria assumed the name and character of Normans

As the genius of Robert expanded with his fortune he awakened the jealousy of his elder brother, by whom in a transient quarrel his life was threatened and his liberty restrained After the death of Humphrey the tender age of his sons excluded them from the command they were reduced to a private estate by the ambition of their guardian and uncle and Guiscard was exalted on a buckler and saluted count of Apulia and general of the republic With an increase of authority and of force he resumed the conquest of Calabria and soon aspired to a rank that should raise him for ever above the heads of his equals By some acts of rapine or sacrilege he had incurred a papal excommunication but Nicholas the Second was easily persuaded that the divisions of friends could terminate only in their mutual prejudice that the Normans were the faithful champions of the Holy See and it was safer to trust the alliance of a prince than the caprice of an aristocracy A synod of one hundred bishops was convened at Melphi and the count interrupted an important enterprise to guard the person and execute the decrees of the Roman pontiff His gratitude and policy conferred on Robert and his posterity the ducal title [43] with the investiture of Apulia Calabria and all the lands both in Italy and Sicily, which his sword could rescue from the schismatic Greeks and the unbelieving Saracens [44] This apostolic sanction might justify his arms but the obedience of a free and victorious people could not be transferred without their consent and Guiscard dissembled his elevation till the ensuing campaign had been illustrated by the conquest of Consenza and Reggio In the hour of triumph he assembled his troops and solicited the Normans to confirm by their suffrage the judgment of the vicar of Christ, the soldiers hailed with joyful acclamations their valiant duke and the counts his former equals pronounced the oath of fidelity with hollow smiles and secret indignation After this inauguration Robert styled himself 'By the grace of God and St. Peter duke of Apulia, Calabria and hereafter of Sicily ' and it was the labour of twenty years to deserve and realise these lofty appellations Such tardy progress in a narrow space may seem unworthy of the abilities of the chief and the spirit of the nation but the Normans were few in number their resources were scanty, their service was voluntary and precarious The bravest designs of the duke were sometimes opposed by the free voice of his parliament of barons the twelve counts of popular election conspired against his authority, and against their perfidious uncle the sons of Humphrey demanded justice and revenge By his policy and vigour Guiscard discovered their plots suppressed their rebellions and punished the guilty with death or exile but in these domestic feuds his years and the national strength were unprofitably consumed After the defeat of his foreign enemies the Greeks Lombards and Saracens their broken forces retreated to the strong and populous cities of the sea coast They excelled in the arts of fortification and defence the Normans were accustomed to serve on horseback in the field and their rude attempts could only succeed by the efforts of persevering courage The resistance of Salerno was maintained above eight months the siege or blockade of Bari lasted near four years In these actions the Norman duke was the foremost in every danger in every fatigue the last and most patient As he pressed the citadel of Salerno a huge stone from the rampart shattered one of his military engines and by a splinter he was wounded in the breast Before the gates of Bari he lodged in a miserable hut or barrack composed of dry branches and thatched with straw —a perilous station on all sides open to the inclemency of the winter and the spears of the enemy [45]

not been dissevered by the revolutions of seven hundred years[46] The monarchy has been composed of the Greek provinces of Calabria and Apulia of the Lombard principality of Salerno th republic of Amalphi and the inland dependencies of the large and ancient duchy of Beneventum. Three districts only were exempted from the common law of subjection—the first for ever and the two last till the middle of the succeeding century The city and immediate territory of Benevento had been transferred by gift or exchange from the German emperor to th Roman pontiff and although this holy land was sometimes invaded the name of St. Peter was finally more potent than the sword of the Normans Their first colony of Aversa subdued and held the state of Capua and her princes were reduced to beg their bread before the palace of their fathers The dukes of Naples the present metropolis maintained the popular freedom under the shadow of the Byzantine empire Among the new acquisitions of Guiscard the science of Salerno[47] and the trade of Amalphi[48] may detain for a moment the curiosity of the reader I Of the learned faculties jurisprudence implies the previous establishment of laws and property and theology may perhaps be superseded by the full light of religion and reason But the savage and the sage must alike implore the assistance of physic and if our diseases are inflamed by luxury the mischiefs of blows and wounds would be more frequent in the ruder ages of society The treasures of Grecian medicine had been communicated to the Arabian colonies of Africa Spain and Sicily and in the intercourse of peace and war a spark of knowledge had been kindled and cherished at Salerno an illustrious city in which the men were honest and the women beautiful[49] A school the first that arose in the darkness of Europe was consecrated to the healing art the conscience of monks and bishops was reconciled to that salutary and lucrative profession and a crowd of patients of the most eminent rank and most distant climates invited or visited the physicians of Salerno They were protected by the Norman conquerors and Guiscard though bred in arms, could discern the merit and value of a philosopher After a pilgrimage of thirty nine years, Constantine an African Christian returned from Bagdad a master of the language and learning of the Arabians and Salerno was enriched by the practice the lessons and th writings of the pupil of Avicenna The school of medicine has long slept in the name of a university but her precepts are abridged in a string of aphorisms bound together in the Leonine verses or Latin rhymes of the twelfth century[50] II Seven miles to the west of Salerno and thirty to the south of Naples the obscure town of Amalphi displayed the power and rewards of industry The land however fertile was of narrow extent but the sea was accessible and open the inhabitants first assumed the office of supplying the western world with the manufactures and productions of the East and this useful traffic was the source of th ir opulence and freedom The government was popular under the administration of a duke and the supremacy of the Greek emperor Fifty thousand citizens were numbered in the walls of Amalphi nor was any city more abundantly provided with gold silver and the objects of precious luxury The mariners who swarmed in her port excelled in the theory and practice of navigation and astronomy and the discovery of the compass which has opened the globe is due to their ingenuity or good fortune Their trade was extended to the coasts or at least to the commodities of Africa Arabia and India and their settlements in Constantinople Antioch, Jerusalem and Alexandria acquired the privileges of independent colonies[51] After three hundred years of prosperity Amalphi was oppressed by the arms of the Normans and sacked by the jealousy of Pisa but the poverty of one thousand fishermen is yet dignified by the remains of an arsenal a cathedral and the palaces of royal merchants

Roger the twelfth and last of the sons of Tancred had been long detained in Normandy by his own and his father's age He accepted the welcome summons hastened to the Apulian camp and deserved at first the esteem and afterwards the envy of his elder brother Their valour and ambition were equal but the youth the beauty the elegant manners of Roger engaged the disinterested love of the soldiers and people So scanty was his allowance for himself and forty followers, that he descended from conquest to robbery and from robbery to domestic theft and so loose were the notions of property that, by his own historian at his special command he is accused of stealing horses from a stable at Melphi[52] His spirit emerged from poverty and disgrace from these base practices he rose to the merit and glory of a holy war and the invasion of Sicily was seconded by the zeal and policy of his brother Guiscard After the retreat of the Greeks the idolaters a most audacious reproach of the Catholics had

retrieved their losses and possessions but the deliverance of the island so vainly undertaken by the forces of the Eastern empire was achieved by a small and private band of adventurers [53] In the first attempt Roger braved in an open boat the real and fabulous dangers of Scylla and Charybdis, landed with only sixty soldiers on a hostile shore drove the Saracens to the gates of Messina and safely returned with the spoils of the adjacent country In the fortress of Trani his active and patient courage were equally conspicuous In his old age he related with pleasure that by the distress of the siege, himself and the countess his wife had been reduced to a single cloak or mantle which they wore alternately that in a sally his horse had been slain and he was dragged away by the Saracens but that he owed his rescue to his good sword, and had retreated with his saddle on his back, lest the meanest trophy might be left in the hands of the miscreants In the siege of Trani three hundred Normans withstood and repulsed the forces of the island In the field of Ceramio fifty thousand horse and foot were overthrown by one hundred and thirty six Christian soldiers, without reckoning St George who fought on horseback in the foremost ranks The captive banners with four camels, were reserved for the successor of St Peter and had these barbaric spoils been exposed not in the Vatican but in the Capitol they might have revived the memory of the Punic triumphs These insufficient numbers of the Normans most probably denote their knights the soldiers of honourable and equestrian rank each of whom was attended by five or six followers in the field [54] yet with the aid of this interpretation and after every fair allowance on the side of valour arms and reputation the discomfiture of so many myriads will reduce the prudent reader to the alternative of a miracle or a fable The Arabs of Sicily derived a frequent and powerful succour from their countrymen of Africa in the siege of Palermo the Norman cavalry was assisted by the galleys of Pisa and in the hour of action the envy of the two brothers was sublimed to a generous and invincible emulation After a war of thirty years,[55] Roger with the title of great count obtained the sovereignty of the largest and most fruitful island of the Mediterranean and his administration displays a liberal and enlightened mind above the limits of his age and education The Moslems were maintained in the free enjoyment of their religion and property [56] a philosopher and physician of Mazara, of the race of Mohammed harangued the conqueror, and was invited to court his geography of the seven climates was translated into Latin and Roger after a diligent perusal, preferred the work of the Arabian to the writings of the Grecian Ptolemy [57] A remnant of Christian natives had promoted the success of the Normans they were rewarded by the triumph of the cross The island was restored to the jurisdiction of the Roman pontiff new bishops were planted in the principal cities, and the clergy was satisfied by a liberal endowment of churches and monasteries Yet the Catholic hero asserted the rights of the civil magistrate Instead of resigning the investiture of benefices he dexterously applied to his own profit the papal claims the supremacy of the crown was secured and enlarged by the singular bull which declares the princes of Sicily hereditary and perpetual legates of the Holy See [58]

To Robert Guiscard the conquest of Sicily was more glorious than beneficial the possession of Apulia and Calabria was inadequate to his ambition and he resolved to embrace or create the first occasion of invading perhaps of subduing the Roman empire of the East [59] From his first wife the partner of his humble fortunes he had been divorced under the pretence of consanguinity and her son Bohemond was destined to imitate rather than to succeed his illustrious father The second wife of Guiscard was the daughter of the princes of Salerno, the Lombards acquiesced in the lineal succession of their son Roger their five daughters were given in honourable nuptials [60] and one of them was betrothed in a tender age to Constantine a beautiful youth, the son and heir of the emperor Michael [61] But the throne of Constantinople was shaken by a revolution the Imperial family of Ducas was confined to the palace or the cloister and Robert deplored and resented the disgrace of his daughter and the expulsion of his ally A Greek, who styled himself the father of Constantine soon appeared at Salerno and related the adventures of his fall and flight That unfortunate friend was acknowledged by the duke and adorned with the pomp and titles of Imperial dignity in his triumphal progress through Apulia and Calabria, Michael[62] was saluted with the tears and acclamations of the people and pope Gregory the Seventh exhorted the bishops to preach and the Catholics to fight in the pious work of his restoration His conversations with Robert were frequent and familiar and their mutual promises were justified by the valour of the Normans and the treasures of the East Yet this Michael by the confession of the Greeks and Latins was a pagean and an impostor a monk who had fled from his convent or a domestic who had served in the palace The fraud had been contrived by the subtle Guiscard and he trusted that after this pretender had given a decent colour to his arms he would sink at the nod of the conqueror into his primitive obscurity But victory was the only argument that could determine the belief of the Greeks and the ardour of the Latins was much inferior to their credulity the Norman veterans wished to enjoy the harvest of their toils, and the unwarlike Italians trembled at the known and unknown dangers of a transmarine expedition In his new levies Robert exerted the influence of gifts and promises the terrors of civil and ecclesiastical authority and some acts of violence might justify the reproach that age and infancy were pressed without distinction into the service of their unrelenting prince After two years incessant preparations the land and naval forces were assembled at Otranto at the heel or extreme promontory of Italy and Robert was accompanied by his wife who fought by his side his son Bohemond and the representative of the emperor Michael. Thirteen hundred knights[43] of Norman race or discipline formed the sinews of the army which might be swelled to thirty thousand[44] followers of every denomination. The men the horses the arms the engines the wooden towers covered with raw hides, were embarked on board one hundred and fifty vessels the transports had been built in the ports of Italy and the galleys were supplied by the alliance of the republic of Ragusa

At the mouth of the Adriatic Gulf the shores of Italy and Epirus incline towards each other The space between Brundusium and Durazzo the Roman passage is no more than one hundred miles[45] at the last station of Otranto it is contracted to fifty[46] and this narrow distance had suggested to Pyrrhus and Pompey the sublime or extravagant idea of a bridge Before the general embarkation the Norman duke despatched Bohemond with fifteen galleys to seize or threaten the isle of Corfu to survey the opposite coast, and to secure a harbour in the neighbourhood of Vallona for the landing of the troops They passed and landed without perceiving an enemy and this successful experiment displayed the neglect and decay of the naval power of the Greeks The islands of Epirus and the maritime towns were subdued by the arms of the name of Robert who led his fleet and army from Corfu (I use the modern appellation) to the siege of Durazzo That city the western key of the empire was guarded by ancient renown and recent fortifications by George Palæologus a patrician victorious in the Oriental wars and a numerous garrison of Albanians and Macedonians who in every age have maintained the character of soldiers In the prosecution of his enterprise the courage of Guiscard was assailed by every form of danger and mischance In the most propitious season of the year as his fleet passed along the coast a storm of wind and snow unexpectedly arose the Adriatic was swelled by the raging blast of the south and a new shipwreck confirmed the old infamy of the Acroceraunian rocks[47] The sails the masts and the oars were shattered or torn away the sea and shore were covered with the fragments of vessels with arms and dead bodies and the greatest part of the provisions were either drowned or damaged The ducal galley was laboriously rescued from the waves and Robert halted seven days on the adjacent cape to collect the relics of his loss and revive the drooping spirits of his soldiers The Normans were no longer the bold and experienced mariners who had explored the ocean from Greenland to Mount Atlas and who smiled at the petty dangers of the Mediterranean They had wept during the tempest they were alarmed by the hostile approach of the Venetians who had been solicited by the prayers and promises of the Byzantine court The first day's action was not disadvantageous to Bohemond a beardless youth[48] who led the naval powers of his father All night the galleys of the republic lay on their anchors in the form of a crescent and the victory of the second day was decided by the dexterity of their evolutions, the station of their archers the weight of their javelins and the borrowed aid of the Greek fire The Apulian and Ragusian vessels fled to the shore several were cut from their cables and dragged away by the conqueror and a sally from the town carried slaughter and dismay to the tents of the Norman duke A seasonable relief was poured into Durazzo and as soon as the besiegers had lost the command of the sea the islands and maritime towns withdrew from the camp the supply of tribute and provision That camp was soon afflicted with a pestilential disease five hundred knights perished by an inglorious death and the list of burials (if all could obtain a decent burial) amounted to ten thousand persons Under these calamities the mind of Guiscard alone was firm and invincible and while he collected new forces from

retrieved their losses and possessions but the deliverance of the island so vainly undertaken by the forces of the Eastern empire was achieved by a small and private band of adventurers [53] In the first attempt Roger braved in an open boat the real and fabulous dangers of Scylla and Charybdis landed with only sixty soldiers on a hostile shore drove the Saracens to the gates of Messina, and safely returned with the spoils of the adjacent country In the fortress of Trani his active and patient courage were equally conspicuous In his old age he related with pleasure that by the distress of the siege, himself and the countess his wife had been reduced to a single cloak or mantle, which they wore alternately that in a sally his horse had been slain, and he was dragged away by the Saracens but that he owed his rescue to his good sword and had retreated with his saddle on his back, lest the meanest trophy might be left in the hands of the miscreants In the siege of Trani, three hundred Normans withstood and repulsed the forces of the island In the field of Ceramio fifty thousand horse and foot were overthrown by one hundred and thirty six Christian oldiers without reckoning St George, who fought on horseback in the foremost ranks The captive banners, with four camels were reserved for the successor of St Peter, and had these barbaric spoils been exposed not in the Vatican but in the Capitol they might have revived the memory of the Punic triumphs These insufficient numbers of the Normans most probably denote their knights the soldiers of honourable and equestrian rank, each of whom was attended by five or six followers in the field [54] yet with the aid of this interpretation and after every fair allowance on the side of valour arms and reputation the discomfiture of so many myriads will reduce the prudent reader to the alternative of a miracle or a fable The Arabs of Sicily derived a frequent and powerful succour from their countrymen of Africa in the siege of Palermo the Norman cavalry was assisted by the galleys of Pisa and in the hour of action the envy of the two brothers was sublimed to a generous and invincible emulation After a war of thirty years [55] Roger, with the title of great count, obtained the sovereignty of the largest and most fruitful island of the Mediterranean and his administration displays a liberal and enlightened mind above the limits of his age and education The Moslems were maintained in the free enjoyment of their religion and property [56] a philosopher and physician of Mazara of the race of Mohammed harangued the conqueror, and was invited to court, his geography of the seven climates was translated into Latin and Roger, after a diligent perusal, preferred the work of the Arabian to the writings of the Grecian Ptolemy [57] A remnant of Christian natives had promoted the success of the Normans they were rewarded by the triumph of the cross The island was restored to the jurisdiction of the Roman pontiff new bishops were planted in the principal cities and the clergy was satisfied by a liberal endowment of churches and monasteries Yet the Catholic hero asserted the rights of the civil magistrate Instead of resigning the investiture of benefices he dexterously applied to his own profit the papal claims the supremacy of the crown was secured and enlarged by the singular bull which declares the princes of Sicily hereditary and perpetual legates of the Holy See [58]

To Robert Guiscard the conquest of Sicily was more glorious than beneficial the possession of Apulia and Calabria was inadequate to his ambition and he resolved to embrace or create the first occasion of invading perhaps of subduing the Roman empire of the East.[59] From his first wife the partner of his humble fortunes he had been divorced under the pretence of consanguinity and her son Bohemond was destined to imitate rather than to succeed his illustrious father The second wife of Guiscard was the daughter of the princes of Salerno the Lombards acquiesced in the lineal succession of their son Roger their five daughters were given in honourable nuptials [60] and one of them was betrothed in a tender age to Constantine a beautiful youth the son and heir of the emperor Michael [61] But the throne of Constantinople was shaken by a revolution the Imperial family of Ducas was confined to the palace or the cloister and Robert deplored and resented the disgrace of his daughter and the expulsion of his ally A Greek who styled himself the father of Constantine soon appeared at Salerno and related the adventures of his fall and flight That unfortunate friend was acknowledged by the duke and adorned with the pomp and titles of Imperial dignity in his triumphal progress through Apulia and Calabria Michael[62] was saluted with the tears and acclamations of the people and pope Gregory the Seventh exhorted the bishops to preach and the Catholics to fight in the pious work of his restoration His conversations with Robert were frequent and familiar and their mutual promises were justified by the valour of the Normans and the treasures of the East Yet this Michael by sally from the town He marched in two col umns to surprise the Normans before daybreak on two different sides his light cavalry was scattered over the plain the archers formed the second line and the Varangians claimed the honours of the vanguard In the first onset the battle axes of the strangers made a deep and bloody impression on the army of Guiscard which was now reduced to fifteen thousand men The Lombards and Calabrians ignomini ously turned their backs they fled towards the river and the sea but the bridge had been broken down to check the sally of the garrison and the coast was lined with the Venetian gal leys who played their engines among the dis orderly throng On the verge of ruin they were saved by the spirit and conduct of their chiefs. Gaita the wife of Robert is painted by the Greeks as a warlike Amazon a second Pallas less skilful in arts but not less terrible in arms than the Athenian goddess [73] though wounded by an arrow she stood her ground and strove by her exhortation and example to rally the flying troops [74] Her female voice was seconded by the more powerful voice and arm of the Norman duke as calm in action as he was mag nanimous in council Whither he cried aloud whither do ye fly? Your enemy is im placable and death is less grievous than servi tude The moment was decisive as the Varan gians advanced before the line they discovered the nakedness of their flanks the main battle of the duke of eight hundred knights stood firm and entire they couched their lances and the Greeks deplore the furious and irresistible shock of the French cavalry [75] Alexius was not defi cient in the duties of a soldier or a general but he no sooner beheld the slaughter of the Varan gians and the flight of the Turks than he de spised his subjects and despaired of his fortune The princess Anne who drops a tear on this melancholy event, is reduced to praise the strength and swiftness of her father s horse and his vigorous strug le when he was almost over thrown by the stroke of a lance which had shiv ered the Imperial helmet. His desperate valour broke through a squadron of Franks who op posed his flight and after wandering two days and as many nights in the mountains he found some repose of body though not of mind in the walls of Lychnidus The victorious Robert re proached the tardy and feeble pursuit which had suffered the escape of so illustrious a prize but he consoled his disappointment by the trophies and standards of the field the wealth and luxury of the Byzantine camp and the glory of defeating an army five times more nu merous than his own A multitude of Italians had been the victims of their own fears but only thirty of his knights were slain in this memorable day In the Roman host, the loss of Greeks Turks and English amounted to five or six thousand [76] the plain of Durazzo was stained with noble and royal blood and the end of the impostor Michael was more honour able than his life

It is more than probable that Guiscard was not afflicted by the loss of a costly pageant, which had merited only the contempt and deri sion of the Greeks After their defeat they still persevered in the defence of Durazzo and a Venetian commander supplied the place of George Palæologus, who had been imprudently called away from his station The tents of the besiegers were converted into barracks to sus-tain the inclemency of the winter and in an swer to the defiance of the garrison Robert in sinuated that his patience was at least equal to their obstinacy [77] Perhaps he already trusted to his secret correspondence with a Venetian noble who sold the city for a rich and honour able marriage. At the dead of night several rope ladders were dropped from the walls the light Calabrians ascended in silence and the Greeks were awakened by the name and trumpets of the conqueror Yet they defended the streets three days against an enemy already master of the rampart and near seven months elapsed between the first investment and the final sur render of the place From Durazzo the Norman duke advanced into the heart of Epirus or Albania traversed the first mountains of Thes-saly surprised three hundred English in the city of Castoria approached Thessalonica and made Constantinople tremble A more pressing duty suspended the prosecution of his ambitious designs By shipwreck, pestilence and the sword his army was reduced to a third of the original numbers and instead of being re cruited from Italy he was informed by plain tive epistles of the mischiefs and dangers which had been produced by his absence the revolt of the cities and barons of Apulia the distress of the pope and the approach or invasion of Henry king of Germany Highly presuming that his person was sufficient for the public safety he repassed the sea in a single brigantine and left the remains of the army under the command of his son and the Norman counts exhorting Bohemond to respect the freedom of his peers and the counts to obey the authority of their leader The son of Guiscard trod in the foot

Apulia and Sicily he battered or scaled or sapped, the walls of Durazzo But his industry and valour were encountered by equal valour and more perfect industry A movable turret of a size and capacity to contain five hundred soldiers had been rolled forwards to the foot of the rampart but the descent of the door or drawbridge was checked by an enormous beam and the wooden structure was instantly consumed by artificial flames

While the Roman empire was attacked by the Turks in the East and the Normans in the West the aged successor of Michael surrendered the sceptre to the hands of Alexius an illustrious captain and the founder of the Comnenian dynasty The princess Anne his daughter and historian, observes in her affected style that even Hercules was unequal to a double combat and on this principle, she approves a hasty peace with the Turks which allowed her father to undertake in person the relief of Durazzo On his accession Alexius found the camp without soldiers and the treasury without money, yet such were the vigour and activity of his measures that in six months he assembled an army of seventy thousand men [69] and performed a march of five hundred miles His troops were levied in Europe and Asia from Peloponnesus to the Black Sea his majesty was displayed in the silver arms and rich trappings of the companies of horse guards and the emperor was attended by a train of nobles and princes some of whom in rapid succession had been clothed with the purple, and were indulged by the lenity of the times in a life of affluence and dignity Their youthful ardour might animate the multitude but their love of pleasure and contempt of subordination were pregnant with disorder and mischief and their importunate clamours for speedy and decisive action disconcerted the prudence of Alexius who might have surrounded and starved the besieging army The enumeration of provinces recalls a sad comparison of the past and present limits of the Roman world the raw levies were drawn together in haste and terror and the garrisons of Anatolia or Asia Minor had been purchased by the evacuation of the cities which were immediately occupied by the Turks The strength of the Greek army consisted in the Varangians the Scandinavian guards whose numbers were recently augmented by a colony of exiles and volunteers from the British island of Thule Under the yoke of the Norman conqueror the Danes and English were oppressed and united a band of adventurous youths resolved to desert a land of slavery the sea was open to their escape and in their long pilgrimage they visited every coast that afforded any hope of liberty and revenge They were entertained in the service of the Greek emperor and their first station was in a new city on the Asiatic shore but Alexius soon recalled them to the defence of his person and palace and bequeathed to his successors the inheritance of their faith and valour [70] The name of a Norman invader revived the memory of their wrongs they marched with alacrity against the national foe and panted to regain in Epirus the glory which they had lost in the battle of Hastings The Varangians were supported by some companies of Franks or Latins and the rebels who had fled to Constantinople from the tyranny of Guiscard were eager to signalise their zeal and gratify their revenge In this emergency the emperor had not disdained the impure aid of the Paulicians or Manichæans of Thrace and Bulgaria and these heretics united with the patience of martyrdom the spirit and discipline of active valour [71] The treaty with the sultan had procured a supply of some thousand Turks and the arrows of the Scythian horse were opposed to the lances of the Norman cavalry On the report and distant prospect of these formidable numbers Robert assembled a council of his principal officers You behold said he your danger it is urgent and inevitable The hills are covered with arms and standards and the emperor of the Greeks is accustomed to wars and triumphs Obedience and union are our only safety and I am ready to yield the command to a more worthy leader The vote and acclamation even of his secret enemies assured him in that perilous moment of their esteem and confidence and the duke thus continued Let us trust in the rewards of victory and deprive cowardice of the means of escape Let us burn our vessels and our baggage and give battle on this spot as if it were the place of our nativity and our burial The resolution was unanimously approved and without confining himself to his lines Guiscard awaited in battle-array the nearer approach of the enemy His rear was covered by a small river his right wing extended to the sea his left to the hills nor was he conscious perhaps that on the same ground Cæsar and Pompey had formerly disputed the empire of the world [72]

Against the advice of his wisest captains Alexius resolved to risk the event of a general action and exhorted the garrison of Durazzo to assist their own deliverance by a well timed

and his march from Salerno to Rome was animated by the public applause and the promise of the divine favour Henry invincible in sixty six battles trembled at his approach recollected some indispensable affairs that required his presence in Lombardy exhorted the Romans to persevere in their allegiance and hastily retreated three days before the entrance of the Normans In less than three years the son of Tancred of Hauteville enjoyed the glory of delivering the pope and of compelling the two emperors, of the East and West, to fly before his victorious arms.[65] But the triumph of Robert was clouded by the calamities of Rome By the aid of the friends of Gregory the walls had been perforated or scaled but the Imperial faction was still powerful and active on the third day the people rose in a furious tumult and a hasty wo d of the conqueror in his defence or revenge was the signal of fire and pillage[66] The Saracens of Sicily the subjects of Roger and auxiliaries of his brother embraced this fair occasion of rifling and profaning the holy city of the Christians many thousands of the citizens, in the sight and by the allies of their spiritual father were exposed to violation captivity or death and a spacious quarter of the city from the Lateran to the Coliseum was consumed by the flames and devoted to perpetual solitude[67] From a city wh re he was now hated and might be no longer feared Gregory retired to end his days in the palace of Salerno The artful pontiff might flatter the vanity of Guiscard with the hope of a Roman or Imperial crown but this dangerous measure which would have inflamed the ambition of the Norman must for ever have alienated the most faithful princes of Germany

The deliverer and scourge of Rome might have indulged himself in a season of repose but in the same year of the flight of the German emperor the indefatigable Robert resumed the design of his Eastern conquests The zeal or gratitude of Gregory had promised to his valour the kingdoms of Greece and Asia[68] his troops were assembled in arms flushed with success and ea er for action Their numbers, in the language of Homer are compared by Anna to a swarm of bees[69] yet the utmost and moderate limits of the powers of Guiscard have been already defined they were contained in this second occasion in one hundred and twenty vessels and as the season was far advanced the harbour of Brundusium[70] was preferred to the open road of Otranto Alexius apprehensive of a second attack, had assiduously laboured to restore the naval forces of the empire and obtained from the republic of Venice an important succour of thirty-six transports fourteen galleys and nine galeots or ships of extraordinary strength and magnitude Their services were liberally paid by the licence or monopoly of trade a p ofitable gift of many shops and houses in the port of Constantinople and a tribute to St Mark, the more acceptable as it was the produce of a tax on their rivals of Amalphi By the union of the Greeks and Venetians the Adriatic was covered with a hostile fleet but their own neglect or the vigilance of Robert, the change of a wind or the shelter of a mist, opened a free passage and the Norman troops were safely disembarked on the coast of Epirus With twenty strong and well appointed galleys their intrepid duke immediately sought the enemy and though more accustomed to fight on horseback he trusted his own life and the lives of his brother and two sons to the event of a naval combat. The dominion of the sea was disputed in three engagements in sight of the isle of Corfu in the two former the skill and numbers of the allies were superior but in the third the Normans obtained a final and complete victory[71] The light brigantines of the Greeks were scattered in ignominious flight the nine castles of the Venetians maintained a more obstinate conflict seven were sunk two were taken two thousand five hundred captives implored in vain the mercy of the victor and the daughter of Alexius deplores the loss of thirteen thousand of his subjects or allies The want of experience had been supplied by the genius of Guiscard and each evening when he had sounded a retreat he calmly explored the causes of his repulse and invented new methods how to remedy his own defects and to baffle the advantages of the enemy The winter season suspended his progress with the return of spring he again aspired to the conquest of Constantinople but, instead of traversing the hills of Epirus he turned his arms against Greece and the islands where the spoils would repay the labour and where the land and sea forces might pursu their joint operations with vigour and effect But in the isle of Cephalonia his projects were fatally blasted by an epidemical disease Robert himself in the seventieth year of his age expired in his tent and a suspicion of poison was imputed by public rumour to his wife or to the Greek emperor[72] This premature death might allow a boundless scope for the imagination of his future exploits, and the event suffi iently declares that the Norman steps of his father and the two destroyers are compared by the Greeks to the caterpillar and the locust the last of whom devours whatever has escaped the teeth of the former [78] After winning two battles against the emperor he descended into the plain of Thessaly and besieged Larissa the fabulous realm of Achilles [79] which contained the treasure and magazines of the Byzantine camp Yet a just praise must not be refused to the fortitude and prudence of Alexius who bravely struggled with the calamities of the times In the poverty of the state he presumed to borrow the superfluous ornaments of the churches the desertion of the Manichæans was supplied by some tribes of Moldavia a reinforcement of seven thousand Turks replaced and revenged the loss of their brethren and the Greek soldiers were exercised to ride to draw the bow and to the daily practice of ambuscades and evolutions Alexius had been taught by experience that the formidable cavalry of the Franks on foot was unfit for action and almost incapable of motion [80] his archers were directed to aim their arrows at the horse rather than the man and a variety of spikes and snares were scattered over the ground on which he might expect an attack In the neighbourhood of Larissa the events of war were protracted and balanced The courage of Bohemond was always conspicuous and often successful but his camp was pillaged by a stratagem of the Greeks the city was impregnable and the venal or discontented counts deserted his standard betrayed their trusts and enlisted in the service of the emperor Alexius returned to Constantinople with the advantage rather than the honour of victory After evacuating the conquests which he could no longer defend the son of Guiscard embarked for Italy and was embraced by a father who esteemed his merit and sympathised in his misfortune

Of the Latin princes the allies of Alexius and enemies of Robert the most prompt and powerful was Henry the Third or Fourth king of Germany and Italy and future emperor of the West The epistle of the Greek monarch[81] to his brother is filled with the warmest professions of friendship and the most lively desire of strengthening their alliance by every public and private tie He congratulates Henry on his success in a just and pious war, and complains that the prosperity of his own empire is disturbed by the audacious enterprises of the Norman Robert The list of his presents expresses the manners of the age—a radiated crown of gold a cross set with pearls to hang on the breast a case of relics with the names and titles of the saints, a vase of crystal a vase of sardonyx, some balm, most probably of Mecca and one hundred pieces of purple To these he added a more solid present, of one hundred and forty four thousand Byzantines of gold, with a farther assurance of two hundred and sixteen thousand so soon as Henry should have entered in arms the Apulian territories and confirmed by an oath the league against the common enemy The German [82] who was already in Lombardy at the head of an army and a faction accepted these liberal offers and marched towards the south his speed was checked by the sound of the battle of Durazzo but the influence of his arms or name in the hasty return of Robert was a full equivalent for the Grecian bribe Henry was the sincere adversary of the Normans the allies and vassals of Gregory the Seventh his implacable foe The long quarrel of the throne and mitre had been recently kindled by the zeal and ambition of that haughty priest [83] the king and the pope had degraded each other and each had seated a rival on the temporal or spiritual throne of his antagonist After the defeat and death of his Swabian rebel Henry descended into Italy to assume the Imperial crown and to drive from the Vatican the tyrant of the church [84] But the Roman people adhered to the cause of Gregory their resolution was fortified by supplies of men and money from Apulia and the city was thrice ineffectually besieged by the king of Germany In the fourth year he corrupted as it is said with Byzantine gold the nobles of Rome whose estates and castles had been ruined by the war The gates the bridges and fifty hostages were delivered into his hands the anti pope Clement the Third was consecrated in the Lateran the grateful pontiff crowned his protector in the Vatican and the emperor Henry fixed his residence in the Capitol as the lawful successor of Augustus and Charlemagne The ruins of the Septizonium were still defended by the nephew of Gregory the pope himself was invested in the castle of St Angelo and his last hope was in the courage and fidelity of his Norman vassal Their friendship had been interrupted by some reciprocal injuries and complaints but on this pressing occasion Guiscard was urged by the obligation of his oath by his interest more potent than oaths by the love of fame and his enmity to the two emperors Unfurling the holy banner he resolved to fly to the relief of the prince of the apostles the most numerous of his armies six thousand horse and thirty thousand foot was instantly assembled

tious to his interest and revenge The recent injuries of Sicily might provoke a just retaliation on the heads of the Saracens the Normans whose blood had been mingled with so many subject streams were encouraged to remember and emulate the naval trophies of their fathers and in the maturity of their strength they contended with the decline of an African power When the Fatimite caliph departed for the conquest of Egypt he rewarded the real merit and apparent fidelity of his servant Joseph with a gift of his royal mantle and forty Arabian horses his palace with its sumptuous furniture and the government of the kingdoms of Tunis and Algiers The Zeirides[103] the descendants of Joseph forgot their allegiance and gratitude to a distant benefactor grasped and abused the fruits of prosperity and after running the little course of an Oriental dynasty were now fainting in their own weakness On the side of the land they were oppressed by the Almohades the fanatic princes of Morocco while the seacoast was open to the enterprise of the Greeks and Franks, who before the close of the eleventh century had extorted a ransom of two hundred thousand pieces of gold By the first arms of Roger the island or rock of Malta which has been since ennobled by a military and religious colony was inseparably annexed to the crown of Sicily Tripoli[104] a strong and maritime city was the next object of his attack and the slaughter of the males the captivity of the females might be justified by the frequent practice of the Moslems themselves The capital of the Zeirides was named Africa from the country and Mahadia[105] from the Arabian founder it is strongly built on a neck of land but the imperfection of the harbour is not compensated by the fertility of the adjacent plain Mahadia was besieged by George the Sicilian admiral with a fleet of one hundred and fifty galleys amply provided with men and the instruments of mischief the sovereign had fled the Moorish governor refused to capitulate declined the last and irresistible assault and secretly escaping, with the Moslem inhabitants abandoned the place and its treasures to the rapacious Franks In successive expeditions the king of Sicily or his lieutenants reduced the cities of Tunis Safax Capsia Bona and a long tract of the sea coast[106] the fortresses were garrisoned the country was tributary and a boast that it held Africa in subjection might be inscribed with some flattery on the sword of Roger[107] After his death that sword was broken and these transmarine possessions were neglected evacuated or lost under the troubled reign of his successor[108] The triumphs of Scipio and Belisarius have proved that the African continent is neither inaccessible nor invincible yet the great princes and powers of Christendom have repeatedly failed in their armaments against the Moors who may still glory in the easy conquest and long servitude of Spain.

Since the decease of Robert Guiscard the Normans had relinquished above sixty years their hostile designs against the empire of the East The policy of Roger solicited a public and private union with the Greek princes whose alliance would dignify his regal character he demanded in marriage a daughter of the Comnenian family and the first steps of the treaty seemed to promise a favourable event But the contemptuous treatment of his ambassadors exasperated the vanity of the new monarch and the insolence of the Byzantine court was expiated according to the laws of nations by the sufferings of a guiltless people[109] With a fleet of seventy galleys George the admiral of Sicily appeared before Corfu and both the island and city were delivered into his hands by the disaffected inhabitants who had yet to learn that a siege is still more calamitous than a tribute In this invasion of some moment in the annals of commerce the Normans spread themselves by sea and over the provinces of Greece and the venerable age of Athens, Thebes and Corinth was violated by rapine and cruelty Of the wrongs of Athens no memorial remains The ancient walls which encompassed without guarding the opulence of Thebes were scaled by the Latin Christians but their sole use of the Gospel was to sanctify an oath that the lawful owners had not secreted any relic of their inheritance or industry On the approach of the Normans the lower town of Corinth was evacuated the Greeks retired to the citadel which was seated on a lofty eminence abundantly watered by the classic fountain of Pirene an impregnable fortress if the want of courage could be balanced by any advantages of art or nature As soon as the besiegers had surmounted the labour (their sole labour) of climbing the hill their general from the commanding eminence admired his own victory and testified his gratitude to Heaven by tearing from the altar the precious image of Theodore the tutelary saint The silk weavers of both sexes whom George transported to Sicily composed the most valuable part of the spoil and in comparing the skilful industry of the mechanic with the sloth and cowardice of the soldier he was heard to greatness was founded on his life [93] Without the appearance of an enemy a victorious army dispersed or retreated in disorder and consternation and Alexius who had trembled for his empire rejoiced in his deliverance The galley which transported the remains of Guiscard was shipwrecked on the Italian shore, but the duke s body was recovered from the sea and deposited in the sepulchre of Venusia [94] a place more illustrious for the birth of Horace[95] than for the burial of the Norman heroes Roger his second son and successor immediately sunk to the humble station of a duke of Apulia the esteem or partiality of his father left the valiant Bohemond to the inheritance of his sword The national tranquillity was disturbed by his claims till the first crusade against the infidels of the East opened a more splendid field of glory and conquest [96]

Of human life the most glorious or humble prospects are alike and soon bounded by the sepulchre The male line of Robert Guiscard was extinguished both in Apulia and at Antioch in the second generation but his younger brother became the father of a line of kings and the son of the great count was endowed with the name the conquests and the spirit of the first Roger [97] The heir of that Norman adventurer was born in Sicily, and at the age of only four years he succeeded to the sovereignty of the island a lot which reason might envy could she indulge for a moment the visionary though virtuous wish of dominion Had Roger been content with his fruitful patrimony a happy and grateful people might have blessed their benefactor, and if a wise administration could have restored the prosperous times of the Greek colonies [98] the opulence and power of Sicily alone might have equalled the widest scope that could be acquired and desolated by the sword of war But the ambition of the great count was ignorant of the e noble pursuits it was gratified by the vulgar means of violence and artifice He sought to obtain the undivided possession of Palermo of which one moiety had been ceded to the elder branch struggled to enlarge his Calabrian limits beyond the measure of former treaties and impatiently watched the declining health of his cousin William of Apulia the grandson of Robert On the first intelligence of his premature death Roger sailed from Palermo with seven galleys, cast anchor in the bay of Salerno received, after ten days negotiation an oath of fidelity from the Norman capital commanded the submission of the barons and extorted a legal investitude from the reluctant popes, who could not long endure either the friendship or enmity of a powerful vassal. The sacred spot of Benevento was respectfully spared as the patrimony of St Peter but the reduction of Capua and Naples completed the design of his uncle Guiscard, and the sole inheritance of the Norman conquests was possessed by the victorious Roger A conscious su*periority of power and merit prompted him to* disdain the titles of duke and of count and the isle of Sicily with a third perhaps of the continent of Italy might form the basis of a kingdom[99] which would only yield to the monarchies of France and England The chiefs of the nation who attended his coronation at Palermo might doubtless pronounce under what name he should reign over them but the example of a Greek tyrant or a Saracen emir were insufficient to justify his regal character, and the nine kings of the Latin world[100] might disclaim their new associate unless he were consecrated by the authority of the supreme pontiff The pride of Anacletus was pleased to confer a title which the pride of the Norman had stooped to solic it [101] but his own legitimacy was attacked by the adverse election of Innocent the Second and while Anacletus sat in the Vatican the successful fugitive was acknowledged by the nations of Europe The infant monarchy of Roger was shaken and almost overthrown by the unlucky choice of an ecclesiastical patron and the sword of Lothaire the Second of Germany the excommunications of Innocent the fleets of Pisa and the zeal of St Bernard were united for the ruin of the Sicilian robber After a gallant resistance the Norman prince was driven from the continent of Italy a new duke of Apulia was invested by the pope and the emperor each of whom held the end of the gonfanon or flagstaff as a token that they asserted their right and suspended their quarrel But such jealous friendship was of short and pre*carious duration* the German armies soon vanished in disease and desertion [102] the Apulian duke with all his adherents was exterminated by a conqueror who seldom forgave either the dead or the living like his predecessor Leo the Ninth the feeble though haughty pontiff be*came the captive and friend of the Normans* and their reconciliation was celebrated by the eloquence of Bernard who now revered the title and virtues of the king of Sicily

As a penance for his impious war against the successor of St Peter that monarch might have promised to display the banner of the cross and he accomplished with ardour a vow so propi

tious to his interest and revenge The recent injuries of Sicily might provoke a just retaliation on the heads of the Saracens the Normans, whose blood had been mingled with so many subject streams were encouraged to remember and emulate the naval trophies of their fathers and in the maturity of their strength they contended with the decline of an African power When the Fatimite caliph departed for the conquest of Egypt he rewarded the real merit and apparent fidelity of his servant Joseph with a gift of his royal mantle and forty Arabian horses his palace with its sumptuous furniture and the government of the kingdoms of Tunis and Algiers The Zeirides [101] the descendants of Joseph forgot their allegiance and gratitude to a distant benefactor grasped and abused the fruits of prosperity and after running the little course of an Oriental dynasty were now fainting in their own weakness On the side of the land they were oppressed by the Almohades the fanatic princes of Morocco while the seacoast was open to the enterprise of the Greeks and Franks who before the close of the eleventh century had extorted a ransom of two hundred thousand pieces of gold By the first arms of Roger the island or rock of Malta which has been since ennobled by a military and religious colony was inseparably annexed to the crown of Sicily Tripoli,[102] a strong and maritime city was the next object of his attack and the slaughter of the males the captivity of the females might be justified by the frequent practice of the Moslems themselves The capital of the Zeirides was named Africa from the country and Mahadia[103] from the Arabian founder it is strongly built on a neck of land but the imperfection of the harbour is not compensated by the fertility of the adjacent plain Mahadia was besieged by George the Sicilian admiral with a fleet of one hundred and fifty galleys amply provided with men and the instruments of mischief the sovereign had fled the Moorish governor refused to capitulate declined the last and irresistible assault and secretly escaping with the Moslem inhabitants abandoned the place and its treasures to the rapacious Franks. In successive expeditions the king of Sicily or his lieutenants reduced the cities of Tunis Safax Capsia Bona and a long tract of the sea coast [104] the fortresses were garrisoned the country was tributary and a boast that it held Africa in subjection might be inscribed with some flattery on the sword of Roger [105] After his death that sword was broken and these transmarine possessions were neglected evacuated or lost under the troubled reign of his successor [106] The triumphs of Scipio and Belisarius have proved that the African continent is neither inaccessible nor invincible yet the great princes and powers of Christendom have repeatedly failed in their armaments against the Moors who may still glory in the easy conquest and long servitude of Spain

Since the decease of Robert Guiscard the Normans had relinquished above sixty years their hostile designs against the empire of the East The policy of Roger solicited a public and private union with the Greek princes whose alliance would dignify his regal character he demanded in marriage a daughter of the Comnenian family and the first steps of the treaty seemed to promise a favourable event But the contemptuous treatment of his ambassadors exasperated the vanity of the new monarch and the insolence of the Byzantine court was expiated according to the laws of nations by the sufferings of a guiltless people [107] With a fleet of seventy galleys George the admiral of Sicily appeared before Corfu and both the island and city were delivered into his hands by the disaffected inhabitants who had yet to learn that a siege is still more calamitous than a tribute In this invasion of some moment in the annals of commerce the Normans spread themselves by sea and over the provinces of Greece and the venerable age of Athens, Thebes and Corinth was violated by rapine and cruelty Of the wrongs of Athens no memorial remains The ancient walls which encompassed without guarding the opulence of Thebes were scaled by the Latin Christians but their sole use of the Gospel was to sanctify an oath that the lawful owners had not secreted any relic of their inheritance or industry On the approach of the Normans the lower town of Corinth was evacuated the Greeks retired to the citadel which was seated on a lofty eminence abundantly watered by the classic fountain of Pirene an impregnable fortress if the want of courage could be balanced by any advantages of art or nature As soon as the besiegers had surmounted the labour (their sole labour) of climbing the hill their general from the commanding eminence admired his own victory and testified his gratitude to Heaven by tearing from the altar the precious image of Theodore the tutelary saint The silk weavers of both sexes whom George transported to Sicily composed the most valuable part of the spoil and in comparing the skilful industry of the mechanic with the sloth and cowardice of the soldier he was heard to

exclaim that the distaff and loom were the only weapons which the Greeks were capable of using The progress of this naval armament was marked by two conspicuous events the rescue of the king of France and the insult of the Byzantine capital In his return by sea from an unfortunate crusade Louis the Seventh was intercepted by the Greeks who basely violated the laws of honour and religion The fortunate encounter of the Norman fleet delivered the royal captive and after a free and honourable entertainment in the court of Sicily Louis continued his journey to Rome and Paris [110] In the absence of the emperor Constantinople and the Hellespont were left without defence and without the suspicion of danger The clergy and people for the soldiers had followed the standard of Manuel were astonished and dismayed at the hostile appearance of a line of galleys which boldly cast anchor in the front of the Imperial city The forces of the Sicilian admiral were inadequate to the siege or assault of an immense and populous metropolis, but George enjoyed the glory of humbling the Greek arrogance and of marking the path of conquest to the navies of the West He landed some soldiers to rifle the fruits of the royal gardens and pointed with silver or more probably with fire the arrows which he discharged against the palace of the Cæsars [111] This playful outrage of the pirates of Sicily, who had surprised an unguarded moment Manuel affected to despise while his martial spirit and the forces of the empire were awakened to revenge The Archipelago and Ionian Sea were covered with his squadrons and those of Venice but I know not by what favourable allowance of transports victuallers and pinnaces our reason or even our fancy, can be reconciled to the stupendous account of fifteen hundred vessels which is proposed by a Byzantine historian These operations were directed with prudence and energy in his homeward voyage George lost nineteen of his galleys which were separated and taken after an obstinate defence Corfu implored the clemency of her lawful sovereign nor could a ship a soldier of the Norman prince be found unless a captive, within the limits of the Eastern empire The prosperity and the health of Roger were already in a declining state while he listened in his palace of Palermo to the messengers of victory or defeat the invincible Manuel the foremost in every assault was celebrated by the Greeks and Latins as the Alexander or Hercules of the age

A prince of such a temper could not be satisfied with having repelled the insolence of a barbarian It was the right and duty, it might be the interest and glory of Manuel to restore the ancient majesty of the empire to recover the provinces of Italy and Sicily and to chastise this pretended king the grandson of a Norman vassal [112] The natives of Calabria were still attached to the Greek language and worship which had been inexorably proscribed by the Latin clergy after the loss of her dukes Apulia was chained as a servile appendage to the crown of Sicily the founder of the monarchy had ruled by the sword and his death had abated the fear without healing the discontent of his subjects the feudal government was always pregnant with the seeds of rebellion and a nephew of Roger himself invited the enemies of his family and nation The majesty of the purple and a series of Hungarian and Turkish wars prevented Manuel from embarking his person in the Italian expedition To the brave and noble Palæologus his lieutenant, the Greek monarch intrusted a fleet and army the siege of Bari was his first exploit and in every operation gold as well as steel was the instrument of victory Salerno and some places along the western coast maintained their fidelity to the Norman king but he lost in two campaigns the greater part of his continental possessions and the modest emperor disdaining all flattery and falsehood was content with the reduction of three hundred cities or villages of Apulia and Calabria whose names and titles were inscribed on all the walls of the palace The prejudices of the Latins were gratified by a genuine or fictitious donation under the seal of the German Cæsars [113] but the successor of Constantine soon renounced this ignominious pretence claimed the indefeasible dominion of Italy and professed his design of chasing the barbarians beyond the Alps By the artful speeches liberal gifts and unbounded promises of their Eastern ally the free cities were encouraged to persevere in their generous struggle against the despotism of Frederic Barbarossa the walls of Milan were rebuilt by the contributions of Manuel and he poured says the historian a river of gold into the bosom of Ancona whose attachment to the Greeks was fortified by the jealous enmity of the Venetians [114] The situation and trade of Ancona rendered it an important garrison in the heart of Italy it was twice besieged by the arms of Frederic the Imperial forces were twice repulsed by the spirit of freedom, that spirit was animated by the ambassador of Constantinople and the most intrepid patriots the most faithful servants were rewarded by the wealth and honours of the Byzantine court[115] The pride of Manuel disdained and rejected a barbarian colleague his ambition was excited by the hope of stripping the purple from the German usurpers, and of establishing in the West as in the East his lawful title of sole emperor of the Romans. With this view he solicited the alliance of the people and the bishop of Rome. Several of the nobles embraced the cause of the Greek monarch the splendid nuptials of his niece with Odo Frangipani secured the support of that powerful family[116] and his royal standard or image was entertained with due reverence in the ancient metropolis[117] During the quarrel between Frederic and Alexander the Third the pope twice received in the Vatican the ambassadors of Constantinople They flattered his piety by the long promised union of the two churches tempted the avarice of his venal court, and exhorted the Roman pontiff to seize the just provocation the favourable moment to humble the savage insolence of the Alemanni and to acknowledge the true representative of Constantine and Augustus[118]

But these Italian conquests this universal reign soon escaped from the hand of the Greek emperor His first demands were eluded by the prudence of Alexander the Third who paused on this deep and momentous revolution[119] nor could the pope be seduced by a personal dispute to renounce the perpetual inheritance of the Latin name After his re union with Frederic, he spoke a more peremptory language confirmed the acts of his predecessors excommunicated the adherents of Manuel and pronounced the final separation of the churches or at least the empires of Constantinople and Rome[120] The free cities of Lombardy no longer remembered their foreign benefactor and without preserving the friendship of Ancona he soon incurred the enmity of Venice[121] By his own avarice or the complaints of his subjects the Greek emperor was provoked to arrest the persons and confiscate the effects of the Venetian merchants This violation of the public faith exasperated a free and commercial people one hundred galleys were launched and armed in as many days they swept the coasts of Dalmatia and Greece but after some mutual wounds, the war was terminated by an agreement, inglorious to the empire insufficient for the republic and a complete vengeance of these and of fresh injuries was reserved for the succeeding generation The lieutenant of Manuel had informed his sovereign that he was strong enough to quell any domestic revolt of Apulia and Calabria but that his forces were inadequate to resist the impending attack of the king of Sicily His prophecy was soon verified the death of Palæologus devolved the command on several chiefs, alike eminent in rank alike defective in military talents the Greeks were oppressed by land and sea and a captive remnant that escaped the swords of the Normans and Saracens abjured all future hostility against the person or dominions of their conqueror[122] Yet the king of Sicily esteemed the courage and constancy of Manuel who had landed a second army on the Italian shore he respectfully addressed the new Justinian solicited a peace or truce of thirty years, accepted as a gift the regal title and acknowledged himself the military vassal of the Roman empire[123] The Byzantine Cæsars acquiesced in this shadow of dominion without expecting perhaps without desiring the service of a Norman army and the truce of thirty years was not disturbed by any hostilities between Sicily and Constantinople About the end of that period the throne of Manuel was usurped by an inhuman tyrant, who had deserved the abhorrence of his country and mankind the sword of William the Second the grandson of Roger was drawn by a fugitive of the Comnenian race and the subjects of Andronicus might salute the strangers as friends, since they detested their sovereign as the worst of enemies The Latin historians[124] expatiate on the rapid progress of the four counts who invaded Romania with a fleet and army and reduced many castles and cities to the obedience of the king of Sicily The Greeks[125] accuse and magnify the wanton sacrilegious cruelties that were perpetrated in the sack of Thessalonica the second city of the empire The former deplore the fate of those invincible but unsuspecting warriors who were destroyed by the arts of a vanquished foe The latter applaud in songs of triumph the repeated victories of their countrymen on the sea of Marmora or Propontis on the banks of the Strymon and under the walls of Durazzo A revolution which punished the crimes of Andronicus had united against the Franks the zeal and courage of the successful insurgents ten thousand were slain in battle and Isaac Angelus, the new emperor might indulge his vanity or vengeance in the treatment of four thousand captives Such was the event of the last contest between the Greeks and Normans before the expiration of twenty years the rival nations were lost or degraded in foreign servitude and the successors of Constantine did not long sur vive to insult the fall of the Sicilian monarchy

The sceptre of Roger successively devolved to his son and grandson they might be con founded under the name of William they are strongly discriminated by the epithets of the bad and the good but these epithets which ap pear to describe the perfection of vice and vir tue, cannot strictly be applied to either of the Norman princes When he was roused to arms by danger and shame, the first William did not degenerate from the valour of his race but his temper was slothful his manners were disso lute, his passions headstrong and mischievous, and the monarch is responsible not only for his personal vices, but for those of Majo the great admiral who abused the confidence and conspired against the life, of his benefactor From the Arabian conquest, Sicily had im bibed a deep tincture of Oriental manners the despotism, the pomp and even the harem of a sultan and a Christian people was oppressed and insulted by the ascendant of the eunuchs who openly professed, or secretly cherished the religion of Mohammed An eloquent historian of the times[126] has delineated the misfortunes of his country [127] the ambition and fall of the ungrateful Majo, the revolt and punishment of his assassins the imprisonment and deliverance of the king himself the private feuds that arose from the public confusion and the various forms of calamity and discord which afflicted Palermo the island and the continent during the reign of William the First, and the minority of his son The youth, innocence and beauty of William the Second,[128] endeared him to the na tion the factions were reconciled the laws were revived, and from the manhood to the premature death of that amiable prince Sicily enjoyed a short sea on of peace justice and happiness, whose value was enhanced by the remembrance of the past and the dread of fu turity The legitimate male posterity of Tancred of Hauteville was extinct in the person of the second William, but his aunt, the daughter of Roger had married the most powerful prince of the age, and Henry the Sixth the son of Frederic Barbarossa descended from the Alps to claim the Imperial crown and the inheritance of his wife Against the unanimous wish of a free people, this inheritance could only be ac quired by arms and I am pleased to transcribe the style and sense of the historian Falcandus who writes at the moment, and on the spot with the feelings of a patriot, and the prophetic eye of a statesman Constantia, the daughter of Sicily, nursed from her cradle in the plea sures and plenty, and educated in the arts and manners, of this fortunate isle, departed long since to enrich the barbarians with our treasures, and now returns, with her savage allies, to con taminate the beauties of her venerable parent. Already I behold the swarms of angry barbar ians our opulent cities the places flourishing in a long peace are shaken with fear desolated by slaughter consumed by rapine and polluted by intemperance and lust I see the massacre or captivity of our citizens, the rapes of our virgins and matrons [129] In this extremity (he interro gates a friend) how must the Sicilians act? By the unanimous election of a king of valour and experience Sicily and Calabria might yet be preserved [130] for in the levity of the Apulians, ever eager for new revolutions I can repose neither confidence nor hope [131] Should Cala bria be lost, the lofty towers the numerous youth and the naval strength of Messina [132] might guard the passage against a foreign in vader If the savage Germans coalesce with the pirates of Messina if they destroy with fire the fruitful region so often wasted by the fires of Mount Ætna [133] what resource will be left for the interior parts of the island these noble cities which should never be violated by the hostile footsteps of a barbarian?[134] Catana has again been overwhelmed by an earthquake the an cient virtue of Syracuse expires in poverty and solitude [135] but Palermo is still crowned with a diadem and her triple walls enclose the active multitudes of Christians and Saracens If the two nations under one king can unite for their common safety they may rush on the barbari ans with invincible arms But if the Saracens fatigued by a repetition of injuries should now retire and rebel, if they should occupy the cas tles of the mountains and sea coast the unfor tunate Christians exposed to a double attack, and placed as it were between the hammer and the anvil must resign themselves to hopeless and inevitable servitude [136] We must not for get that a priest here prefers his country to his religion and that the Moslems whose alliance he seeks were still numerous and powerful in the state of Sicily

The hopes or at least the wishes of Falcan dus were at first gratified by the free and unan imous election of Tancred, the grandson of the first king whose birth was illegitimate but whose civil and military virtues shone without a blemish During four years the term of his life and reign he stood in arms on the farthest verge of the Apulian frontier against the powers of Germany, and the restitution of a royal cap

tive of Constantia herself without injury or ransom may appear to surpass the most liberal measure of policy or reason After his decease the kingdom of his widow and infant son fell without a struggle and Henry pursued his victorious march from Capua to Palermo The political balance of Italy was destroyed by his success and if the pope and the free cities had consulted their obvious and real interest, they would have combined the powers of earth and heaven to prevent the dangerous union of the German empire with the kingdom of Sicily But the subtle policy for which the Vatican has so often been praised or arraigned was on this occasion blind and inactive and if it were true that Celestine the Third had kicked away the Imperial crown from the head of the prostrate Henry[137] such an act of impotent pride could serve only to cancel an obligation and provoke an enemy The Genoese who enjoyed a beneficial trade and establishment in Sicily listened to the promise of his boundless gratitude and speedy departure[138] their fleet commanded the straits of Messina and opened the harbour of Palermo and the first act of his government was to abolish the privileges and to seize the property of these imprudent allies The last hope of Falcandus was defeated by the discord of the Christians and Mohammedans they fought in the capital several thousands of the latter were slain but their surviving brethren fortified the mountains and disturbed above thirty years the peace of the island By the policy of Frederic the Second sixty thousand Saracens were transplanted to Nocera in Apulia In their wars against the Roman church the emperor and his son Mainfroy were strengthened and disgraced by the service of the enemies of Christ and this national colony maintained their religion and manners in the heart of Italy till they were extirpated at the end of the thirteenth century by the zeal and revenge of the house of Anjou[139] All the calamities which the prophetic orator had deplored were surpassed by the cruelty and avarice of the German conqueror He violated the royal sepulchres and explored the secret treasures of the palace Palermo and the whole kingdom the pearls and jewels however precious might be easily removed but one hundred and sixty horses were laden with the gold and silver of Sicily[140] The young king his mother and sisters and the nobles of both sexes were separately confined in the fortresses of the Alps and on the slightest rumour of rebellion the captives were deprived of life of their eyes or the hope of posterity Constantia herself was touched with sympathy for the miseries of her country and the heiress of the Norman line might struggle to check her despotic husband and to save the patrimony of her new born son of an emperor so famous in the next age under the name of Frederic the Second Ten years after this revolution the French monarchs annexed to their crown the duchy of Normandy the sceptre of her ancient dukes had been transmitted by a granddaughter of William the Conqueror to the house of Plantagenet and the adventurous Normans, who had raised so many trophies in France England and Ireland in Apulia Sicily and the East were lost either in victory or servitude among the vanquished nations

CHAPTER LVII

The Turks of the House of Seljuk Their Revolt against Mahmud, Conqueror of Hindostan Togrul subdues Persia, and protects the Caliphs Defeat and Captivity of the Emperor Romanus Diogenes by Alp Arslan Power and Magnificence of Malek Shah Conquest of Asia Minor and Syria State and Oppression of Jerusalem Pilgrimages to the Holy Sepulchre

From the isle of Sicily the reader must transport himself beyond the Caspian Sea to the original seat of the Turks or Turkmans against whom the first crusade was principally directed Their Scythian empire of the sixth century was long since dissolved but the name was still famous among the Greeks and Orientals and the fragments of the nation each a powerful and independent people were scattered over the desert from China to the Oxus and the Danube the colony of Hungarians was admitted into the republic of Europe and the thrones of Asia were occupied by slaves and soldiers of Turkish extraction While Apulia and Sicily were subdued by the Norman lance a swarm of these northern shepherds over spread the kingdoms of Persia, their princes of the race of Seljuk erected a splendid and solid empire from Samarcand to the confines of Greece and Egypt and the Turks have maintained their dominion in Asia Minor till the victorious crescent has been planted on the dome of St Sophia

One of the greatest of the Turkish princes was Mamood or Mahmud [1] the Gaznevide, who reigned in the eastern provinces of Persia one thousand years after the birth of Christ His father Sebectagi was the slave of the slave of the slave of the commander of the faithful But in this descent of servitude the first degree was merely titular, since it was filled by the sovereign of Transoxiana and Chorasan, who still paid a nominal allegiance to the caliph of Bagdad The second rank was that of a minister of state a lieutenant of the Samanides [2] who broke, by his revolt the bonds of political slavery But the third step was a state of real and domestic servitude in the family of that rebel, from which Sebectagi by his courage *and dexterity ascended to the supreme com*mand of the city and province of Gazna [3] as the son in law and successor of his grateful master The falling dynasty of the Samanides was at first protected and at last overthrown by their servants and in the public disorders the fortune of Mahmud continually increased For him the title of Sultan [4] was first invented and his kingdom was enlarged from Transoxiana to the neighbourhood of Ispahan from the shores of the Caspian to the mouth of the Indus but the principal source of his fame and riches was the holy war which he waged against the Gentoos of Hindostan In this foreign narrative I may not consume a page and a volume would scarcely suffice to recapitulate the battles and sieges of his twelve expeditions Never was the Musulman hero dismayed by the inclemency of the seasons the height of the mountains the breadth of the rivers the barrenness of the desert the multitudes of the enemy or the formidable array of their elephants of war [5] The sultan of Gazna surpassed the limits of the conquests of Alexander after a march of three months over the hills of Cashmir and Thibet he reached the famous city of Kinoge [6] on the Upper Ganges and in a naval combat on one of the branches of the Indus he fought and vanquished four thousand boats of the natives Delhi Lahor, and Multan were compelled to open their gates, the fertile kingdom of Guzarat attracted his ambition and tempted his stay and his avarice indulged the fruitless project of discovering the golden and aromatic isles of the Southern Ocean On the payment of a tribute the rajahs preserved their dominions, the people their lives and fortunes but to the religion of Hindostan the zealous Musulman was cruel and inexorable many hundred temples or pagodas were levelled with the ground, many thousand idols were demolished and the servants of the prophet were stimulated and rewarded by the precious materials of which they were composed The pagoda of Sumnat was situate on the promontory of Guzarat in the neighbourhood of Diu one of the last remaining possessions of the Portuguese [7] It was endowed with the *revenue of two thousand vil*lages two thousand Brahmins were consecrated to the service of the deity whom they washed each morning and evening in water from the distant Ganges the subordinate ministers consisted of three hundred musicians three hundred barbers and five hundred dancing girls, conspicuous for their birth or beauty Three sides of the temple were protected by the ocean the narrow isthmus was fortified by a natural or artificial precipice and the city and adjacent country were peopled by a nation of fanatics. They confessed the sins and the punishment of Kinoge and Delhi, but if the impious stranger should presume to approach their holy precincts he would surely be overwhelmed by a blast of the divine vengeance By this challenge the faith of Mahmud was animated to a per*sonal trial of the strength of this Indian deity* Fifty thousand of his worshippers were pierced by the spear of the Moslems, the walls were scaled the sanctuary was profaned and the conqueror aimed a blow of his iron mace at the head of the idol The trembling Brahmins are said to have offered ten millions sterling for his ransom and it was urged by the wisest counsellors that the destruction of a stone image would not change the hearts of the Gentoos and that such a sum might be dedicated to the relief of the true believers Your reasons' replied the sultan are specious and strong but never in the eyes of posterity shall Mahmud appear as a merchant of idols He repeated his *blows and a treasure of pearls and rubies con*cealed in the belly of the statue explained in some degree the devout prodigality of the *Brahmins The fragments of the idol were dis*tributed to Gazna Mecca and Medina Bagdad listened to the edifying tale and Mahmud was saluted by the caliph with the title of guardian of the fortune and faith of Mohammed

tory of nations I cannot refuse to turn aside to gather some flowers of science or virtue The name of Mahmud the Gaznevide is still vener able in the East his subjects enjoyed the bless ings of prosperity and peace his vices were con cealed by the veil of religion and two familiar examples will testify his justice and magnani mity I As he sat in the divan an unhappy subject bowed before the throne to accuse the insolence of a Turkish soldier who had driven him from his house and bed Suspend your clamours said Mahmud inform me of his next visit and ourself in person will judge and punish the offender The sultan followed his guide invested the house with his guards and extinguishing the torches pronounced the death of the criminal who had been seized in the act of rapine and adultery After the execu tion of his sentence the lights were rekindled Mahmud fell prostrate in prayer and rising from the ground demanded some homely fare which he devoured with the voraciousness of hunger The poor man whose injury he had avenged was unable to suppress his astonish ment and curiosity and the courteous monarch condescended to explain the motives of this singular behaviour I had reason to suspect that none except one of my sons could dare to perpetrate such an outrage and I extinguished the lights that my justice might be blind and inexorable My prayer was a thanksgiving on the discovery of the offender and so painful was my anxiety that I had passed three days without food since the first moment of your complaint II The sultan of Gazna had de clared war against the dynasty of the Bowides the sovereigns of the western Persia he was disarmed by an epistle of the sultana mother and delayed his invasion till the manhood of her son [9] During the life of my husband said the artful regent I was ever apprehensive of your ambition he was a prince and a soldier worthy of your arms He is now no more his sceptre has passed to a woman and a child and you dare not attack their infancy and weakness How inglorious would be your conquest how shameful your defeat! and yet the event of war is in the hand of the Almighty Avarice was the only defect that tarnished the illustrious character of Mahmud and never has that passion been more richly satiated. The Orien tals exceed the measure of credibility in the account of millions of gold and silver such as the avidity of man has never accumulated in the magnitud of pearls diamonds and rubies such as have never been produced by the work manship of nature [9] Yet the soil of Hindostan is impregnated with precious minerals her trade in every age has attracted the gold and silver of the world and her virgin spoils were rifled by the first of the Mohammedan conquerors. His behaviour in the last days of his life evinces the vanity of these possessions so laboriously won so dangerously held and so inevitably lost He surveyed the vast and various cham bers of the treasury of Gazna burst into tears and again closed the doors without bestowing any portion of the wealth which he could no longer hope to preserve The following day he reviewed the state of his military force one hundred thousand foot fifty five thousand horse and thirteen hundred elephants of bat tle.[10] He again wept the instability of human greatness and his grief was embittered by the hostile progress of the Turkmans, whom he had introduced into the heart of his Persian king dom.

In the modern depopulation of Asia the regu lar operation of government and agriculture is confined to the neighbourhood of cities and the distant country is abandoned to the pastoral tribes of Arabs Curds and Turkmans [11] Of the last mentioned people two considerable branch es extend on either side of the Caspian Sea the western colony can muster forty thousand sol diers the eastern less obvious to the traveller, but more strong and populous has increased to the number of one hundred thousand families In the midst of civilised nations they preserve the manners of the Scythian desert remove their encampments with the change of seasons, and feed their cattle among the ruins of pal aces and temples Their flocks and herds are their only riches their tents either black or white according to the colour of the banner are covered with felt, and of a circular form their winter apparel is a sheepskin a robe of cloth or cotton their summer garment the features of the men are harsh and ferocious the countenance of their women is soft and pleas ing Their wandering life maintains the spirit and exercise of arms they fight on horseback and their courage is displayed in frequent con tests with each other and with their neighbours For the licence of pasture they pay a slight tribute to the sovereign of the land but the domestic jurisdiction is in the hands of the chiefs and elders The first emigration of the Eastern Turkmans the most ancient of their race may be ascribed to the tenth century of the Christian era [12] In the decline of the caliphs, and the weakness of their lieutenants the bar rier of the Jaxartes was often violated in each invasion after the victory or retreat of their countrymen some wandering tribe embracing the Mohammedan faith obtained a free encampment in the spacious plains and pleasant climate of Transoxiana and Carizme The Turkish slaves who aspired to the throne encouraged these emigrations which recruited their armies awed their subjects and rivals and protected the frontier against the wilder natives of Turkestan and this policy was abused by Mahmud the Gaznevide beyond the example of former times He was admonished of his error by a chief of the race of Seljuk who dwelt in the territory of Bochara The sultan had inquired what supply of men he could furnish for military service If you send ' replied Ismael 'one of these arrows into our camp fifty thousand of your servants will mount on horseback And if that number, continued Mahmud ' should not be sufficient' 'Send this second arrow to the horde of Balik and you will find fifty thousand more But ' said the Gaznevide dissembling his anxiety if I should stand in need of the whole force of your kindred tribes? Despatch my bow ' was the last reply of Ismael 'and as it is circulated around the summons will be obeyed by two hundred thousand horse ' The apprehension of such formidable friendship induced Mahmud to transport the most obnoxious tribes into the heart of Chorasan where they would be separated from their brethren by the river Oxus, and enclosed on all sides by the walls of obedient cities But the face of the country was an object of temptation rather than terror, and the vigour of government was relaxed by the absence and death of the sultan of Gazna The shepherds were converted into robbers the bands of robbers were collected into an army of conquerors as far as Ispahan and the Tigris Persia was afflicted by their predatory inroads and the Turkmans were not ashamed or afraid to measure their courage and numbers with the proudest sovereigns of Asia Massoud the son and successor of Mahmud had too long neglected the advice of his wisest Omrahs Your enemies they repeatedly urged, were in their origin a swarm of ants they are now little snakes and unless they be instantly crushed they will acquire the venom and magnitude of serpents After some alternatives of truce and hostility after the repulse or partial success of his lieutenants the sultan marched in person against the Turkmans who attacked him on all sides with barbarous shouts and irregular onset Massoud says the Persian historian [13] 'plunged singly to oppose the torrent of gleaming arms, exhibiting such acts of gigantic force and valour as never king had before displayed A few of his friends roused by his words and actions and that innate honour which inspires the brave seconded their lord so well that wheresoever he turned his fatal sword the enemies were mowed down or retreated before him But now when victory seemed to blow on his standard, misfortune was active behind it for when he looked round he beheld almost his whole army, excepting that body he commanded in person devouring the paths of flight The Gaznevide was abandoned by the cowardice or treachery of some generals of the Turkish race and this memorable day of Zendecan[14] founded in Persia the dynasty of the shepherd kings [15]

The victorious Turkmans immediately proceeded to the election of a king and if the probable tale of a Latin historian[16] deserves any credit they determined by lot the choice of their new master A number of arrows were successively inscribed with the name of a tribe a family and a candidate, they were drawn from the bundle by the hand of a child and the important prize was obtained by Togrul Beg the son of Michael the son of Seljuk whose surname was immortalised in the greatness of his posterity The sultan Mahmud who valued himself on his skill in national genealogy professed his ignorance of the family of Seljuk yet the father of that race appears to have been a chief of power and renown [17] For a daring intrusion into the harem of his prince Seljuk was banished from Turkestan with a numerous tribe of his friends and vassals he passed the Jaxartes encamped in the neighbourhood of Samarcand embraced the religion of Mohammed and acquired the crown of martyrdom in a war against the infidels His age of a hundred and seven years surpassed the life of his son and Seljuk adopted the care of his two grandsons Togrul and Jaafar the eldest of whom at the age of forty five was invested with the title of Sultan in the royal city of Nishabur The blind determination of chance was justified by the virtues of the successful candidate It would be superfluous to praise the valour of a Turk and the ambition of Togrul[18] was equal to his valour By his arms the Gaznevides were expelled from the eastern kingdoms of Persia and gradually driven to the banks of the Indus in search of a softer and more wealthy conquest. In the West he annihilated the dynasty of the Bowides and the sceptre of Irak passed from the Persian to the Turkish nation The princes who had felt or who feared the Seljukian arrows bowed their heads in the dust by the conquest of Aderbijan or Media he approached the Roman confines and the shepherd presumed to despatch an ambassador or herald to demand the tribute and obedience of the emperor of Constantinople [18] In his own dominions Togrul was the father of his soldiers and people by a firm and equal administration Persia was relieved from the evils of anarchy and the same hands which had been imbrued in blood became the guardians of justice and the public peace The more rustic, perhaps the wisest portion of the Turkmans[19] continued to dwell in the tents of their ancestors and from the Oxus to the Euphrates these military colonies were protected and propagated by their native princes But the Turks of the court and city were refined by business and softened by pleasure they imitated the dress language and manners of Persia and the royal palaces of Nishabur and Rei displayed the order and magnificence of a great monarchy The most deserving of the Arabians and Persians were promoted to the honours of the state and the whole body of the Turkish nation embraced with fervour and sincerity the religion of Mohammed The northern swarms of barbarians who overspread both Europe and Asia have been irreconcilably separated by the consequences of a similar conduct. Among the Moslems as among the Christians their vague and local traditions have yielded to the reason and authority of the prevailing system to the fame of antiquity and the consent of nations. But the triumph of the Koran is more pure and meritorious as it was not assisted by any visible splendour of worship which might allure the pagans by some resemblance of idolatry The first of the Seljukian sultans was conspicuous by his zeal and faith each day he repeated the five prayers which are enjoined to the true believers of each week the two first days were consecrated by an extraordinary fast and in every city a mosch was completed before Togrul presumed to lay the foundations of a palace [20]

With the belief of the Koran the son of Seljuk imbibed a lively reverence for the successor of the prophet. But that sublime character was still disputed by the caliphs of Bagdad and Egypt, and each of the rivals was solicitous to prove his title in the judgment of the strong though illiterate barbarians Mahmud the Gaznevide had declared himself in favour of the line of Abbas and had treated with indignity the robe of honour which was presented by the Fatimite ambassador Yet the ungrateful Hashemite had changed with the change of fortune he applauded the victory of Zendecan, and named the Seljukian sultan his temporal vicegerent over the Moslem world As Togrul executed and enlarged this important trust he was called to the deliverance of the caliph Cayem and obeyed the holy summons, which gave a new kingdom to his arms [21] In the palace of Bagdad the commander of the faithful still slumbered a venerable phantom. His servant or master the prince of the Bowides could no longer protect him from the insolence of meaner tyrants and the Euphrates and Tigris were oppressed by the revolt of the Turkish and Arabian emirs The presence of a conqueror was implored as a blessing and the transient mischiefs of fire and sword were excused as the sharp but salutary remedies which alone could restore the health of the republic At the head of an irresistible force the sultan of Persia marched from Hamadan the proud were crushed the prostrate were spared the prince of the Bowides disappeared the heads of the most obstinate rebels were laid at the feet of Togrul and he inflicted a lesson of obedience on the people of Mosul and Bagdad After the chastisement of the guilty and the restoration of peace the royal shepherd accepted the reward of his labours and a solemn comedy represented the triumph of religious prejudice over barbarian power [22] The Turkish sultan embarked on the Tigris landed at the gate of Racca and made his public entry on horseback At the palace gate he respectfully dismounted and walked on foot preceded by his emirs without arms The caliph was seated behind his black veil the black garment of the Abbassides was cast over his shoulders and he held in his hand the staff of the apostle of God The conqueror of the East kissed the ground stood some time in a modest posture and was led towards the throne by the vizir and an interpreter After Togrul had seated himself on another throne his commission was publicly read which declared him the temporal lieutenant of the vicar of the prophet He was successively invested with seven robes of honour and presented with seven slaves the natives of the seven climates of the Arabian empire His mystic veil was perfumed with musk two crowns were placed on his head two scimitars were girded to his side as the symbols of a double reign over the East and West After this inauguration the sultan was prevented from prostrating himself a sec

rier of the Jaxartes was often violated in each invasion after the victory or retreat of their countrymen some wandering tribe embracing the Mohammedan faith obtained a free encampment in the spacious plains and pleasant climate of Transoxiana and Carizme The Turkish slaves who aspired to the throne encouraged these emigrations which recruited their armies awed their subjects and rivals and protected the frontier against the wilder natives of Turkestan and this policy was abused by Mahmud the Gaznevide beyond the example of former times He was admonished of his error by a chief of the race of Seljuk who dwelt in the territory of Bochara The sultan had inquired what supply of men he could furnish for military service If you send replied Ismael one of these arrows into our camp fifty thousand of your servants will mount on horseback" "And if that number' continued Mahmud "should not be sufficient?' 'Send this second arrow to the horde of Balik and you will find fifty thousand more But said the Gaznevide dissembling his anxiety if I should stand in need of the whole force of your kindred tribes?'' Despatch my bow was the last reply of Ismael and as it is circulated around, the summons will be obeyed by two hundred thousand horse' The apprehension of such formidable friendship induced Mahmud to transport the most obnoxious tribes into the heart of Chorasan where they would be separated from their brethren by the river Oxus and enclosed on all sides by the walls of obedient cities But the face of the country was an object of temptation rather than terror and the vigour of government was relaxed by the absence and death of the sultan of Gazna The shepherds were converted into robbers, the bands of robbers were collected into an army of conquerors as far as Ispahan and the Tigris Persia was afflicted by their predatory inroads and the Turkmans were not ashamed or afraid to measure their courage and numbers with the proudest sovereigns of Asia Massoud the son and successor of Mahmud had too long neglected the advice of his wisest Omrahs Your enemies they repeatedly urged, were in their origin a swarm of ants they are now little snakes and unless they be instantly crushed they will acquire the venom and magnitude of serpents After some alternatives of truce and hostility after the repulse or partial success of his lieutenants the sultan marched in person against the Turkmans who attacked him on all sides with barbarous shouts and irregular onset Massoud says the Persian historian[13] "plunged singly to oppose the torrent of gleaming arms, exhibiting such acts of gigantic force and valour as never king had before displayed A few of his friends roused by his words and actions and that innate honour which inspires the brave seconded their lord so well that, wheresoever he turned his fatal sword the enemies were mowed down or retreated before him But now when victory seemed to blow on his standard misfortune was active behind it for when he looked round he beheld almost his whole army excepting that body he commanded in person devouring the paths of flight The Gaznevide was abandoned by the cowardice or treachery of some generals of the Turkish race and this memorable day of Zendecan[14] founded in Persia the dynasty of the shepherd kings[15]

ond time but he twice kissed the hand of the commander of the faithful, and his titles were proclaimed by the voice of heralds and the applause of the Moslems In a second visit to Bagdad the Seljukian prince again rescued the caliph from his enemies, and devoutly on foot led the bridle of his mule from the prison to the palace Their alliance was cemented by the marriage of Togrul s sister with the successor of the prophet Without reluctance he had introduced a Turkish virgin into his harem but Cayem proudly refused his daughter to the sultan disdained to mingle the blood of the Hashemites with the blood of a Scythian shepherd, and protracted the negotiation many months till the gradual diminution of his revenue admonished him that he was still in the hands of a master The royal nuptials were followed by the death of Togrul himself [24] as he left no children his nephew Alp Arslan succeeded to the title and prerogatives of sultan and his name after that of the caliph was pronounced in the public prayers of the Moslems Yet in this revolution the Abbassides acquired a larger measure of liberty and power On the throne of Asia the Turkish monarchs were less jealous of the domestic administration of Bagdad and the commanders of the faithful were relieved from the ignominious vexations to which they had been exposed by the presence and poverty of the Persian dynasty

Since the fall of the caliphs the discord and degeneracy of the Saracens respected the Asiatic provinces of Rome which by the victories of Nicephorus Zimisces and Basil had been extended as far as Antioch and the eastern boundaries of Armenia Twenty five years after the death of Basil his successors were suddenly assaulted by an unknown race of barbarians who united the Scythian valour with the fanaticism of new proselytes and the art and riches of a powerful monarchy [25] The myriads of Turkish horse overspread a frontier of six hundred miles from Tauris to Arzeroum and the blood of one hundred and thirty thousand Christians was a grateful sacrifice to the Arabian prophet Yet the arms of Togrul did not make any deep or lasting impression on the Greek empire The torrent rolled away from the open country the sultan retired without glory or success from the siege of an Armenian city the obscure hostilities were continued or suspended with a vicissitude of events and the bravery of the Macedonian legions renewed the fame of the conqueror of Asia [26] The name of Alp Arslan the valiant lion is expressive of the popular idea of the perfection of man and the successor of Togrul displayed the fierceness and generosity of the royal animal He passed the Euphrates at the head of the Turkish cavalry and entered Cæsarea the metropolis of Cappadocia to which he had been attracted by the fame and wealth of the temple of St. Basil The solid structure resisted the destroyer but he carried away the doors of the shrine incrusted with gold and pearls and profaned the relics of the tutelar saint whose mortal frailties were now covered by the venerable rust of antiquity The final conquest of Armenia and Georgia was achieved by Alp Arslan In Armenia the title of a kingdom and the spirit of a nation were annihilated the artificial fortifications were yielded by the mercenaries of Constantinople, by strangers without faith veterans without pay or arms and recruits without experience or discipline The loss of this important frontier was the news of a day and the Catholics were neither surprised nor displeased that a people so deeply infected with the Nestorian and Eutychian errors had been delivered by Christ and his mother into the hands of the infidels [27] The woods and valleys of Mount Caucasus were more strenuously defended by the native Georgians [28] or Iberians but the Turkish sultan and his son Malek were indefatigable in this holy war their captives were compelled to promise a spiritual as well as temporal, obedience and instead of their collars and bracelets an iron horse shoe a badge of ignominy, was imposed on the infidels who still adhered to the worship of their fathers The change however was not sincere or universal and through ages of servitude the Georgians have maintained the succession of their princes and bishops But a race of men whom Nature has cast in her most perfect mould is degraded by poverty ignorance and vice their profession and still more their practice of Christianity is an empty name and if they have emerged from heresy it is only because they are too illiterate to remember a metaphysical creed [29]

The false or genuine magnanimity of Mahmud the Gaznevide was not imitated by Alp Arslan and he attacked without scruple the Greek empress Eudocia and her children His alarming progress compelled her to give herself and her sceptre to the hand of a soldier and Romanus Diogenes was invested with the Imperial purple His patriotism and perhaps his pride urged him from Constantinople within two months after his accession and the next campaign he most scandalously took the field

during the holy festival of Easter In the palace Diogenes was no more than the husband of Eudocia in the camp he was the emperor of the Romans and he sustained that character with feeble resources and invincible courage. By his spirit and success the soldiers were taught to act, the subjects to hope and the enemies to fear The Turks had penetrated into the heart of Phrygia but the sultan himself had resigned to his emirs the prosecution of the war and their numerous detachments were scattered over Asia in the security of conquest. Laden with spoil and careless of discipline they were separately surprised and defeated by the Greeks the activity of the emperor seemed to multiply his presence and while they heard of his expedition to Antioch the enemy felt his sword on the hills of Trebizond In three laborious campaigns the Turks were driven beyond the Euphrates in the fourth and last, Romanus undertook the deliverance of Armenia The desolation of the land obliged him to transport a supply of two months provisions and he marched forwards to the siege of Malazkerd [40] an important fortress in the midway between the modern cities of Arzeroum and Van His army amounted at the least, to one hundred thousand men The troops of Constantinople were reinforced by the disorderly multitudes of Phrygia and Cappadocia but the real strength was composed of the subjects and allies of Europe the legions of Macedonia and the squadrons of Bulgaria the Uzi a Moldavian horde who were themselves of the Turkish race [41] and above all the mercenary and adventurous bands of French and Normans Their lances were commanded by the valiant Ursel of Baliol the kinsman or father of the Scottish kings [42] and were allowed to excel in the exercise of arms or according to the Greek style in the practice of the Pyrrhic dance

On the report of this bold invasion which threatened his hereditary dominions Alp Arslan flew to the scene of action at the head of forty thousand horse [43] His rapid and skilful evolutions distressed and dismayed the superior numbers of the Greeks and in the defeat of Basilacius, one of their principal generals he displayed the first example of his valour and clemency Th imprud nce of the emperor has separated his forces after the reduction of Malazkerd. It was in vain that he attempted to recall the mercenary Franks they refused to obey his summons he disdained to await their return the desertion of the Uzi filled his mind with anxiety and suspicion and against the most salutary advice he rushed forwards to speedy and decisive action Had he listened to the fair proposals of the sultan Romanus might have secured a retreat, perhaps a peace but in these overtures he supposed the fear or weakness of the enemy and his answer was conceived in the tone of insult and defiance "If the barbarian wishes for peace let him evacuate the ground which he occupies for the encampment of the Romans and surrender his city and palace of Rei as a pledge of his sincerity Alp Arslan smiled at the vanity of the demand but he wept the death of so many faithful Moslems and after a devout prayer proclaimed a free permission to all who were desirous of retiring from the field With his own hands he tied up his horse s tail exchanged his bow and arrows for a mace and scimitar clothed himself in a white garment, perfumed his body with musk, and declared that if he were vanquished that spot should be the place of his burial [44] The sultan himself had affected to cast away his missile weapons but his hopes of victory were placed in the arrows of the Turkish cavalry whose squadrons were loosely distributed in the form of a crescent. Instead of the successive lines and reserves of the Grecian tactics Romanus led his army in a single and solid phalanx and pressed with vigour and impatience the artful and yielding resistance of the barbarians In this desultory and fruitless combat he wasted the greater part of a summer s day till prudence and fatigue compelled him to return to his camp But a retreat is always perilous in the face of an active foe and no sooner had the standard been turned to the rear than the phalanx was broken by the base cowardice or the baser jealousy of Andronicus a rival prince who disgraced his birth and the purple of the Cæsars [45] The Turkish squadrons poured a cloud of arrows on this moment of confusion and lassitude and the horns of their formidable crescent were closed in the rear of the Greeks In the destruction of the army and pillage of the camp it would be needless to mention the number of the slain or captives The Byzantine writers deplore the loss of an inestimable pearl they forgot to mention that in this fatal day the Asiatic provinces of Rome were irretrievably sacrificed

As long as a hope survived Romanus attempted to rally and save the relics of his army When the centre the Imperial station was left naked on all sides and encompassed by the victorious Turks, he still with desperate courage maintained the fight till the close of day at the head of the brave and faithful subjects who adhered to his standard They fell around him, his horse was slain the emperor was wounded yet he stood alone and intrepid till he was oppressed and bound by the strength of multitudes The glory of this illustrious prize was disputed by a slave and a soldier, a slave who had seen him on the throne of Constantinople, and a soldier whose extreme deformity had been excused on the promise of some signal service Despoiled of his arms his jewels and his purple Romanus spent a dreary and perilous night on the field of battle, amidst a disorderly crowd of the meaner barbarians In the morning the royal captive was presented to Alp Arslan who doubted of his fortune, till the identity of the person was ascertained by the report of his ambassadors and by the more pathetic evidence of Basilacius who embraced with tears the feet of his unhappy sovereign The successor of Constantine in a plebeian habit, was led into the Turkish divan and commanded to kiss the ground before the lord of Asia He reluctantly obeyed and Alp Arslan starting from his throne is said to have planted his foot on the neck of the Roman emperor [36] But the fact is doubtful, and if, in this moment of insolence the sultan complied with the national custom the rest of his conduct has extorted the praise of his bigoted foes and may afford a lesson to the most civilised ages He instantly raised the royal captive from the ground and thrice clasping his hand with tender sympathy assured him that his life and dignity should be inviolate in the hands of a prince who had learned to respect the majesty of his equals and the vicissitudes of fortune From the divan Romanus was conducted to an adjacent tent where he was served with pomp and reverence by the officers of the sultan who, twice each day seated him in the place of honour at his own table In a free and familiar conversation of eight days not a word not a look of insult escaped from the conqueror but he severely censured the unworthy subjects who had deserted their valiant prince in the hour of danger and gently admonished his antagonist of some errors which he had committed in the management of the war In the preliminaries of negotiation Alp Arslan asked him what treatment he expected to receive and the calm indifference of the emperor displays the freedom of his mind If you are cruel said he you will take my life if you listen to pride, you will drag me at your chariot wheels if you consult your interest you will accept a ransom and restore me to my country " 'And what " continued the sultan, ' would have been your own behaviour had fortune smiled on your arms? The reply of the Greek betrays a sentiment which prudence and even gratitude should have taught him to suppress 'Had I vanquished " he fiercely said ' I would have inflicted on thy body many a stripe ' The Turkish conqueror smiled at the insolence of his captive observed that the Christian law inculcated the love of enemies and forgiveness of injuries and nobly declared that he would not imitate an example which he condemned After mature deliberation, Alp Arslan dictated the terms of liberty and peace, a ransom of a million, an annual tribute of three hundred and sixty thousand pieces of gold,[37] the marriage of the royal children and the deliverance of all the Moslems who were in the power of the Greeks Romanus, with a sigh, subscribed this treaty, so disgraceful to the majesty of the empire he was immediately invested with a Turkish robe of honour his nobles and patricians were restored to their sovereign and the sultan after a courteous embrace dismissed him with rich presents and a military guard No sooner did he reach the confines of the empire than he was informed that the palace and provinces had disclaimed their allegiance to a captive a sum of two hundred thousand pieces was painfully collected and the fallen monarch transmitted this part of his ransom with a sad confession of his impotence and disgrace The generosity or perhaps the ambition of the sultan prepared to espouse the cause of his ally but his designs were prevented by the defeat imprisonment and death of Romanus Diogenes [38]

In the treaty of peace it does not appear that Alp Arslan extorted any province or city from the captive emperor and his revenge was satisfied with the trophies of his victory and the spoils of Anatolia from Antioch to the Black Sea The fairest part of Asia was subject to his laws twelve hundred princes or the sons of princes stood before his throne and two hundred thousand soldiers marched under his banners The sultan disdained to pursue the fugitive Greeks but he meditated the more glorious conquest of Turkestan the original seat of the house of Seljuk He moved from Bagdad to the banks of the Oxus a bridge was thrown over the river, and twenty days were consumed in the passage of his troops But the progress of the great king was retarded by the governor of Berzem and Joseph the Carizmian presumed to defend his fortress against the powers of the East When he was produced a captive in the royal tent the sultan instead of praising his valour severely reproached his obstinate folly and the insolent replies of the rebel provoked a sentence that he should be fastened to four stakes and left to expire in that painful situation At this command the desperate Carizmian drawing a dagger rushed headlong towards the throne the guards raised their battle axes the z al was checked by Alp Arslan the most skilful archer of the age he drew his bow but his foot slipped the arrow glanced aside and he received in his breast the dagger of Joseph who was instantly cut in pieces The wound was mortal and th Turkish prince bequeathed a dying admonition to the pride of kings In my youth said Alp Arslan I was advised by a sage to humble myself before God to distrust my own strength and never to despise the most contemptible foe I have neglected these lessons and my neglect has been deservedly punished Yesterday as from an eminence I beheld the numbers the discipline and the spirit of my armies the earth seemed to tremble under my feet and I said in my heart Surely thou art the king of the world the greatest and most invincible of warriors These armies a e no longer mine and in the confidence of my personal strength I now fall by the hand of an assassin [39] Alp Arslan possessed the virtues of a Turk and a Musulman his voice and stature commanded the reverence of mankind his face was shaded with long whiskers and his ample turban was fashioned in the shape of a crown. The remains of the sultan were deposited in the tomb of the Seljukian dynasty and the passenger might read and meditate this useful inscription [40] O YE WHO HAVE SEEN THE GLORY OF ALP ARSLAN EXALTED TO THE HEAVENS, REPAIR TO MARU AND YOU WILL BEHOLD IT BURIED IN THE DUST The annihilation of the inscription and the tomb itself more forcibly proclaims the instability of his man greatness

During the life of Alp Arslan his eldest son had been acknowledged as the future sultan of the Turks On his father s death the inheritance was disputed by an uncle a cousin and a brother they drew their scimitars and assembled their followers and the triple victory of Malek Shah[41] established his own reputation and the right of primogeniture In every age and more especially in Asia the thirst of power has inspired the same passions and occasioned the same disord rs but, from the long series of civil war it would not be easy to extract a sentiment more pure and magnanimous than is contained in a aying of the Turkish prince On the eve of the battle he performed his devotions at Thous, before the tomb of the Imam Riza As the sultan rose from the ground he asked his vizir Nizam who had knelt beside him what had been the object of his secret petition That your arms may be crowned with victory was the prudent and most probably the sincere ans er of the minister For my part replied the generous Malek I implored the Lord of hosts that he would take from me my life and crown if my broth r be more worthy than myself to reign over the Moslems The favourable judgment of Heaven was ratified by the caliph and for the first time the sacred title of Commander of the Faithful was communicated to a barbarian But this barbarian by his personal merit and the extent of his empire was the greatest prince of his age After the settlement of Persia and Syria he marched at the head of innumerable armies to achieve the conquest of Turkestan which had been undertaken by his father In his passage of the Oxus the boatmen who had been employed in transporting some troops, complained that their paym nt was assigned on the revenues of Antioch The sultan frowned at this preposterous choice but he smiled at the artful flattery of his vizir It was not to postpone their reward that I selected those remote places but to leave a memorial to posterity that und r your r ign Antioch and the Oxus were subject to the same sovereign But this description of his limits was unjust and parsimonious beyond the Oxus he reduced to his obedience the cities of Bochara Carizme and Samarcand and crushed each rebellious slave or independent savage who dared to resist Malek passed the Sihon or Jaxartes the last boundary of Persian civilisation the hordes of Turkestan yielded to his supremacy his name was inserted on the coins and in the prayers of Cashgar a Tartar kingdom on the extreme borders of China From the Chinese frontier he *stretched his immediate jurisdiction of feuda*tory sway to the west and south as far as the mountains of Georgia the neighbourhood of Constantinople the holy city of Jerusalem and the spicy groves of Arabia Felix Instead of resigning himself to the luxury of his harem the shepherd king both in peace and war was in a tion and in the fi ld By the perpetual motion of the royal camp each province was successively blessed with his presence and he is said to have perambulated twelve times the wide extent of his dominions which surpassed the An

head of the brave and faithful subjects who adhered to his standard They fell around him his horse was slain, the emperor was wounded, yet he stood alone and intrepid till he was oppressed and bound by the strength of multitudes The glory of this illustrious prize was disputed by a slave and a soldier, a slave who had seen him on the throne of Constantinople and a soldier whose extreme deformity had been excused on the promise of some signal service Despoiled of his arms his jewels and his purple, Romanus spent a dreary and perilous night on the field of battle, amidst a disorderly crowd of the meaner barbarians In the morning the royal captive was presented to Alp Arslan who doubted of his fortune till the identity of the person was ascertained by the report of his ambassadors and by the more pathetic evidence of Basilacius who embraced with tears the feet of his unhappy sovereign The successor of Constantine in a plebeian habit was led into the Turkish divan and commanded to kiss the ground before the lord of Asia He reluctantly obeyed, and Alp Arslan starting from his throne, is said to have planted his foot on the neck of the Roman emperor [36] But the fact is doubtful and if in this moment of insolence, the sultan complied with the national custom the rest of his conduct has extorted the praise of his bigoted foes and may afford a lesson to the most civilised ages He instantly raised the royal captive from the ground and thrice clasping his hand with tender sympathy assured him that his life and dignity should be inviolate in the hands of a prince who had learned to respect the majesty of his equals and the vicissitudes of fortune From the divan Romanus was conducted to an adjacent tent where he was served with pomp and reverence by the officers of the sultan who twice each day seated him in the place of honour at his own table In a free and familiar conversation of eight days not a word not a look of insult escaped from the conqueror but he severely censured the unworthy subjects who had deserted their valiant prince in the hour of danger and gently admonished his antagonist of some errors which he had committed in the management of the war In the preliminaries of negotiation Alp Arslan asked him what treatment he expected to receive and the calm indifference of the emperor displays the freedom of his mind If you are cruel' said he you will take my life if you listen to pride you will drag me at your chariot wheels if you consult your interest you will accept a ransom and restore me to my country" "And what' continued the sultan, would have been your own behaviour had fortune smiled on your arms? The reply of the Greek betrays a sentiment which prudence, and even gratitude should have taught him to suppress Had I vanquished he fiercely said "I would have inflicted on thy body many a stripe' The Turkish conqueror smiled at the insolence of his captive observed that the Christian law inculcated the love of enemies and forgiveness of injuries and nobly declared that he would not imitate an example which he condemned After mature deliberation Alp Arslan dictated the terms of liberty and peace a ransom of a million an annual tribute of three hundred and sixty thousand pieces of gold [37] the marriage of the royal children and the deliverance of all the Moslems who were in the power of the Greeks Romanus, with a sigh subscribed this treaty so disgraceful to the majesty of the empire he was immediately invested with a Turkish robe of honour his nobles and patricians were restored to their sovereign, and the sultan after a courteous embrace dismissed him with rich presents and a military guard No sooner did he reach the confines of the empire than he was informed that the palace and provinces had disclaimed their allegiance to a captive a sum of two hundred thousand pieces was painfully collected and the fallen monarch transmitted this part of his ransom with a sad confession of his impotence and disgrace The generosity or perhaps the ambition of the sultan prepared to espouse the cause of his ally but his designs were prevented by the defeat imprisonment and death of Romanus Diogenes [38]

In the treaty of peace it does not appear that Alp Arslan extorted any province or city from the captive emperor and his revenge was satisfied with the trophies of his victory, and the spoils of Anatolia from Antioch to the Black Sea The fairest part of Asia was subject to his laws twelve hundred princes or the sons of princes stood before his throne and two hundred thousand soldiers marched under his banners The sultan disdained to pursue the fugitive Greeks but he meditated the more glorious conquest of Turkestan the original seat of the house of Seljuk He moved from Bagdad to the banks of the Oxus a bridge was thrown over the river and twenty days were consumed in the passage of his troops But the progress of the great king was retarded by the governor of Berzem and Joseph the Carizmian presumed to defend his fortress against the powers of the

In a period when Furope was plunged in the deepest barbarism the light and splendour of Asia may be ascribed to the docility rather than the knowledge of the Turkish conquerors An ample share of their wisdom and virtue is due to a Persian vizir who ruled the empire under the reigns of Alp Arslan and his son Nizam one of the most illustrious ministers of the East was honoured by the caliph as an oracle of religion and science he was trusted by the sultan as the faithful vicegerent of his power and justice After an administration of thirty years the fame of the vizir his wealth and even his services were transformed into crimes He was overthrown by the insidious arts of a woman and a rival and his fall was hastened by a rash declaration that his cap and inkhorn the badges of his office were connected by the divine decree with the throne and diadem of the sultan At the age of ninety three years the venerable statesman was dismissed by his master accused by his enemies, and murdered by a fanatic the last words of Nizam attested his innocence, and the remainder of Malek's life was short and inglorious From Ispahan the scene of this disgraceful transaction the sultan moved to Bagdad with the design of transplanting the caliph and of fixing his own residence in the capital of the Moslem world The feeble successor of Mohammed obtained a respite of ten days, and before the expiration of the term the barbarian was summoned by the angel of death His ambassadors at Constantinople had asked in marriage a Roman princess but the proposal was decently eluded and the daughter of Alexius who might herself have been the victim expresses her abhorrence of this unnatural conjunction [46] The daughter of the sultan was bestowed on the caliph Moctadi with the imperious condition that renouncing the society of his wives and concubines he should for ever confine himself to this honourable alliance

tre,[29] and the hordes of Turkmans overspread the plains of the Western Asia. After the death of Malek the bands of union and subordination were relaxed and finally dissolved: the indulgence of the house of Seljuk invested their slaves with the inheritance of kingdoms; and in the Oriental style a crowd of princes arose from the dust of their feet.[30]

A prince of the royal line, Cutulmish, the son of Izrail, the son of Seljuk, had fallen in a battle against Alp Arslan: and the humane victor had dropped a tear over his grave. His five sons, strong in arms, ambitious of power, and eager for revenge, unsheathed their scimitars against the son of Alp Arslan. The two armies expected the signal, when the caliph, forgetful of the majesty which secluded him from vulgar eyes, interposed his venerable mediation. "Instead of shedding the blood of your brethren, your brethren both in descent and faith, unite your forces in a holy war against the Greeks, the enemies of God and his apostle." They listened to his voice; the sultan embraced his rebellious kinsmen; and the eldest, the valiant Soliman, accepted the royal standard, which gave him the free conquest and hereditary command of the provinces of the Roman empire, from Arzeroum to Constantinople and the unknown regions of the West.[31] Accompanied by his four brothers, he passed the Euphrates: the Turkish camp was soon seated in the neighbourhood of Kutaieh in Phrygia; and his flying cavalry laid waste the country as far as the Hellespont and the Black Sea. Since the decline of the empire the peninsula of Asia Minor had been exposed to the transient though destructive inroads of the Persians and Saracens; but the fruits of a lasting conquest were reserved for the Turkish sultan; and his arms were introduced by the Greeks, who aspired to reign on the ruins of their country. Since the captivity of Romanus six years the feeble son of Eudocia had trembled under the weight of the Imperial crown, till the provinces of the East and West were lost in the same month by a double rebellion: of either chief Nicephorus was the common name; but the surnames of Bryennius and Botoniates distinguish the European and Asiatic candidates. Their reasons, or rather their promises, were weighed in the divan; and, after some hesitation, Soliman declared himself in favour of Botoniates, opened a free passage to his troops in their march from Antioch to Nice, and joined the banner of the crescent to that of the cross. After his ally had ascended the throne of Constantinople, the sultan was hospitably entertained in the suburb of Chrysopolis or Scutari; and a body of two thousand Turks was transported into Europe, to whose dexterity and courage the new emperor was indebted for the defeat and captivity of his rival Bryennius. But the conquest of Europe was dearly purchased by the sacrifice of Asia: Constantinople was deprived of the obedience and revenue of the provinces beyond the Bosphorus and Hellespont; and the regular progress of the Turks, who fortified the passes of the rivers and mountains, left not a hope of their retreat or expulsion. Another candidate implored the aid of the sultan: Melissenus, in his purple robes and red buskins, attended the motions of the Turkish camp; and the desponding cities were tempted by the summons of a Roman prince, who immediately surrendered them into the hands of the barbarians. These acquisitions were confirmed by a treaty of peace with the emperor Alexius: his fear of Robert compelled him to seek the friendship of Soliman; and it was not till after the sultan's death that he extended as far as Nicomedia, about sixty miles from Constantinople, the eastern boundary of the Roman world. Since the first conquests of the caliphs, the establishment of the Turks in Anatolia or Asia Minor was the most deplorable loss which the church and empire had sustained. By the propagation of the Moslem faith, Soliman deserved the name of Gazi, a holy champion; and his new kingdom of the Romans, or of Roum, was added to the tables of Oriental geography. It is described as extending from the Euphrates to Constantinople, from the Black Sea to the confines of Syria; pregnant with mines of silver and iron, of alum and copper, fruitful in corn and wine, and productive of cattle and excellent horses.[a] The wealth of Lydia, the arts of the Greeks, the splendour of the Augustan age, existed only in books and ruins, which were equally obscure in the eyes of the Scythian conquerors. Yet in the present decay Anatolia still contains some wealthy and populous cities; and, under the Byzantine empire, they were far more flourishing in numbers, size, and opulence. By the choice of the sultan, Nice, the metropolis of Bithynia, was preferred for his palace and fortress: the seat of the Seljukian dynasty of Roum was planted one hundred miles from Constantinople; and the divinity of Christ was denied and derided in the same temple in which it had been pronounced by the first general synod of the Catholics The unity of God and the mission of Mohammed were preached in the moschs the Arabian learning was taught in the schools the Cadhis judged according to the law of the Koran, the Turkish manners and language prevailed in the cities and Turkman camps were scattered over the plains and mountains of Anatolia On the hard conditions of tribute and servitude the Greek Christians might enjoy the exercise of their religion but their most holy churches were profaned their priests and bishops were insulted [53] they were compelled to suffer the triumph of the pagans and the apostasy of their brethren many thousand children were marked by the knife of circumcision, and many thousand captives were devoted to the service or the pleasures of their masters [54] After the loss of Asia Antioch still maintained her primitive allegiance to Christ and Cæsar but the solitary province was separated from all Roman aid and surrounded on all sides by the Mohammedan powers The despair of Philaretus the governor prepared the sacrifice of his religion and loyalty had not his guilt been prevented by his son who hastened to the Nicene palace and offered to deliver this valuable prize into the hands of Soliman The ambitious sultan mounted on horseback and in twelve nights (for he reposed in the day) performed a march of six hundred miles Antioch was oppressed by the speed and secrecy of his enterprise and the dependent cities as far as Laodicea and the confines of Aleppo [55] obeyed the example of the metropolis From Laodicea to the Thracian Bosphorus or arm of St George the conquests and reign of Soliman extended thirty days journey in length and in breadth about ten or fifteen between the rocks of Lycia and the Black Sea [56] The Turkish ignorance of navigation protected for a while the inglorious safety of the emperor but no sooner had a fleet of two hundred ships been constructed by the hands of the captive Greeks than Alexius trembled behind the walls of his capital His plaintive epistles were dispersed over Europe to excite the compassion of the Latins and to paint the danger the weakness and the riches of the city of Constantine [57]

But the most interesting conquest of the Seljukian Turks was that of Jerusalem [58] which soon became the theatre of nations In their capitulation with Omar, the inhabitants had stipulated the assurance of their religion and property, but the articles were interpreted by a master against whom it was dangerous to dispute and in the four hundred years of the reign of the caliphs the political climate of Jerusalem was exposed to the vicissitudes of storms and sunshine [59] By the increase of proselytes and population the Mohammedans might excuse their usurpation of three fourths of the city but a peculiar quarter was reserved for the patriarch with his clergy and people, a tribute of two pieces of gold was the price of protection and the sepulchre of Christ, with the church of the Resurrection was still left in the hands of his votaries Of these votaries the most numerous and respectable portion were strangers to Jerusalem the pilgrimages to the Holy Land had been stimulated rather than suppressed by the conquest of the Arabs, and the enthusiasm which had always prompted these perilous journeys was nourished by the congenial passions of grief and indignation A crowd of pilgrims from the East and West continued to visit the holy sepulchre and the adjacent sanctuaries more especially at the festival of Easter and the Greeks and Latins the Nestorians and Jacobites, the Copts and Abyssinians the Armenians and Georgians maintained the chapels, the clergy and the poor of their respective communions The harmony of prayer in so many various tongues the worship of so many nations in the common temple of their religion might have afforded a spectacle of edification and peace, but the zeal of the Christian sects was embittered by hatred and revenge and in the kingdom of a suffering Messiah who had pardoned his enemies they aspired to command and persecute their spiritual brethren The preeminence was asserted by the spirit and numbers of the Franks and the greatness of Charlemagne [60] protected both the Latin pilgrims and the Catholics of the East The poverty of Carthage Alexandria and Jerusalem was relieved by the alms of that pious emperor and many monasteries of Palestine were founded or restored by his liberal devotion Harun Alrashid the greatest of the Abbassides esteemed in his Christian brother a similar supremacy of genius and power their friendship was cemented by a frequent intercourse of gifts and embassies and the caliph, without resigning the substantial dominion presented the emperor with the keys of the holy sepulchre and perhaps of the city of Jerusalem In the decline of the Carlovingian monarchy the republic of Amalphi promoted the interest of trade and religion in the East. Her vessels transported the Latin pilgrims to the coasts of Egypt and Palestine and deserved by their useful imports, the favour and alliance of the Fatimite caliphs [61] an annual fair was instituted on Mount Calvary and the Italian merchants founded the convent and hospital of St. John of Jerusalem the cradle of the monastic and military order which has since resigned in the isles of Rhodes and of Malta Had the Christian pilgrims been content to revere the tomb of a prophet the disciples of Mohammed instead of blaming would have imitated their piety but these rigid Unitarians were scandalised by a worship which represents the birth death and resurrection of a God the Catholic images were branded with the name of idols and the Moslems smil d with indignation[62] at the miraculous flame which was kindled on the eve of Easter in the holy sepulchre [63] This pious fraud first devised in the ninth century [64] was devoutly cherished by the Latin crusaders and is annually repeated by the clergy of the Greek Armenian and Coptic sects [6] who impose on the credulous spectators[66] for their own benefit and that of their tyrants In every age a principle of toleration has been fortified by a sense of interest and the revenue of the prince and his emir was increased each year by the expense and tribute of so many thousand strangers

The revolution which transferred the sceptre from the Abbassides to the Fatimites was a benefit rather than an injury to the Holy Land A sov reign resident in Egypt was more sensible of the importance of Christian trade and the emirs of Palestine were less remote from the justice and power of the throne But the third of these Fatimite caliphs was the famous Hakem [67] a frantic youth who was delivered by his impiety and despotism from the fear either of God or man and whose reign was a wild mixture of vice and folly Regardless of the most ancient customs of Egypt he imposed on the women an absolute confinement the restraint excited the clamours of both sexes their clamours provoked his fury a part of Old Cairo was deli ered to the flames and the guards and citizens were engaged many days in a bloody conflict At first the caliph declared himself a zealous Musulman the founder or benefactor of moschs and colleges twelve hundred and ninety copies of the Koran were transcribed at his expense in letters of gold and his edict extirpated the vineyards of the Upper Egypt. But his vanity was soon flattered by the hope of introducing a new religion he aspired above the fame of a proph t and styled himself the visible image of the Most High God who after nine apparitions on earth, was at length manifest in his royal person At the name of Hakem the lord of the living and the dead every knee was bent in religious adoration his mysteries were performed on a mountain near Cairo sixteen thousand converts had signed his profession of faith and at the present hour a free and warlike people the Druses of Mount Libanus are persuaded of the life and divinity of a madman and tyrant [68] In his divine character Hakem hated the Jews and Christians as the servants of his rivals while some remains of prejudice or prudence still pleaded in favour of the law of Mohammed Both in Egypt and Palestine his cruel and wanton persecution made some martyrs and many apostates the common rights and special privileges of the sectaries were equally disregarded and a general interdict was laid on the devotion of strangers and natives The temple of the Christian world the church of the Resurrection was demolished to its foundations the luminous prodigy of Easter was interrupted and much profane labour was exhausted to destroy the cave in the rock which properly constitutes the holy sepulchre At the report of this sacrilege the nations of Europe were astonished and afflicted but instead of arming in the defence of the Holy Land they contented themselves with burning or banishing the Jews as the secret advisers of the impious barbarian [69] Yet the calamities of Jerusalem were in some measure alleviated by the inconstancy or repentance of Hakem himself and the royal mandate was sealed for the restitution of the churches when the tyrant was assassinated by the emissaries of his sister The succeeding caliphs resumed the maxims of religion and policy a free toleration was again granted with the pious aid of the emperor of Constantinople the holy sepulchre arose from its ruins and after a short abstinence the pilgrims returned with an increase of appetite to the spiritual feast [70] In the sea voyage of Palestine the dangers were frequent and the opportunities rare but the conversion of Hungary opened a safe communication between Germany and Greece The charity of St. Stephen the apostle of his kingdom relieved and conducted his itinerant brethren [71] and from Belgrade to Antioch they traversed fifteen hundred miles of a Christian empire Among the Franks the zeal of pilgrimage prevailed beyond the example of former times and the roads were covered with multitudes of either sex and of every rank, who professed their contempt of life so soon as they should have kissed the tomb of their Redeemer Princes and prelates abandon contended with Urban for the name and honours of the pontificate He attempted to unite the powers of the West, at a time when the princes were separated from the church and the people from their princes by the excommunication which himself and his predecessors had thundered against the emperor and the king of France Philip the First of France supported with patience the censures which he had provoked by his scandalous life and adulterous marriage Henry the Fourth of Germany asserted the right of investitures the prerogative of confirming his bishops by the delivery of the ring and crosier But the emperor s party was crushed in Italy by the arms of the Normans and the countess Mathilda, and the long quarrel had been recently envenomed by the revolt of his son Conrad and the shame of his wife [5] who in the synods of Constance and Placentia confessed the manifold prostitutions to which she had been exposed by a husband regardless of her honour and his own [6] So popular was the cause of Urban so weighty was his influence that the council which he summoned at Placentia[7] was composed of two hundred bishops of Italy, France Burgundy Swabia and Bavaria Four thousand of the clergy and thirty thousand of the laity attended this important meeting and, as the most spacious cathedral would have been inadequate to the multitude the session of seven days was held in a plain adjacent to the city The ambassadors of the Greek emperor Alexius Comnenus were introduced to plead the distress of their sovereign and the danger of Constantinople which was divided only by a narrow sea from the victorious Turks the common enemies of the Christian name In their suppliant address they flattered the pride of the Latin princes and appealing at once to their policy and religion exhorted them to repel the barbarians on the confines of Asia rather than to expect them in the heart of Europe At the sad tale of the misery and perils of their Eastern brethren the assembly burst into tears the most eager champions declared their readiness to march and the Greek ambassadors were dismissed with the assurance of a speedy and powerful succour

The relief of Constantinople was included in the larger and most distant project of the deliverance of Jerusalem, but the prudent Urban adjourned the final decision to a second synod which he proposed to celebrate in some city of France in the autumn of the same year The short delay would propagate the flame of enthusiasm, and his firmest hope was in a nation of soldiers[8] still proud of the pre eminence of their name and ambitious to emulate their hero Charlemagne [9] who in the popular romance of Turpin [10] had achieved the conquest of the Holy Land A latent motive of affection or vanity might influence the choice of Urban he was himself a native of France, a monk of Clugny, and the first of his countrymen who ascended the throne of St Peter The pope had illustrated his family and province nor is there perhaps a more exquisite gratification than to revisit in a conspicuous dignity, the humble and laborious scenes of our youth

It may occasion some surprise that the Roman pontiff should erect in the heart of France the tribunal from whence he hurled his anathemas against the king but our surprise will vanish so soon as we form a just estimate of a king of France of the eleventh century [11] Philip the First was the great grandson of Hugh Capet, the founder of the present race who in the decline of Charlemagne s posterity added the regal title to his patrimonial estates of Paris and Orleans In this narrow compass he was possessed of wealth and jurisdiction but in the rest of France Hugh and his first descendants were no more than the feudal lords of about sixty dukes and counts of independent and hereditary power,[12] who disdained the control of laws and legal assemblies and whose disregard of their sovereign was revenged by the disobedience of their inferior vassals At Clermont in the territories of the count of Auvergne [13] the pope might brave with impunity the resentment of Philip and the council which he convened in that city was not less numerous or respectable than the synod of Placentia [14] Besides his court and council of Roman cardinals he was supported by thirteen archbishops and two hundred and twenty five bishops, the number of mitred prelates was computed at four hundred and the fathers of the church were blessed by the saints and enlightened by the doctors of the age From the adjacent kingdoms a martial train of lords and knights of power and renown attended the council [15] in high expectation of its resolves and such was the ardour of zeal and curiosity that the city was filled and many thousands in the month of November erected their tents or huts in the open field A session of eight days produced some useful or edifying canons for the reformation of manners a severe censure was pronounced against the licence of private war the Truce of God[16] was confirmed a suspension of hostilities during four days of the week women and priests were placed under the safe guard of the church and a protection of three years was extended to husbandmen and merchants the defenceless victims of military rapine But a law however venerable be the sanction cannot suddenly transform the temper of the times and the benevolent efforts of Urban deserve the less praise since he laboured to appease some domestic quarrels that he might spread the flames of war from the Atlantic to the Euphrates From the synod of Placentia the rumour of his great design had gone forth among the nations the clergy on their return had preached in every diocese the merit and glory of the deliverance of the Holy Land and when the pope ascended a lofty scaffold in the market place of Clermont his eloquence was addressed to a well prepared and impatient audience His topics were obvious his exhortation was vehement his success inevitable The orator was interrupted by the shout of thousands who with one voice and in their rustic idiom exclaimed aloud God wills it, God wills it![17] It is indeed the will of God replied the pope and let this memorable word the inspiration surely of the Holy Spirit, be for ever adopted as your cry of battle, to animate the devotion and courage of the champions of Christ His cross is the symbol of your salvation wear it, a red a bloody cross as an external mark on your breasts or shoulders as a pledge of your sacred and irrevocable engagement The proposal was joyfully accepted great numbers both of the clergy and laity impressed on their garments the sign of the cross[18] and solicited the pope to march at their head This dangerous honour was declined by the more prudent successor of Gregory who alleged the schism of the church and the duties of his pastoral office recommending to the faithful who were disqualified by sex or profession by age or infirmity to aid with their prayers and alms the personal service of their robust brethren The name and powers of his legate he devolved on Adhemar bishop of Puy the first who had received the cross at his hands The foremost of the temporal chiefs was Raymond count of Toulouse whose ambassadors in the council excused the absence and pledged the honour of their master After the confession and absolution of their sins the champions of the cross were dismissed with a superfluous admonition to invite their countrymen and friends and their departure for the Holy Land was fixed to the festival of the Assumption the fifteenth of August, of the ensuing year[19]

So familiar and as it were so natural to man is the practice of violence that our indulgence allows the slightest provocation the most disputable right, as a sufficient ground of national hostility But the name and nature of a holy war demands a more rigorous scrutiny nor can we hastily believe that the servants of the Prince of Peace would unsheathe the sword of destruction unless the motive were pure the quarrel legitimate and the necessity inevitable The policy of an action may be determined from the tardy lessons of experience but before we act our conscience should be satisfied of the justice and propriety of our enterprise In the age of the crusades the Christians both of the East and West, were persuaded of their lawfulness and merit their arguments are clouded by the perpetual abuse of Scripture and rhetoric but they seem to insist on the right of natural and religious defence their peculiar title to the Holy Land and the impiety of their Pagan and Mohammedan foes.[20] I The right of a just defence may fairly include our civil and spiritual allies it depends on the existence of danger and that danger must be estimated by the twofold consideration of the malice and the power of our enemies A pernicious tenet has been imputed to the Mohammedans, the duty of extirpating all other religions by the sword This charge of ignorance and bigotry is refuted by the Koran by the history of the Musulman conquerors and by their public and legal toleration of the Christian worship But it cannot be denied that the Oriental churches are depressed under their iron yoke that, in peace and war they assert a divine and indefeasible claim of universal empire and that in their orthodox creed the unbelieving nations are continually threatened with the loss of religion or liberty In the eleventh century the victorious arms of the Turks presented a real and urgent apprehension of these losses They had subdued in less than thirty years the kingdoms of Asia as far as Jerusalem and the Hellespont and the Greek empire tottered on the verge of destruction Besides an honest sympathy for their brethren the Latins had a right and interest in the support of Constantinople the most important barrier of the West and the privilege of defence must reach to prevent, as well as to repel an impending assault But this salutary purpose might have been accomplished by a moderate succour and our calmer reason must disclaim the innumerable hosts and remote operations which overwhelmed Asia and depopulated Europe II Palestine could add nothing to the strength or safety of the Latins and fanaticism alone could pretend to justify the conquest of that distant and narrow province The Christians affirmed that their inalienable title to the promised land had been sealed by the blood of their divine Saviour it was their right and duty to rescue their inheritance from the unjust possessors who profaned his sepulchre, and oppressed the pilgrimage of his disciples Vainly would it be alleged that the pre-eminence of Jerusalem and the sanctity of Palestine have been abolished with the Mosaic law that the God of the Christians is not a local deity and that the recovery of Bethlehem or Calvary his cradle or his tomb will not atone for the violation of the moral precepts of the Gospel Such arguments glance aside from the leaden shield of superstition and the religious mind will not easily relinquish its hold on the sacred ground of mystery and miracle III But the holy wars which have been waged in every climate of the globe from Egypt to Livonia and from Peru to Hindostan require the support of some more general and flexible tenet It has been often supposed and sometimes affirmed that a difference of religion is a worthy cause of hostility that obstinate unbelievers may be slain or subdued by the champions of the cross and that grace is the sole fountain of dominion as well as of mercy Above four hundred years before the first crusade the eastern and western provinces of the Roman empire had been acquired about the same time, and in the same manner by the barbarians of Germany and Arabia Time and treaties had legitimated the conquests of the Christian Franks but in the eyes of their subjects and neighbours the Mohammedan princes were still tyrants and usurpers who by the arms of war or rebellion might be lawfully driven from their unlawful possession [21]

As the manners of the Christians were relaxed, their discipline of penance[22] was enforced and with the multiplication of sins the remedies were multiplied In the primitive church a voluntary and open confession prepared the work of atonement. In the middle ages the bishops and priests interrogated the criminal compelled him to account for his thoughts words and actions and prescribed the terms of his reconciliation with God But as this discretionary power might alternately be abused by indulgence and tyranny a rule of discipline was framed to inform and regulate the spiritual judges This mode of legislation was invented by the Greeks their penitentials[23] were translated or imitated in the Latin church and in the time of Charlemagne the clergy of every diocese were provided with a code, which they prudently concealed from the knowledge of the vulgar In this dangerous estimate of crimes and punishments each case was supposed each difference was remarked by the experience or penetration of the monks, some sins are enumerated which innocence could not have suspected and others which reason cannot believe and the more ordinary offences of fornication and adultery of perjury and sacrilege of rapine and murder were expiated by a penance which according to the various circumstances was prolonged from forty days to seven years During this term of mortification the patient was healed the criminal was absolved by a salutary regimen of fasts and prayers the disorder of his dress was expressive of grief and remorse, and he humbly abstained from all the business and pleasure of social life But the rigid execution of these laws would have depopulated the palace the camp and the city the barbarians of the West believed and trembled but nature often rebelled against principle and the magistrate laboured without effect to enforce the jurisdiction of the priest A liberal accomplishment of penance was indeed impracticable the guilt of adultery was multiplied by daily repetition that of homicide might involve the massacre of a whole people each act was separately numbered and in those times of anarchy and vice a modest sinner might easily incur a debt of three hundred years His insolvency was relieved by a commutation or indulgence a year of penance was appreciated at twenty six solidi[24] of silver about four pounds sterling for the rich at three solidi or nine shillings for the indigent and these alms were soon appropriated to the use of the church which derived from the redemption of sins an inexhaustible source of opulence and dominion A debt of three hundred years or twelve hundred pounds, was enough to impoverish a plentiful fortune the scarcity of gold and silver was supplied by the alienation of land, and the princely donations of Pepin and Charlemagne are expressly given for the remedy of their soul It is a maxim of the civil law, that whosoever cannot pay with his purse must pay with his body and the practice of flagellation was adopted by the monks—a cheap though painful equivalent. By a fantastic arithmetic a year of penance was taxed at three thousand lashes [25] and such was the skill and patience of a famous hermit St. Dominic of the Iron Cuirass [26] that in six days he could discharge an entire century by a whipping of three hundred thousand stripes His example was followed by many penitents of both sexes and as a vicarious sacrifice was accepted a sturdy disciplinarian might expiate on his own back the sins of his benefactors [27] These compensations of the purse and the person introduced in the eleventh century a more honourable mode of satisfaction The merit of military service against the Saracens of Africa and Spain had been allowed by the predecessors of Urban the Second In the council of Clermont that pope proclaimed a plenary indulgence to those who should enlist under the banner of the cross the absolution of all their sins and a full receipt for all that might be due of canonical penance [28] The cold philosophy of modern times is incapable of feeling the impression that was made on a sinful and fanatic world At the voice of their pastor the robber the incendiary the homicide arose by thousands to redeem their souls by repeating on the infidels the same deeds which they had exercised against their Christian brethren and the terms of atonement were eagerly embraced by offenders of every rank and denomination None were pure none were exempt from the guilt and penalty of sin and those who were the least amenable to the justice of God and the church were the best entitled to the temporal and eternal recompense of their pious courage. If they fell the spirit of the Latin clergy did not hesitate to adorn their tomb with the crown of martyrdom [29] and should they survive they could expect without impatience the delay and increase of their heav nly reward They offered their blood to the Son of God who had laid down his life for their salvation they took up the cross and entered with confidence into the way of the Lord His providence would watch over their safety perhaps his visible and miraculous power would smooth the difficulties of their holy enterprise. The cloud and pillar of Jehovah had marched before the Israelites into the promised land. Might not the Christians more reasonably hope that the rivers would open for their passage that the walls of the strongest cities would fall at the sound of their trumpets and that the sun would be arrested in his mid-career to allow them time for the destruction of the infidels?

Of the chiefs and soldiers who marched to the holy sepulchre, I will dare to affirm that all were prompted by the spirit of enthusiasm the belief of merit the hope of reward and the assurance of divine aid But I am equally persuaded that in many it was not the sole that in some it was not the leading principle of action The use and abuse of religion are feeble to stem they are strong and irresistible to impel the stream of national manners Against the private wars of the barbarians their bloody tournaments licentious loves and judicial duels, the popes and synods might ineffectually thunder It is a more easy task to provoke the metaphysical disputes of the Greeks, to drive into the cloister the victims of anarchy or despotism to sanctify the patience of slaves and cowards or to assume the merit of the humanity and benevolence of modern Christians War and exercise were the reigning passions of the Franks or Latins they were enjoined as a penance to gratify those passions to visit distant lands and to draw their swords against the nations of the East. Their victory or even their attempt, would immortalise the names of the intrep d heroes of the cross and the purest piety could not be insensible to the most splendid prospect of military glory In the petty quarrels of Europe they shed the blood of their friends and countrymen for the acquisition perhaps of a castle or a village They could march with alacrity against the distant and hostile nations who were devoted to their arms their fancy already grasped the golden sceptres of Asia and the conques of Apulia and Sicily by the Normans might exalt to royalty the hopes of the most private adventurer Christendom in her rudest state must have yielded to the climate and cultivation of the Mohammedan countries and their natural and artificial wealth had been magnified by the tales of pilgrims and the gifts of an imperfect commerce The vulgar both the great and small were taught to believe every wonder of lands flowing with milk and honey of mines and treasures of gold and diamonds, of palaces of marble and jasper and of odoriferous groves of cinnamon and frankincense In this earthly paradise each warrior depended on his sword to carve a plenteous and honourable establishment, which he measured only by the extent of his wishes [30] Their vassals and soldiers trusted their fortunes to God and their master the spoils of a Turkish emir might enrich the meanest follower of the camp and the flavour of the wines the beauty of the Grecian women [31] were temptations more adapted to the nature, than to the profession of the champions of the cross. The love of freedom their colonies were numerous and rich and they enjoyed under the protection of the emperor and the bishops, the free exercise of their religion[36] At Verdun Trèves Mentz Spires Worms, many thousands of that unhappy people were pillaged and massacred[37] nor had they felt a more bloody stroke since the persecution of Hadrian A remnant was saved by the firmness of their bishops who accepted a feigned and transient conversion but the more obstinate Jews opposed their fanaticism to the fanaticism of the Christians barricadoed their houses and precipitating themselves their families and their wealth into the rivers or the flames disappointed the malice or at least the avarice, of their implacable foes

Between the frontiers of Austria and the seat of the Byzantine monarchy the crusaders were compelled to traverse an interval of six hundred miles the wild and desolate countries of Hungary[38] and Bulgaria The soil is fruitful and intersected with rivers but it was then covered with morasses and forests, which spread to a boundless extent whenever man has ceased to exercise his dominion over the earth Both nations had imbibed the rudiments of Christianity the Hungarians were ruled by their native princes the Bulgarians by a lieutenant of the Greek emperor but on the slightest provocation their ferocious nature was rekindled and ample provocation was afforded by the disorders of the first pilgrims Agriculture must have been unskilful and languid among a people whose cities were built of reeds and timber which were deserted in the summer season for the tents of hunters and shepherds A scanty supply of provisions was rudely demanded forcibly seized and greedily consumed and on the first quarrel the crusaders gave a loose to indignation and revenge But their ignorance of the country of war and of disciplin exposed them to every snare The Greek præfect of Bulgaria commanded a regular force at the trumpet of the Hungarian king the eighth or the tenth of his martial subjects bent their bows and mounted on horseback their policy was insidious and their retaliation on these pious robbers was unrelenting and bloody[39] About a third of the naked fugitives and the hermit Peter was of the number escaped to the Thracian mountains and the emperor who respected the pilgrimage and succour of the Latins conducted them by secure and easy journeys to Constantinople and advised them to await the arrival of their brethren. For a while they remembered their faults and losses, but no sooner were they revived by the hospitable entertainment than their venom was again inflamed, they stung their benefactor and neither gardens nor palaces nor churches were safe from their depredations For his own safety, Alexius allured them to pass over to the Asiatic side of the Bosphorus but their blind impetuosity soon urged them to desert the station which he had assigned and to rush headlong against the Turks who occupied the road of Jerusalem. The hermit, conscious of his shame had withdrawn from the camp to Constantinople and his lieutenant, Walter the Penniless who was worthy of a better command attempted without success to introduce some order and prudence among the herd of savages. They separated in quest of prey and themselves fell an easy prey to the arts of the sultan By a rumour that their foremost companions were rioting in the spoils of his capital Soliman tempted the main body to descend into the plain of Nice they were overwhelmed by the Turkish arrows, and a pyramid of bones[40] informed their companions of the place of their defeat Of the first crusaders, three hundred thousand had already perished before a single city was rescued from the infidels before their graver and more noble brethren had completed the preparations of their enterprise[41]

None of the great sovereigns of Europe embarked their persons in the first crusade The emperor Henry the Fourth was not disposed to obey the summons of the pope Philip the First of France was occupied by his pleasures William Rufus of England by a recent conquest the kings of Spain were engaged in a domestic war against the Moors and the northern monarchs of Scotland Denmark,[42] Sweden and Poland were yet strangers to the passions and interests of the South The religious ardour was more strongly felt by the princes of the second order who held an important place in the feudal system. Their situation will naturally cast under four distinct heads the review of their names and characters but I may escape some needless repetition by observing at once that courage and the exercise of arms are the common attribute of these Christian adventurers. I The first rank both in war and council is justly due to Godfrey of Bouillon and happy would it have been for the crusaders if they had trusted themselves to the sole conduct of that accomplished hero a worthy representative of Charlemagne from whom he was descended in the female line His father was of the noble race of the counts of Boulogne Brabant the lower

was a powerful incitement to the multitudes who were oppressed by feudal or ecclesiastical tyranny Under this holy sign the peasants and burghers who were attached to the servitude of the glebe, might escape from a haughty lord and transplant themselves and their families to a land of liberty The monk might release him self from the discipline of his convent the debtor might suspend the accumulation of usury and the pursuit of his creditors and out laws and malefactors of every cast might con tinue to brave the laws and elude the punish ment of their crimes [32]

These motives were potent and numerous when we have singly computed their weight on the mind of each individual we must add the infinite series the multiplying powers of example and fashion The first proselytes be came the warmest and most effectual mis sionaries of the cross among their friends and countrymen they preached the duty, the merit, and the recompense of their holy vow and the most reluctant hearers were insensibly drawn within the whirlpool of persuasion and au thority The martial youths were fired by the reproach or suspicion of cowardice the op portunity of visiting with an army the sepul chre of Christ was embraced by the old and in firm by women and children who consulted rather their zeal than their strength and those who in the evening had derided the folly of their companions were the most eager, the en suing day to tread in their footsteps The ig norance which magnified the hopes diminished the perils of the enterprise Since the Turkish conquest the paths of pilgrimage were ob literated, the chiefs themselves had an im perfect notion of the length of the way and the state of their enemies and such was the stupid ity of the people that at the sight of the first city or castle beyond the limits of their knowl edge they were ready to ask whether that was not the Jerusalem the term and object of their labours Yet the more prudent of the cru saders who were not sure that they should be fed from heaven with a shower of quails or manna provided themselves with those pre cious metals which in every country are the representatives of every commodity To defray according to their rank the expenses of the road princes alienated their provinces nobles their lands and castles peasants their cattle and the instruments of husbandry The value of property was depreciated by the eager compe tition of multitudes while the price of arms and horses was raised to an exorbitant height by the wants and impatience of the buyers [33] Those who remained at home with sense and money were enriched by the epidemical dis ease the sovereigns acquired at a cheap rate the domains of their vassals and the eccles astical purchasers completed the payment by the assurance of their prayers The cross which was commonly sewed on the garment in cloth or silk was inscribed by some zealots on their skin an hot iron or indelible liquor was ap plied to perpetuate the mark and a crafty monk who showed the miraculous impression on his breast was repaid with the popular veneration and richest benefices of Palestine.[34]

The fifteenth of August had been fixed in the council of Clermont for the departure of the pilgrims but the day was anticipated by the thoughtless and needy crowd of plebeians and I shall briefly despatch the calamities which they inflicted and suffered before I enter on the more serious and successful enterprise of the chiefs Early in the spring from the confines of France and Lorraine above sixty thousand of the populace of both sexes flocked round the first missionary of the crusade and pressed him with clamorous importunity to lead them to the holy sepulchre The hermit assuming the character without the talents or authority of a general impelled or obeyed the forward im pulse of his votaries along the banks of the Rhine and Danube Their wants and numbers soon compelled them to separate, and his lieutenant Walter the Penniless a valiant though needy soldier conducted a vanguard of pilgrims whose condition may be determined from the proportion of eight horsemen to fifteen thousand foot The example and foot steps of Peter were closely pursued by another fanatic the monk Godescal whose sermons had swept away fifteen or twenty thousand peasants from the villages of Germany Their rear was again pressed by a herd of two hundred thousand the most stupid and savage refuse of the people who mingled with their devotion a brutal licence of rapine prostitution and drunkenness Some counts and gentlemen at the head of three thousand horse attended the motions of the multitude to partake in the spoil but their genuine leaders (may we credit such folly?) were a goose and a goat who were carried in the front and to whom these worthy Christians ascribed an infusion of the divine spirit [35] Of these and of other bands of enthusi asts the first and most easy warfare was against the Jews the murderers of the Son of God In the trading cities of the Moselle and the Rhine

the last to depart, the delay may be excused by the greatness of his preparation and the promise of an everlasting farewell [V] The name of Bohemond the son of Robert Guiscard was already famous by his double victory over the Greek emperor but his father's will had reduced him to the principality of Tarentum and the remembrance of his Eastern trophies till he was awakened by the rumour and passage of the French pilgrims It is in the person of this Norman chief that we may seek for the coolest policy and ambition with a small allay of religious fanaticism His conduct may justify a belief that he had secretly directed the design of the pope which he affected to second with astonishment and zeal at the siege of Amalphi his example and discourse inflamed the passions of a confederate army he instantly tore his garment to supply crosses for the numerous candidates and prepared to visit Constantinople and Asia at the head of ten thousand horse and twenty thousand foot. Several princes of the Norman race accompanied this veteran general and his cousin Tancred[53] was the partner rather than the servant of the war In the accomplished character of Tancred we discover all the virtues of a perfect knight[54] the true spirit of chivalry which inspired the generous sentiments and social offices of man far better than the base philosophy or the baser religion of the times

Between the age of Charlemagne and that of the crusades a revolution had taken place among the Spaniards the Normans and the French which was gradually extended to the rest of Europe The service of the infantry was degraded to the plebeians the cavalry formed the strength of the armies and the honourable name of miles or soldier was confined to the gentlemen[55] who served on horseback and were invested with the character of knighthood The dukes and counts who had usurped the rights of sovereignty divided the provinces among their faithful barons the barons distributed among their vassals the fiefs or benefices of their jurisdiction and these military tenants the peers of each other and of their lord composed the noble or equestrian order which disdained to conceive the peasant or burgher as of the same species with themselves The dignity of their birth was preserved by pure and equal alliances their sons alone who could produce four quarters or lines of ancestry without spot or reproach, might legally pretend to the honour of knighthood but a valiant plebeian was sometimes enriched and ennobled by the sword and became the father of a new race A single knight could impart according to his judgment the character which he received and the warlike sovereigns of Europe derived more glory from this personal distinction than from the lustre of their diadem. This ceremony of which some traces may be found in Tacitus and the woods of Germany[56] was in its origin simple and profane the candidate after some previous trial was invested with the sword and spurs and his cheek or shoulder was touched with a slight blow as an emblem of the last affront which it was lawful for him to endure But superstition mingled in every public and private action of life in the holy wars it sanctified the profession of arms and the order of chivalry was assimilated in its rights and privileges to the sacred orders of priesthood The bath and white garment of the novice were an indecent copy of the regeneration of baptism his sword which he offered on the altar was blessed by the ministers of religion his solemn reception was preceded by fasts and vigils and he was created a knight in the name of God of St. George and of St. Michael the archangel He swore to accomplish the duties of his profession and education example and the public opinion were the inviolable guardians of his oath. As the champion of God and the ladies (I blush to unite such discordant names) he devoted himself to speak with truth to maintain the right to protect the distressed to practise courtesy a virtue less familiar to the antients to pursue the infidels to despise the allurements of ease and safety and to vindicate in every perilous adventure the honour of his character The abuse of the same spirit provoked the illiterate knight to disdain the arts of industry and peace to esteem himself the sole judge and avenger of his own injuries and proudly to neglect the laws of civil society and military discipline Yet the benefits of this institution to refine the temper of barbarians and to infuse some principles of faith justice and humanity were strongly felt, and have been often observed The asperity of national prejudice was softened and the community of religion and arms spread a similar colour and generous emulation over the face of Christendom. Abroad in enterprise and pilgrimage at home in martial exercise, the warriors of every country were perpetually associated and impartial taste must prefer a Gothic tournament to the Olympic games of classic antiquity[57] Instead of the naked spectacles which corrupted the manners of the Greeks and banished from the stadi province of Lorraine [43] was the inheritance of his mother and by the emperor's bounty he was himself invested with that ducal title which has been improperly transferred to his lordship of Bouillon in the Ardennes [44] In the service of Henry the Fourth he bore the great standard of the empire and pierced with his lance the breast of Rodolph the rebel king Godfrey was the first who ascended the walls of Rome and his sickness, his vow perhaps his re*morse for bearing arms against the pope* con*firmed* an early resolution of visiting the holy sepulchre not as a pilgrim, but a deliverer His valour was matured by prudence and modera tion, his piety, though blind, was sincere and in the tumult of a camp he practised the real and fictitious virtues of a convent Superior to the private factions of the chiefs he reserved his enmity for the enemies of Christ and though he gained a kingdom by the attempt his pure and disinterested zeal was acknowl edged by his rivals Godfrey of Bouillon [45] was accompanied by his two brothers by Eustace the elder who had succeeded to the county of Boulogne and by the younger Baldwin a character of more ambiguous virtue The duke of Lorraine was alike celebrated on either side of the Rhine from his birth and education he was equally conversant with the French and Teutonic languages the barons of France Germany and Lorraine assembled their vas sals and the confederate force that marched under his banner was composed of fourscore thousand foot and about ten thousand horse II In the parliament that was held at Paris in the king s presence about two months after the council of Clermont Hugh count of Verman dois was the most conspicuous of the princes who assumed the cross But the appellation of the Great was applied not so much to his merit or possessions (though neither were contempt ible) as to the royal birth of the brother of the king of France [46] Robert duke of Normandy was the eldest son of William the Conqueror, but on his father s death he was deprived of the kingdom of England by his own indo lence and the activity of his brother Rufus The worth of Robert was degraded by an excessive levity and easiness of temper his cheerfulness seduced him to the indulgence of pleasure his profuse liberality impover ished the prince and people his indiscrimi the clemency multiplied the number of offen property wa he amiable qualities of a private tution of mu the essential defects of a sovereign and horses was rais of ten thousand marks he mortgaged Normandy during his absence to the English usurper [47] but his engagement and behaviour in the holy war announced in Robert a reformation of manners and restored him to some degree to the public esteem Another Robert was count of Flanders a royal province which in this century, gave three queens to the thrones of France, England, and Denmark he was surnamed the Sword and Lance of the Christians, but in the exploits of a soldier he sometimes forgot the duties of a general Stephen, count of Chartres of Blois and of Troyes, was one of the richest princes of h age and the number of his castles has been compared to the three hundred and sixty five days of the year His mind was improved by literature and, in the council of the chiefs, the eloquent Stephen [48] was chosen to discharge the office of their president These four were the principal leaders of the French the Normans, and the pilgrims of the British isles but the list of the barons who were possessed of three or four towns would exceed says a contemporary the catalogue of the Trojan war [49] III In the south of France the command was assumed by Adhemar bishop of Puy, the pope's legate and by Raymond count of St Giles and Toulouse, who added the prouder titles of duke of Narbonne and marquis of Provence The former was a respectable prelate alike qualified for this world and the next The latter was a veteran warrior who had fought against the Saracens of Spain and who consecrated his de clining age not only to the deliverance but to the perpetual service of the holy sepulchre His experience and riches gave him a strong ascendant in the Christian camp whose dis tress he was often able and sometimes willing to relieve But it was e ier for him to extort the praise of the Infidels than to preserve the love of his subjects and associates His eminent quali ties were clouded by a temper haughty en vious, and obstinate and though he resigned an ample patrimony for the cause of God his piety in the public opinion was not exempt from avarice and ambition [50] A mercantile rather than a martial spirit prevailed among his provincials [51] a common name which in cluded the natives of Auvergne and Lan guedoc [52] the vassals of the kingdom of Bur gundy or Arles From the adjacent frontier of Spain he drew a band of hardy adventurers as he marched through Lombardy a crowd of Italians flocked to his standard and his united force consisted of one hundred thousand horse and foot If Raymond was the first to enlist and congratulate himself that he had almost reached the first term of his pilgrimage without drawing his sword against a Christian adversary After an easy and pleasant journey through Lombardy from Turin to Aquileia Raymond and his provincials marched forty days through the savage country of Dalmatia[59] and Sclavonia The weather was a perpetual fog the land was mountainous and desolate the natives were either fugitive or hostile loose in their religion and government, they refused to furnish provisions or guides murdered the stragglers and exercised by night and day the vigilance of the count who derived more security from the punishment of some captive robbers than from his interview and treaty with the prince of Scodra[60] His march between Durazzo and Constantinople was harassed without being stopped by the peasants and soldiers of the Greek emperor and the same faint and ambiguous hostility was prepared for the remaining chiefs who passed the Adriatic from the coast of Italy Bohemond had arms and vessels and foresight and discipline and his name was not forgotten in the provinces of Epirus and Thessaly Whatever obstacles he encountered were surmounted by his military conduct and the valour of Tancred and if the Norman prince affected to spare the Greeks he gorged his soldiers with the full plunder of an heretical castle[61] The nobles of France pressed forwards with the vain and thoughtless ardour of which their nation has been sometimes accused. From the Alps to Apulia the march of Hugh the Great, of the two Roberts and of Stephen of Chartres through a wealthy country and amidst the applauding Catholics was a devout or triumphant progress they kissed the feet of the Roman pontiff and the golden standard of St Peter was delivered to the brother of the French monarch.[62] But in this visit of piety and pleasure they neglected to secure the season and the means of their embarkation the winter was insensibly lost their troops were scattered and corrupted in the towns of Italy They separately accomplished their passage regardless of safety or dignity and within nine months from the feast of the Assumption the day appointed by Urban all the Latin princes had reached Constantinople But the count of Vermandois was produced as a captive his foremost vessels were scattered by a tempest and his person against the law of nations, was detained by the lieutenants of Alexius Yet the arrival of Hugh had been announced by four and twenty knights in golden armour who commanded the emperor to revere the general of the Latin Christians, the brother of the king of kings[63]

In some Oriental tale I have read the fable of a shepherd who was ruined by the accomplishment of his own wishes he had prayed for water the Ganges was turned into his ground and his flock and cottage were swept away by the inundation Such was the fortune or at least the apprehension of the Greek emperor Alexius Comnenus whose name has already appeared in this history and whose conduct is so differently represented by his daughter Anna[64] and by the Latin writers[65] In the council of Placentia his ambassadors had solicited a moderate succour perhaps of ten thousand soldiers but he was astonished by the approach of so many potent chiefs and fanatic nations The emperor fluctuated between hope and fear between timidity and courage but in the crooked policy which he mistook for wisdom I cannot believe I cannot discern that he maliciously conspired against the life or honour of the French heroes The promiscuous multitudes of Peter the Hermit were savage beasts alike destitute of humanity and reason nor was it possible for Alexius to prevent or deplore their destruction The troops of Godfrey and his peers were less contemptible but not less suspicious to the Greek emperor Their motives might be pure and pious but he was equally alarmed by his knowledge of the ambitious Bohemond and his ignorance of the Transalpine chiefs the courage of the French was blind and headstrong they might be tempted by the luxury and wealth of Greece and elated by the view and opinion of their invincible strength and Jerusalem might be forgotten in the prospect of Constantinople After a long march and painful abstinence the troops of Godfrey encamped in the plains of Thrace they heard with indignation that their brother the count of Vermandois was imprisoned by the Greeks and their reluctant duke was compelled to indulge them in some freedom of retaliation and rapine They were appeased by the submission of Alexius he promised to supply their camp and as they refused in the midst of winter to pass the Bosphorus their quarters were assigned among the gardens and palaces on the shores of that narrow sea But an incurable jealousy still rankled in the minds of the two nations, who despised each other as slaves and barbarians Ignorance is the ground of suspicion and suspicion was inflamed into daily provocations prejudice is um the virgins and matrons the pompous dec oration of the lists was crowned with the pres ence of chaste and high born beauty, from whose hands the conqueror received the prize of his dexterity and courage The skill and strength that were exerted in wrestling and boxing bear a distant and doubtful relation to the merit of a soldier but the tournaments as they were in vented in France and eagerly adopted both in the East and West presented a lively image of the business of the field The single combats the general skirmish the defence of a pass or castle were rehearsed as in actual service and the contest both in real and mimic war, was decided by the superior management of the horse and lance The lance was the proper and peculiar weapon of the knight his horse was of a large and heavy breed but this charger till he was roused by the approaching danger was usually led by an attendant and he quietly rode a pad or palfrey of a more easy pace His helmet and sword his greaves and buckler it would be superfluous to describe but I may remark that at the period of the crusades, the armour was less ponderous than in later times and that instead of a massy cuirass his breast was defended by a hauberk or coat of mail When their long lances were fixed in the rest the warriors furiously spurred their horses against the foe and the light cavalry of the Turks and Arabs could seldom stand against the direct and impetuous weight of their charge Each knight was attended to the field by his faithful squire a youth of equal birth and similar hopes he was followed by his archers and men at arms and four or five or six soldiers were computed as the furniture of a complete lance In the expedi tions to the neighbouring kingdoms or the Holy Land the duties of the feudal tenure no longer subsisted the voluntary service of the knights and their followers was either prompted by zeal or attachment or purchased with re wards and promises and the numbers of each squadron were measured by the power the wealth and the fame of each independent chieftain They were distinguished by his banner, his armorial coat and his cry of war and the most ancient families of Europe must seek in these achievements the origin and proof of their nobility In this rapid portrait of chivalry I have been urged to anticipate on the story of the crusades at once an effect and a cause of this memorable institution [55]

Such were the troops and such the leaders who assumed the cross for the deliverance of the holy sepulchre As soon as they were relieved by the absence of the plebeian multitude they encouraged each other by interviews and mes sages to accomplish their vow, and hasten their departure Their wives and sisters were de sirous of partaking the danger and merit of the pilgrimage their portable treasures were con veyed in bars of silver and gold and the princes and barons were attended by their equipage of hounds and hawks to amuse their leisure and to supply their table The difficulty of pro curing subsistence for so many myriads of men and horses engaged them to separate their forces their choice or situation determined the road and it was agreed to meet in the neigh bourhood of Constantinople, and from thence to begin their operations against the Turks From the banks of the Meuse and the Moselle God frey of Bouillon followed the direct way of Ger many Hungary and Bulgaria, and as long as he exercised the sole command every step af forded some proof of his prudence and virtue On the confines of Hungary he was stopped three weeks by a Christian people to whom the name, or at least the abuse of the cross was justly odious The Hungarians still smarted with the wounds which they had received from the first pilgrims in their turn they had abused the right of defence and retaliation, and they had reason to apprehend a severe revenge from a hero of the same nation and who was en gaged in the same cause But after weighing the motives and the events the virtuous duke was content to pity the crimes and misfortunes of his worthless brethren and his twelve deputies the messengers of peace requested in his name a free passage and an equal market To remove their suspicions Godfrey trusted himself and afterwards his brother to the faith of Carloman king of Hungary who treated them with a simple but hospitable entertainment the treaty was sanctified by their common Gospel and a proclamation under pain of death restrained the animosity and licence of the Latin soldiers. From Austria to Belgrade they traversed the plains of Hungary without enduring or offer ing an injury and the proximity of Carloman who hovered on their flanks with his numerous cavalry was a precaution not less useful for their safety than for his own They reached the banks of the Save and no sooner had they passed the river than the king of Hungary restored the hostages and saluted their de parture with the fairest wishes for the success of their enterprise With the same conduct and discipline Godfrey pervaded the woods of Bul garia and the frontiers of Thrace, and might might clearly discern that, however false in friendship he was sincere in his enmity[69] The spirit of chivalry was last subdued in the person of Tancred and none could deem them selves dishonoured by the imitation of that gallant knight. He disdained the gold and flattery of the Greek monarch assaulted in his presence an insolent patrician escaped to Asia in the habit of a private soldier and yielded with a sigh to the authority of Bohemond and the interest of the Christian cause The best and most ostensible reason was the impossibility of passing the sea and accomplishing their vow without the licence and the vessels of Alexius but they cherished a secret hope that, as soon as they trod the continent of Asia their swords would obliterate their shame and dissolve the engagement, which on his side might not be very faithfully performed The ceremony of their homage was grateful to a people who had long since considered pride as the substitute of power High on his throne the emperor sat mute and unmovable his majesty was adored by the Latin princes and they submitted to kiss either his feet or his knees, an indignity which their own writers are ashamed to confess, and unable to deny[70]

Private or public interest suppressed the murmurs of the dukes and counts but a French baron (he is supposed to be Robert of Paris[71]) presumed to ascend the throne, and to place himself by the side of Alexius The sage reproof of Baldwin provoked him to exclaim, in his barbarous idiom Who is this rustic, that keeps his seat while so many valiant captains are standing round him? The emperor maintained his silence dissembled his indignation and questioned his interpreter concerning the meaning of the words which he partly suspected from the universal language of gesture and countenance Before the departure of the pilgrims he endeavoured to learn the name and condition of the audacious baron I am a Frenchman replied Robert of the purest and most ancient nobility of my country All that I know is that there is a church in my neighbourhood[72] the resort of those who are desirous of approving their valour in single combat. Till an enemy appears they address their prayers to God and his saints That church I have frequently visited but never have I found an antagonist who dared to accept my defiance Alexius dismissed the challenger with some prudent advice for his conduct in the Turkish warfare and history repeats with pleasure this lively example of the manners of his age and country

The conquest of Asia was undertaken and achieved by Alexander with thirty five thousand Macedonians and Greeks[73] and his best hope was in the strength and discipline of his phalanx of infantry The principal force of the crusaders consisted in their cavalry and when that force was mustered in the plains of Bithynia the knights and their martial attendants on horseback amounted to one hundred thousand fighting men completely armed with the helmet and coat of mail The value of these soldiers deserved a strict and authentic account and the flower of European chivalry might furnish in a first effort, this formidable body of heavy horse A part of the infantry might be enrolled for the service of scouts, pioneers and archers but the promiscuous crowd were lost in their own disorder and we depend not on the eyes or knowledge but on the belief and fancy of a chaplain of Count Baldwin[74] in the estimate of six hundred thousand pilgrims able to bear arms, besides the priests and monks the women and children of the Latin camp The reader starts and before he is recovered from his surprise I shall add on the same testimony that, if all who took the cross had accomplished their vow above SIX MILLIONS would have migrated from Europe to Asia. Under this oppression of faith I derive some relief from a more sagacious and thinking writer[75] who after the same review of the cavalry accuses the credulity of the priest of Chartres, and even doubts whether the Cisalpine regions (in the geography of a Frenchman) were sufficient to produce and pour forth such incredible multitudes The coolest scepticism will remember that of these religious volunteers great numbers never beheld Constantinople and Nice Of enthusiasm the influence is irregular and transient many were detained at home by reason or cowardice by poverty or weakness and many were repulsed by the obstacles of the way the more insuperable as they were unforeseen to these ignorant fanatics The savage countries of Hungary and Bulgaria were whitened with their bones their vanguard was cut in pieces by the Turkish sultan and the loss of the first adventure by the sword or climate or fatigue has already been stated at three hundred thousand men Yet the myriads that survived that marched that pressed forwards on the holy pilgrimage were a subject of astonishment to themselves and to the Greeks The copious energy of her language sinks under the efforts of the princess Anna[76] the images of locusts, of leaves and flowers of the sands of the blind, hunger is deaf and Alexius is accused of a design to starve or assault the Latins in a dangerous post, on all sides encompassed with the waters [66] Godfrey sounded his trumpets burst the net overspread the plain and insulted the suburbs but the gates of Constantinople were strongly fortified the ramparts were lined with archers, and after a doubtful conflict, both parties listened to the voice of peace and religion The gifts and promises of the emperor insensibly soothed the fierce spirit of the Western strangers as a Christian warrior he rekindled their zeal for the prosecution of their holy enterprise, which he engaged to second with his troops and treasures On the return of spring Godfrey was persuaded to occupy a pleasant and plentiful camp in Asia and no sooner had he passed the Bosphorus than the Greek vessels were suddenly recalled to the opposite shore The same policy was repeated with the succeeding chiefs, who were swayed by the example and weakened by the departure of their foremost companions By his skill and diligence Alexius prevented the union of any two of the confederate armies at the same moment under the walls of Constantinople and before the feast of the Pentecost not a Latin pilgrim was left on the coast of Europe

The same arms which threatened Europe might deliver Asia and repel the Turks from the neighbouring shores of the Bosphorus and Hellespont The fair provinces from Nice to Antioch were the recent patrimony of the Roman emperor and his ancient and perpetual claim still embraced the kingdoms of Syria and Egypt In his enthusiasm Alexius indulged or affected, the ambitious hope of leading his new allies to subvert the thrones of the East but the calmer dictates of reason and temper dissuaded him from exposing his royal person to the faith of unknown and lawless barbarians His prudence or his pride was content with extorting from the French princes an oath of homage and fidelity and a solemn promise that they would either restore or hold their Asiatic conquests as the humble and loyal vassals of the Roman empire Their independent spirit was fired at the mention of their foreign and voluntary servitude they successively yielded to the dexterous application of gifts and flattery and the first proselytes became the most eloquent and effectual missionaries to multiply the companions of their shame The pride of Hugh of Vermandois was soothed by the honours of his captivity and in the brother of the French king the example of submission was prevalent and weighty In the mind of Godfrey of Bouillon every human consideration was subordinate to the glory of God and the success of the crusade He had firmly resisted the temptations of Bohemond and Raymond who urged the attack and conquest of Constantinople Alexius esteemed his virtues deservedly named him the champion of the empire, and dignified his homage with the filial name and the rites of adoption [67] The hateful Bohemond was received as a true and ancient ally and if the emperor reminded him of former hostilities it was only to praise the valour that he had displayed and the glory that he had acquired in the fields of Durazzo and Larissa The son of Guiscard was lodged and entertained and served with Imperial pomp one day as he passed through the gallery of the palace a door was carelessly left open to expose a pile of gold and silver, of silk and gems of curious and costly furniture that was heaped in seeming disorder from the floor to the roof of the chamber What conquests' exclaimed the ambitious miser 'might not be achieved by the possession of such a treasure? — 'It is your own,' replied a Greek attendant who watched the motions of his soul and Bohemond after some hesitation condescended to accept this magnificent present The Norman was flattered by the assurance of an independent principality and Alexius eluded rather than denied his daring demand of the office of great domestic or general of the East The two Roberts, the son of the conqueror of England and the kinsman of three queens [68] bowed in their turn before the Byzantine throne A private letter of Stephen of Chartres attests his admiration of the emperor the most excellent and liberal of men who taught him to believe that he was a favourite and promised to educate and establish his youngest son In his southern province the count of St Giles and Toulouse faintly recognised the supremacy of the king of France a prince of a foreign nation and language At the head of a hundred thousand men he declared that he was the soldier and servant of Christ alone and that the Greek might be satisfied with an equal treaty of alliance and friendship His obstinate resistance enhanced the value and the price of his submission and he shone says the princess Anna among the barbarians as the sun amidst the stars of heaven His disgust of the noise and insolence of the French his suspicions of the designs of Bohemond the emperor imparted to his faithful Raymond, and that aged statesman jealous vigilance this important conquest. The murmurs of the chiefs were stifled by honour or interest and after a halt of nine days they directed their march towards Phrygia under the guidance of a Greek general whom they suspected of a secret connivance with the sultan. The consort and the principal servants of Soliman had been honourably restored without ransom and the emperor's generosity to the miscreants[83] was interpreted as treason to the Christian cause

Soliman was rather provoked than dismayed by the loss of his capital he admonished his subjects and allies of this strange invasion of the Western barbarians the Turkish emirs obeyed the call of loyalty or religion the Turkman hordes encamped round his standard and his whole force is loosely stated by the Christians at two hundred or even three hundred and sixty thousand horse Yet he patiently waited till they had left behind them the sea and the Greek frontier and hovering on the flanks observed their careless and confident progress in two columns beyond the view of each other Some miles before they could reach Dorylæum in Phrygia the left, and least numerous division was surprised and attacked and almost oppressed by the Turkish cavalry[84] The heat of the weather the clouds of arrows, and the barbarous onset overwhelmed the crusaders they lost their order and confidence, and the fainting fight was sustained by the personal valour rather than by the military conduct, of Bohemond Tancred and Robert of Normandy They were revived by the welcome banners of duke Godfrey who flew to their succour with the count of Vermandois and sixty thousand horse and was followed by Raymond of Toulouse the bishop of Puy and the remainder of the sacred army Without a moment's pause they formed in new order and advanced to a second battle. They were received with equal resolution and in their common disdain for the unwarlike people of Greece and Asia it was confessed on both sides that the Turks and the Franks were the only nations entitled to the appellation of soldiers.[85] Their encounter was varied and balanced by the contrast of arms and discipline of the direct charge and wheeling evolutions of the couched lance and the brandished javelin of a weighty broadsword and a crooked sabre of cumbrous armour and thin flowing robes, and of the long Tartar bow and the arbalist or crossbow a deadly weapon yet unknown to the Orientals.[*] As long as the horses were fresh, and the quivers full Soliman maintained the advantage of the day and four thousand Christians were pierced by the Turkish arrows In the evening swiftness yielded to strength on either side the numbers were equal or at least as great as any ground could hold or any generals could manage but in turning the hills, the last division of Raymond and his provincials was led perhaps without design on the rear of an exhausted enemy and the long contest was determined Besides a nameless and unaccounted multitude three thousand pagan knights were slain in the battle and pursuit the camp of Soliman was pillaged and in the variety of precious spoil the curiosity of the Latins was amused with foreign arms and apparel and the new aspect of dromedaries and camels The importance of the victory was proved by the hasty retreat of the sultan reserving ten thousand guards of the relics of his army Soliman evacuated the kingdom of Roum, and hastened to implore the aid and kindle the resentment of his Eastern brethren In a march of five thousand miles the crusaders traversed the Lesser Asia, through a wasted land and deserted towns without finding either a friend or an enemy The geographer[87] may trace the position of Dorylæum Antioch of Pisidia Iconium Archelais and Germanicia and may compare those classic appellations with the modern names of Eskishehr the old city Akshehr the white city Cogni Erekli and Marash As the pilgrims passed over a desert where a draught of water is exchanged for silver they were tormented by intolerable thirst and on the banks of the first rivulet their haste and intemperance were still more pernicious to the disorderly throng They climbed with toil and danger the steep and slippery sides of Mount Taurus many of the soldiers cast away their arms to secure their footsteps and had not terror preceded their van the long and trembling file might have been driven down the precipice by a handful of resolute enemies Two of their most respectable chiefs the duke of Lorraine and the count of Toulouse were carried in litters Raymond was raised as it is said by miracle from a hopeless malady and Godfrey had been torn by a bear as he pursued that rough and perilous chase in the mountains of Pisidia

To improve the general consternation the cousin of Bohemond and the brother of Godfrey were detached from the main army with their respective squadrons of five and of seven hundred knights They overran in a rapid career the hills and sea-coast of Cilicia from sea or the stars of heaven imperfectly represent what she had seen and heard and the daughter of Alexius exclaims that Europe was loosened from its foundations and hurled against Asia The ancient hosts of Darius and Xerxes labour under the same doubt of a vague and indefinite magnitude but I am inclined to believe that a larger number has never been contained within the lines of a single camp than at the siege of Nice the first operation of the Latin princes Their motives their characters and their arms, have been already displayed Of their troops the most numerous portion were natives of France the Low Countries the banks of the Rhine, and Apulia sent a powerful reinforcement some bands of adventurers were drawn from Spain Lombardy and England [77] and from the distant bogs and mountains of Ireland and Scotland[78] issued some naked and savage fanatics ferocious at home but unwarlike abroad Had not superstition condemned the sacrilegious prudence of depriving the poorest or weakest Christian of the merit of the pilgrimage the useless crowd with mouths but without hands, might have been stationed in the Greek empire till their companions had opened and secured the way of the Lord A small remnant of the pilgrims who passed the Bosphorus was permitted to visit the holy sepulchre Their northern constitution was scorched by the rays and infected by the vapours of a Syrian sun They consumed with heedless prodigality their stores of water and provision their numbers exhausted the inland country the sea was remote the Greeks were unfriendly and the Christians of every sect fled before the voracious and cruel rapine of their brethren In the dire necessity of famine they sometimes roasted and devoured the flesh of their infant or adult captives Among the Turks and Saracens the idolaters of Europe were rendered more odious by the name and reputation of cannibals the spies who introduced themselves into the kitchen of Bohemond were shown several human bodies turning on the spit and the artful Norman encouraged a report which increased at the same time the abhorrence and the terror of the infidels [79]

I have expatiated with pleasure on the first steps of the crusaders as they paint the manners and character of Europe but I shall abridge the tedious and uniform narrative of their blind achievements which were performed by strength and are described by ignorance From their first station in the neighbourhood of Nicomedia they advanced in successive divisions passed the contracted limit the Greek empire opened a road through t hills and commenced by the siege of his ca tal their pious warfare against the Turkish s tan His kingdom of Roum extended from t Hellespont to the confines of Syria and barr the pilgrimage of Jerusalem his name was K idge Arslan or Soliman [80] of the race of Selju and son of the first conqueror and in the d fence of a land which the Turks considered their own he deserved the praise of his e mies by whom alone he is known to posteri Yielding to the first impulse of the torrent he deposited his family and treasure in Nice re tired to the mountains with fifty thousand horse and twice descended to assault the camps or quarters of the Christian besiegers, which formed an imperfect circle of above six miles The lofty and solid walls of Nice were covered by a deep ditch and flanked by three hundred and seventy towers and on the verge of Christendom the Moslems were trained in arms and inflamed by religion Before this city the French princes occupied their stations and prosecuted their attacks without correspondence or subordination emulation prompted their valour but their valour was sullied by cruelty and their emulation degenerated into envy and civil discord In the siege of Nice the arts and engines of antiquity were employed by the Latins the mine and the battering ram the tortoise and the belfry or movable turret artificial fire and the catapult and balist the sling and the crossbow for the casting of stones and darts [81] In the space of seven weeks much labour and blood were expended and some progress especially by Count Raymond was made on the side of the besiegers But the Turks could protract their resistance and secure their escape as long as they were masters of the lake[82] Ascanius which stretches several miles to the westward of the city The means of conquest were supplied by the prudence and industry of Alexius a great number of boats was transported on sledges from the sea to the lake they were filled with the most dexterous of his archers the flight of the sultana was intercepted Nice was invested by land and water and a Greek emissary persuaded the inhabitants to accept his master s protection and to save themselves by a timely surrender from the rage of the savages of Europe In the moment of victory or at least of hope the crusaders thirsting for blood and plunder were awed by the Imperial banner that streamed from the citadel and Alexius guarded with cavalry and an enormous loss by famine de sertion and fatigue the progress of the cru saders was imperceptible and their success re mote if the Latin Ulysses the artful and am bitious Bohemond had not employed the arms of cunning and deceit. The Christians of Anti och were numerous and discontented Phirouz a Syrian renegado had acquired the favour of the emir and the command of three tov ers, and the merit of his repentance disguised to the Latins and perhaps to himself the foul design of perfidy and treason A secret correspondence for their mutual interest was soon established between Phirouz and the prince of Tarento and Bohemond declared in the council of the chiefs that he could deliver the city into their hands Bu he claimed the sovereignty of Antioch as the reward of his service, and the proposal which had been rejected by the envy was at length extorted from the distress of his equals The nocturnal surprise was executed by the French and Norman princes who ascended in person the scaling ladders that were thrown from the walls their new proselyte, after the murder of his too scrupulous brother embraced and introduced the servants of Christ, the army rushed through the gates, and the Moslems soon found that, although mercy was hopeless re sistance was impotent. But the citadel still re fused to surrender and the victors themselves were speedily encompassed and besieged by the innumerable forces of Kerboga prince of Mosul, who with twenty-eight Turkish emirs advanced to the deliverance of Antioch Five and twenty days the Christians spent on the verge of destruction and the proud lieu tenant of the caliph and the sultan left them only the choice of servitude or death [93] In this extremity they collected the relics of their strength sallied from the town and in a single memorable day annihilated or dispersed the host of Turks and Arabians which they might safely report to have consisted of six hundred thousand men [94] Their supernatural allies I shall proceed to consider the human causes of the victory of Antioch were the fearless despair of the Franks and the surprise the discord per haps the errors, of their unskilful and pre sumptuous adversaries The battle is described with as much disorder as it was fought but we may observe the tent of Kerboga, a movable and spacious palace, enriched with the luxury of Asia and capable of holding above two thousand persons we may distinguish his three thousand guards, who were cased the horses as well as the men, in complete steel

In the eventful period of the siege and de fence of Antioch the crusaders were alternately exalted by victory or sunk in despair either swelled with plenty or emaciated with hunger A speculative reasoner might suppose that their faith had a strong and serious influence on their practice and that the soldiers of the cross, the deliverers of the holy sepulchre prepared themselves by a sober and virtuous life for the daily contemplation of martyrdom Ex perience blows away this charitable illusion and seldom does the history of profane war dis play such scenes of intemperance and prostitu tion as were exhibited under the walls of Antioch. The grove of Daphne no longer flourished but the Syrian air was still im pregnated with the same vices the Chris tians were seduced by every temptation [95] that nature either prompts or reprobates the au thority of the chiefs was despised and sermons and edicts were alike fruitless against those scandalous disorders, not less pernicious to military discipline than repugnant to evangelic purity In the first days of the siege and the pos session of Antioch the Franks consumed with wanton and thoughtless prodigality the frugal subsistence of weeks and months the desolate country no longer yielded a supply and from that country they were at length excluded by the arms of the besieging Turks. Disease the faithful companion of want was envenomed by the rains of the winter the summer heats un wholesome food and the close imprisonment of multitudes The pictures of famine and pesti lence are always the same and always dis gustful and our imagination may suggest the nature of their sufferings and their resources. The remains of treasure or spoil were eagerly lavished in the purchase of the vilest nourish ment and dreadful must have been the calami ties of the poor since after paying three marks of silver for a goat and fifteen for a lean camel [96] the count of Flanders was reduced to beg a din ner and duke Godfrey to borrow a horse Sixty thousand horses had been reviewed in the camp before the end of the siege they were diminished to two thousand and scarcely two hundred fit for service could be mustered on the day of battle Weakness of body and terror of mind extinguished the ardent enthusiasm of the pilgrims and every motive of honour and religion was subdued by the desire of life [97] Among the chiefs, three heroes may be found without fear or reproach Godfrey of Bouillon was supported by his magnanimous piety Bohemond by ambition and interest and

Cogni to the Syrian gates, the Norman standard was first planted on the walls of Tarsus and Malmistra but the proud injustice of Baldwin at length provoked the patient and generous Italian and they turned their consecrated swords against each other in a private and profane quarrel Honour was the motive, and fame the reward of Tancred, but fortune smiled on the more selfish enterprise of his rival [88] He was called to the assistance of a Greek or Armenian tyrant who had been suffered, under the Turkish yoke, to reign over the Christians of Edessa Baldwin accepted the character of his son and champion but no sooner was he introduced into the city than he inflamed the people to the massacre of his father occupied the throne and treasure extended his conquests over the hills of Armenia and the plain of Mesopotamia and founded the first principality of the Franks or Latins which subsisted fifty four years beyond the Euphrates [89]

Before the Franks could enter Syria the summer, and even the autumn, were completely wasted the siege of Antioch, or the separation and repose of the army during the winter season was strongly debated in their council the love of arms and the holy sepulchre urged them to advance and reason perhaps was on the side of resolution since every hour of delay abates the fame and force of the invader and multiplies the resources of defensive war The capital of Syria was protected by the river Orontes and the iron bridge of nine arches derives its name from the massy gates of the two towers which are constructed at either end They were opened by the sword of the duke of Normandy his victory gave entrance to three hundred thousand crusaders an account which may allow some scope for losses and desertion but which clearly detects much exaggeration in the review of Nice In the description of Antioch[90] it is not easy to define a middle term between her ancient magnificence under the successors of Alexander and Augustus and the modern aspect of Turkish desolation The Tetrapolis or four cities if they retained their name and position must have left a large vacuity in a circumference of twelve miles and that measure as well as the number of four hundred towers are not perfectly consistent with the five gates so often mentioned in the history of the siege Yet Antioch must have still flourished as a great and populous capital At the head of the Turkish emirs, Baghisian a veteran chief commanded in the place his garrison was composed of six or seven thousand horse, and fifteen or twenty thousand foot, one hundred thousand Moslems are said to have fallen by the sword, and their numbers were probably inferior to the Greeks Armenians, and Syrians who had been no more than fourteen years the slaves of the house of Seljuk. From the remains of a solid and stately wall it appears to have arisen to the height of threescore feet in the valleys, and wherever less art and labour had been applied, the ground was supposed to be defended by the river the morass and the mountains Notwithstanding these fortifications the city had been repeatedly taken by the Persians, the Arabs the Greeks, and the Turks so large a circuit must have yielded many previous points of attack, and in a siege that was formed about the middle of October the vigour of the execution could alone justify the boldness of the attempt Whatever strength and valour could perform in the field was abundantly discharged by the champions of the cross in the frequent occasions of sallies, of forage, of the attack and defence of convoys, they were often victorious, and we can only complain that their exploits are sometimes enlarged beyond the scale of probability and truth The sword of Godfrey[91] divided a Turk from the shoulder to the haunch and one half of the infidel fell to the ground while the other was transported by his horse to the city gate As Robert of Normandy rode against his antagonist, I devote thy head ' he piously exclaimed to the demons of hell and that head was instantly cloven to the breast by the resistless stroke of his descending falchion But the reality or the report of such gigantic prowess[92] must have taught the Moslems to keep within their walls and against those walls of earth or stone the sword and the lance were unavailing weapons In the slow and successive labours of a siege the crusaders were supine and ignorant without skill to contrive or money to purchase or industry to use the artificial engines and implements of assault In the conquest of Nice they had been powerfully assisted by the wealth and knowledge of the Greek emperor his absence was poorly supplied by some Genoese and Pisan vessels that were attracted by religion or trade to the coast of Syria the stores were scanty the return precarious and the communication difficult and dangerous. Indolence or weakness had prevented the Franks from investing the entire circuit and the perpetual freedom of two gates relieved the wants and recruited the garrison of the city At the end of seven months after the ruin of their

Tancred declared in the true spirit of chivalry, that, as long as he was at the head of forty knights, he would never relinquish the enterprise of Palestine But the count of Toulouse and Provence was suspected of a voluntary indisposition the duke of Normandy was recalled from the sea shore by the censures of the church, Hugh the Great though he led the vanguard of the battle embraced an ambiguous opportunity of returning to France and Stephen count of Chartres basely deserted the standard which he bore, and the council in which he presided The soldiers were discouraged by the flight of William viscount of Melun, surnamed the Carpenter, from the weighty strokes of his axe and the saints were scandalised by the fall of Peter the Hermit who, after arming Europe against Asia attempted to escape from the penance of a necessary fast Of the multitude of recreant warriors the names (says an historian) are blotted from the book of life and the opprobrious epithet of the rope dancers was applied to the deserters who dropped in the night from the walls of Antioch The emperor Alexius [98] who seemed to advance to the succour of the Latins, was dismayed by the assurance of their hopeless condition They expected their fate in silent despair oaths and punishments were tried without effect and to rouse the soldiers to the defence of the walls it was found necessary to set fire to their quarters

For their salvation and victory they were indebted to the same fanaticism which had led them to the brink of ruin In such a cause and in such an army visions prophecies and miracles were frequent and familiar In the distress of Antioch they were repeated with unusual energy and success St Ambrose had assured a pious ecclesiastic that two years of trial must precede the season of deliverance and grace the deserters were stopped by the presence and reproaches of Christ himself the dead had promised to arise and combat with their brethren the Virgin had obtained the pardon of their sins and their confidence was revived by a visible sign the seasonable and splendid discovery of the HOLY LANCE The policy of their chiefs has on this occasion been admired and might surely be excused but a pious fraud is seldom produced by the cool conspiracy of many persons, and a voluntary impostor might depend on the support of the wise and the credulity of the people Of the diocese of Marseilles there was a priest of low cunning and loose manners and his name was Peter Bartholemy He presented himself at the door of the council chamber to disclose an apparition of St Andrew, which had been thrice reiterated in his sleep with a dreadful menace if he presumed to suppress the commands of heaven 'At Antioch ' said the apostle in the church of my brother St Peter near the high altar is concealed the steel head of the lance that pierced the side of our Redeemer In three days that instrument of eternal, and now of temporal salvation will be manifested to his disciples Search, and ye shall find bear it aloft in battle and that mystic weapon shall penetrate the souls of the miscreants The pope's legate the bishop of Puy, affected to listen with coldness and distrust, but the revelation was eagerly accepted by Count Raymond whom his faithful subject in the name of the apostle had chosen for the guardian of the holy lance The experiment was resolved and on the third day, after a due preparation of prayer and fasting the priest of Marseilles introduced twelve trusty spectators among whom were the count and his chaplain and the church doors were barred against the impetuous multitude The ground was opened in the appointed place but the workmen who relieved each other, dug to the depth of twelve feet without discovering the object of their search. In the evening when Count Raymond had withdrawn to his post, and the weary assistants began to murmur Bartholemy, in his shirt and without his shoes boldly descended into the pit the darkness of the hour and of the place enabled him to secrete and deposit the head of a Saracen lance and the first sound the first gleam of the steel was saluted with a devout rapture The holy lance was drawn from its recess wrapped in a veil of silk and gold and exposed to the veneration of the crusaders their anxious suspense burst forth in a general shout of joy and hope and the desponding troops were again inflamed with the enthusiasm of valour Whatever had been the arts and whatever might be the sentiments of the chiefs they skilfully improved this fortunate revolution by every aid that discipline and devotion could afford. The soldiers were dismissed to their quarters with an injunction to fortify their minds and bodies for the approaching conflict freely to bestow their last pittance on themselves and their horses and to expect with the dawn of day the signal of victory On the festival of St Peter and St Paul the gates of Antioch were thrown open a martial psalm 'Let the Lord arise and let his enemies be scattered!' was chanted by a procession of priests and monks the battle array was marshalled in twelve divisions in honour of the twelve apostles and the holy lance in the absence of Raymond was intrusted to the hands of his chaplain The influence of this relic or trophy was felt by the servants and perhaps by the enemies of Christ [99] and its potent energy was heightened by an accident a stratagem or a rumour of a miraculous complexion Three knights in white garments and resplendent arms either issued or seemed to issue from the hills the voice of Adhemar the pope's legate proclaimed them as the martyrs St George St Theodore and St. Maurice the tumult of battle allowed no time for doubt or scrutiny and the welcome apparition dazzled the eyes or the imagination of a fanatic army In the season of danger and triumph the revelation of Bartholemy of Marseilles was unanimously asserted but as soon as the temporary service was accomplished the personal dignity and liberal alms which the count of Toulouse derived from the custody of the holy lance provoked the envy and awakened the reason of his rivals A Norman clerk presumed to sift with a philosophic spirit the truth of the legend the circumstances of the discovery and the character of the prophet and the pious Bohemond ascribed their deliverance to the merits and intercession of Christ alone For a while the Provincials defended their national palladium with clamours and arms and new visions condemned to death and hell the profane sceptics who presumed to scrutinise the truth and merit of the discovery The prevalence of incredulity compelled the author to submit his life and veracity to the judgment of God A pile of dry faggots four feet high and fourteen long was erected in the midst of the camp the flames burnt fiercely to the elevation of thirty cubits and a narrow path of twelve inches was left for the perilous trial The unfortunate priest of Marseilles traversed the fire with dexterity and speed but his thighs and belly were scorched by the intense heat he expired the next day and the logic of believing minds will pay some regard to his dying protestations of innocence and truth Some efforts were made by the Provincials to substitute a cross, a ring or a tabernacle in the place of the holy lance which soon vanished in contempt and oblivion [100] Yet the revelation of Antioch is gravely asserted by succeeding historians and such is the progress of credulity that miracles, most doubtful on the spot and at the moment, will be received with implicit faith at a convenient distance of time and space

The prudence or fortune of the Franks had delayed their invasion till the decline of the Turkish empire [101] Under the manly government of the three first sultans the kingdoms of Asia were united in peace and justice and the innumerable armies which they led in person were equal in courage and superior in discipline to the barbarians of the West. But at the time of the crusade the inheritance of Malek Shah was disputed by his four sons their private ambition was insensible of the public danger and in the vicissitudes of their fortune the royal vassals were ignorant or regardless, of the true object of their allegiance The twenty eight emirs who marched with the standard of Kerboga were his rivals or enemies their hasty levies were drawn from the towns and tents of Mesopotamia and Syria and the Turkish veterans were employed or consumed in the civil wars beyond the Tigris The caliph of Egypt embraced this opportunity of weakness and discord to recover his ancient possessions and his sultan Aphdal besieged Jerusalem and Tyre expelled the children of Ortok and restored in Palestine the civil and ecclesiastical authority of the Fatimites [102] They heard with astonishment of the vast armies of Christians that had passed from Europe to Asia and rejoiced in the sieges and battles which broke the power of the Turks the adversaries of their sect and monarchy But the same Christians were the enemies of the prophet and from the overthrow of Nice and Antioch the motive of their enterprise which was gradually understood would urge them forwards to the banks of the Jordan or perhaps of the Nile An intercourse of epistles and embassies, which rose and fell with the events of war was maintained between the throne of Cairo and the camp of the Latins and their adverse pride was the result of ignorance and enthusiasm The ministers of Egypt declared in a haughty or insinuated in a milder tone that their sovereign the true and lawful commander of the faithful had rescued Jerusalem from the Turkish yoke and that the pilgrims if they would divide their numbers and lay aside their arms should find a safe and hospitable reception at the sepulchre of Jesus In the belief of their lost condition the caliph Mostali despised their arms and imprisoned their deputies the conquest and victory of Antioch prompted him to solicit those formidable champions with gifts of horses and silk robes of vases and purses of gold and silver and in his estimate of their merit or power the first place was assigned to

Bohemond, and the second to Godfrey In either fortune, the answer of the crusaders was firm and uniform they disdained to inquire into the private claims or possessions of the followers of Mohammed whatsoever was his name or nation the usurper of Jerusalem was their enemy and instead of prescribing the mode and terms of their pilgrimage, it was only by a timely surrender of the city and province, their sacred right that he could deserve their alliance or deprecate their impending and irresistible attack [103]

Yet this attack when they were within the view and reach of their glorious prize, was suspended above ten months after the defeat of Kerboga The zeal and courage of the crusaders were chilled in the moment of victory, and instead of marching to improve the consternation, they hastily dispersed to enjoy the luxury, of Syria The causes of this strange delay may be found in the want of strength and subordination In the painful and various service of Antioch the cavalry was annihilated many thousands of every rank had been lost by famine sickness and desertion the same abuse of plenty had been productive of a third famine and the alternative of intemperance and distress had generated a pestilence which swept away above fifty thousand of the pilgrims Few were able to command and none were willing to obey the domestic feuds which had been stifled by common fear were again renewed in acts or at least in sentiments of hostility the fortune of Baldwin and Bohemond excited the envy of their companions, the bravest knights were enlisted for the defence of their new principalities, and Count Raymond exhausted his troops and treasures in an idle expedition into the heart of Syria The winter was consumed in discord and disorder a sense of honour and religion was rekindled in the spring and the private soldiers less susceptible of ambition and jealousy awakened with angry clamours the indolence of their chiefs In the month of May the relics of this mighty host proceeded from Antioch to Laodicea about forty thousand Latins of whom no more than fifteen hundred horse and twenty thousand foot were capable of immediate service Their easy march was continued between Mount Libanus and the sea-shore their wants were liberally supplied by the coasting traders of Genoa and Pisa, and they drew large contributions from the emirs of Tripoli, Tyre Sidon Acre and Cæsarea who granted a free passage and promised to follow the example of Jerusalem From Cæsarea they advanced into the midland country their clerks recognised the sacred geography of Lydda Ramla Emmaus and Bethlehem and as soon as they descried the holy city, the crusaders forgot their toils and claimed their reward [104]

Jerusalem has derived some reputation from the number and importance of her memorable sieges It was not till after a long and obstinate contest that Babylon and Rome could prevail against the obstinacy of the people the craggy ground that might supersede the necessity of fortifications and the walls and towers that would have fortified the most accessible plain [105] These obstacles were diminished in the age of the crusades The bulwarks had been completely destroyed and imperfectly restored the Jews their nation and worship were for ever banished but nature is less changeable than man and the site of Jerusalem, though somewhat softened and somewhat removed was still strong against the assaults of an enemy By the experience of a recent siege and a three years possession the Saracens of Egypt had been taught to discern and in some degree to remedy, the defects of a place which religion as well as honour forbade them to resign Aladin or Iftikhar the caliph's lieutenant was intrusted with the defence his policy strove to restrain the native Christians by the dread of their own ruin and that of the holy sepulchre to animate the Moslems by the assurance of temporal and eternal rewards His garrison is said to have consisted of forty thousand Turks and Arabians and if he could muster twenty thousand of the inhabitants it must be confessed that the besieged were more numerous than the besieging army [106] Had the diminished strength and numbers of the Latins allowed them to grasp the whole circumference of four thousands yards (about two English miles and a half[107]) to what useful purpose should they have descended into the valley of Ben Hinnom and torrent of Kedron [108] or approached the precipices of the south and east from whence they had nothing either to hope or fear? Their siege was more reasonably directed against the northern and western sides of the city Godfrey of Bouillon erected his standard on the first swell of Mount Calvary to the left as far as St Stephen's gate the line of attack was continued by Tancred and the two Roberts and Count Raymond established his quarters from the citadel to the foot of Mount Sion which was no longer included within the precincts of the city On the fifth day the cru saders made a general assault in the fanatic hope of battering down the walls without engines, and of scaling them without ladders By the dint of brutal force they burst the first barrier but they were driven back with shame and slaughter to the camp the influence of vision and prophecy was deadened by the too frequent abuse of those pious stratagems and time and labour were found to be the only means of victory The time of the siege was indeed fulfilled in forty days, but they were forty days of calamity and anguish A repetition of the old complaint of famine may be imputed in some degree to the voracious or disorderly appetite of the Franks but the stony soil of Jerusalem is almost destitute of water the scanty springs and hasty torrents were dry in the summer season nor was the thirst of the besiegers relieved as in the city by the artificial supply of cisterns and aqueducts The circumjacent country is equally destitute of trees for the uses of shade or building but some large beams were discovered in a cave by the crusaders a wood near Sichem the enchanted grove of Tasso[109] was cut down the necessary timber was transported to the camp by the vigour and dexterity of Tancred and the engines were framed by some Genoese artists who had fortunately landed in the harbour of Jaffa. Two movable turrets were constructed at the expense and in the stations, of the duke of Lorraine and the count of Toulouse and rolled forwards with devout labour not to the most accessible but to the most neglected parts of the fortification Raymond's tower was reduced to ashes by the fire of the besieged but his colleague was more vigilant and successful the enemies were driven by his archers from the rampart the drawbridge was let down and on a Friday at three in the afternoon the day and hour of the Passion Godfrey of Bouillon stood victorious on the walls of Jerusalem. His example was followed on every side by the emulation of valour and about four hundred and sixty years after the conquest of Omar the holy city was rescued from the Mohammedan yoke In the pillage of public and private wealth the adventurers had agreed to respect the exclusive property of the first occupant and the spoils of the great mosque seventy lamps and massy vases of gold and silver rewarded the diligence and displayed the generosity of Tancred. A bloody sacrifice was offered by his mistaken votaries to the God of the Christians resistance might provoke, but neither age nor sex could mollify their implacable rage they indulged themselves three days in a promiscuous massacre[110] and the infection of the dead bodies produced an epidemical disease After seventy thousand Moslems had been put to the sword and the harmless Jews had been burnt in their synagogue they could still reserve a multitude of captives whom interest or lassitude persuaded them to spare Of these savage heroes of the cross Tancred alone betrayed some sentiments of compassion yet we may praise the more selfish lenity of Raymond who granted a capitulation and safe-conduct to the garrison of the citadel.[111] The holy sepulchre was now free and the bloody victors prepared to accomplish their vow Bareheaded and barefoot with contrite hearts and in a humble posture they ascended the hill of Calvary amidst the loud anthems of the clergy kissed the stone which had covered the Saviour of the world and bedewed with tears of joy and penitence the monument of their redemption This union of the fiercest and most tender passions has been variously considered by two philosophers by the one[11] as easy and natural by the other[112] as absurd and incredible Perhaps it is too rigorously applied to the same persons and the same hour the example of the virtuous Godfrey awakened the piety of his companions while they cleansed their bodies they purified their minds nor shall I believe that the most ardent in slaughter and rapine were the foremost in the procession to the holy sepulchre

Eight days after this memorable event which pope Urban did not live to hear the Latin chiefs proceeded to the election of a king to guard and govern their conquests in Palestine Hugh the Great and Stephen of Chartres had retired with some loss of reputation which they strove to regain by a second crusade and an honourable death Baldwin was established at Edessa and Bohemond at Antioch and two Roberts the duke of Normandy[113] and the count of Flanders preferred their fair inheritance in the West to a doubtful competition or a barren sceptre The jealousy and ambition of Raymond were condemned by his own followers and the free the just the unanimous voice of the army proclaimed Godfrey of Bouillon the first and most worthy of the champions of Christendom His magnanimity accepted a trust as full of danger as of glory but in a city where his Saviour had been crowned with thorns the devout pilgrim rejected the name and ensigns of royalty and the founder of the kingdom of Jerusalem contented himself with the modest title of Defender and Baron of the

Bohemond, and the second to Godfrey In either fortune the answer of the crusaders was firm and uniform they disdained to inquire into the private claims or possessions of the followers of Mohammed whatsoever was his name or nation the usurper of Jerusalem was their enemy, and instead of prescribing the mode and terms of their pilgrimage, it was only by a timely surrender of the city and province their sacred right that he could deserve their alliance or deprecate their impending and irresistible attack [103]

Yet this attack, when they were within the view and reach of their glorious prize was suspended above ten months after the defeat of Kerboga The zeal and courage of the crusaders were chilled in the moment of victory and instead of marching to improve the consternation, they hastily dispersed to enjoy the luxury, of Syria The causes of this strange delay may be found in the want of strength and subordination In the painful and various service of Antioch the cavalry was annihilated many thousands of every rank had been lost by famine sickness and desertion the same abuse of plenty had been productive of a third famine and the alternative of intemperance and distress had generated a pestilence which swept away above fifty thousand of the pilgrims Few were able to command and none were willing to obey the domestic feuds which had been stifled by common fear were again renewed in acts or at least in sentiments of hostility the fortune of Baldwin and Bohemond excited the envy of their companions the bravest knights were enlisted for the defence of their new principalities and Count Raymond exhausted his troops and treasures in an idle expedition into the heart of Syria The winter was consumed in discord and disorder a sense of honour and religion was rekindled in the spring and the private soldiers less susceptible of ambition and jealousy awakened with angry clamours the indolence of their chiefs In the month of May the relics of this mighty host proceeded from Antioch to Laodicea about forty thousand Latins of whom no more than fifteen hundred horse and twenty thousand foot were capable of immediate service Their easy march was continued between Mount Libanus and the sea shore their wants were liberally supplied by the coasting traders of Genoa and Pisa and they drew large contributions from the emirs of Tripoli Tyre Sidon Acre and Cæsarea who granted a free passage and promised to follow the example of Jerusalem From Cæsarea they advanced into the midland country their clerks recognised the sacred geography of Lydda Ramla Emmaus and Bethlehem and as soon as they descried the holy city the crusaders forgot their toils and claimed their reward [104]

Jerusalem has derived some reputation from the number and importance of her memorable sieges It was not till after a long and obstinate contest that Babylon and Rome could prevail against the obstinacy of the people the craggy ground that might supersede the necessity of fortifications and the walls and towers that would have fortified the most accessible plain [105] These obstacles were diminished in the age of the crusades The bulwarks had been completely destroyed and imperfectly restored the Jews their nation and worship were for ever banished but nature is less changeable than man and the site of Jerusalem, though somewhat softened and somewhat removed was still strong against the assaults of an enemy By the experience of a recent siege and a three years possession the Saracens of Egypt had been taught to discern and in some degree to remedy the defects of a place which religion as well as honour forbade them to resign Aladin or Iftikhar the caliph s lieutenant, was intrusted with the defence his policy strove to restrain the native Christians by the dread of their own ruin and that of the holy sepulchre to animate the Moslems by the assurance of temporal and eternal rewards His garrison is said to have consisted of forty thousand Turks and Arabians, and if he could muster twenty thousand of the inhabitants it must be confessed that the besieged were more numerous than the besieging army [106] Had the diminished strength and numbers of the Latins allowed them to grasp the whole circumference of four thousands yards (about two English miles and a half [107]) to what useful purpose should they have descended into the valley of Ben Hinnom and torrent of Kedron [108] or approached the precipices of the south and east, from whence they had nothing either to hope or fear? Their siege was more reasonably directed against the northern and western sides of the city Godfrey of Bouillon erected his standard on the first swell of Mount Calvary to the left as far as St Stephen s gate the line of attack was continued by Tancred and the two Roberts and Count Raymond established his quarters from the citadel to the foot of Mount Sion which was no longer included within the precincts of the city On the fifth day the cru

saders made a general assault, in the fanatic hope of battering down the walls without engines and of scaling them without ladders By the dint of brutal force they burst the first barrier but they were driven back with shame and slaughter to the camp the influence of vision and prophecy was deadened by the too frequent abuse of those pious stratagems and time and labour were found to be the only means of victory The time of the siege was indeed fulfilled in forty days, but they were forty days of calamity and anguish A repetition of the old complaint of famine may be imputed in some degree to the voracious or disorderly appetite of the Franks but the stony soil of Jerusalem is almost destitute of water the scanty springs and hasty torrents were dry in the summer season nor was the thirst of the besiegers relieved as in the city by the artificial supply of cisterns and aqueducts The circumjacent country is equally destitute of trees for the uses of shade or building but some large beams were discovered in a cave by the crusaders a wood near Sichem, the enchanted grove of Tasso[109] was cut down the necessary timber was transported to the camp by the vigour and dexterity of Tancred and the engines were framed by some Genoese artists, who had fortunately landed in the harbour of Jaffa Two movable turrets were contructed at the expense, and in the stations, of the duke of Lorraine and the count of Toulouse and rolled forwards with devout labour not to the most accessible but to the most neglected parts of the fortification Raymond s tower was reduced to ashes by the fire of the besieged but his colleague was more vigilant and successful the enemies were driven by his archers from the rampart the drawbridge was let down and on a Friday at three in the afternoon the day and hour of the Passion, Godfrey of Bouillon stood victorious on the walls of Jerusalem. Holy Sepulchre His government of a single year [115] too short for the public happiness was interrupted in the first fortnight by a summons to the field by the approach of the vizir or sultan of Egypt who had been too slow to prevent, but who was impatient to avenge, the loss of Jerusalem His total overthrow in the battle of Ascalon sealed the establishment of the Latins in Syria and signalised the valour of the French princes who in this action bade a long farewell to the holy wars Some glory might be derived from the prodigious inequality of numbers though I shall not count the myriads of horse and foot on the side of the Fatimites but except three thousand Ethiopians or Blacks, who were armed with flails or scourges of iron the barbarians of the South fled on the first onset and afforded a pleasing comparison between the active valour of the Turks and the sloth and effeminacy of the natives of Egypt After suspending before the holy sepulchre the sword and standard of the sultan, the new king (he deserves the title) embraced his departing companions and could retain only with the gallant Tancred three hundred knights and two thousand foot soldiers for the defence of Palestine His sovereignty was soon attacked by a new enemy, the only one against whom Godfrey was a coward Adhemar bishop of Puy who excelled both in council and action had been swept away in the last plague of Antioch the remaining ecclesiastics preserved only the pride and avarice of their character and their seditious clamours had required that the choice of a bishop should precede that of a king The revenue and jurisdiction of the lawful patriarch were usurped by the Latin clergy the exclusion of the Greeks and Syrians was justified by the reproach of heresy or schism [116] and under the iron yoke of their deliverers the Oriental Christians regretted the tolerating government of the Arabian caliphs Daimbert archbishop of Pisa had long been trained in the secret policy of Rome he brought a fleet of his countrymen to the succour of the Holy Land and was installed without a competitor the spiritual and temporal head of the church The new patriarch[117] immediately grasped the sceptre which had been acquired by the toil and blood of the victorious pilgrims and both Godfrey and Bohemond submitted to receive at his hands the investiture of their feudal possessions Nor was this sufficient Daimbert claimed the immediate property of Jerusalem and Jaffa instead of a firm and generous refusal the hero negotiated with the priest a quarter of either city was ceded to the church and the modest bishop was satisfied with an eventual reversion of the rest, on the death of Godfrey without children or on the future acquisition of a new seat at Cairo or Damascus

Without this indulgence the conqueror would have almost been stripped of his infant kingdom which consisted only of Jerusalem and Jaffa with about twenty villages and towns of the adjacent country [118] Within this narrow verge the Mohammedans were still lodged in some impregnable castles and the husbandman the trader, and the pilgrim were exposed to daily and domestic hostility By the arms of Godfrey himself, and of the two Baldwins his brother and cousin who succeeded to the throne the Latins breathed with more ease and safety and at length they equalled in the extent of their dominions, though not in the millions of their subjects the ancient princes of Judah and Israel [119] After the reduction of the maritime cities of Laodicea Tripoli Tyre and Ascalon,[120] which were powerfully assisted by the fleets of Venice Genoa and Pisa and even of Flanders and Norway [121] the range of sea coast from Scanderoon to the borders of Egypt was possessed by the Christian pilgrims If the prince of Antioch disclaimed his supremacy the counts of Edessa and Tripoli owned themselves the vassals of the king of Jerusalem the Latins reigned beyond the Euphrates and the four cities of Hems Hamah Damascus and Aleppo were the only relics of the Mohammedan conquests in Syria [122] The laws and language the manners and titles of the French nation and Latin church were introduced into these transmarine colonies According to the feudal jurisprudence the principal states and subordinate baronies descended in the line of male and female succession [123] but the children of the first conquerors [124] a motley and degenerate race were dissolved by the luxury of the climate the arrival of new crusaders from Europe was a doubtful hope and a casual event The service of the feudal tenures[125] was performed by six hundred and sixty six knights who might expect the aid of two hundred more under the banner of the count of Tripoli and each knight was attended to the field by four squires or archers on horseback [126] Five thousand and seventy five serjeants most probably foot soldiers were supplied by the churches and cities and the whole legal militia of the kingdom could not exceed eleven thousand men a slender defence against the surrounding myriads of Saracens and Turks [127] But the firmest

bulwark of Jerusalem was founded on the knights of the Hospital of St John[135] and of the temple of Solomon[136] on the strange association of a monastic and military life which fanaticism might suggest but which policy must approve The flower of the nobility of Europe aspired to wear the cross and to profess the vows of these respectable orders their spirit and discipline were immortal and the speedy donation of twenty-eight thousand farms, or manors[137] enabled them to support a regular force of cavalry and infantry for the defence of Palestine The austerity of the convent soon evaporated in the exercise of arms the world was scandalised by the pride, avarice and corruption of these Christian soldiers their claims of immunity and jurisdiction disturbed the harmony of the church and state and the public peace was endangered by their jealous emulation But in their most dissolute period the knights of the hospital and temple maintained their fearless and fanatic character they neglected to live but they were prepared to die in the service of Christ and the spirit of chivalry the parent and offspring of the crusades has been transplanted by this institution from the holy sepulchre to the isle of Malta[138]

The spirit of freedom which pervades the feudal institutions was felt in its strongest energy by the volunteers of the cross who elected for their chief the most deserving of his peers Amidst the slaves of Asia unconscious of the lesson or example a model of political liberty was introduced and the laws of the French kingdom are derived from the purest source of equality and justice Of such laws the first and indispensable condition is the assent of those whose obedience they require and for whose benefit they are designed No sooner had Godfrey of Bouillon accepted the office of supreme magistrate than he solicited the public and private advice of the Latin pilgrims who were the best skilled in the statutes and customs of Europe From these materials with the counsel and approbation of the patriarch and barons of the clergy and laity Godfrey composed the ASSISE OF JERUSALEM[139] a precious monument of feudal jurisprudence The new code attested by the seals of the king the patriarch and the viscount of Jerusalem was deposited in the holy sepulchre enriched with the improvements of succeeding times and respectfully consulted as often as any doubtful question arose in the tribunals of Palestine With the kingdom and city all was lost[140] the fragments of the written law were preserved by jealous tradition[141] and variable practice till the middle of the thirteenth century the code was restored by the pen of John d'Ibelin count of Jaffa one of the principal feudatories[142] and the final revision was accomplished in the year thirteen hundred and sixty nine for the use of the Latin kingdom of Cyprus[143]

The justice and freedom of the constitution were maintained by two tribunals of unequal dignity which were instituted by Godfrey of Bouillon after the conquest of Jerusalem The king in person presided in the upper court the court of the barons Of these the four most conspicuous were the prince of Galilee the lord of Sidon and Cæsarea and the counts of Jaffa and Tripoli who perhaps with the constable and marshal[144] were in a special manner the compeers and judges of each other But all the nobles who held their lands immediately of the crown were entitled and bound to attend the king's court and each baron exercised a similar jurisdiction in the subordinate assemblies of his own feudatories. The connection of lord and vassal was honourable and voluntary reverence was due to the benefactor protection to the dependent but they mutually pledged their faith to each other and the obligation on either side might be suspended by neglect or dissolved by injury The cognizance of marriages and testaments was blended with religion and usurped by the clergy but the civil and criminal causes of the nobles the inheritance and tenure of their fiefs, formed the proper occupation of the supreme court Each member was the judge and guardian both of public and private rights. It was his duty to assert with his tongue and sword the lawful claims of the lord but if an unjust superior presumed to violate the freedom or property of a vassal the confederate peers stood forth to maintain his quarrel by word and deed They boldly affirmed his innocence and his wrongs demanded the restitution of his liberty and his lands suspended after a fruitless demand their own service rescued their brother from prison and employed every weapon in his defence without offering direct violence to the person of their lord which was ever sacred in their eyes[145] In their pleadings replies, and rejoinders the advocates of the court were subtle and copious but the use of argument and evidence was often superseded by judicial combat and the Assise of Jerusalem admits in many cases this barbarous institution which has been slowly abolished by the laws and manners of Europe.

The spirit of freedom which pervades the feudal institutions was felt in its strongest energy by the volunteers of the cross who elected for their chief the most deserving of his peers. Amidst the slaves of Asia unconscious of the lesson or example a model of political liberty was introduced and the laws of the French kingdom are derived from the purest source of equality and justice. Of such laws the first and indispensable condition is the assent of those whose obedience they require and for whose benefit they are designed No sooner had Godfrey of Bouillon accepted the office of supreme magistrate than he solicited the public and private advice of the Latin pilgrims who were the best skill d in the statutes and customs of Europe From these materials with the counsel and approbation of the patriarch and barons of the clergy and laity Godfrey composed the ASSISE OF JERUSALEM[132] a precious monument of feudal jurisprudence The new code attested by the seals of the king the patriarch and the viscount of Jerusalem, was deposited in the holy sepulchre enriched with the improvements of succeeding times and respectfully consulted as often as any doubtful question arose in the tribunals of Palestine With the kingdom and city all was lost[133] the fragments of the written law were preserved by jealous tradition[134] and variable practice till the middle of the thirteenth century the code was restored by the pen of John d Ibelin count of Jaffa one of the principal feudatories[135] and the final revision was accomplished in the year thirteen hundred and sixty nine for the use of the Latin kingdom of Cyprus[136]

The justice and freedom of the constitution were maintained by two tribunals of unequal dignity which were instituted by Godfrey of Bouillon after the conquest of Jerusalem The king in person presided in the upper court the court of the barons Of these the four most conspicuous were the prince of Galilee the lord of Sidon and Cæsarea and the counts of Jaffa and Tripoli who perhaps with the constable and marshal[137] were in a special manner the compeers and judges of each other But all the nobles who held their lands immediately of the crown were entitled and bound to attend the king's court and each baron exercised a similar jurisdiction in the subordinate assemblies of his own feudatories The connection of lord and vassal was honourable and voluntary reverence was due to the benefactor protection to the dependent but they mutually pledged their faith to each other and the obligation on either side might be suspended by neglect or dissolved by injury The cognisance of marriages and testaments was blended with religion and usurped by the clergy but the civil and criminal causes of the nobles the inheritance and tenure of their fiefs, formed the proper occupation of the supreme court Each member was the judge and guardian both of public and private rights It was his duty to assert with his tongue and sword the lawful claims of the lord but if an unjust superior presumed to violate the freedom or property of a vassal the confederate peers stood forth to maintain his quarrel by word and deed They boldly affirmed his innocence and his wrongs demanded the restitution of his liberty and his lands suspended after a fruitless demand their own service rescued their brother from prison and employed every weapon in his defence without offering direct violence to the person of their lord which was ever sacred in their eyes[138] In their pleadings replies and rejoinders the advocates of the court were subtle and copious but the use of argument and evidence was often superseded by judicial combat and the Assise of Jerusalem admits in many cases this barbarous institution which has been slowly abolished by the laws and manners of Europe

The trial by battle was established in all criminal cases which affected the life or limb or honour of any person and in all civil transactions of or above the value of one mark of silver It appears that in criminal cases the combat was the privilege of the accuser who, except in a charge of treason avenged his personal injury or the death of those persons whom he had a right to represent but wher ever, from the nature of the charge testimony could be obtained it was necessary for him to produce witnesses of the fact In civil cases the combat was not allowed as the means of establishing the claim of the demandant but he was obliged to produce witnesses who had or assumed to have knowledge of the fact The combat was then the privilege of the defendant because he charged the witness with an attempt by perjury to take away his right He came therefore to be in the same situation as the appellant in criminal cases It was not then as a mode of proof that the combat was received nor as making negative evidence (according to the supposition of Montesquieu)[139] but in every case the right to offer battle was founded on the right to pursue by arms the redress of an injury, and the judicial combat was fought on the same principle and with the same spirit as a private duel Champions were only allowed to women and to men maimed or past the age of sixty The consequence of a defeat was death to the person accused or to the champion or witness, as well as to the accuser himself but in civil cases the demandant was punished with infamy and the loss of his suit while his witness and champion suffered an ignominious death In many cases it was in the option of the judge to award or to refuse the combat but two are specified in which it was the inevitable result of the challenge if a faithful vassal gave the lie to his compeer who unjustly claimed any portion of their lord's demesnes or if an unsuccessful suitor presumed to impeach the judgment and veracity of the court He might impeach them but the terms were severe and perilous in the same day he successfully fought all the members of the tribunal even those who had been absent a single defeat was followed by death and infamy and where none could hope for victory it is highly probable that none would adventure the trial In the Assise of Jerusalem the legal subtlety of the count of Jaffa is more laudably employed to elude than to facilitate the judicial combat which he derives from a principle of honour rather than of superstition[140]

Among the causes which enfranchised the plebeians from the yoke of feudal tyranny the institution of cities and corporations is one of the most powerful and if those of Palestine are coeval with the first crusade, they may be ranked with the most ancient of the Latin world Many of the pilgrims had escaped from their lords under the banner of the cross, and it was the policy of the French princes to tempt their stay by the assurance of the rights and privileges of freemen It is expressly declared in the Assise of Jerusalem that after instituting for his knights and barons the court of peers, in which he presided himself Godfrey of Bouillon established a second tribunal, in which his person was represented by his viscount. The jurisdiction of this inferior court extended over the burgesses of the kingdom and it was composed of a select number of the most discreet and worthy citizens who were sworn to judge according to the laws of the actions and fortunes of their equals[141] In the conquest and settlement of new cities the example of Jerusalem was imitated by the kings and their great vassals and above thirty similar corporations were founded before the loss of the Holy Land Another class of subjects the Syrians[142] or Oriental Christians were oppressed by the zeal of the clergy and protected by the toleration of the state Godfrey listened to their reasonable prayer that they might be judged by their own national laws A third court was instituted for their use of limited and domestic jurisdiction the sworn members were Syrians in blood, language and religion but the office of the president (in Arabic of the rais) was sometimes exercised by the viscount of the city At an immeasurable distance below the nobles, the burgesses and the strangers the Assise of Jerusalem condescends to mention the villains and slaves the peasants of the land and the captives of war who were almost equally considered as the objects of property The relief or protection of these unhappy men was not esteemed worthy of the care of the legislator but he diligently provides for the recovery though not indeed for the punishment of the fugitives Like hounds or hawks who had strayed from the lawful owner they might be lost and claimed the slave and falcon were of the same value but three slaves or twelve oxen were accumulated to equal the price of the war horse and a sum of three hundred pieces of gold was fixed in the age of chivalry as the equivalent of the more noble animal[143]

IN a style less grave than that of history I should perhaps compare the emperor Alexius[1] to the jackal who is said to follow the steps, and devour the leavings of the lion Whatever had been his fears and toils in the passage of the first crusade they were amply recompensed by the subsequent benefits which he derived from the exploits of the Franks His dexterity and vigilance secured their first conquest of Nice and from this threatening station the Turks were compelled to evacuate the neighbourhood of Constantinople While the crusaders with blind valour advanced into the midland countries of Asia the crafty Greek improved the favourable occasion when the emirs of the sea-coast were recalled to the standard of the sultan. The Turks were driven from the isles of Rhodes and Chios the cities of Ephesus and Smyrna of Sardes Philadelphia and Laodicea were restored to the empire which Alexius enlarged from the Hellespont to the banks of the Mæander and the rocky shores of Pamphylia The churches resumed their splendour the towns were rebuilt and fortified and the desert country was peopled with colonies of Christians who were gently removed from the more distant and dangerous frontier In these paternal cares we may forgive Alexius if he forgot the deliverance of the holy sepulchre but by the Latins he was stigmatised with the foul reproach of treason and desertion They had sworn fidelity and obedience to his throne but he had promised to assist their enterprise in person or at least with his troops and treasures his base retreat dissolved their obligations and the sword which had been the instrument of their victory was the pledge and title of their just independence It does not appear that the emperor attempted to revive his obsolete claims over the kingdom of Jerusalem[2] but the borders of Cilicia and Syria were more recent in his possession and more accessible to his arms The great army of the crusaders was annihilated or dispersed the principality of Antioch was left without a head by the surprise and captivity of Bohemond, his ransom had oppressed him with a heavy debt, and his Norman followers were insufficient to repel the hostilities of the Greeks and Turks. In this distress Bohemond embraced a magnanimous resolution of leaving the defence of Antioch to his kinsman the faithful Tancred of arming the West against the Byzantine empire and of executing the design which he inherited from the lessons and example of his father Guiscard His embarkation was clandestine, and if we may credit a tale of the princess Anna he passed the hostile sea closely secreted in a coffin.[3] But his reception in France was dignified by the public applause and his marriage with the king's daughter his return was glorious, since the bravest spirits of the age enlisted under his veteran command and he repassed the Adriatic at the head of five thousand horse and forty thousand foot, assembled from the most remote climates of Europe.[4] The strength of Durazzo and prudence of Alexius the progress of famine and approach of winter eluded his ambitious hopes and the venal confederates were seduced from his standard A treaty of peace[5] suspended the fears of the Greeks and they were finally delivered by the death of an adversary whom neither oaths could bind nor dangers could appall nor prosperity could satiate His children succeeded to the principality of Antioch but the boundaries were strictly defined the homage was clearly stipulated and the cities of Tarsus and Malmistra were restored to the Byzantine emperors Of the coast of Anatolia they possessed the entire circuit from Trebizond to the Syrian gates The Seljukian dynasty of Roum[6] was separated on all sides from the sea and their Musulman brethren the power of the sultans was shaken by the victories and even the defeats of the Franks and after the loss of Nice they removed their throne to Cogni or Iconium an obscure and inland town above three hundred miles from Constantinople.[7] Instead of trembling for

The Seljukian dynasty of Roum[6] was separated on all sides from the sea and their Musulman brethren the power of the sultans was shaken by the victories and even the defeats of the Franks and after the loss of Nice they removed their throne to Cogni or Iconium an obscure and inland town above three hundred miles from Constantinople.[7] Instead of trembling for their capital the Comnenian princes waged an offensive war against the Turks and the first crusade prevented the fall of the declining empire

In the twelfth century three great emigrations marched by land from the West to the relief of Palestine The soldiers and pilgrims of Lombardy, France and Germany were excited by the example and success of the first crusade [8] Forty eight years after the deliverance of the holy sepulchre the emperor and the French king Conrad the Third and Louis the Seventh, undertook the second crusade to support the falling fortunes of the Latins [9] A grand division of the third crusade was led by the emperor Frederic Barbarossa [10] who sympathised with his brothers of France and England in the common loss of Jerusalem These three expeditions may be compared in their resemblance of the greatness of numbers their passage through the Greek empire, and the nature and event of their Turkish warfare, and a brief parallel may save the repetition of a tedious narrative However splendid it may seem a regular story of the crusades would exhibit the perpetual return of the same causes and effects, and the frequent attempts for the defence or recovery of the Holy Land would appear so many faint and unsuccessful copies of the original

I Of the swarms that so closely trod in the footsteps of the first pilgrims the chiefs were equal in rank though unequal in fame and merit to Godfrey of Bouillon and his fellow adventurers At their head were displayed the banners of the dukes of Burgundy Bavaria, and Aquitain the first a descendant of Hugh Capet the second a father of the Brunswick line the archbishop of Milan, a temporal prince transported, for the benefit of the Turks the treasures and ornaments of his church and palace and the veteran crusaders Hugh the Great and Stephen of Chartres returned to consummate their unfinished vow The huge and disorderly bodies of their followers moved forward in two columns and if the first consisted of two hundred and sixty thousand persons the second might possibly amount to sixty thousand horse and one hundred thousand foot [11] The armies of the second crusade might have claimed the conquest of Asia the nobles of France and Germany were animated by the presence of their sovereigns and both the rank and personal characters of Conrad and Louis gave a dignity to their cause and a discipline to their force which might be vainly expected from the feudatory chiefs The cavalry of the emperor and that of the king was each composed of seventy thousand knights and their immediate attendants in the field [12] and if the light armed troops the peasant infantry the women and children, the priests and monks be rigorously excluded, the full account will scarcely be satisfied with four hundred thousand souls The West, from Rome to Britain was called into action the kings of Poland and Bohemia obeyed the summons of Conrad and it is affirmed by the Greeks and Latins that in the passage of a strait or river the Byzantine agents after a tale of nine hundred thousand desisted from the endless and formidable computation [13] In the third crusade as the French and English preferred the navigation of the Mediterranean the host of Frederic Barbarossa was less numerous Fifteen thousand knights and as many squires were the flower of the German chivalry sixty thousand horse and one hundred thousand foot were mustered by the emperor in the plains of Hungary and after such repetitions we shall no longer be startled at the six hundred thousand pilgrims which credulity has ascribed to this last emigration [14] Such extravagant reckonings prove only the astonishment of contemporaries but their astonishment most strongly bears testimony to the existence of an enormous though indefinite multitude The Greeks might applaud their superior knowledge of the arts and stratagems of war but they confessed the strength and courage of the French cavalry and the infantry of the Germans [15] and the strangers are described as an iron race of gigantic stature who darted fire from their eyes and spilt blood like water on the ground Under the banners of Conrad a troop of females rode in the attitude and armour of men and the chief of these Amazons from her gilt spurs and buskins obtained the epithet of the Golden footed Dame.

II The numbers and character of the strangers was an object of terror to the effeminate Greeks and the sentiment of fear is nearly allied to that of hatred This aversion was suspended or softened by the apprehension of the Turkish power and the invectives of the Latins will not bias our more candid belief that the emperor Alexius dissembled their insolence eluded their hostilities counselled their rashness and opened to their ardour the road of pilgrimage and conquest But when the Turks had been driven from Nice and the seacoast when the Byzantine princes no longer dreaded the distant sultans of Cogni they felt with purer indignation the free and frequent passage of the Western barbarians who violated the majesty and en dangered the saf ty of the empire Th second and third crusades were undertaken under the reign of Manu l Comnenus and Isaac Angelus. Of the former the passions were always impet uous and often malevolent and the natural union of a cowardly and a mischievous temper was exemplified in the latter who without merit or mercy could punish a tyrant and oc cupy his throne It was secretly and perhaps tacitly resolved by the prince and people to de stroy or at least to discourage the pilgrims by every species of injury and oppression and their wa t of prudence and discipline continually afforded the pretence or the opportunity The Western monarchs had stipulated a safe passage and fair market in the country of their Cl ristian brethren the treaty had been ratified by oaths and hostages and the poorest sold er of Fred eric s army was furnished with three marks of silver to defray his expenses on the road But every engagement was violated by treach ry and injustice and the complaints of the Latins are a tested by the honest confession of a Greek historian, who has dared to pref r truth to his country [18] Instead of an hospitable recep tion the gates of the cities both in Europe and Asia were closely barred against the crusaders and the scanty pittance of food was let down in baskets from the walls Experience or fore ight might excuse this timid jealousy but the com mon duties of humanity prohibited the mixture of chalk, or other poisonous ingredients in the bread and should Manuel be acquit ed of any foul conniva ce he is guilty of coining base money for the purpose of trading with the pil grims In every step of their march they were stopped or misled the governors had private o d rs to fortify the pa ses and break down the bridges against them the stragglers were pil laged and murdered the sold rs and horses were pierced in the woods by arrows from an invisible hand the sick were burnt in their beds and the dead bodies were h ng on gib bets along the highways These injuries exas perated the champions of the cross who were not endowed with evangelical patience and the Byzantine princes who had provoked the un equal conflict promoted the embarkation and march of these formidabl guests. On the verge of the Turkish frontier Barbarossa spared the guilty Philadelphia [19] rew arded the hospitable Laodicea and deplored the hard necessity that had stained his sword with any drops of Chris tian blood In their intercourse with the mon archs of Germany and France the pride of the

might boast that on the first interview the seat of Lou s was a low stool beside the throne of Manuel [19] but no soon r had the French king transport d his army beyond the Bosphorus than he refused th offer of a second conference unless his brother would meet him on equal terms either on the sea or land With Conrad and Fred ric the ceremonial was still nicer and more difficult like the successors of Constant tine they styled themselves emperors of the Romans [19] and firmly maintained the purity of their title and dignity The first of these repre sentati es of Charlemagne would only converse with Manuel on horseback in the open field the second by passing the Hellespont rather than the Bosphorus declined the view of Con stantinople and its sovereign An emperor who had been crowned at Rome was reduced in the Gr ek epistles to the humble appellation of Rex or prince of the Alemanni and the vain and feeble Angelus affected to be ignorant of the name of one of the greatest men and monarchs of the age While they viewed with hatred and suspicion the Latin pilgrims the Greek emper ors maintained a strict though secret, alliance with the Turks and Saracens Isaac Angelus complained that by his friendship for the great Saladin he had incurred the enmity of the Franks and a mosque was founded at Constan tinople for the public exercise of the religion of Mohammed [20]

III The swarms that followed the first cru sade were destroyed in Anatolia by famine, pestilence and the Turkish arrows, and the princes only escaped with some squadrons of horse to accomplish their lamentable pilgrim age A just opinion may be formed of their knowledge and humanity of their knowledge from the design of subduing Persia and Chora san in their way to Jerusalem of their human ity from the massacre of the Christian people a friendly city who came out to meet them with palms and crosses in their hands The arms of Conrad and Louis were less cruel and impru dent but the event of the second crusade was still more ruinous to Christendom and the Greek Manuel is accused by his own subjects of giving s asonable intelligence to the sultan and treacherous guides to the Latin princes In stead of crushing the common foe by a double attack at the same time but on different sides the Germans were urged by emulation and the French were retarded by jealousy Louis had scarcely passed the Bosphorus when he was met by the returning emperor who had lost the greatest part of his army in glorious but un

In speech in writing in action Ber rd stood high above his rivals and contem oraries his compositions are not devoid of wit d eloquence and he seems to have preserved much reason and humanity as may be recon led with the character of a saint. In a secular le he would have shared the seventh part of a rivate inheritance by a vow of poverty and enance by closing his eyes against the visible orld,[30] by the refusal of all ecclesiastical dig ities the abbot of Clairvaux became the oracle f Europe and the founder of one hundred and xty convents. Princes and pontiffs trembled at he freedom of his apostolical censures France En land and Milan consulted and obeyed his judgment in a schism of the church the debt was repaid by the gratitude of Innocent the Second and his successor Eugenius the Third was the friend and disciple of the holy Bernard It was in the proclamation of the second cru sade that he shone as the missionary and proph et of God who called the nations to the defence of his holy sepulchre [31] At the parliament of Vezelay he spoke before the king and Louis the Seventh with his nobles received their crosses from his hand The abbot of Clairvaux then marched to the less easy conquest of the emper or Conrad a phlegmatic people ignorant of his language was transported by the pathetic vehemence of his tone and gestures and his progress from Constance to Cologne was the triumph of eloquence and zeal Bernard ap plauds his own success in the depopulation of Europe affirms that cities and castles were emptied of their inhabitants and computes that only one man was left behind for the con solation of seven widows [32] The blind fanatics were desirous of electing him for their general but the example of the hermit Peter was before his eyes and whilst he assured the crusaders of the divine favour he prudently declined a mili tary command in which failure and victory would have been almost equally disgraceful to his character [33] Yet, after the calamitous event, the abbot of Clairvaux was loudly accused as a false prophet, the author of the public and pri vate mourning his enemies exulted his friends blushed and his apology was slow and unsatis factory He justifies his obedience to the com mands of the pope expatiates on the myster ious ways of Providence imputes the misfor tunes of the pilgrims to their own sins and modestly insinuates that his mission had been approved by signs and wonders [34] Had the fact been certain the argument would be decisive and his faithful disciples who enumerate twen ty or thirty miracles in a day appeal to the public assemblies of France and Germany in which they were performed [35] At the present hour such prodigies will not obtain credit be yond the precincts of Clairvaux but in the pre ternatural cures of the blind the lame and the sick who were presented to the man of God it is impossible for us to ascertain the separate shares of accident, of fancy of imposture and of fiction successful, action on the banks of the Meander. The contrast of the pomp of his rival has tened the retreat of Conrad the desertion of his independent vassals reduced him to his hereditary troops and he borrowed some Greek vessels to execute by sea the pilgrimage of Palestine. Without studying the lessons of experience or the nature of the war the king of France advanced through the same country to a similar fate. The vanguard which bore the royal banner and the oriflamme of St Denys [21] had doubled their march with rash and inconsiderate speed and the rear which the king commanded in person, no longer found their companions in the evening camp. In darkness and disorder they were encompassed assaulted and overwhelmed by the innumerable hosts of Turks who in the art of war were superior to the Christians of the twelfth century. Louis who climbed a tree in the general discomfiture was saved by his own valour and the ignorance of his adversaries and with the dawn of day he escaped alive but almost alone to the camp of the vanguard. But instead of pursuing his expedition by land he was rejoiced to shelter the relics of his army in the friendly seaport of Satalia. From thence he embarked for Antioch but so penurious was the supply of Greek vessels that they could only afford room for his knights and nobles and the plebeian crowd of infantry was left to perish at the foot of the Pamphylian hills. The emperor and the king embraced and wept at Jerusalem their martial trains the remnant of mighty armies were joined to the Christian powers of Syria and a fruitless siege of Damascus was the final effort of the second crusade. Conrad and Louis embarked for Europe with the personal fame of piety and courage but the Orientals had braved these potent monarchs of the Franks with whose names and military forces they had been so often threatened.[22] Perhaps they had still more to fear from the veteran genius of Frederic the First who in his youth had served in Asia under his uncle Conrad. Forty campaigns in Germany and Italy had taught Barbarossa to command and his soldiers even the princes of the empire were accustomed under his reign to obey. As soon as he lost sight of Philadelphia and Laodicea the last cities of the Greek frontier he plunged into the salt and barren desert a land (says the historian) of horror and tribulation.[23] During twenty days every step of his fainting and sickly march was besieged by the innumerable hordes of Turkmans [24] whose numbers and fury seemed after each defeat to multiply and inflame. The emperor continued to struggle and to suffer and such was the measure of his calamities that when he reached the gates of Iconium no more than one thousand knights were able to serve on horseback. By a sudden and resolute assault he defeated the guards, and stormed the capital of the sultan [25] who humbly sued for pardon and peace. The road was now open and Frederic advanced in a career of triumph till he was unfortunately drowned in a petty torrent of Cilicia.[26] The remainder of his Germans was consumed by sickness and desertion and the emperor's son expired with the greatest part of his Swabian vassals at the siege of Acre. Among the Latin heroes Godfrey of Bouillon and Frederic Barbarossa could alone achieve the passage of the Lesser Asia yet even their success was a warning and in the last and most experienced age of the crusades every nation preferred the sea to the toils and perils of an inland expedition.[27]

The enthusiasm of the first crusade is a natural and simple event while hope was fresh danger untried and enterprise congenial to the spirit of the times. But the obstinate perseverance of Europe may indeed excite our pity and admiration that no instruction should have been drawn from constant and adverse experience that the same confidence should have repeatedly grown from the same failures that six succeeding generations should have rushed headlong down the precipice that was open before them and that men of every condition should have staked their public and private fortunes on the desperate adventure of possessing or recovering a tombstone two thousand miles from their country. In a period of two centuries after the council of Clermont each spring and summer produced a new emigration of pilgrim warriors for the defence of the Holy Land but the seven great armaments or crusades were excited by some impending or recent calamity the nations were moved by the authority of their pontiffs and the example of their kings their zeal was kindled and their reason was silenced by the voice of their holy orators and among these Bernard [28] the monk or the saint may claim the most honourable place. About eight years before the first conquest of Jerusalem he was born of a noble family in Burgundy at the age of three and twenty he buried himself in the monastery of Citeaux then in the primitive fervour of the institution at the end of two years he led forth her third colony or daughter to the valley of Clairvaux [29] in Champagne and was content till the hour of his death with the

has sent an infidel to hell' His report of the riches of the land the effeminacy of the natives, and the disorders of the government, revived the hopes of Noureddin the caliph of Bagdad applauded the pious design and Shiracouh descended into Egypt a second time with twelve thousand Turks and eleven thousand Arabs. Yet his forces were still inferior to the confederate armies of the Franks and Saracens and I can discern an unusual degree of military art in his passage of the Nile his retreat into Thebais, his masterly evolutions in the battle of Babain, the surprise of Alexandria and his marches and countermarches in the flats and valley of Egypt, from the tropic to the sea. His conduct was seconded by the courage of his troops and on the eve of action a Mamaluke[42] exclaimed If we cannot wrest Egypt from the Christian dogs, why do we not renounce the honours and rewards of the sultan and retire to labour with the peasants, or to spin with the females of the harem? Yet, after all his efforts in the field[43] after the obstinate defence of Alexandria[44] by his nephew Saladin an honourable capitulation and retreat concluded the second enterprise of Shiracouh and Noureddin reserved his abilities for a third and more propitious occasion It was soon offered by the ambition and avarice of Amalric or Amaury king of Jerusalem who had imbibed the pernicious maxim that no faith should be kept with the enemies of God A religious warrior the great master of the hospital encouraged him to proceed the emperor of Constantinople either gave, or promised a fleet to act with the armies of Syria and the perfidious Christian unsatisfied with spoil and subsidy aspired to the conquest of Egypt In this emergency the Moslems turned their eyes towards the sultan of Damascus the vizir whom danger encompassed on all sides, yielded to their unanimous wishes and Noureddin seemed to be tempted by the fair offer of one third of the revenue of the kingdom. The Franks were already at the gates of Cairo but the suburbs, the old city were burnt on their approach they were deceived by an insidious negotiation and their vessels were unable to surmount the barriers of the Nile They prudently declined a contest with the Turks in the midst of a hostile country and Amaury retired into Palestine with the shame and reproach that always adhere to unsuccessful injustice After this deliverance Shiracouh was invested with a robe of honour which he soon stained with the blood of the unfortunate Shawer For a while the Turkish emirs condescended to hold the office of vizir but this foreign conquest precipitated the fall of the Fatimites themselves and the bloodless change was accomplished by a message and a word The caliphs had been degraded by their own weakness and the tyranny of the vizirs their subjects blushed when the descendant and successor of the prophet presented his naked hand to the rude gripe of a Latin ambassador they wept when he sent the hair of his women a sad emblem of their grief and terror to excite the pity of the sultan of Damascus By the command of Noureddin and the sentence of the doctors the holy names of Abubeker Omar and Othman were solemnly restored the caliph Mosthadi of Bagdad was acknowledged in the public prayers as the true commander of the faithful and the green livery of the sons of Ali was exchanged for the black colour of the Abbassides The last of his race the caliph Adhed who survived only ten days, expired in happy ignorance of his fate his treasures secured the loyalty of the soldiers and silenced the murmurs of the sectaries and in all subsequent revolutions Egypt has never departed from the orthodox tradition of the Moslems.[45]

The hilly country beyond the Tigris is occupied by the pastoral tribes of the Curds[46] a people hardy strong savage impatient of the yoke addicted to rapine and tenacious of the government of their national chiefs The resemblance of name situation and manners seems to identify them with the Carduchians of the Greeks[47] and they still defend against the Ottoman Porte the antique freedom which they asserted against the successors of Cyrus Poverty and ambition prompted them to embrace the profession of mercenary soldiers the service of his father and uncle prepared the reign of the great Saladin[48] and the son of Job or Ayub a simple Curd magnanimously smiled at his pedigree, which flattery deduced from the Arabian caliphs[49] So unconscious was Noureddin of the impending ruin of his house that he constrained the reluctant youth to follow his uncle Shiracouh into Egypt his military character was established by the defence of Alexandria and if we may believe the Latins he solicited and obtained from the Christian general the profane honours of knighthood[50] On the death of Shiracouh the office of grand vizir was bestowed on Saladin as the youngest and least powerful of the emirs but with the advice of his father whom he invited to Cairo his genius obtained the ascendant over his equals and attached the army to his person and interest While Noureddin lived these ambitious Curds were the most established his military fame and he was invested with the command of Mosul, as the only champion that could avenge the cause of the prophet The public hope was not disappointed after a siege of twenty five days he stormed the city of Edessa, and recovered from the Franks their conquests beyond the Euphrates[33] the martial tribes of Curdistan were subdued by the independent sovereign of Mosul and Aleppo his soldiers were taught to behold the camp as their only country, they trusted to his liberality for their rewards and their absent families were protected by the vigilance of Zenghi At the head of these veterans his son Noureddin gradually united the Mohammedan powers added the kingdom of Damascus to that of Aleppo, and waged a long and successful war against the Christians of Syria he spread his ample reign from the Tigris to the Nile, and the Abbassides rewarded their faithful servant with all the titles and prerogatives of royalty The Latins themselves were compelled to own the wisdom and courage and even the justice and piety, of this implacable adversary[40] In his life and government the holy warrior revived the zeal and simplicity of the first caliphs Gold and silk were banished from his palace the use of wine from his dominions, the public revenue was scrupulously applied to the public service and the frugal household of Noureddin was maintained from his legitimate share of the spoil which he vested in the purchase of a private estate His favourite sultana sighed for some female object of expense Alas" replied the king "I fear God and am no more than the treasurer of the Moslems Their property I cannot alienate but I still possess three shops in the city of Hems these you may take and these alone can I bestow' His chamber of justice was the terror of the great and the refuge of the poor Some years after the sultan s death an oppressed subject called aloud in the streets of Damascus O Noureddin Noureddin where art thou now? Arise arise to pity and protect us! A tumult was apprehended and a living tyrant blushed or trembled at the name of a departed monarch

By the arms of the Turks and Franks the Fatimites had been deprived of Syria In Egypt the decay of their character and influence was still more essential Yet they were still revered as the descendants and successors of the prophet they maintained their invisible state in the palace of Cairo and their person was seldom violated by the profane eyes of subjects or strangers The Latin ambassadors[41] have described their own introduction through a series of gloomy passages and glittering porticoes the scene was enlivened by the warbling of birds and the murmur of fountains it was enriched by a display of rich furniture and rare animals of the Imperial treasures something was shown and much was supposed and the long order of unfolding doors was guarded by black soldiers and domestic eunuchs The sanctuary of the presence chamber was veiled with a curtain and the vizir who conducted the ambassadors laid aside his scimitar, and prostrated himself three times on the ground the veil was then removed and they beheld the commander of the faithful who signified his pleasure to the first slave of the throne But this slave was his master the vizirs or sultans had usurped the supreme administration of Egypt the claims of the rival candidates were decided by arms and the name of the most worthy of the strongest was inserted in the royal patent of command The factions of Dargham and Shawer alternately expelled each other from the capital and country and the weaker side implored the dangerous protection of the sultan of Damascus or the king of Jerusalem the perpetual enemies of the sect and monarchy of the Fatimites By his arms and religion the Turk was most formidable, but the Frank in an easy direct march could advance from Gaza to the Nile while the intermediate situation of his realm compelled the troops of Noureddin to wheel round the skirts of Arabia a long and painful circuit which exposed them to thirst fatigue and the burning winds of the desert The secret zeal and ambition of the Turkish prince aspired to reign in Egypt under the name of the Abbassides but the restoration of the suppliant Shawer was the ostensible motive of the first expedition and the success was intrusted to the emir Shiracouh a valiant and veteran commander Dargham was oppressed and slain but the ingratitude the jealousy, the just apprehensions of his more fortunate rival soon provoked him to invite the king of Jerusalem to deliver Egypt from his insolent benefactors To this union the forces of Shiracouh were unequal he relinquished the premature conquest and the evacuation of Belbeis or Pelusium was the condition of his safe retreat. As the Turks defiled before the enemy and their general closed the rear with a vigilant eye and a battle axe in his hand a Frank presumed to ask him if he were not afraid of an attack? It is doubtless in your power to begin the attack replied the intrepid emir but rest assured that not one of my soldiers will go to paradise till he has sent an infidel to hell. His report of the riches of the land, the effeminacy of the natives, and the disorders of the government, revived the hopes of Noureddin; the caliph of Bagdad applauded the pious design; and Shiracouh descended into Egypt a second time with twelve thousand Turks and eleven thousand Arabs. Yet his forces were still inferior to the confederate armies of the Franks and Saracens; and I can discern an unusual degree of military art in his passage of the Nile, his retreat into Thebais, his masterly evolutions in the battle of Babain, the surprise of Alexandria, and his marches and countermarches in the flats and valley of Egypt, from the tropic to the sea. Yet, after all his efforts in the field,[43] after the obstinate defence of Alexandria[44] by his nephew Saladin, an honourable capitulation and retreat concluded the second enterprise of Shiracouh; and Noureddin reserved his abilities for a third and more propitious occasion. It was soon offered by the ambition and avarice of Amalric or Amaury, king of Jerusalem, who had imbibed the pernicious maxim that no faith should be kept with the enemies of God. A religious warrior, the great master of the hospital, encouraged him to proceed; the emperor of Constantinople either gave, or promised, a fleet to act with the armies of Syria; and the perfidious Christian, unsatisfied with spoil and subsidy, aspired to the conquest of Egypt. In this emergency the Moslems turned their eyes towards the sultan of Damascus; the vizir, whom danger encompassed on all sides, yielded to their unanimous wishes, and Noureddin seemed to be tempted by the fair offer of one third of the revenue of the kingdom. The Franks were already at the gates of Cairo; but the suburbs, the old city, were burnt on their approach; they were deceived by an insidious negotiation, and their vessels were unable to surmount the barriers of the Nile. They prudently declined a contest with the Turks in the midst of a hostile country; and Amaury retired into Palestine with the shame and reproach that always adhere to unsuccessful injustice. After this deliverance, Shiracouh was invested with a robe of honour, which he soon stained with the blood of the unfortunate Shawer. For a while the Turkish emirs condescended to hold the office of vizir; but this foreign conquest precipitated the fall of the Fatimites themselves; and the bloodless change was accomplished by a message and a word. The caliphs had been degraded by their own weakness and the tyranny of the vizirs: their subjects blushed when the descendant and successor of the prophet presented his naked hand to the rude gripe of a Latin ambassador; they wept when he sent the hair of his women, a sad emblem of their grief and terror, to excite the pity of the sultan of Damascus. By the command of Noureddin, and the sentence of the doctors, the holy names of Abubeker, Omar, and Othman were solemnly restored: the caliph Mosthadi, of Bagdad, was acknowledged in the public prayers as the true commander of the faithful; and the green livery of the sons of Ali was exchanged for the black colour of the Abbassides. The last of his race, the caliph Adhed, who survived only ten days, expired in happy ignorance of his fate; his treasures secured the loyalty of the soldiers, and silenced the murmurs of the sectaries; and in all subsequent revolutions Egypt has never departed from the orthodox tradition of the Moslems.[45]

The resemblance of name, situation, and manners, seems to identify them with the Carduchians of the Greeks;[47] and they still defend against the Ottoman Porte the antique freedom which they asserted against the successors of Cyrus. Poverty and ambition prompted them to embrace the profession of mercenary soldiers: the service of his father and uncle prepared the reign of the great Saladin;[48] and the son of Job or Ayub, a simple Curd, magnanimously smiled at his pedigree, which flattery deduced from the Arabian caliphs.[49] So unconscious was Noureddin of the impending ruin of his house, that he constrained the reluctant youth to follow his uncle Shiracouh into Egypt: his military character was established by the defence of Alexandria; and if we may believe the Latins, he solicited and obtained from the Christian general the profane honours of knighthood.[50] On the death of Shiracouh, the office of grand vizir was bestowed on Saladin, as the youngest and least powerful of the emirs; but with the advice of his father, whom he invited to Cairo, his genius obtained the ascendant over his equals, and attached the army to his person and interest. On the proud or con scientious refusal of the Christian warrior Sala din struck him on the head with his scimitar and Reginald was despatched by the guards.[60] The trembling Lusignan was sent to Damascus to an honourable prison and speedy ransom but the victory was stained by the execution of two hundred and thirty knights of the hospital the intrepid champions and martyrs of their faith. The kingdom was left without a head and of the two grand masters of the military orders the one was slain and the other was a prisoner From all the cities both of the sea coast and the inland country the garrisons had been drawn away for this fatal field Tyre and Tripoli alone could escape the rapid inroad of Saladin and three months after the battle of Tiberias he appeared in arms before the gates of Jerusalem.[61]

He might expect that the siege of a city so venerable on earth and in heaven so interesting to Europe and Asia would rekindle the last sparks of enthusiasm and that, of sixty thou sand Christians, every man would be a soldier and every soldier a candidate for martyrdom. But queen Sybilla trembled for herself and her captive husband and the barons and knights, who had escaped from the sword and chains of the Turks displayed the same factious and self ish spirit in the public ruin The most numerous portion of the inhabitants was composed of the Greek and Oriental Christians whom expe rience had taught to prefer the Mohammedan before the Latin yoke [62] and the holy sepulchre attracted a base and needy crowd without arms or courage who subsisted only on the charity of the pilgrims. Some feeble and hasty efforts were made for the defence of Jerusalem but in the space of fourteen days a victorious army drove back the sallies of the besieged planted their engines, opened the wall to the breadth of fifteen cubits applied their scaling ladders and erected on the breach twelve banners of the prophet and the sultan. It was in vain that a barefoot procession of the queen the women and the monks implored the Son of God to save his tomb and his inheritance from impious violation. Their sole hope was in the mercy of the conqueror and to the first suppliant depu tation that mercy was sternly denied He had sworn to avenge the patience and long suffering of the Moslems the hour of forgiveness was elapsed, and the moment was now arrived to expiate, in blood the innocent blood which had been spilt by Godfrey and the first crusaders[63] But a desperate and successful struggle of the Franks admonished the sultan that his triumph was not yet secure, he listened with reverence to a solemn adjuration in the name of the common Father of mankind and a sentiment of human sympathy mollified the rigour of fanaticism and conquest He consented to accept the city and to spare the inhabitants The Greek and Oriental Christians were permitted to live under his dominion but it was stipulated that in forty days all the Franks and Latins should evacuate Jerusalem and be safely conducted to the seaports of Syria and Egypt that ten pieces of gold should be paid for each man, five for each woman, and one for every child and that those who were unable to purchase their freedom should be detained in perpetual slavery Of some writers it is a favourite and invidious theme to compare the humanity of Saladin with the massacre of the first crusade The difference would be merely personal but we should not forget that the Christians had offered to capitulate and that the Mohammedans of Jerusalem sustained the last extremities of an assault and storm Justice is indeed due to the fidelity with which the Turkish conqueror fulfilled the conditions of the treaty and he may be deservedly praised for the glance of pity which he cast on the misery of the vanquished Instead of a rigorous exaction of his debt, he accepted a sum of thirty thousand byzants for the ransom of seven thousand poor two or three thousand more were dismissed by his gratuitous clemency and the number of slaves was reduced to eleven or fourteen thousand persons In his interview with the queen his words and even his tears suggested the kindest consolations his liberal alms were distributed among those who had been made orphans or widows by the fortune of war and while the knights of the hospital were in arms against him he allowed their more pious brethren to continue during the term of a year the care and service of the sick In these acts of mercy the virtue of Saladin deserves our admiration and love he was above the necessity of dissimulation and his stern fanaticism would have prompted him to dissemble rather than to affect this profane compassion for the enemies of the Koran After Jerusalem had been delivered from the presence of the strangers the sultan made his triumphant entry his banners waving in the wind, and to the harmony of martial music The great mosque of Omar which had been converted into a church was again consecrated to one God and his prophet Mohammed the walls and pavement were purified with rose water and a pulpit the labour of Noureddin, was erected in the sanctuary But when the golden cross that glittered on the dome was cast down and dragged through the streets the Christians of every sect uttered a lamentable groan, which was answered by the joyful shouts of the Moslems In four ivory chests the patriarch had collected the crosses, the image the vases and the relics of the holy place they were seized by the conqueror, who was desirous of presenting the caliph with the trophies of Christian idolatry He was persuaded however, to intrust them to the patriarch and prince of Antioch and the pious pledge was redeemed by Richard of England, at the expense of fifty two thousand byzants of gold[64]

The nations might fear and hope the immediate and final expulsion of the Latins from Syria which was yet delayed above a century after the death of Saladin[65] In the career of victory he was first checked by the resistance of Tyre the troops and garrisons which had capitulated were imprudently conducted to the same port their numbers were adequate to the defence of the place and the arrival of Conrad of Montferrat inspired the disorderly crowd with confidence and union His father a venerable pilgrim had been made prisoner in the battle of Tiberias but that disaster was unknown in Italy and Greece when the son was urged by ambition and piety to visit the inheritance of his royal nephew the infant Baldwin The view of the Turkish banners warned him from the hostile coast of Jaffa and Conrad was unanimously hailed as the prince and champion of Tyre which was already besieged by the conqueror of Jerusalem The firmness of his zeal and perhaps his knowledge of a generous foe enabled him to brave the threats of the sultan and to declare that should his aged parent be exposed before the walls he himself would discharge the first arrow and glory in his descent from a Christian martyr[66] The Egyptian fleet was allowed to enter the harbour of Tyre but the chain was suddenly drawn and five galleys were either sunk or taken a thousand Turks were slain in a sally and Saladin after burning his engines concluded a glorious campaign by a disgraceful retreat to Damascus He was soon assailed by a more formidable tempest. The pathetic narratives and even the pictures, that represented in lively colours the servitude and profanation of Jerusalem, awakened the torpid sensibility of Europe the emperor Frederic Barbarossa and the kings of France and England assumed the cross and the tardy magnitude of their armaments was anticipated by the maritime states of the Mediterranean and the Ocean. The skilful and provident Italians first embarked in the ships of Genoa, Pisa and Venice They were speedily followed by the most eager pilgrims of France Normandy and the Western Isles The powerful succour of Flanders Frise and Denmark filled near a hundred vessels and the Northern warriors were distinguished in the field by a lofty stature and a ponderous battle axe [67] Their increasing multitudes could no longer be confined within the walls of Tyre or remain obedient to the voice of Conrad They pitied the misfortunes and revered the dignity of Lusignan who was released from prison perhaps to divide the army of the Franks. He proposed the recovery of Ptolemais or Acre thirty miles to the south of Tyre and the place was first invested by two thousand horse and thirty thousand foot under his nominal command I shall not expatiate on the story of this memorable siege which lasted near two years and consumed in a narrow space the forces of Europe and Asia. Never did the flame of enthusiasm burn with fiercer and more destructive rage nor could the true believers a common appellation who consecrated their own martyrs, refuse some applause to the mistaken zeal and courage of their adversaries At the sound of the holy trumpet the Moslems of Egypt, Syria, Arabia, and the Oriental provinces assembled under the servant of the prophet [68] his camp was pitched and removed within a few miles of Acre and he laboured night and day for the relief of his brethren and the annoyance of the Franks. Nine battles, not unworthy of the name were fought in the neighbourhood of Mount Carmel, with such vicissitude of fortune that in one attack the sultan forced his way into the city that in one sally the Christians penetrated to the royal tent. By the means of divers and pigeons a regular correspondence was maintained with the besieged and as often as the sea was left open, the exhausted garrison was withdrawn and a fresh supply was poured into the place The Latin camp was thinned by famine, the sword and the climate but the tents of the dead were replenished with new pilgrims who exaggerated the strength and speed of their approaching countrymen. The vulgar was astonished by the report that the pope himself with an innumerable crusade was advanced as far as Constantinople. The march of the emperor filled the East with more serious alarms the obstacles which he encountered in Asia and perhaps in Greece were raised by the policy of Saladin his joy on the death of Barbarossa was measured by his esteem and the Christians were rather dismayed than encouraged at the sight of the duke of Swabia and his way worn remnant of five thousand Germans. At length in the spring of the second year the royal fleets of France and England cast anchor in the bay of Acre and the siege was more vigorously prosecuted by the youthful emulation of the two kings, Philip Augustus and Richard Plantagenet. After every resource had been tried and every hope was exhausted the defenders of Acre submitted to their fate a capitulation was granted but their lives and liberties were taxed at the hard conditions of a ransom of two hundred thousand pieces of gold the deliverance of one hundred nobles and fifteen hundred inferior captives and the restoration of the wood of the holy cross. Some doubts in the agreement, and some delay in the execution rekindled the fury of the Franks, and three thousand Moslems almost in the sultan s view were beheaded by the command of the sanguinary Richard [69] By the conquest of Acre the Latin powers acquired a strong town and a convenient harbour but the advantage was most dearly purchased The minister and historian of Saladin computes, from the report of the enemy that their numbers, at different periods, amounted to five or six hundred thousand that more than one hundred thousand Christians were slain that a far greater number was lost by disease or shipwreck and that a small portion of this mighty host could return in safety to their native countries [70]

Philip Augustus and Richard the First are the only kings of France and England who have fought under the same banners but the holy service in which they were enlisted was incessantly disturbed by their national jealousy and the two factions which they protected in Palestine were more averse to each other than to the common enemy In the eyes of the Orientals the French monarch was superior in dignity and power and in the emperor s absence the Latins revered him as their temporal chief [71] His exploits were not adequate to his fame. Philip was brave but the statesman predominated in his character he was soon weary of sacrificing his health and interest on a barren coast the surrender of Acre became the signal of his de parture nor could he justify this unpopular de sertion by leaving the duke of Burgundy with five hundred knights and ten thousand foot for the service of the Holy Land The king of Eng land though inferior in dignity surpassed his rival in wealth and military renown [72] and if heroism be confined to brutal and ferocious valour Richard Plantagenet will stand high among the heroes of the age The memory of Coeur de Lion of the lion hearted prince was long dear and glorious to his English subjects and at the distance of sixty years it was cele brated in proverbial sayings by the grandsons of the Turks and Saracens against whom he had fought his tremendous name was employed by the Syrian mothers to silence their infants and if a horse uddenly started from the way his rider was wont to exclaim Dost thou think king Richard is in that bush? '[73] His cruelty to the Mohammedans was the effect of temper and zeal but I cannot believe that a soldier so free and fearless in the use of his lance, would have descended to whet a dagger against his valiant brother Conrad of Montferrat who was slain at Tyre by some secret assassins [74] After the sur render of Acre and the departure of Philip the king of England led the crusaders to the recov ery of the sea coast and the cities of Cæsarea and Jaffa were added to the fragments of the kingdom of Lusignan A march of one hundred miles from Acre to Ascalon was a great and per petual battle of eleven days In the disorder of his troops Saladin remained on the field with seventeen guards without lowering his stand ard or suspending the sound of his brazen ket tledrum he again rallied and renewed the charge and his preachers or heralds called aloud on the Unitarians manfully to stand up against the Christian idolaters But the progress of these idolaters was irresistible and it was only by demolishing the walls and buildings of Ascalon that the sultan could prevent them from occupying an important fortress on the confines of Egypt During a severe winter the armies slept but in the spring the Franks ad vanced within a day s march of Jerusalem un der the leading standard of the English king and his active spirit intercepted a convoy or caravan, of seven thousand camels Saladin[75] had fixed his station in the holy city but the city was struck with consternation and discord he fasted he prayed he preached he offered to share the dangers of the siege but his Mama lukes, who remembered the fate of their com panions at Acre, pressed the sultan, with loyal or seditious clamours, to reserve his person and their courage for the future defence of the reli gion and empire [76] The Moslems were delivered by the sudden or, as they deemed the miracu lous retreat of the Christians [77] and the laurels of Richard were blasted by the prudence, or envy of his companions The hero ascending a hill and veiling his face exclaimed with an in dignant voice, 'Those who are unwilling to rescue are unworthy to view the sepulchre of Christ!' After his return to Acre, on the news that Jaffa was surprised by the sultan he sailed with some merchant vessels and leaped fore most on the beach the castle was relieved by his presence and sixty thousand Turks and Saracens fled before his arms The discovery of his weakness provoked them to return in the morning and they found him carelessly en camped before the gates with only seventeen knights and three hundred archers Without counting their numbers, he sustained their charge and we learn from the evidence of his enemies that the king of England, grasping his lance rode furiously along their front from the right to the left wing without meeting an ad versary who dared to encounter his career ' Am I writing the history of Orlando or Amadis?

During these hostilities a languid and tedious negotiation[79] between the Franks and Moslems was started and continued and broken and again resumed and again broken Some acts of royal courtesy the gift of snow and fruit the exchange of Norway hawks and Arabian horses softened the asperity of religious war from the vicissitude of success the monarchs might learn to su pect that Heaven was neuter in the quarrel nor, after the trial of each other could either hope for a decisive victory [80] The health both of Richard and Saladin appeared to be in a declining state and they respectively suffered the evils of distant and domestic war fare Plantagenet was impatient to punish a perfidious rival who had invaded Normandy in his absence and the indefatigable sultan was subdued by the cries of the people who was the victim and of the soldiers who were the instru ments of his martial zeal The first demands of the king of England were the restitution of Jerusalem Palestine and the true cross and he firmly declared that himself and his brother pil grims would end their lives in the pious labour rather than return to Europe with ignominy and remorse But the conscience of Saladin re fused without some weighty compensation, to restore the idols or promote the idolatry of the

Christians he asserted with equal firmness, his religious and civil claim to the sovereignty of Palestine descanted on the importance and sanctity of Jerusalem and rejected all terms of the establishment, or partition of the Latins. The marriage which Richard proposed of his sister with the sultan's brother was defeated by the difference of faith the princess abhorred the embraces of a Turk and Adel or Saphadin would not easily renounce a plurality of wives. A personal interview was declined by Saladin who alleged their mutual ignorance of each other's language and the negotiation was managed with much art and delay by their interpreters and envoys The final agreement was equally disapproved by the zealots of both parties, by the Roman pontiff and the caliph of Bagdad It was stipulated that Jerusalem and the holy sepulchre should be open without tribute or vexation to the pilgrimage of the Latin Christians that after the demolition of Ascalon they should inclusively possess the sea coast from Jaffa to Tyre that the count of Tripoli and the prince of Antioch should be comprised in the truce and that, during three years and three months all hostilities should cease The principal chiefs of the two armies swore to the observance of the treaty but the monarchs were satisfied with giving their word and their right hand and the royal majesty was excused from an oath which always implies some suspicion of falsehood and dishonour Richard embarked for Europe to see a long captivity and a premature grave and the space of a few months concluded the life and glories of Saladin The Orientals described his edifying death which happened at Damascus but they seem ignorant of the equal distribution of his alms along the three religions,[81] or of the display of a shroud instead of a standard to admonish the East of the instability of human greatness The unity of empire was dissolved by his death his sons were oppressed by the stronger arm of their uncle Saphadin the hostile interests of the sultans of Egypt, Damascus and Aleppo[82] were again revived and the Franks or Latins stood and breathed and hoped in their fortresses along the Syrian coast.

The noblest monument of a conqueror's fame and of the terror which he inspired is the Saladine tenth a general tax which was imposed on the laity and even the clergy of the Latin church for the service of the holy war The practice was too lucrative to expire with the occasion and this tribute became the foundation of all the tithes and tenths on ecclesiastical benefices which have been granted by the Roman pontiffs to Catholic sovereigns, or reserved for the immediate use of the apostolic see.[83] This pecuniary emolument must have tended to increase the interest of the popes in the recovery of Palestine after the death of Saladin they preached the crusade by their epistles their legates, and their missionaries and the accomplishment of the pious work might have been expected from the zeal and talents of Innocent the Third[84] Under that young and ambitious priest the successors of St. Peter attained the full meridian of their greatness and in a reign of eighteen years exercised a despotic command over the emperors and kings, whom he raised and deposed over the nations, whom an interdict of months or years deprived for the offence of their rulers, of the exercise of Christian worship In the council of the Lateran he acted as the ecclesiastical almost as the temporal sovereign of the East and West. It was at the feet of his legate that John of England surrendered his crown and Innocent may boast of the two most signal triumphs over sense and humanity the establishment of transubstantiation and the origin of the inquisition At his voice two crusades, the fourth and the fifth were undertaken but, except a king of Hungary the princes of the second order were at the head of the pilgrims the forces were inadequate to the design nor did the effects correspond with the hopes and wishes of the pope and the people The fourth crusade was diverted from Syria to Constantinople and the conquest of the Greek or Roman empire by the Latins will form the proper and important subject of the next chapter In the fifth[85] two hundred thousand Franks were landed at the eastern mouth of the Nile They reasonably hoped that Palestine must be subdued in Egypt the seat and storehouse of the sultan and after a siege of sixteen months the Moslems deplored the loss of Damietta. But the Christian army was ruined by the pride and insolence of the legate Pelagius, who in the pope's name assumed the character of general the sickly Franks were encompassed by the waters of the Nile and the Oriental forces and it was by the evacuation of Damietta that they obtained a safe retreat some concessions for the pilgrims, and the tardy restitution of the doubtful relic of the true cross. The failure may in some measure be ascribed to the abuse and multiplication of the crusades, which were preached at the same time against the pagans of Livonia the Moors of Spain, the Albigeois of France and the kings of Sicily of the Imperial family [86] In these meritorious services the volunteers might acquire at home the same spiritual indulgence and a larger measure of temporal rewards and even the popes in their zeal against a domestic enemy were sometimes tempted to forget the distress of their Syrian brethren From the last age of the crusades they derived the occasional command of an army and revenue, and some deep reasoners have suspected that the whole enterprise from the first synod of Placentia, was contrived and executed by the policy of Rome. The suspicion is not founded either in nature or in fact. The successors of St. Peter appear to have followed rather than guided the impulse of manners and prejudice without much foresight of the seasons or cultivation of the soil they gathered the ripe and spontaneous fruits of the superstition of the times They gathered these fruits without toil or personal danger in the council of the Lateran Innocent the Third declared an ambiguous resolution of animating the crusaders by his example but the pilot of the sacred vessel could not abandon the helm nor was Palestine ever blessed with the presence of a Roman pontiff [87]

The persons, the families and estates of the pilgrims were under the immediate protection of the popes and these spiritual patrons soon claimed the prerogative of directing their operations and enforcing by commands and censures the accomplishment of their vow Frederic the Second [88] the grandson of Barbarossa was successively the pupil the enemy and the victim of the church At the age of twenty-one years and in obedience to his guardian Innocent the Third he assumed the cross the same promise was repeated at his royal and imperial coronations and his marriage with the heiress of Jerusalem for ever bound him to defend the kingdom of his son Conrad But as Frederic advanced in age and authority he repented of the rash engagements of his youth his liberal sense and knowledge taught him to despise the phantoms of superstition and the crowns of Asia he no longer entertained the same reverence for the successors of Innocent and his ambition was occupied by the restoration of the Italian monarchy from Sicily to the Alps But the success of this project would have reduced the popes to their primitive simplicity and after the delays and excuses of twelve years, they urged the emperor with entreaties and threats to fix the time and place of his departure for Palestine In the harbours of Sicily and Apulia he prepared a fleet of one hundred galleys, and of one hundred vessels that were framed to tran and land two thousand five hundred kn with their horses and attendants his vassa Naples and Germany formed a powerful a and the number of English crusaders was m nified to sixty thousand by the report of fa But the inevitable or affected slowness of t mighty preparation consumed the strength provisions of the more indigent pilgrims multitude was thinned by sickness and de tion and the sultry summer of Calabria an pated the mischiefs of a Syrian campaign. length the emperor hoisted sail at Brundusi with a fleet and army of forty thousand m but he kept the sea no more than three da and his hasty retreat, which was ascribed by friends to a grievous indisposition, was accu by his enemies as a voluntary and obstinate d obedience For suspending his vow was Frede excommunicated by Gregory the Ninth presuming the next year to accomplish vow he was again excommunicated by t same pope [89] While he served under the bann of the cross a crusade was preached against hi in Italy and after his return he was compell to ask pardon for the injuries which he h suffered The clergy and military orders Palestine were previously instructed to r nounce his communion and dispute his com mands and in his own kingdom the emper was forced to consent that the orders of th camp should be issued in the name of God an of the Christian republic Frederic entere Jerusalem in triumph and with his own hand (for no priest would perform the office) he too the crown from the altar of the holy sepulchre But the patriarch cast an interdict on the church which his presence had profaned and the knights of the hospital and temple informed the sultan how easily he might be surprised and slain in his unguarded visit to the river Jordan. reth, of Tyre and Sidon the Latins were allowed to inhabit and fortify the city an equal code of civil and religious freedom was ratified for the sectaries of Jesus and those of Mohammed, and while the former worshipped at the holy sepulchre the latter might pray and preach in the mosque of the temple[90] from whence the prophet undertook his nocturnal journey to heaven. The clergy deplored this scandalous toleration and the weaker Moslems were gradually expelled but every rational object of the crusades was accomplished without bloodshed the churches were restored the monasteries were replenished and in the space of fifteen years, the Latins of Jerusalem exceeded the number of six thousand This peace and prosperity for which they were ungrateful to their benefactor was terminated by the irruption of the strange and savage hordes of Carizmians.[91] Flying from the arms of the Moguls, those shepherds of the Caspian rolled headlong on Syria and the union of the Franks with the sultans of Aleppo, Hems, and Damascus was insufficient to stem the violence of the torrent. Whatever stood against them was cut off by the sword or dragged into captivity the military orders were almost exterminated in a single battle and in the pillage of the city in the profanation of the holy sepulchre, the Latins confess and regret the modesty and discipline of the Turks and Saracens.

Of the seven crusades, the two last were undertaken by Louis the Ninth king of France who lost his liberty in Egypt, and his life on the coast of Africa Twenty-eight years after his death he was canonised at Rome and sixty five miracles were readily found and solemnly attested to justify the claim of the royal saint.[92] The voice of history renders a more honourable testimony that he united the virtues of a king a hero and a man that his martial spirit was tempered by the love of private and public justice and that Louis was the father of his people, the friend of his neighbours, and the terror of the infidels. Superstition alone in all the extent of her baleful influence[*] corrupted his understanding and his heart his devotion stooped to admire and imitate the begging friars of Francis and Dominic he pursued with blind and cruel zeal the enemies of the faith and the best of kings twice descended from his throne to seek the adventures of a spiritual knight-errant. A monkish historian would have been content to applaud the most despicable part of his character but the noble and gallant Joinville[94] who shared the friendship and captivity of Louis, has traced with the pencil of nature the free portrait of his virtues as well as of his failings From this intimate knowledge we may learn to suspect the political views of depressing their great vassals, which are so often imputed to the royal authors of the crusades. Above all the princes of the middle ages Louis the Ninth successfully laboured to restore the prerogatives of the crown but it was at home and not in the East, that he acquired for himself and his posterity his vow was the result of enthusiasm and sickness and if he were the promoter he was likewise the victim of this holy madness. For the invasion of Egypt France was exhausted of her troops and treasures he covered the sea of Cyprus with eighteen hundred sails the most modest enumeration amounts to fifty thousand men and if we might trust his own confession as it is reported by Oriental vanity he disembarked nine thousand five hundred horse and one hundred and thirty thousand foot who performed their pilgrimage under the shadow of his power[95]

In complete armour the oriflamme waving before him Louis leaped foremost on the beach and the strong city of Damietta which had cost his predecessors a siege of sixteen months, was abandoned on the first assault by the trembling Moslems. But Damietta was the first and the last of his conquests and in the fifth and sixth crusades the same causes, almost on the same ground were productive of similar calamities[96] After a ruinous delay which introduced into the camp the seeds of an epidemical disease the Franks advanced from the sea-coast towards the capital of Egypt and strove to surmount the unseasonable inundation of the Nile which opposed their progress. Under the eye of their intrepid monarch the barons and knights of France displayed their invincible contempt of danger and discipline his brother the count of Artois stormed with inconsiderate valour the town of Massoura and the carrier pigeons announced to the inhabitants of Cairo that all was lost. But a soldier who afterwards usurped the sceptre rallied the flying troops the main body of the Christians was far behind their vanguard and Artois was overpowered and slain. A shower of Greek fire was incessantly poured on the invaders the Nile was commanded by the Egyptian galleys the open country by the Arabs all provisions were intercepted each day aggravated the sickness and famine and about the same time a retreat was found to be necessary and impracticable The Oriental writers confess that Louis might have escaped

But the patriarch cast an interdict on the church which his presence had profaned and the knights of the hospital and temple informed the sultan how easily he might be surprised and slain in his unguarded visit to the river Jordan. In such a state of fanaticism and faction victory was hopeless and defence was difficult but the conclusion of an advantageous peace may be imputed to the discord of the Mohammedans and their personal esteem for the character of Frederic. The enemy of the church is accused of maintaining with the miscreants an intercourse of hospitality and friendship unworthy of a Christian of despising the barrenness of the land and of indulging a profane thought that if Jehovah had seen the kingdom of Naples, he never would have selected Palestine for the inheritance of his chosen people Yet Frederic obtained from the sultan the restitution of Jerusalem, of Bethlehem and Naza

Berytus, Sidon Tyre, and Jaffa and the strong er castles of the Hospitalers and Templars suc cessively fell and the whole existence of the Franks was confined to the city and colony of St. John of Acre, which is sometimes described by the more classic title of Ptolemais.

After the loss of Jerusalem, Acre[118] which is distant about seventy miles became the metropolis of the Latin Christians, and was adorned with strong and stately buildings, with aque ducts, an artificial port and a double wall The population was increased by the incessant streams of pilgrims and fugitives in the pauses of hostility the trade of the East and West was attracted to this convenient station and the market could offer the produce of every clime and the interpreters of every tongue. But in this conflux of nations every vice was propagated and practised of all the disciples of Jesus and Mohammed the male and female inhabitants of Acre were esteemed the most corrupt nor could the abuse of religion be corrected by the discipline of law The city had many sovereigns and no government. The kings of Jerusalem and Cyprus, of the house of Lusignan the princes of Antioch, the counts of Tripoli and Sidon the great masters of the hospital the temple, and the Teutonic order the republics of Venice, Genoa and Pisa, the pope s legate the kings of France and England assumed an independent com mand seventeen tribunals exercised the power of life and death every criminal was protected in the adjacent quarter and the perpetual jeal ousy of the nations often burst forth in acts of violence and blood. Some adventurers who disgraced the ensign of the cross compensated their want of pay by the plunder of the Mohammedan villages nineteen Syrian merchants who traded under the public faith were de spoiled and hanged by the Christians and the denial of satisfaction justified the arms of the sultan Khalil. He marched against Acre at the head of sixty thousand horse and one hundred and forty thousand foot his train of artillery (if I may use the word) was numerous and weighty the separate timbers of a single engine were transported in one hundred waggons and the royal historian Abulfeda who served with the troops of Hamah was himself a spectator of the holy war Whatever might be the vices of the Franks their courage was rekindled by en thusiasm and despair but they were torn by the discord of seventeen chiefs and overwhelmed on all sides by the powers of the sultan. After a siege of thirty three days the double wall was forced by the Moslems the principal tower yielded to their engines the Mamalukes made a general assault the city was stormed and death or slavery was the lot of sixty thousand Christians. The convent, or rather fortress, of the Templars resisted three days longer but the great master was pierced with an arrow, and of five hundred knights, only ten were left alive, less happy than the victims of the sword if they lived to suffer on a scaffold in the unjust and cruel proscription of the whole order The king of Jerusalem the patriarch and the great mas ter of the hospital effected their retreat to the shore but the sea was rough the vessels were insufficient, and great numbers of the fugitives were drowned before they could reach the isle of Cyprus which might comfort Lusignan for the loss of Palestine By the command of the sultan the churches and fortifications of the Latin cities were demolished a motive of ava rice or fear still opened the holy sepulchre to some devout and defenceless pilgrims and a mournful and solitary silence prevailed along the coast which had so long resounded with the WORLD S DEBATE[119]

CHAPTER LX

Schism of the Greeks and Latins State of Constantinople Revolt of the Bulgarians Isaac Angelus dethroned by his Brother Alexius Origin of the Fourth Crusade Alliance of the French and Venetians with the Son of Isaac Their Naval Expedition to Constantinople The Two Sieges and Final Conquest of the City by the Latins

THE restoration of the Western empire by Charlemagne was speedily followed by the separation of the Greek and Latin churches.[1] A religious and national animosity still divides the two largest communions of the Christian world and the schism of Constan tinople by alienating her most useful allies, and provoking her most dangerous enemies, has precipitated the decline and fall of the Roman empire in the East.

if he would have deserted his subjects he was made prisoner with the greatest part of his nobles all who could not redeem their lives by service or ransom were inhumanly massacred, and the walls of Cairo were decorated with a circle of Christian heads [97] The king of France was loaded with chains but the generous victor a great grandson of the brother of Saladin, sent a robe of honour to his royal captive and his deliverance with that of his soldiers was obtained by the restitution of Damietta[98] and the payment of four hundred thousand pieces of gold In a soft and luxurious climate the degenerate children of the companions of Noureddin and Saladin were incapable of resisting the flower of European chivalry they triumphed by the arms of their slaves or Mamalukes the hardy natives of Tartary, who at a tender age had been purchased of the Syrian merchants and were educated in the camp and palace of the sultan But Egypt soon afforded a new example of the danger of prætorian bands and the rage of these ferocious animals who had been let loose on the strangers was provoked to devour their benefactor In the pride of conquest Touran Shah the last of his race was murdered by his Mamalukes and the most daring of the assassins entered the chamber of the captive king with drawn scimitars and their hands imbrued in the blood of their sultan The firmness of Louis commanded their respect,[99] their avarice prevailed over cruelty and zeal the treaty was accomplished and the king of France with the relics of his army was permitted to embark for Palestine He wasted four years within the walls of Acre unable to visit Jerusalem, and unwilling to return without glory to his native country

The memory of his defeat excited Louis after sixteen years of wisdom and repose to undertake the seventh and last of the crusades His finances were restored his kingdom was enlarged a new generation of warriors had arisen and he embarked with fresh confidence at the head of six thousand horse and thirty thousand foot The loss of Antioch had provoked the enterprise a wild hope of baptising the king of Tunis tempted him to steer for the African coast and the report of an immense treasure reconciled his troops to the delay of their voyage to the Holy Land Instead of a proselyte he found a siege, the French panted and died on the burning sands, St Louis expired in his tent and no sooner had he closed his eyes than his son and successor gave the signal of the retreat.[100] It is thus says a lively writer that a Christian king died near the ruins of Carthage, waging war against the sectaries of Mohammed in a land to which Dido had introduced the deities of Syria.[101]

A more unjust and absurd constitution cannot be devised than that which condemns the natives of a country to perpetual servitude under the arbitrary dominion of strangers and slaves Yet such has been the state of Egypt above five hundred years The most illustrious sultans of the Baharite and Borgite dynasties[102] were themselves promoted from the Tartar and Circassian bands, and the four and twenty beys, or military chiefs have ever been succeeded not by their sons but by their servants They produce the great charter of their liberties the treaty of Selim the First with the republic[103] and the Othman emperor still accepts from Egypt a slight acknowledgment of tribute and subjection With some breathing intervals of peace and order the two dynasties are marked as a period of rapine and bloodshed[104] but their throne however shaken reposed on the two pillars of discipline and valour their sway extended over Egypt Nubia Arabia and Syria their Mamalukes were multiplied from eight hundred to twenty five thousand horse, and their numbers were increased by a provincial militia of one hundred and seven thousand foot and the occasional aid of sixty six thousand Arabs[105] Princes of such power and spirit could not long endure on their coast a hostile and independent nation and if the ruin of the Franks was postponed about forty years they were indebted to the cares of an unsettled reign, to the invasion of the Moguls and to the occasional aid of some warlike pilgrims Among these the English reader will observe the name of our first Edward who assumed the cross in the lifetime of his father Henry At the head of a thousand soldiers the future conqueror of Wales and Scotland delivered Acre from a siege marched as far as Nazareth with an army of nine thousand men emulated the fame of his uncle Richard, extorted by his valour a ten years truce and escaped with a dangerous wound from the dagger of a fanatic assassin[106] Antioch[107] whose situation had been less exposed to the calamities of the Holy war was finally occupied and ruined by Bondocdar or Bibars sultan of Egypt and Syria the Latin principality was extinguished and the first seat of the Christian name was dispeopled by the slaughter of seventeen and the captivity of one hundred thousand of her inhabitants The maritime towns of Laodicea Gabala Tripoli

the clergy of the age and the purity of his morals has never been impeached but his ordination was hasty his rise was irregular and Ignatius, his abdicated predecessor was yet supported by the public compassion and the obstinacy of his adherents They appealed to the tribunal of Nicholas the First one of the proudest and most aspiring of the Roman pontiffs, who embraced the welcome opportunity of judging and condemning his rival of the East. Their quarrel was embittered by a conflict of jurisdiction over the king and nation of the Bulgarians nor was their recent conversion to Christianity of much avail to either prelate, unless he could number the proselytes among the subjects of his power With the aid of his court the Greek patriarch was victorious but in the furious contest he deposed in his turn the successor of St. Peter and involved the Latin church in the reproach of heresy and schism. Photius sacrificed the peace of the world to a short and precarious reign he fell with his patron, the Cæsar Bardas and Basil the Macedonian performed an act of justice in the restoration of Ignatius, whose age and dignity had not been sufficiently respected From his monastery or prison, Photius solicited the favour of the emperor by pathetic complaints and artful flattery and the eyes of his rival were scarcely closed when he was again restored to the throne of Constantinople After the death of Basil he experienced the vicissitudes of courts and the ingratitude of a royal pupil the patriarch was again deposed and in his last solitary hours he might regret the freedom of a secular and studious life. In each revolution the breath the nod, of the sovereign had been accepted by a submissive clergy and a synod of three hundred bishops was always prepared to hail the triumph, or to stigmatise the fall of the holy or the execrable Photius.* By a delusive promise of succour or reward the popes were tempted to countenance these various proceedings and the synods of Constantinople were ratified by their epistles or legates But the court and the people, Ignatius and Photius, were equally adverse to their claims their ministers were insulted or imprisoned the procession of the Holy Ghost was forgotten Bulgaria was for ever annexed to the Byzantine throne and the schism was prolonged by their rigid censure of all the multiplied ordinations of an irregular patriarch. The darkness and corruption of the tenth century suspended the intercourse without reconciling the minds, of the two nations But when the Norman sword restored the churches of Apulia to the jurisdiction of Rome the departing flock was warned, by a petulant epistle of the Greek patriarch to avoid and abhor the errors of the Latins. The rising majesty of Rome could no longer brook the insolence of a rebel and Michael Cerularius was excommunicated in the heart of Constantinople by the pope's legates Shaking the dust from their feet, they deposited on the altar of St. Sophia a direful anathema[10] which enumerates the seven mortal heresies of the Greeks, and devotes the guilty teachers, and their unhappy sectaries, to the eternal society of the devil and his angels According to the emergencies of the church and state a friendly correspondence was sometimes resumed the language of charity and concord was sometimes affected but the Greeks have never recanted their errors the popes have never repealed their sentence and from this thunderbolt we may date the consummation of the schism. It was enlarged by each ambitious step of the Roman pontiffs the emperors blushed and trembled at the ignominious fate of their royal brethren of Germany and the people was scandalised by the temporal power and military life of the Latin clergy[11]

The aversion of the Greeks and Latins was nourished and manifested in the three first expeditions to the Holy Land Alexius Comnenus contrived the absence at least of the formidable pilgrims his successors, Manuel and Isaac Angelus, conspired with the Moslems for the ruin of the greatest princes of the Franks and their crooked and malignant policy was seconded by the active and voluntary obedience of every order of their subjects Of this hostile temper a large portion may doubtless be ascribed to the difference of language dress and manners, which severs and alienates the nations of the globe The pride as well as the prudence of the sovereign was deeply wounded by the intrusion of foreign armies that claimed a right of traversing his dominions, and passing under the walls of his capital his subjects were insulted and plundered by the rude strangers of the West and the hatred of the pusillanimous Greeks was sharpened by secret envy of the bold and pious enterprises of the Franks But these profane causes of national enmity were fortified and inflamed by the venom of religious zeal Instead of a kind embrace an hospitable reception from their Christian brethren of the East every tongue was taught to repeat the names of schismatic and heretic more odious to an orthodox ear than those of pagan and infidel instead of being loved for the general conformity of faith

In the course of the present history the aversion of the Greeks for the Latins has been often visible and conspicuous It was originally derived from the disdain of servitude inflamed, after the time of Constantine by the pride of equality or dominion and finally exasperated by the preference which their rebellious subjects had given to the alliance of the Franks In every age the Greeks were proud of their superiority in profane and religious knowledge they had first received the light of Christianity they had pronounced the decrees of the seven general councils, they alone possessed the language of Scripture and philosophy nor should the barbarians, immersed in the darkness of the West [2] presume to argue on the high and mysterious questions of theological science Those barbarians despised in their turn the restless and subtle levity of the Orientals the authors of every heresy and blessed their own simplicity which was content to hold the tradition of the apostolic church Yet in the seventh century the synods of Spain and afterwards of France improved or corrupted the Nicene creed on the mysterious subject of the third person of the Trinity [3] In the long controversies of the East the nature and generation of the Christ had been scrupulously defined and the well known relation of father and son seemed to convey a faint image to the human mind The idea of birth was less analogous to the Holy Spirit, who instead of a divine gift or attribute was considered by the Catholics as a substance a person a god he was not begotten but in the orthodox style he proceeded Did he proceed from the Father alone perhaps by the Son? or from the Father and the Son? The first of these opinions was asserted by the Greeks the second by the Latins and the addition to the Nicene creed of the word filioque kindled the flame of discord between the Oriental and the Gallic churches In the origin of the dispute the Roman pontiffs affected a character of neutrality and moderation [4] they condemned the innovation but they acquiesced in the sentiment of their Transalpine brethren they seemed desirous of casting a veil of silence and charity over the superfluous research and in the correspondence of Charlemagne and Leo the Third the pope assumes the liberality of a statesman and the prince descends to the passions and prejudices of a priest [5] But the orthodoxy of Rome spontaneously obeyed the impulse of her temporal policy and the filioque which Leo wished to erase was transcribed in the symbol and chanted in the liturgy of the Vatican The Nicene and Athanasian creeds are held as the Catholic faith without which none can be saved and both Papists and Protestants must now sustain and return the anathemas of the Greeks, who deny the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Son as well as from the Father Such articles of faith are not susceptible of treaty, but the rules of discipline will vary in remote and independent churches and the reason even of divines might allow that the difference is inevitable and harmless. The craft or superstition of Rome has imposed on her priests and deacons the rigid obligation of celibacy among the Greeks it is confined to the bishops the loss is compensated by dignity or annihilated by age and the parochial clergy, the papas enjoy the conjugal society of the wives whom they have married before their entrance into holy orders A question concerning the Azyms was fiercely debated in the eleventh century and the essence of the Eucharist was supposed in the East and West to depend on the use of leavened or unleavened bread Shall I mention in a serious history the furious reproaches that were urged against the Latins who for a long while remained on the defensive? They neglected to abstain, according to the apostolical decree from things strangled and from blood they fasted a Jewish observance on the Saturday of each week during the first week of Lent they permitted the use of milk and cheese [6] their infirm monks were indulged in the taste of flesh and animal grease was substituted for the want of vegetable oil the holy chrism or unction in baptism was reserved to the episcopal order the bishops, as the bridegrooms of their churches were decorated with rings their priests shaved their faces, and baptised by a single immersion Such were the crimes which provoked the zeal of the patriarchs of Constantinople and which were justified with equal zeal by the doctors of the Latin church [7]

Bigotry and national aversion are powerful magnifiers of every object of dispute but the immediate cause of the schism of the Greeks may be traced in the emulation of the leading prelates who maintained the supremacy of the old metropolis superior to all and of the reigning capital inferior to none in the Christian world About the middle of the ninth century Photius [8] an ambitious layman the captain of the guards and principal secretary was promoted by merit and favour to the more desirable office of patriarch of Constantinople In science even ecclesiastical science, he surpassed from the same Imperial dynasty The successor of a second Nero might ha e found it an easy task o deserve the esteem and affect on of his subjects they sometimes had reason to regret the administration of Andron cus The sound and gorous mind of the tyrant was capable of discerning the connection between his own and the publ c in erest and while he was feared by all who could inspire him ith fear the unsus pected people, and the remote provinces, might bless the inexorable justice of their master But his successor was va n and jealous of the su preme power which he wanted courage and abil ties to exercise his vices were pern cious, his virtues (if he possessed any virtues) were useless, to mankind and the Greeks, who im pu ed their calamities to his negl gence den ed him the merit of any transient or accidental benefits of the times Isaac slept on the throne and was awakened only by the sound of plea sure his vacant hours ere amused by come dians and buffoons, and e en to these buffoons the emperor was an object of contempt his feasts and buildings exceeded the examples of royal luxury the number of his eunuchs and domestics amounted to twenty thousand and a daily sum of four thousand pounds of silver would swell to four mill ons sterling the a nual expense of his household and table H s po erty was rel eved by oppression and the publ c d s con ent was inflamed by equal abuses in the collection and the appl cation of the revenue. While the Greeks numbered the days of their ser tude, a fla ering prophet whom he re warded w th the dignity of patriarch assured him of a long and vic orious re gn of thirty t o years during wh ch he should extend his way to Mount Libanus and his conquests beyond the Euphrates. But his only step to ards the accomplishment of the pred c on was a splend d and scandalous embassy o Saladin[19] to de ma d the resti ution of the holy sepulchre and to propose an offens e and defensi e league w th the enemy of the Chr stian name In these unwo thy hands, of Isaac and his brother the remains of the G eek emp re crumbled into dust. The island of Cyprus whose name excites the deas of elegance and pleasure, was usurped by his namesake a Comnen an prince and by a strange concatenat on of events, the sword of our English Richard bestowed that kingdom on the house of Lusignan a rich compensation for the loss of Jerusalem.

The honour of the monarchy and the safety of the cap tal were deeply wounded by the re volt of the Bulgarians and Wallachians. Since the victory of the second Basil, they had sup ported, abo e a hundred and seventy years the loose dominion of the Byzantine princes but no effectual measures had been adopted to impose the yoke of laws and manners on these savage tr bes. By the command of Isaac, their sole means of subsistence their flocks and herds were driven away to contr bute towards the pomp of the royal nuptials and the r fierce warr ors were exasperated by the denial of equal rank and pay in the mil tary service Peter and Asan t o powerful chiefs, of the race of the ancient kings[20] asserted the r own rights and the nat onal freedom their demoniac im pos ors proclaimed to the crowd that their glorious patron St. Demetrius had for ever de serted the cause of the Greeks and the confla grat on spread from the banks of the Danube to the h lls of Macedonia and Thrace After some faint efforts Isaac Angelus and his brother acqu esced in their independence and the Im perial troops were soon discouraged by the bones of their fellow sold ers that were scattered along the passes of Mount Hæmus. By the arms and pol cy of John or Joannices, the second kingdom of Bulgaria was firmly established The subtle barbarian sent an embassy to Inno cent the Third to ackno ledge himself a gen uine son of Rome in descent and religion[21] and humbly recei ed from the pope the l cence of coining money the royal title, and a Latin arch bishop or patriarch The Vat can exulted in the spiritual conquest of Bulgaria the first object of the schism and if the Greeks could ha e preserved the prerogati es of the church they would gladly have res gned the rights of the monarchy

The Bulgarians were mal c ous enough to pray for the long life of Isaac Angelus the surest pledge of their freedom and prosperity Yet the r ch efs could in olve in the same indis criminate contempt the family and nat on of the emperor In all the Greeks sa d Asan to his troop the same climate and character and education w ll be productive of the same fru ts Behold my lance continued the war rior and the long streamers that float in the nd They d ffer only in colour they are formed of the same silk, and fash oned by the same workman nor has the str pe that s stained in purple any super or price or value above its fellows[22] Several of these cand dates for the purple successi ely rose and fell under the em p re of Isaac a general ho had repelled the fleets of S cily was dr ven to revolt and ruin by the ingratitude of the prince and his luxurious and worship, they were abhorred for some rules of discipline some questions of theology, in which themselves or their teachers might differ from the Oriental church In the crusade of Louis the Seventh the Greek clergy washed and purified the altars which had been defiled by the sacrifice of a French priest. The companions of Frederic Barbarossa deplore the injuries which they endured both in word and deed from the peculiar rancour of the bishops and monks Their prayers and sermons excited the people against the impious barbarians, and the patriarch is accused of declaring that the faithful might obtain the redemption of all their sins by the extirpation of the schismatics [12] An enthusiast named Dorotheus alarmed the fears and restored the confidence of the emperor by a prophetic assurance that the German heretic after assaulting the gate of Blachernes would be made a signal example of the divine vengeance The passage of these mighty armies were rare and perilous events but the crusades introduced a frequent and familiar intercourse between the two nations which enlarged their knowledge without abating their prejudices. The wealth and luxury of Constantinople demanded the productions of every climate these imports were balanced by the art and labour of her numerous inhabitants her situation invites the commerce of the world and in every period of her existence that commerce has been in the hands of foreigners After the decline of Amalphi the Venetians Pisans and Genoese introduced their factories and settlements into the capital of the empire their services were rewarded with honours and immunities they acquired the possession of lands and houses their families were multiplied by marriages with the natives and after the toleration of a Mohammedan mosque it was impossible to interdict the churches of the Roman rite [13] The two wives of Manuel Comnenus[14] were of the race of the Franks the first a sister in law of the emperor Conrad the second a daughter of the prince of Antioch he obtained for his son Alexius a daughter of Philip Augustus king of France, and he bestowed his own daughter on a marquis of Montferrat who was educated and dignified in the palace of Constantinople The Greek encountered the arms and aspired to the empire of the West he esteemed the valour and trusted the fidelity of the Franks [15] their military talents were unfitly recompensed by the lucrative offices of judges and treasurers the policy of Manuel had solicited the alliance of the pope, and the popular voice accused him of a partial bias to the nation and religion of the Latins [16] During his reign and that of his successor Alexius, they were exposed at Constantinople to the reproach of foreigners, heretics, and favourites, and this triple guilt was severely expiated in the tumult which announced the return and elevation of Andronicus [17] The people rose in arms from the Asiatic shore the tyrant despatched his troops and galleys to assist the national revenge and the hopeless resistance of the strangers served only to justify the rage and sharpen the daggers of the assassins Neither age nor sex, nor the ties of friendship or kindred, could save the victims of national hatred and avarice and religious zeal the Latins were slaughtered in their houses and in the streets their quarter was reduced to ashes, the clergy were burnt in their churches, and the sick in their hospitals and some estimate may be formed of the slain from the clemency which sold above four thousand Christians in perpetual slavery to the Turks The priests and monks were the loudest and most active in the destruction of the schismatics and they chanted a thanksgiving to the Lord when the head of a Roman cardinal the pope's legate, was severed from his body fastened to the tail of a dog and dragged with savage mockery through the city The more diligent of the strangers had retreated on the first alarm to their vessels and escaped through the Hellespont from the scene of blood In their flight they burnt and ravaged two hundred miles of the sea-coast inflicted a severe revenge on the guiltless subjects of the empire marked the priests and monks as their peculiar enemies, and compensated by the accumulation of plunder the loss of their property and friends. On their return they exposed to Italy and Europe the wealth and weakness the perfidy and malice of the Greeks whose vices were painted as the genuine characters of heresy and schism The scruples of the first crusaders had neglected the fairest opportunities of securing by the possession of Constantinople the way to the Holy Land a domestic revolution invited and almost compelled the French and Venetians to achieve the conquest of the Roman empire of the East

In the series of the Byzantine princes I have exhibited the hypocrisy and ambition the tyranny and fall of Andronicus, the last male of the Comnenian family who reigned at Constantinople The revolution which cast him headlong from the throne saved and exalted Isaac Angelus [18] who descended by the females

from the same Imperial dynasty The successor of a second Nero might have found it an easy task to deserve the esteem and affection of his subjects they sometimes had reason to regret the administration of Andronicus The sound and vigorous mind of the tyrant was capable of discerning the connection between his own and the public interest and while he was feared by all who could inspire him with fear the unsuspected people and the remote provinces might bless the inexorable justice of their master But his successor was vain and jealous of the supreme power which he wanted courage and abilities to exercise his vices were pernicious his virtues (if he possessed any virtues) were useless, to mankind and the Greeks, who imputed their calamities to his negligence denied him the merit of any transient or accidental benefits of the times Isaac slept on the throne, and was awakened only by the sound of pleasure his vacant hours were amused by comedians and buffoons and even to these buffoons the emperor was an object of contempt his feasts and buildings exceeded the examples of royal luxury the number of his eunuchs and domestics amounted to twenty thousand and a daily sum of four thousand pounds of silver would swell to four millions sterling the annual expense of his household and table His poverty was relieved by oppression and the public discontent was inflamed by equal abuses in the collection and the application of the revenue. By the command of Isaac their sole means of subsistence their flocks and herds were driven away to contribute towards the pomp of the royal nuptials and their fierce warriors were exasperated by the denial of equal rank and pay in the military service. Peter and Asan two powerful chiefs of the race of the ancient kings [20] asserted their own rights and the national freedom their demoniac impostors proclaimed to the crowd that their glorious patron St. Demetrius had for ever deserted the cause of the Greeks and the conflagration spread from the banks of the Danube to the hills of Macedonia and Thrace. After some faint efforts, Isaac Angelus and his brother acquiesced in their independence and the Imperial troops were soon discouraged by the bones of their fellow soldiers that were scattered along the passes of Mount Hæmus. By the arms and policy of John or Joannices, the second kingdom of Bulgaria was firmly established The subtle barbarian sent an embassy to Innocent the Third to acknowledge himself a genuine son of Rome in descent and religion [21] and humbly received from the pope the licence of coining mon y the royal title, and a Latin archbishop or patriarch The Vatican exulted in the piritual conquest of Bulgaria the first object of the schism and if the Greeks could have preserved the prerogatives of the church they would gladly have resigned the rights of the monarchy

The Bulgarians were malicious enough to pray for the long life of Isaac Angelus the surest pledge of their freedom and prosperity Yet their chiefs could involve in the same indiscriminate contempt the family and nation of the emperor In all the Greeks, said Asan to his troops the same climate and character and education will be productive of the same fruits B hold my lance continued the warrior and the long streamers that float in the wind. The scruples of the first crusaders had neglected the fairest opportunities of securing, by the possession of Constantinople the way to the Holy Land a domestic revolution invited, and almost compelled the French and Venetians to achieve the conquest of the Roman empire of the East

from the same Imperial dynasty The successor of a second Nero might have found it an easy task to deserve the esteem and affection of his subjects they sometimes had reason to regret the administration of Andronicus The sound and vigorous mind of the tyrant was capable of discerning the connection between his own and the public interest and while he was feared by all who could inspire him with fear the unsuspected people and the remote provinces might bless the inexorable justice of their master But his successor was vain and jealous of the supreme power which he wanted courage and abilities to exercise his vices were pernicious his virtues (if he possessed any virtues) were useless, to mankind and the Greeks who imputed their calamities to his negligence denied him the merit of any transient or accidental benefits of the times Isaac slept on the throne, and was awakened only by the sound of pleasure his vacant hours were amused by comedians and buffoons, and even to these buffoons the emperor was an object of contempt his feasts and buildings exceeded the examples of royal luxury the number of his eunuchs and domestics amounted to twenty thousand and a daily sum of four thousand pounds of silver would swell to four millions sterling the annual expense of his household and table His poverty was relieved by oppression and the public discontent was inflamed by equal abuses in the collection and the application of the revenue. While the Greeks numbered the days of their servitude, a flattering prophet, whom he rewarded with the dignity of patriarch assured him of a long and victorious reign of thirty two years, during which he should extend his sway to Mount Libanus and his conquests beyond the Euphrates But his only step towards the accomplishment of the prediction was a splendid and scandalous embassy to Saladin [18] to demand the restitution of the holy sepulchre and to propose an offensive and defensive league with the enemy of the Christian name In these unworthy hands, of Isaac and his brother the remains of the Greek empire crumbled into dust. The island of Cyprus, whose name excites the ideas of elegance and pleasure, was usurped by his namesake, a Comnenian prince and by a strange concatenation of events the sword of our English Richard bestowed that kingdom on the house of Lusignan a rich compensation for the loss of Jerusalem.

The honour of the monarchy and the safety of the capital were deeply wounded by the revolt of the Bulgarians and Wallachians. Since the victory of the second Basil, they had supported, above a hundred and seventy years the loose dominion of the Byzantine princes but no effectual measures had been adopted to impose the yoke of laws and manners on these savage tribes. By the command of Isaac, their sole means of subsistence their flocks and herds were driven away to contribute towards the pomp of the royal nuptials and their fierce warriors were exasperated by the denial of equal rank and pay in the military service Peter and Asan two powerful chiefs of the race of the ancient kings,[19] asserted their own rights and the national freedom their demoniac impostors proclaimed to the crowd that their glorious patron St. Demetrius had for ever deserted the cause of the Greeks and the conflagration spread from the banks of the Danube to the hills of Macedonia and Thrace. After some faint efforts, Isaac Angelus and his brother acquiesced in their independence and the Imperial troops were soon discouraged by the bones of their fellow-soldiers that were scattered along the passes of Mount Hæmus. By the arms and policy of John or Joannices, the second kingdom of Bulgaria was firmly established The subtle barbarian sent an embassy to Innocent the Third to acknowledge himself a genuine son of Rome in descent and religion [1] and humbly received from the pope the licence of coining money the royal title, and a Latin archbishop or patriarch The Vatican exulted in the spiritual conquest of Bulgaria the first object of the schism and if the Greeks could have preserved the prerogatives of the church they would gladly have resigned the rights of the monarchy

The Bulgarians were malicious enough to pray for the long life of Isaac Angelus, the surest pledge of their freedom and prosperity Yet their chiefs could involve in the same indiscriminate contempt the family and nation of the emperor In all the Greeks, said Asan to his troops the same climate and character and education will be productive of the same fruits B hold my lance continued the warrior and the long streamers that float in the wind They differ only in colour they are formed of the same silk, and fashioned by the same workman nor has the stripe that is stained in purple any superior price or value above its fellows [2] Several of these candidates for the purple successively rose and fell under the empire of Isaac a general who had repelled the fleets of Sicily was driven to revolt and ruin by the ingratitude of the prince and his luxurious

repose was disturbed by secret conspiracies and popular insurrections The emperor was saved by accident, or the merit of his servants for he was at length oppressed by an ambitious brother, who for the hope of a precarious diadem forgot the obligations of nature, of loyalty, and of friendship [23] While Isaac in the Thracian valleys pursued the idle and solitary pleasures of the chase his brother Alexius Angelus was in vested with the purple by the unanimous suf frage of the camp the capital and the clergy subscribed to their choice and the vanity of the new sovereign rejected the name of his fathers for the lofty and royal appellation of the Comnenian race On the despicable character of Isaac I have exhausted the language of con tempt and can only add that in a reign of eight years the baser Alexius [4] was supported by the masculine vices of his wife Euphrosyne The first intelligence of his fall was conveyed to the late emperor by the hostile aspect and pursuit of the guards, no longer his own he fled before them above fifty miles as far as Stagyra in Mac edonia but the fugitive without an object or a follower was arrested, brought back to Con stantinople deprived of his eyes and confined in a lonesome tower on a scanty allowance of bread and water At the moment of the revo lution, his son Alexius whom he educated in the hope of empire was twelve years of age He was spared by the usurper and reduced to at tend his triumph both in peace and war but as the army was encamped on the sea shore an Italian vessel facilitated the escape of the royal youth and in the disguise of a common sailor he eluded the search of his enemies passed the Hellespont and found a secure refuge in the isle of Sicily After saluting the threshold of the apostles and imploring the protection of pope Innocent the Third Alexius accepted the kind invitation of his sister Irene the wife of Philip of Swabia king of the Romans But in his pas sage through Italy he heard that the flower of Western chivalry was assembled at Venice for the deliverance of the Holy Land and a ray of hope was kindled in his bosom that their in vincible swords might be employed in his father's restoration

About ten or twelve years after the loss of Jerusalem the nobles of France were again summoned to the holy war by the voice of a third prophet less extravagant, perhaps than Peter the Hermit but far below St. Bernard in the merit of an orator and a statesman An illiterate priest of the neighbourhood of Paris Fulk of Neuilly,[25] forsook his parochial duty to assume the more flattering character of a pop ular and itinerant missionary The fame of his sanctity and miracles was spread over the land he declaimed, with severity and vehemence against the vices of the age and his sermons which he preached in the streets of Paris con verted the robbers the usurers the prostitutes, and even the doctors and scholars of the uni versity No sooner did Innocent the Third ascend the chair of St. Peter than he proclaimed in Italy Germany and France the obligation of a new crusade [26] The eloquent pontiff de scribed the ruin of Jerusalem, the triumph of the Pagans, and the shame of Christendom his liberality proposed the redemption of sins a plenary indulgence to all who should serve in Palestine, either a year in person or two years by a substitute [27] and among his legates and orators who blew the sacred trumpet Fulk of Neuilly was the loudest and most successful The situation of the principal monarchs was averse to the pious summons The emperor Frederic the Second was a child and his king dom of Germany was disputed by the rival houses of Brunswick and Swabia the mem orable factions of the Guelphs and Ghibelines. Philip Augustus of France had performed and could not be persuaded to renew the perilous vow but as he was not less ambitious of praise than of power he cheerfully instituted a per petual fund for the defence of the Holy Land Richard of England was satiated with the glory and misfortunes of his first adventure and he presumed to deride the exhortations of Fulk of Neuilly who was not abashed in the presence of kings You advise me said Plantagenet to dismiss my three daughters pride avarice and incontinence I bequeath them to the most de serving my pride to the knights templars my avarice to the monks of Cisteaux and my in continence to the prelates But the preacher was heard and obeyed by the great vassals the princes of the second order and Theobald or Thibaut count of Champagne was the fore most in the holy race The valiant youth at the age of twenty two years was encouraged by the domestic examples of his father who marched in the second crusade and of his elder brother who had ended his days in Palestine with the title of King of Jerusalem two thousand two hundred knights owed service and homage to his peerage [5] the nobles of Champagne ex celled in all the exercises of war [29] and by his marriage with the heiress of Navarre Thibaut could draw a band of hardy Gascons from either side of the Pyrenean mountains His com panion in arms was Louis count of Blois and Chartres like himself of regal lineage, for both the princes were nephews, at the same time of the kings of France and England In a crowd of prelates and barons, who imitated their zeal I distinguish the birth and merit of Matthew of Montmorency the famous Simon of Montfort, the scourge of the Albigeois and a valiant noble, Jeffrey of Villehardouin[30] marshal of Champagne[31] who has condescended in the rude idiom of his age and country[32] to write or dictate[33] an original narrative of the councils and actions in which he bore a memorable part. At the same time Baldwin count of Flanders, who had married the sister of Thibaut assumed the cross at Bruges with his brother Henry and the principal knights and citizens of that rich and industrious province[34] The vow which the chiefs had pronounced in churches, they ratified in tournaments the operations of the war were debated in full and frequent assemblies and it was resolved to seek the deliverance of Palestine in Egypt a country since Saladin s death which was almost ruined by famine and civil war But the fate of so many royal armies displayed the toils and perils of a land expedition and if the Flemings dwelt along the ocean the French barons were destitute of ships and ignorant of navigation. They embraced the wise resolution of choosing six deputies or representatives, of whom Villehardouin was one, with a discretionary trust to direct the motions, and to pledge the faith of the whole confederacy The maritime states of Italy were alone possessed of the means of transporting the holy warriors with their arms and horses and the six deputies proceeded to Venice to solicit, on motives of piety or interest, the aid of that powerful republic

In the invasion of Italy by Attila I have mentioned[35] the flight of the Venetians from the fallen cities of the continent and their obscure shelter in the chain of islands that line the extremity of the Adriatic Gulf In the midst of the waters, free, indigent laborious and inaccessible, they gradually coalesced into a republic the first foundations of Venice were laid in the island of Rialto and the annual election of the twelve tribunes was superseded by the permanent office of a duke or doge On the verge of the two empires the Venetians exult in the belief of primitive and perpetual independence[36] Against the Latins their antique freedom has been asserted by the sword and may be justified by the pen Charlemagne himself resigned all claims of sovereignty to the islands of the Adriatic Gulf his son Pepin was repulsed in the attacks of the lagunas or canals, too deep for the cavalry and too shallow for the vessels and in every age under the German Cæsars, the lands of the republic have been clearly distinguished from the kingdom of Italy But the inhabitants of Venice were considered by themselves, by strangers, and by their sovereigns as an inalienable portion of the Greek empire[37] in the ninth and tenth centuries the proofs of their subjection are numerous and unquestionable and the vain titles the servile honours, of the Byzantine court so ambitiously solicited by their dukes would have degraded the magistrates of a free people. But the bands of this dependence which was never absolute or rigid were imperceptibly relaxed by the ambition of Venice and the weakness of Constantinople. Obedience was softened into respect, privilege ripened into prerogative, and the freedom of domestic government was fortified by the independence of foreign dominion. The maritime cities of Istria and Dalmatia bowed to the sovereigns of the Adriatic and when they armed against the Normans in the cause of Alexius, the emperor applied not to the duty of his subjects, but to the gratitude and generosity of his faithful allies. The sea was their patrimony[38] the western parts of the Mediterranean from Tuscany to Gibraltar were indeed abandoned to their rivals of Pisa and Genoa but the Venetians acquired an early and lucrative share of the commerce of Greece and Egypt. Their riches increased with the increasing demand of Europe their manufactures of silk and glass, perhaps the institution of their bank, are of high antiquity and they enjoyed the fruits of their industry in the magnificence of public and private life To assert her flag to avenge her injuries to protect the freedom of navigation the republic could launch and man a fleet of a hundred galleys and the Greeks, the Saracens, and the Normans were encountered by her naval arms The Franks of Syria were assisted by the Venetians in the reduction of the sea coast but their zeal was neither blind nor disinterested and in the conquest of Tyre they shared the sovereignty of a city the first seat of the commerce of the world The policy of Venice was marked by the avarice of a trading and the insolence of a maritime power yet her ambition was prudent nor did she often forget that if armed galleys were the effect and safeguard merchant vessels were the cause and supply of her greatness. In her religion she avoided the schism of the Greeks, without yield ing a servile obedience to the Roman pontiff, and a free intercourse with the infidels of every clime appears to have allayed betimes the fever of superstition Her primitive government was a loose mixture of democracy and monarchy the doge was elected by the votes of the general assembly as long as he was popular and successful, he reigned with the pomp and authority of a prince, but in the frequent revolutions of the state he was deposed or banished or slain, by the justice or injustice of the multitude The twelfth century produced the first rudiments of the wise and jealous aristocracy, which has reduced the doge to a pageant, and the people to a cipher [39]

When the six ambassadors of the French pilgrims arrived at Venice they were hospitably entertained in the palace of St Mark by the reigning duke his name was Henry Dandolo [40] and he shone in the last period of human life as one of the most illustrious characters of the times Under the weight of years and after the loss of his eyes [41] Dandolo retained a sound understanding and a manly courage, the spirit of a hero, ambitious to signalise his reign by some memorable exploits and the wisdom of a patriot anxious to build his fame on the glory and advantage of his country He praised the bold enthusiasm and liberal confidence of the barons and their deputies in such a cause and with such associates he should aspire were he a private man, to terminate his life but he was the servant of the republic, and some delay was requisite to consult on this arduous business, the judgment of his colleagues The proposal of the French was first debated by the six sages who had been recently appointed to control the administration of the doge it was next disclosed to the forty members of the council of state and finally communicated to the legislative assembly of four hundred and fifty representatives who were annually chosen in the six quarters of the city In peace and war the doge was still the chief of the republic his legal authority was supported by the personal reputation of Dandolo, his arguments of public interest were balanced and approved and he was authorised to inform the ambassadors of the following conditions of the treaty [42] It was proposed that the crusaders should assemble at Venice on the feast of St John of the ensuing year that flat bottomed vessels should be prepared for four thousand five hundred horses and nine thousand squires with a number of ships sufficient for the embarkation of four thousand five hundred knights and twenty thousand foot that during a term of nine months they should be supplied with provisions, and transported to whatsoever coast the service of God and Christendom should require and that the republic should join the armament with a squadron of fifty galleys It was required that the pilgrims should pay before their departure, a sum of eighty five thousand marks of silver and that all conquests by sea and land should be equally divided between the confederates The terms were hard but the emergency was pressing and the French barons were not less profuse of money than of blood A general assembly was convened to ratify the treaty the stately chapel and place of St Mark were filled with ten thousand citizens and the noble deputies were taught a new lesson of humbling themselves before the majesty of the people ' Illustrious Venetians ' said the marshal of Champagne ' we are sent by the greatest and most powerful barons of France to implore the aid of the master of the sea for the deliverance of Jerusalem. They have enjoined us to fall prostrate at your feet nor will we rise from the ground till you have promised to avenge with us the injuries of Christ The eloquence of their words and tears [43] their martial aspect and suppliant attitude were applauded by a universal shout as it were says Jeffrey by the sound of an earthquake The venerable doge ascended the pulpit to urge their request by those motives of honour and virtue which alone can be offered to a popular assembly the treaty was transcribed on parchment attested with oaths and seals mutually accepted by the weeping and joyful representatives of France and Venice and despatched to Rome for the approbation of pope Innocent the Third Two thousand marks were borrowed of the merchants for the first expenses of the armament Of the six deputies two repassed the Alps to announce their success while their four companions made a fruitless trial of the zeal and emulation of the republics of Genoa and Pisa

The execution of the treaty was still opposed by unforeseen difficulties and delays The marshal on his return to Troyes was embraced and approved by Thibaut count of Champagne who had been unanimously chosen general of the confederates But the health of that valiant youth already declined and soon became hopeless and he deplored the untimely fate which condemned him to expire not in a field of battle but on a bed of sickness To his brave and numerous vassals the dying prince distributed his treasures they swore in his pres ence to accomplish his vow and their own but some there were says the marshal who accepted his gifts and forfeited their word The more resolute champions of the cross held a parliament at Soissons for the election of a new general but such was the incapacity or jealousy or reluctance of the princes of France, that none could be found both able and willing to assume the conduct of the enterprise. They acquiesced in the choice of a stranger of Boniface marquis of Montferrat, descended of a race of heroes, and himself of conspicuous fame in the wars and negotiations of the times [44] nor could the piety or ambition of the Italian chief decline this honourable invitation. After visiting the French court where he was received as a friend and kinsman the marquis, in the church of Soissons, was invested with the cross of a pilgrim and the staff of a general and immediately repassed the Alps, to prepare for the distant expedition of the East. About the festival of the Pentecost he displayed his banner and marched towards Venice at the head of the Italians he was preceded or followed by the counts of Flanders and Blois and the most respectable barons of France and their numbers were swelled by the pilgrims of Germany [45] whose object and motives were similar to their own. The Venetians had fulfilled and even surpassed, their engagements stables were constructed for the horses, and barracks for the troops the magazines were abundantly replenished with forage and provisions and the fleet of transports, ships, and galleys, was ready to hoist sail as soon as the republic had received the price of the freight and armament. But that price far exceeded the wealth of the crusaders who were assembled at Venice. The Flemings, whose obedience to their count was voluntary and precarious, had embarked in their vessels for the long navigation of the ocean and Mediterranean and many of the French and Italians had preferred a cheaper and more convenient passage from Marseilles and Apulia to the Holy Land. Each pilgrim might complain that, after he had furnished his own contribution, he was made responsible for the deficiency of his absent brethren the gold and silver plate of the chiefs, which they freely delivered to the treasury of St. Mark was a generous but inadequate sacrifice and after all their efforts, thirty four thousand marks were still wanting to complete the stipulated sum. The obstacle was removed by the policy and patriotism of the doge, who proposed to the barons that, if they would join their arms in reducing *some revolted cities of Dal*matia, he would expose his person in the holy war and obtain from the republic a long indulgence till some wealthy conquest should afford the means of satisfying the debt. After much scruple and hesitation they chose rather to accept the offer than to relinquish the enterprise and the first hostilities of the fleet and army were directed against Zara [46] a strong city of the Sclavonian coast, which had renounced its allegiance to Venice and implored the protection of the king of Hungary [47] The crusaders burst the chain or boom of the harbour landed their horses, troops, and military engines and compelled the inhabitants, after a defence of five days to surrender at discretion their lives were spared but the revolt was punished by the pillage of their houses and the demolition of their walls. The season was far advanced the French and Venetians resolved to pass the winter in a secure harbour and plentiful country but their repose was disturbed by national and tumultuous quarrels of the soldiers and mariners The conquest of Zara had scattered the seeds of discord and scandal the arms of the allies had been stained in their outset with the blood not of infidels, but of Christians the king of Hungary and his new subjects were themselves enlisted under the banner of the cross and the scruples of the devout were magnified by the fear or lassitude of the reluctant pilgrims. The pope had excommunicated the false crusaders who had pillaged and massacred their brethren,[48] and only the marquis Boniface and Simon of Montfort escaped these spiritual thunders the one by his absence from the siege the other by his final departure from the camp Innocent might absolve the simple and submissive penitents of France but he was provoked by the stubborn reason of the Venetians, who refused to confess their guilt, to accept their pardon or to allow in their temporal concerns, the interposition of a priest

The assembly of such formidable powers by sea and land had revived the hopes of young[49] Alexius and both at Venice and Zara he solicited the arms of the crusaders for his own restoration and his father's[50] deliverance The royal youth was recommended by Philip king of Germany his prayers and presence excited the compassion of the camp and his cause was embraced and pleaded by the marquis of Montferrat and the doge of Venice. A double alliance, and the dignity of Cæsar had connected with the Imperial family the two elder brothers of Boniface [51] he expected to derive a kingdom from the important service and the more gen erous ambition of Dandolo was eager to secure the inestimable benefits of trade and dominion that might accrue to his country [52] Their influence procured a favourable audience for the ambassadors of Alexius, and if the magnitude of his offers excited some suspicion, the motives and rewards which he displayed might justify the delay and diversion of those forces which had been consecrated to the deliverance of Jerusalem He promised, in his own and his father's name that, as soon as they should be seated on the throne of Constantinople they would terminate the long schism of the Greeks, and submit themselves and their people to the lawful supremacy of the Roman church He engaged to recompense the labours and merits of the crusaders by the immediate payment of two hundred thousand marks of silver, to accompany them in person to Egypt or if it should be judged more advantageous, to maintain during a year, ten thousand men and, during his life, five hundred knights for the service of the Holy Land These tempting conditions were accepted by the republic of Venice, and the eloquence of the doge and marquis persuaded the counts of Flanders Blois, and St Pol with eight barons of France, to join in the glorious enterprise A treaty of offensive and defensive alliance was confirmed by their oaths and seals and each individual, according to his situation and character was swayed by the hope of public or private advantage by the honour of restoring an exiled monarch or by the sincere and probable opinion that their efforts in Palestine would be fruitless and unavailing and that the acquisition of Constantinople must precede and prepare the recovery of Jerusalem But they were the chiefs or equals of a valiant band of freemen and volunteers who thought and acted for themselves the soldiers and clergy were divided, and if a large majority subscribed to the alliance the numbers and arguments of the dissidents were strong and respectable [53] The boldest hearts were appalled by the report of the naval power and impregnable strength of Constantinople and their apprehensions were disguised to the world, and perhaps to themselves by the more decent objections of religion and duty They alleged the sanctity of a vow which had drawn them from their families and homes to the rescue of the holy sepulchre nor should the dark and crooked counsels of human policy divert them from a pursuit the event of which was in the hands of the Almighty Their first offence the attack of Zara had been severely punished by the reproach of their conscience and the censures of the pope nor would they again imbrue their hands in the blood of their fellow Christians The apostle of Rome had pronounced nor would they usurp the right of avenging with the sword the schism of the Greeks and the doubtful usurpation of the Byzantine monarch On these principles or pretences many pilgrims, the most distinguished for their valour and piety, withdrew from the camp and their retreat was less pernicious than the open or secret opposition of a discontented party that laboured on every occasion, to separate the army and disappoint the enterprise

Notwithstanding this defection the departure of the fleet and army was vigorously pressed by the Venetians whose zeal for the service of the royal youth concealed a just resentment to his nation and family They were mortified by the recent preference which had been given to Pisa the rival of their trade they had a long arrear of debt and injury to liquidate with the Byzantine court and Dandolo might not discourage the popular tale that he had been deprived of his eyes by the emperor Manuel, who perfidiously violated the sanctity of an ambassador A similar armament for ages had not rode the Adriatic it was composed of one hundred and twenty flat bottomed vessels or palanders for the horses two hundred and forty transports filled with men and arms seventy store ships laden with provisions and fifty stout galleys well prepared for the encounter of an enemy [54] While the wind was favourable the sky serene and the water smooth every eye was fixed with wonder and delight on the scene of military and naval pomp which overspread the sea The shields of the knights and squires at once an ornament and a defence were arranged on either side of the ships the banners of the nations and families were displayed from the stern our modern artillery was supplied by three hundred engines for casting stones and darts the fatigues of the way were cheered with the sound of music and the spirits of the adventurers were raised by the mutual assurance that forty thousand Christian heroes were equal to the conquest of the world [55] In the navigation [56] from Venice and Zara the fleet was successfully steered by the skill and experience of the Venetian pilots at Durazzo the confederates first landed on the territories of the Greek empire the isle of Corfu afforded a station and repose they doubled without accident, the perilous cape of Malea the southern point of Peloponnesus or the Morea made a descent in the islands of Negropont and Andros and cast anchor at Abydus on the Asiatic side of the Hellespont. These preludes of conquest were easy and bloodless the Greeks of the provinces, without patriotism or courage were crushed by an irresistible force the presence of the lawful heir might justify their obedience, and it was rewarded by the modesty and discipline of the Latins. As they penetrated through the Hellespont, the magnitude of their navy was compressed in a narrow channel and the face of the waters was darkened with innumerable sails. They again expanded in the basin of the Propontis, and traversed that placid sea till they approached the European shore at the abbey of St. Stephen three leagues to the west of Constantinople The prudent doge dissuaded them from dispersing themselves in a populous and hostile land and as their stock of provisions was reduced it was resolved in the season of harvest, to replenish their storeships in the fertile islands of the Propontis With this resolution they directed their course but a strong gale and their own impatience drove them to the eastward and so near did they run to the shore and the city that some volleys of stones and darts were exchanged between the ships and the rampart. As they passed along they gazed with admiration on the capital of the East, or as it should seem of the earth rising from her seven hills, and towering over the continents of Europe and Asia. The swelling domes and lofty spires of five hundred palaces and churches were gilded by the sun and reflected in the waters the walls were crowded with soldiers and spectators, whose number they beheld of whose temper they were ignorant and each heart was chilled by the reflection that, since the beginning of the world such an enterprise had never been undertaken by such a handful of warriors But the momentary apprehension was dispelled by hope and valour and every man says the marshal of Champagne glanced his eye on the sword or lance which he must speedily use in the glorious conflict.[17] The Latins cast anchor before Chalcedon the mariners only were left in the vessels the soldiers, horses, and arms were safely landed and in the luxury of an Imperial palace the barons tasted the first fruits of their success On the third day the fleet and army moved towards Scutari, the Asiatic suburb of Constantinople a detachment of five hundred Greek horse was surprised and defeated by fourscore French knights and in a halt of nine days the camp was plentifully supplied with forage and provisions.

In relating the invasion of a great empire it may seem strange that I have not described the obstacles which should have checked the progress of the strangers. The Greeks, in truth were an unwarlike people but they were rich industrious, and subject to the will of a single man had that man been capable of fear when his enemies were at a distance or of courage when they approached his person The first rumour of his nephew's alliance with the French and Venetians was despised by the usurper Alexius his flatterers persuaded him that in this contempt he was bold and sincere and each evening in the close of the banquet he thrice discomfited the barbarians of the West. These barbarians had been justly terrified by the report of his naval power and the sixteen hundred fishing boats of Constantinople[18] could have manned a fleet to sink them in the Adriatic, or stop their entrance in the mouth of the Hellespont. But all force may be annihilated by the negligence of the prince and the venality of his ministers The great duke or admiral made a scandalous, almost a public, auction of the sails, the masts and the rigging the royal forests were reserved for the more important purpose of the chase and the trees, says Nicetas were guarded by the eunuchs like the groves of religious worship[19] From this dream of pride Alexius was awakened by the siege of Zara and the rapid advances of the Latins as soon as he saw the danger was real he thought inevitable and his vain presumption was lost in abject despondency and despair He suffered these contemptible barbarians to pitch their camp in the sight of the palace, and his apprehensions were thinly disguised by the pomp and menace of a suppliant embassy The sovereign of the Romans was astonished (his ambassadors were instructed to say) at the hostile appearance of the strangers If these pilgrims were sincere in their vow for the deliverance of Jerusalem his voice must applaud and treasures should assist, their pious design but should they dare to invade the sanctuary of empire their numbers, were they ten times more considerable should not protect them from his just resentment. The answer of the doge and barons was simple and magnanimous. In the cause of honour and justice they said we despise the usurper of Greece his threats and his offers. Our friendship and his allegiance are due to the lawful heir to the young prince who is seated among us and to his father the emperor Isaac who has been deprived of his sceptre his free dom, and his eyes by the crime of an ungrateful brother Let that brother confess his guilt and implore forgiveness, and we ourselves will intercede that he may be permitted to live in affluence and security But let him not insult us by a second message our reply will be made in arms, in the palace of Constantinople '

On the tenth day of their encampment at Scutari the crusaders prepared themselves as soldiers and as Catholics for the passage of the Bosphorus Perilous indeed was the adventure the stream was broad and rapid in a calm the current of the Euxine might drive down the liquid and unextinguishable fire of the Greeks and the opposite shores of Europe were defended by seventy thousand horse and foot in formidable array On this memorable day, which happened to be bright and pleasant the Latins were distributed in six battles or divisions the first or vanguard, was led by the count of Flanders one of the most powerful of the Christian princes in the skill and number of his crossbows The four successive battles of the French were commanded by his brother Henry the counts of St. Pol and Blois, and Matthew of Montmorency the last of whom was honoured by the voluntary service of the marshal and nobles of Champagne. The sixth division, the rearguard and reserve of the army was conducted by the marquis of Montferrat, at the head of the Germans and Lombards The chargers saddled, with their long caparisons dragging on the ground were embarked in the flat palanders [60] and the knights stood by the side of their horses in complete armour, the helmets laced and their lances in their hands Their numerous train of serjeants[61] and archers occupied the transports, and each transport was towed by the strength and swiftness of a galley The six divisions traversed the Bosphorus without encountering an enemy or an obstacle to land the foremost was the wish to conquer or die was the resolution of every division and of every soldier Jealous of the pre-eminence of danger the knights in their heavy armour leaped into the sea when it rose as high as their girdle the serjeants and archers were animated by their valour and the squires, letting down the drawbridges of the palanders, led the horses to the shore Before the squadrons could mount and form and couch their lances, the seventy thousand Greeks had vanished from their sight the timid Alexius gave the example to his troops and it was only by the plunder of his rich pavilions that the Latins were informed that they had fought against an emperor In the first consternation of the flying enemy, they resolved by a double attack, to open the entrance of the harbour The tower of Galata [62] in the suburb of Pera was attacked and stormed by the French, while the Venetians assumed the more difficult task of forcing the boom or chain that was stretched from that tower to the Byzantine shore After some fruitless attempts their intrepid perseverance prevailed, twenty ships of war, the relics of the Grecian navy, were either sunk or taken, the enormous and massy links of iron were cut asunder by the shears or broken by the weight of the galleys [63] and the Venetian fleet, safe and triumphant rode at anchor in the port of Constantinople. By these daring achievements a remnant of twenty thousand Latins solicited the licence of besieging a capital which contained above four hundred thousand inhabitants [64] able though not willing to bear arms in the defence of their country Such an account would indeed suppose a population of near two millions but whatever abatement may be required in the numbers of the Greeks the belief of those numbers will equally exalt the fearless spirit of their assailants.

In the choice of the attack the French and Venetians were divided by their habits of life and warfare The former affirmed with truth that Constantinople was most accessible on the side of the sea and the harbour The latter might assert with honour that they had long enough trusted their lives and fortunes to a frail bark and a precarious element and loudly demanded a trial of knighthood a firm ground and a close onset either on foot or horseback After a prudent compromise of employing the two nations by sea and land in the service best suited to their character, the fleet covering the army they both proceeded from the entrance to the extremity of the harbour the stone bridge of the river was hastily repaired and the six battles of the French formed their encampment against the front of the capital the basis of the triangle which runs about four miles from the port to the Propontis [65] On the edge of a broad ditch at the foot of a lofty rampart they had leisure to contemplate the difficulties of their enterprise The gates to the right and left of their narrow camp poured forth frequent sallies of cavalry and light infantry which cut off their stragglers swept the country of provisions sounded the alarm five or six times in the course of each day and compelled them to plant a palisade and sink an entrenchment for their immediate safety In the supplies and con

as the Venetians had been too sparing or the Franks too voracious the usual complaints of hunger and scarcity were heard and perhaps felt their stock of flour would be exhausted in three weeks and their disgust of salt meat tempted them to taste the flesh of their horses. The trembling usurper was supported by Theodore Lascaris his son in law a valiant youth, who aspired to save and to rule his country the Greeks regardless of that country were awakened to the defence of their religion but their firmest hope was in the strength and spirit of the Varangian guards, of the Danes and English, as they are named in the writers of the times[66] After ten days incessant labour the ground was levelled the ditch filled the approaches of the besiegers were regularly made and two hundred and fifty engines of assault exercised their various powers to clear the rampart, to batter the walls and to sap the foundations On the first appearance of a breach the scaling ladders were applied the numbers that defended the vantage ground repulsed and oppressed the adventurous Latins but they admired the resolution of fifteen knights and serjeants, who had gained the ascent and maintained their perilous station till they were precipitated or made prisoners by the Imperial guards On the side of the harbour the naval attack was more successfully conducted by the Venetians and that industrious people employed every resource that was known and practised before the invention of gunpowder A double line three bow shots in front was formed by the galleys and ships and the swift motion of the former was supported by the weight and loftiness of the latter whose decks and poops and turret, were the platforms of military engines, that discharged their shot over the head of the first line The soldiers who leaped from the galleys on shore immediately planted and ascended their scaling ladders, while the large ships, advancing more slowly into the intervals and lowering a draw bridge opened a way through the air from their masts to the rampart. In the midst of the conflict the doge a venerable and conspicuous form stood aloft in complete armour on the prow of his galley The great standard of St. Mark was displayed before him his threats promises, and exhortations urged the diligence of the rowers his vessel was the first that struck and Dandolo was the first warrior on the shore The nations admired the magnanimity of the blind old man without reflecting that his age and infirmities diminished the price of life and enhanced the value of immortal glory On a sudden by an invisible hand (for the standard bearer was probably slain) the banner of the republic was fixed on the rampart twenty five towers were rapidly occupied and by the cruel expedient of fire, the Greeks were driven from the adjacent quarter The doge had despatched the intelligence of his success when he was checked by the danger of his confederates Nobly declaring that he would rather die with the pilgrims than gain a victory by their destruction Dandolo relinquished his advantage recalled his troops and hastened to the scene of action He found the six weary diminutive battles of the French encompassed by sixty squadrons of the Greek cavalry the least of which was more numerous than the largest of their divisions. Shame and despair had provoked Alexius to the last effort of a general sally but he was awed by the firm order and manly aspect of the Latins and, after skirmishing at a distance withdrew his troops in the close of the evening The silence or tumult of the night exasperated his fears and the timid usurper collecting a treasure of ten thousand pounds of gold basely deserted his wife his people and his fortune threw himself into a bark stole through the Bosphorus and landed in shameful safety in an obscure harbour of Thrace As soon as they were apprised of his flight the Greek nobles sought pardon and peace in the dungeon where the blind Isaac expected each hour the visit of the executioner Again saved and exalted by the vicissitudes of fortune, the captive in his Imperial robes was replaced on the throne and surrounded with prostrate slaves, whose real terror and affected joy he was incapable of discerning At the dawn of day hostilities were suspended and the Latin chiefs were surprised by a message from the lawful and reigning emperor who was impatient to embrace his son and to reward his generous deliverers.[67]

But these generous deliverers were unwilling to release their hostage till they had obtained from his father the payment, or at least the promise of their recompense. They chose four ambassadors, Matthew of Montmorency, our historian the marshal of Champagne, and two Venetians, to congratulate the emperor The gates were thrown open on their approach the streets on both sides were lined with the battle axes of the Danish and English guard the presence-chamber glittered with gold and jewels, the false substitutes of virtue and power by the side of the blind Isaac his wife was seated the sister of the king of Hungary and by her appearance the noble matrons of Greece were drawn from their domestic retirement and mingled with the circle of senators and soldiers The Latins by the mouth of the marshal, spoke like men conscious of their merits, but who respected the work of their own hands and the emperor clearly understood that his son s engagements with Venice and the pilgrims must be ratified without hesitation or delay Withdrawing into a private chamber with the empress a chamberlain, an interpreter and the four ambassadors the father of young Alexius inquired with some anxiety into the nature of his stipulations The submission of the Eastern empire to the pope, the succour of the Holy Land, and a present contribution of two hundred thousand marks of silver —'These conditions are weighty ' was his prudent reply 'they are hard to accept and difficult to perform But no conditions can exceed the measure of your services and deserts' After this satisfactory assurance the barons mounted on horseback and introduced the heir of Constantinople to the city and palace his youth and marvellous adventures engaged every heart in his favour and Alexius was solemnly crowned with his father in the dome of St Sophia In the first days of his reign the people already blessed with the restoration of plenty and peace was delighted by the joyful catastrophe of the tragedy and the discontent of the nobles their regret and their fears were covered by the polished surface of pleasure and loyalty The mixture of two discordant nations in the same capital might have been pregnant with mischief and danger and the suburb of Galata or Pera was assigned for the quarters of the French and Venetians But the liberty of trade and familiar intercourse was allowed between the friendly nations and each day the pilgrims were tempted by devotion or curiosity to visit the churches and palaces of Constantinople. Their rude minds insensible perhaps of the finer arts were astonished by the magnificent scenery and the poverty of their native towns enhanced the populousness and riches of the first metropolis of Christendom [68] Descending from his state young Alexius was prompted by interest and gratitude to repeat his frequent and familiar visits to his Latin allies and in the freedom of the table the gay petulance of the French sometimes forgot the emperor of the East.[69] In their more serious conferences it was agreed that the re union of the two churches must be the result of patience and time but avarice was less tractable than zeal, and a large sum was instantly disbursed to appease the wants, and silence the importunity of the crusaders [70] Alexius was alarmed by the approaching hour of their departure their absence might have relieved him from the engagement which he was yet incapable of performing but his friends would have left him, naked and alone, to the caprice and prejudice of a perfidious nation He wished to bribe their stay, the delay of a year by undertaking to defray their expense and to satisfy in their name the freight of the Venetian vessels The offer was agitated in the council of the barons, and, after a repetition of their debates and scruples, a majority of votes again acquiesced in the advice of the doge and the prayer of the young emperor At the price of sixteen hundred pounds of gold he prevailed on the marquis of Montferrat to lead him with an army round the provinces of Europe to establish his authority and pursue his uncle while Constantinople was awed by the presence of Baldwin and his confederates of France and Flanders The expedition was successful the blind emperor exulted in the success of his arms and listened to the predictions of his flatterers that the same Providence which had raised him from the dungeon to the throne would heal his gout restore his sight and watch over the long prosperity of his reign Yet the mind of the suspicious old man was tormented by the rising glories of his son nor could his pride conceal from his envy that while his own name was pronounced in faint and reluctant acclamations the royal youth was the theme of spontaneous and universal praise [71]

By the recent invasion the Greeks were awakened from a dream of nine centuries from the vain presumption that the capital of the Roman empire was impregnable to foreign arms The strangers of the West had violated the city and bestowed the sceptre of Constantine their Imperial clients soon became as unpopular as themselves the well known vices of Isaac were rendered still more contemptible by his infirmities, and the young Alexius was hated as an apostate who had renounced the manners and religion of his country His secret covenant with the Latins was divulged or suspected the people, and especially the clergy were devoutly attached to their faith and superstition and every convent and every shop resounded with the danger of the church and the tyranny of the pope [72] An empty treasury could ill supply the demands of regal luxury and foreign extortion the Greeks refused to avert by a general tax the impending evils of servitude and pillage

the oppression of the rich excited a more dangerous and personal resentment and if the emperor melted the plate and despoiled the images of the sanctuary he seemed to justify the complaints of heresy and sacrilege During the absence of marquis Boniface and his Imperial pupil Constantinople was visited with a calamity which might be justly imputed to the zeal and indiscretion of the Flemish pilgrims [72] In one of their visits to the city they were scandalised by the aspect of a mosque or synagogue in which one God was worshipped without a partner or a son. Their effectual mode of controversy was to attack the infidels with the sword and their habitation with fire but the infidels, and some Christian neighbours, presumed to defend their lives and properties and the flames which bigotry had kindled consumed the most orthodox and innocent structures. During eight days and nights the conflagration spread above a league in front, from the harbour to the Propontis, over the thickest and most populous regions of the city It is not easy to count the stately churches and palaces that were reduced to a smoking ruin to value the merchandise that perished in the trading streets, or to number the families that were involved in the common destruction By this outrage, which the doge and the barons in vain affected to disclaim, the name of the Latins became still more unpopular and the colony of that nation above fifteen thousand persons consulted their safety in a hasty retreat from the city to the protection of their standard in the suburb of Pera. The emperor returned in triumph but the firmest and most dexterous policy would have been insufficient to steer him through the tempest which overwhelmed the person and government of that unhappy youth. His own inclination, and his father's advice attached him to his benefactors but Alexius hesitated between gratitude and patriotism between the fear of his subjects and of his allies.[74] By his feeble and fluctuating conduct he lost the esteem and confidence of both and while he invited the marquis of Montferrat to occupy the palace, he suffered the nobles to conspire, and the people to arm for the deliverance of their country Regardless of his painful situation the Latin chiefs repeated their demands, resented his delays, suspected his intentions and exacted a decisive answer of peace or war The haughty summons was delivered by three French knights and three Venetian deputies who girded their swords, mounted their horses, pierced through the angry multitude and entered with a fearless countenance the palace and presence of the Greek emperor In a peremptory tone they recapitulated their services and his engagements and boldly declared that, unless their just claims were fully and immediately satisfied they should no longer hold him either as a sovereign or a friend After this defiance, the first that had ever wounded an Imperial ear they departed without betraying any symptoms of fear but their escape from a servile palace and a furious city astonished the ambassadors themselves and their return to the camp was the signal of mutual hostility

Among the Greeks all authority and wisdom were overborne by the impetuous multitude who mistook their rage for valour their numbers for strength, and their fanaticism for the support and inspiration of Heaven. In the eyes of both nations Alexius was false and contemptible the base and spurious race of the Angeli was rejected with clamorous disdain and the people of Constantinople encompassed the senate to demand at their hands a more worthy emperor To every senator conspicuous by his birth or dignity they successively presented the purple by each senator the deadly garment was repulsed the contest lasted three days and we may learn from the historian Nicetas, one of the members of the assembly that fear and weakness were the guardians of their loyalty A phantom who vanished in oblivion was forcibly proclaimed by the crowd [75] but the author of the tumult, and the leader of the war was a prince of the house of Ducas and his common appellation of Alexius must be discriminated by the epithet of Mourzoufle [76] which in the vulgar idiom expressed the close junction of his black and shaggy eyebrows. At once a patriot and a courtier the perfidious Mourzoufle who was not destitute of cunning and courage opposed the Latins both in speech and action inflamed the passions and prejudices of the Greeks, and insinuated himself into the favour and confidence of Alexius who trusted him with the office of great chamberlain and tinged his buskins with the colours of royalty At the dead of night he rushed into the bed-chamber with an affrighted aspect, exclaiming that the palace was attacked by the people and betrayed by the guards Starting from his couch the unsuspecting prince threw himself into the arms of his enemy who had contrived his escape by a private staircase But that staircase terminated in a prison Alexius was seized stripped and loaded with chains and after tasting some days the bitterness of death he was poisoned or

In the first days of his reign the people already blessed with the restoration of plenty and peace was delighted by the joyful catastrophe of the tragedy and the discontent of the nobles their regret and their fears were covered by the polished surface of pleasure and loyalty The mixture of two discordant nations in the same capital might have been pregnant with mischief and danger, and the suburb of Galata or Pera was assigned for the quarters of the French and Venetians But the liberty of trade and familiar intercourse was allowed between the friendly nations and each day the pilgrims were tempted by devotion or curiosity to visit the churches and palaces of Constantinople. their countryman Nicetas an army of phantoms marched with the French hero and he was magnified to a giant in the eyes of the Greeks[52] While the fugitives deserted their posts and cast away their arms the Latins entered the city under the banners of their leaders the streets and gates opened for their passage and either design or accident kindled a third conflagration, which consumed in a few hours the measure of three of the largest cities of France.[53] In the close of evening the barons checked their troops and fortified their stations they were awed by the extent and populousness of the capital which might yet require the labour of a month if the churches and palaces were conscious of their internal strength. But in the morning a suppliant procession with crosses and images, announced the submission of the Greeks and deprecated the wrath of the conquerors the usurper escaped through the golden gate the palaces of Blachernæ and Boucoleon were occupied by the count of Flanders and the marquis of Montferrat and the empire which still bore the name of Constantine and the title of Roman, was subverted by the arms of the Latin pilgrims.[54]

Constantinople had been taken by storm and no restraints except those of religion and humanity were imposed on the conquerors by the laws of war Boniface marquis of Montferrat, still acted as their general and the Greeks, who revered his name as that of their future sovereign were heard to exclaim in a lamentable tone Holy marquis-king have mercy upon us! His prudence or compassion opened the gates of the city to the fugitives and he exhorted the soldiers of the cross to spare the lives of their fellow-Christians The streams of blood that flow down the pages of Nicetas may be reduced to the slaughter of two thousand of his unresisting countrymen[55] and the greater part was massacred not by the strangers but by the Latins who had been driven from the city and who exercised the revenge of a triumphant faction Yet of these exiles, some were less mindful of injuries than of benefits and Nicetas himself was indebted for his safety to the generosity of a Venetian merchant. Pope Innocent the Third accuses the pilgrims of respecting in their lust, neither age nor sex, nor religious profession and bitterly laments that the deeds of darkness fornication adultery and incest, were perpetrated in open day and that noble matrons and holy nuns were polluted by the grooms and peasants of the Catholic camp[56] It is indeed probable that the licence of victory prompted and covered a multitude of sins but it is certain that the capital of the East contained a stock of venal or willing beauty sufficient to satiate the desires of twenty thousand pilgrims, and female prisoners were no longer subject to the right or abuse of domestic slavery The marquis of Montferrat was the patron of discipline and decency the count of Flanders was the mirror of chastity they had forbidden under pain of death the rape of married women or virgins, or nuns and the proclamation was sometimes invoked by the vanquished[57] and respected by the victors. Their cruelty and lust were moderated by the authority of the chiefs and feelings of the soldiers for we are no longer describing an irruption of the northern savages and however ferocious they might still appear time policy and religion had civilised the manners of the French and still more of the Italians. But a free scope was allowed to their avarice which was glutted even in the holy week, by the pillage of Constantinople. The right of victory unshackled by any promise or treaty had confiscated the public and private wealth of the Greeks and every hand according to its size and strength might lawfully execute the sentence and seize the forfeiture A portable and universal standard of exchange was found in the coined and uncoined metals of gold and silver which each captor at home or abroad might convert into the possessions most suitable to his temper and situation. Of the treasures which trade and luxury had accumulated the silks, velvets, furs the gems, spices, and rich movables were the most precious, as they could not be procured for money in the ruder countries of Europe. An order of rapine was instituted nor was the share of each individual abandoned to industry or chance. Under the tremendous penalties of perjury—excommunication and death—the Latins were bound to deliver their plunder into the common stock three churches were selected for the deposit and distribution of the spoil a single share was allotted to a foot soldier two for a serjeant on horseback, four to a knight, and larger proportions according to the rank and merit of the barons and princes. For violating this sacred engagement, a knight belonging to the count of St. Paul was hanged with his shield and coat of arms around his neck his example might render similar offenders more artful and discreet, but avarice was more powerful than fear and it is generally believed that the secret far exceeded the acknowledged plunder Yet the magnitude of the prize surpassed the largest scale of ex strangled or beaten with clubs, at the command and in the presence, of the tyrant The emperor Isaac Angelus soon followed his son to the grave, and Mourzoufle, perhaps, might spare the superfluous crime of hastening the extinction of impotence and blindness

The death of the emperors and the usurpation of Mourzoufle had changed the nature of the quarrel It was no longer the disagreement of allies who overvalued their services or neglected their obligations the French and Venetians forgot their complaints against Alexius dropped a tear on the untimely fate of their companion and swore revenge against the perfidious nation who had crowned his assassin. Yet the prudent doge was still inclined to negotiate he asked as a debt a subsidy or a fine fifty thousand pounds of gold about two millions sterling nor would the conference have been abruptly broken if the zeal or policy of Mourzoufle had not refused to sacrifice the Greek church to the safety of the state [77] Amidst the invectives of his foreign and domestic enemies, we may discern that he was not unworthy of the character which he had assumed of the public champion the second siege of Constantinople was far more laborious than the first the treasury was replenished, and discipline was restored by a severe inquisition into the abuses of the former reign and Mourzoufle an iron mace in his hand visiting the posts and affecting the port and aspect of a warrior was an object of terror to his soldiers at least and to his kinsmen Before and after the death of Alexius the Greeks made two vigorous and well conducted attempts to burn the navy in the harbour but the skill and courage of the Venetians repulsed the fire ships and the vagrant flames wasted themselves without injury in the sea [78] In a nocturnal sally the Greek emperor was vanquished by Henry brother of the count of Flanders the advantages of number and surprise aggravated the shame of his defeat his buckler was found on the field of battle and the Imperial standard * a divine image of the Virgin was presented as a trophy and a relic, to the Cistercian monks the disciples of St. Bernard Near three months without excepting the holy season of Lent were consumed in skirmishes and preparations before the Latins were ready or resolved for a general assault The land fortifications had been found impregnable and the Venetian pilots represented that on the shore of the Propontis the anchorage was unsafe and the ships must be driven by the current far away to the straits of the Hellespont a prospect not unpleasing to the reluctant pilgrims, who sought every opportunity of breaking the army From the harbour, therefore, the assault was determined by the assailants and expected by the besieged, and the emperor had placed his scarlet pavilions on a neighbouring height, to direct and animate the efforts of his troops A fearless spectator, whose mind could entertain the ideas of pomp and pleasure, might have admired the long array of two embattled armies which extended above half a league, the one on the ships and galleys the other on the walls and towers raised above the ordinary level by several stages of wooden turrets. Their first fury was spent in the discharge of darts, stones, and fire, from the engines but the water was deep the French were bold the Venetians were skilful, they approached the walls and a desperate conflict of swords spears and battle axes was fought on the trembling bridges that grappled the floating to the stable batteries. In more than a hundred places the assault was urged and the defence was sustained till the superiority of ground and numbers finally prevailed and the Latin trumpets sounded a retreat On the ensuing days the attack was renewed with equal vigour and a similar event and in the night the doge and the barons held a council, apprehensive only for the public danger not a voice pronounced the words of escape or treaty and each warrior according to his temper embraced the hope of victory or the assurance of a glorious death [80] By the experience of the former siege the Greeks were instructed but the Latins were animated, and the knowledge that Constantinople might be taken was of more avail than the local precautions which that knowledge had inspired for its defence In the third assault two ships were linked together to double their strength a strong north wind drove them on the shore the bishops of Troyes and Soissons led the van and the auspicious names of the Pilgrim and the Paradise resounded along the line [81] The episcopal banners were displayed on the walls a hundred marks of silver had been promised to the first adventurers and if their reward was intercepted by death their names have been immortalised by fame Four towers were scaled three gates were burst open and the French knights who might tremble on the waves felt themselves invincible on horseback on the solid ground Shall I relate that the thousands who guarded the emperor's person fled on the approach and before the lance of a single warrior? Their ignominious flight is attested by

perience or expectation [88] After the whole had been equally divided between the French and Venetians fifty thousand marks were deducted to satisfy the debts of the former and the demands of the latter The residue of the French amounted to four hundred thousand marks of silver,[89] about eight hundred thousand pounds sterling nor can I better appreciate the value of that sum in the public and private transactions of the age than by defining it as seven times the annual revenue of the kingdom of England [90]

In this great revolution we enjoy the singular felicity of comparing the narratives of Villehardouin and Nicetas the opposite feelings of the marshal of Champagne and the Byzantine senator [91] At the first view it should seem that the wealth of Constantinople was only transferred from one nation to another and that the loss and sorrow of the Greeks is exactly balanced by the joy and advantage of the Latins But in the miserable account of war the gain is never equivalent to the loss the pleasure to the pain the smiles of the Latins were transient and fallacious, the Greeks for ever wept over the ruins of their country, and their real calamities were aggravated by sacrilege and mockery What benefits accrued to the conquerors from the three fires which annihilated so vast a portion of the buildings and riches of the city? What a stock of such things as could neither be used nor transported was maliciously or wantonly destroyed! How much treasure was idly wasted in gaming debauchery and riot! And what precious objects were bartered for a vile price by the impatience or ignorance of the soldiers whose reward was stolen by the base industry of the last of the Greeks! These alone who had nothing to lose might derive some profit from the revolution but the misery of the upper ranks of society is strongly painted in the personal adventures of Nicetas himself His stately palace had been reduced to ashes in the second conflagration and the senator with his family and friends found an obscure shelter in another house which he possessed near the church of St Sophia It was the door of this mean habitation that his friend the Venetian merchant guarded in the disguise of a soldier till Nicetas could save by a precipitate flight the relics of his fortune and the chastity of his daughter In a cold wintry season these fugitives nursed in the lap of prosperity departed on foot his wife was with child the desertion of their slaves compelled them to carry their baggage on their own shoulders and their women whom they placed in the centre were exhorted to conceal their beauty with dirt instead of adorning it with paint and jewels Every step was less painful than the taunts of the plebeians, with whom they were now levelled, nor did the exiles breathe in safety till their mournful pilgrimage was concluded at Selymbria, above forty miles from the capital On the way they overtook the patriarch without attendance and almost without apparel riding on an ass, and reduced to a state of apostolical poverty which had it been voluntary might perhaps have been meritorious In the meanwhile his desolate churches were profaned by the licentiousness and party zeal of the Latins After stripping the gems and pearls they converted the chalices into drinking-cups their tables on which they gamed and feasted were covered with the pictures of Christ and the saints and they trampled under foot the most venerable objects of the Christian worship In the cathedral of St Sophia the ample veil of the sanctuary was rent asunder for the sake of the golden fringe and the altar a monument of art and riches, was broken in pieces and shared among the captors. Their mules and horses were laden with the wrought silver and gilt carvings which they tore down from the doors and pulpit and if the beasts stumbled under the burden they were stabbed by their impatient drivers and the holy pavement streamed with their impure blood A prostitute was seated on the throne of the patriarch and that daughter of Belial as she is styled sung and danced in the church to ridicule the hymns and processions of the Orientals Nor were the repositories of the royal dead secure from violation in the church of the Apostles the tombs of the emperors were rifled and it is said that after six centuries the corpse of Justinian was found without any signs of decay or putrefaction In the streets the French and Flemings clothed themselves and their horses in painted robes and flowing head dresses of linen and the coarse intemperance of their feasts[92] insulted the splendid sobriety of the East. To expose the arms of a people of scribes and scholars they affected to display a pen an inkhorn and a sheet of paper without discerning that the instruments of science and valour were alike feeble and useless in the hands of the modern Greeks.

Their reputation and their language encouraged them however to despise the ignorance and to overlook the progress of the Latins [93] In the love of the arts the national difference was still more obvious and real the Greeks pre served with reverence the works of their ancestors, which they could not imitate and in the destruction of the statues of Constantinople, we are provoked to join in the complaints and invectives of the Byzantine historian [94] We have seen how the rising city was adorned by the vanity and despotism of the Imperial founder in the ruins of paganism some gods and heroes were saved from the axe of superstition and the forum and hippodrome were dignified with the relics of a better age Several of these are described by Nicetas[95] in a florid and affected style and from his descriptions I shall select some interesting particulars. 1 The victorious charioteers were cast in bronze, at their own or the public charge, and fitly placed in the hippodrome they stood aloft in their chariots wheeling round the goal the spectators could admire their attitude and judge of the resemblance and of these figures, the most perfect might have been transported from the Olympic stadium. 2 The sphinx, river horse and crocodile, denote the climate and manufacture of Egypt and the spoils of that ancient province. 3 The she wolf suckling Romulus and Remus, a subject alike pleasing to the old and the new Romans but which could rarely be treated before the decline of the Greek sculpture. 4. An eagle holding and tearing a serpent in his talons—a domestic monument of the Byzantines, which they ascribed, not to a human artist, but to the magic power of the philosopher Apollonius, who by this talisman delivered the city from such venomous reptiles. 5 An ass and his driver which were erected by Augustus in his colony of Nicopolis to commemorate a verbal omen of the victory of Actium. 6 An equestrian statue which passed in the vulgar opinion for Joshua, the Jewish conqueror stretching out his hand to stop the course of the descending sun A more classical tradition recognised the figures of Bellerophon and Pegasus, and the free attitude of the steed seemed to mark that he trod on air rather than on the earth. 7 A square and lofty obelisk of brass the sides were embossed with a variety of picturesque and rural scenes birds singing rustics labouring or playing on their pipes, sheep bleating lambs skipping the sea and a scene of fish and fishing little naked Cupids laughing playing and pelting each other with apples, and on the summit a female figure turning with the slightest breath and thence denominated the wind's attendant 8 The Phrygian shepherd presenting to Venus the prize of beauty the apple of discord 9 The incomparable statue of Helen which is delineated by Nicetas in the words of admiration and love her well turned feet, snowy arms, rosy lips, bewitching smiles, swimming eyes, arched eye brows, the harmony of her shape the lightness of her drapery and her flowing locks that waved in the wind—a beauty that might have moved her barbarian destroyers to pity and remorse. 10 The manly or divine form of Hercules,[96] as he was restored to life by the master hand of Lysippus, of such magnitude that his thumb was equal to the waist his leg to the stature of a common man [97] his chest ample his shoulders broad his limbs strong and muscular his hair curled his aspect commanding Without his bow or quiver or club his lion's skin carelessly thrown over him, he was seated on an osier basket, his right leg and arm stretched to the utmost, his left knee bent and supporting his elbow his head reclining on his left hand his countenance indignant and pensive 11 A colossal statue of Juno which had once adorned her temple of Samos the enormous head by four yoke of oxen was laboriously drawn to the palace. 12 Another colossus, of Pallas or Minerva thirty feet in height, and representing with admirable spirit the attributes and character of the martial maid Before we accuse the Latins it is just to remark that this Pallas was destroyed after the first siege by the fear and superstition of the Greeks themselves [98] The other statues of brass which I have enumerated were broken and melted by the unfeeling avarice of the crusaders the cost and labour were consumed in a moment the soul of genius evaporated in smoke, and the remnant of base metal was coined into money for the payment of the troops Bronze is not the most durable of monuments from the marble forms of Phidias and Praxiteles the Latins might turn aside with stupid contempt [99] but unless they were crushed by some accidental injury those useless stones stood secure on their pedestals [100] The most enlightened of the strangers above the gross and sensual pursuits of their countrymen, more piously exercised the right of conquest in the search and seizure of the relics of the saints.[101] Immense was the supply of heads and bones, crosses and images that were scattered by this revolution over the churches of Europe and such was the increase of pilgrimage and oblation that no branch, perhaps of more lucrative plunder was imported from the East.[102] Of the writings of antiquity many that still existed in the twelfth century are now lost. But the pilgrims were not solicitous to save or transport

perience or expectation [88] After the whole had been equally divided between the French and Venetians fifty thousand marks were deducted to satisfy the debts of the former and the demands of the latter The residue of the French amounted to four hundred thousand marks of silver,[89] about eight hundred thousand pounds sterling nor can I better appreciate the value of that sum in the public and private transactions of the age than by defining it as seven times the annual revenue of the kingdom of England [90]

In this great revolution we enjoy the singular felicity of comparing the narratives of Villehardouin and Nicetas the opposite feelings of the marshal of Champagne and the Byzantine senator [91] At the first view it should seem that the wealth of Constantinople was only transferred from one nation to another and that the loss and sorrow of the Greeks is exactly balanced by the joy and advantage of the Latins But in the miserable account of war the gain is never equivalent to the loss the pleasure to the pain the smiles of the Latins were transient and fallacious the Greeks for ever wept over the ruins of their country and their real calamities were aggravated by sacrilege and mockery What benefits accrued to the conquerors from the three fires which annihilated so vast a portion of the buildings and riches of the city? What a stock of such things as could neither be used nor transported was maliciously or wantonly destroyed! How much treasure was idly wasted in gaming debauchery and riot! And what precious objects were bartered for a vile price by the impatience or ignorance of the soldiers whose reward was stolen by the base industry of the last of the Greeks! These alone who had nothing to lose might derive some profit from the revolution but the misery of the upper ranks of society is strongly painted in the personal adventures of Nicetas himself His stately palace had been reduced to ashes in the second conflagration and the senator with his family and friends found an obscure shelter in another house which he possessed near the church of St Sophia It was the door of this mean habitation that his friend the Venetian merchant guarded in the disguise of a soldier till Nicetas could save by a precipitate flight the relics of his fortune and the chastity of his daughter In a cold wintry season these fugitives nursed in the lap of prosperity departed on foot his wife was with child the desertion of their slaves compelled them to carry their baggage on their own shoulders, and their women, whom they placed in the centre were exhorted to conceal their beauty with dirt instead of adorning it with paint and jewels. Every step was less painful than the taunts of the plebeians, with whom they were now levelled nor did the exiles breathe in safety till their mournful pilgrimage was concluded at Selymbria above forty miles from the capital On the way they overtook the patriarch without attendance and almost without apparel riding on an ass, and reduced to a state of apostolical poverty which had it been voluntary might perhaps have been meritorious. In the meanwhile his desolate churches were profaned by the licentiousness and party zeal of the Latins After stripping the gems and pearls they converted the chalices into drinking-cups their tables, on which they gamed and feasted were covered with the pictures of Christ and the saints and they trampled under foot the most venerable objects of the Christian worship In the cathedral of St Sophia the ample veil of the sanctuary was rent asunder for the sake of the golden fringe and the altar a monument of art and riches, was broken in pieces and shared among the captors. Their mules and horses were laden with the wrought silver and gilt carvings which they tore down from the doors and pulpit, and if the beasts stumbled under the burden they were stabbed by their impatient drivers, and the holy pavement streamed with their impure blood A prostitute was seated on the throne of the patriarch and that daughter of Belial as she is styled sung and danced in the church to ridicule the hymns and processions of the Orientals Nor were the repositories of the royal dead secure from violation in the church of the Apostles the tombs of the emperors were rifled and it is said that after six centuries the corpse of Justinian was found without any signs of decay or putrefaction In the streets the French and Flemings clothed themselves and their horses in painted robes and flowing head dresses of linen and the coarse intemperance of their feasts[92] insulted the splendid sobriety of the East. To expose the arms of a people of scribes and scholars they affected to display a pen an inkhorn and a sheet of paper without discerning that the instruments of science and valour were alike feeble and useless in the hands of the modern Greeks

Their reputation and their language encouraged them however to despise the ignorance and to overlook the progress of the Latins [93] In the love of the arts the national difference was still more obvious and real the Greeks pre

count of Flanders and Hainault is now your sovereign and the emperor of the East. He was saluted with loud applause and the proclamation was re-echoed through the city by the joy of the Latins and the trembling adulation of the Greeks Boniface was the first to kiss the hand of his rival and to raise him on the buckler and Baldwin was transported to the cathedral and solemnly invested with the purple buskins. At the end of three weeks he was crowned by the legate, in the vacancy of a patriarch but the Venetian clergy soon filled the chapter of St. Sophia seated Thomas Morosini on the ecclesiastical throne and employed every art to perpetuate in their own nation the honours and benefices of the Greek church.[4] Without delay the successor of Constantine instructed Palestine France and Rome, of this memorable revolution To Palestine he sent, as a trophy the gates of Constantinople and the chain of the harbour [5] and adopted from the Assise of Jerusalem the laws or customs best adapted to a French colony and conquest in the East. In his epistles the natives of France are encouraged to swell that colony and to secure that conquest, to people a magnificent city and a fertile land, which will reward the labours both of the priest and the soldier He congratulates the Roman pontiff on the restoration of his authority in the East invites him to extinguish the Greek schism by his presence in a general council and implores his blessing and forgiveness for the disobedient pilgrims Prudence and dignity are blended in the answer of Innocent.[6] In the subversion of the Byzantine empire, he arraigns the vices of man, and adores the providence of God the conquerors will be absolved or condemned by their future conduct the validity of their treaty depends on the judgment of St. Peter but he inculcates their most sacred duty of establishing a just subordination of obedience and tribute from the Greeks to the Latins, from the magistrates to the clergy and from the clergy to the pope.

In the division of the Greek provinces[7] the share of the Venetians was more ample than that of the Latin emperor No more than one fourth was appropriated to his domain a clear moiety of the remainder was reserved for Venice and the other moiety was distributed among the adventurers of France and Lombardy The venerable Dandolo was proclaimed despot of Romania, and invested after the Greek fashion with the purple buskins. He ended at Constantinople his long and glorious life and if the prerogative was personal the title was used by his successors till the middle of the fourteenth century with the singular though true addition of lords of one fourth and a half of the Roman empire [8] The doge a slave of state was seldom permitted to depart from the helm of the republic, but his place was supplied by the bail or regent who exercised a supreme jurisdiction over the colony of Venetians they possessed three of the eight quarters of the city and his independent tribunal was composed of six judges, four counsellors, two chamberlains, two fiscal advocates, and a constable. The long experience of the Eastern trade enabled them to select their portion with discernment they had rashly accepted the dominion and defence of Adrianople but it was the more reasonable aim of their policy to form a chain of factories, and cities, and islands, along the maritime coast from the neighbourhood of Ragusa to the Hellespont and the Bosphorus. The labour and cost of such extensive conquests exhausted their treasury they abandoned the maxims of government, adopted a feudal system, and contented themselves with the homage of their nobles[9] for the possessions which these private vassals undertook to reduce and maintain And thus it was that the family of Sanut acquired the duchy of Naxos, which involved the greatest part of the archipelago *For the price of ten thousand marks the re*public purchased of the marquis of Montferrat the fertile island of Crete or Candia with the ruins of a hundred cities [10] but its improvement was stinted by the proud and narrow spirit of an aristocracy [11] and the wisest senators would confess that the sea, not the land was the treasury of St. Mark. In the moiety of the adventurers the marquis Boniface might claim the most liberal reward and besides the isle of Crete his exclusion from the throne was compensated by the royal title and the provinces beyond the Hellespont. But he prudently exchanged that distant and difficult conquest for the kingdom of Thessalonica or Macedonia twelve days journey from the capital where he might be supported by the neighbouring powers of his brother in law the king of Hungary His progress was hailed by the voluntary or reluctant acclamations of the natives and Greece the proper and ancient Greece again received a Latin conqueror [12] who trod with indifference that classic ground He viewed with a careless eye the beauties of the valley of Tempe traversed with a cautious step the straits of Thermopylæ occupied the un

the volumes of an unknown tongue the perishable substance of paper or parchment can only be preserved by the multiplicity of copies the literature of the Greeks had almost centered in the metropolis and, without computing the extent of our loss we may drop a tear over the libraries that have perished in the triple fire of Constantinople [102]

CHAPTER LXI

Partition of the Empire by the French and Venetians Five Latin Emperors of the Houses of Flanders and Courtenay Their Wars against the Bulgarians and Greeks Weakness and Poverty of the Latin Empire Recovery of Constantinople by the Greeks General Consequences of the Crusades

AFTER the death of the lawful princes the French and Venetians confident of justice and victory agreed to divide and regulate their future possessions [1] It was stipulated by treaty that twelve electors six of either nation should be nominated, that a majority should choose the emperor of the East and that, if the votes were equal, the decision of chance should ascertain the successful candidate To him with all the titles and prerogatives of the Byzantine throne they assigned the two palaces of Boucoleon and Blachernæ, with a fourth part of the Greek monarchy It was defined that the three remaining portions should be equally shared between the republic of Venice and the barons of France that each feudatory, with an honourable exception for the doge should acknowledge and perform the duties of homage and military service to the supreme head of the empire that the nation which gave an emperor should resign to their brethren the choice of a patriarch and that the pilgrims whatever might be their impatience to visit the Holy Land should devote another year to the conquest and defence of the Greek provinces After the conquest of Constantinople by the Latins the treaty was confirmed and executed and the first and most important step was the creation of an emperor The six electors of the French nation were all ecclesiastics, the abbot of Loces, the archbishop elect of Acre in Palestine and the bishops of Troyes Soissons, Halberstadt and Bethlehem the last of whom exercised in the camp the office of pope's legate their profession and knowledge were respectable and as they could not be the objects they were best qualified to be the authors of the choice The six Venetians were the principal servants of the state and in this list the noble families of Querini and Contarini are still proud to discover their ancestors. The twelve assembled in the chapel of the palace and after the solemn invocation of the Holy Ghost they proceeded to deliberate and vote A just impulse of respect and gratitude prompted them to crown the virtues of the doge his wisdom had inspired their enterprise and the most youthful knights might envy and applaud the exploits of blindness and age. But the patriot Dandolo was devoid of all personal ambition and fully satisfied that he had been judged worthy to reign His nomination was overruled by the Venetians themselves his countrymen and perhaps his friends,[2] represented with the eloquence of truth the mischiefs that might arise to national freedom and the common cause from the union of two incompatible characters of the first magistrate of a republic and the emperor of the East The exclusion of the doge left room for the more equal merits of Boniface and Baldwin and at their names all meaner candidates respectfully withdrew The marquis of Montferrat was recommended by his mature age and fair reputation by the choice of the adventurers, and the wishes of the Greeks nor can I believe that Venice the mistress of the sea could be seriously apprehensive of a petty lord at the foot of the Alps [3] But the count of Flanders was the chief of a wealthy and warlike people he was valiant pious, and chaste in the prime of life since he was only thirty two years of age a descendant of Charlemagne a cousin of the king of France and a compeer of the prelates and barons who had yielded with reluctance to the command of a foreigner Without the chapel these barons with the doge and marquis at their head expected the decision of the twelve electors. It was announced by the bishop of Soissons, in the name of his colleagues Ye have sworn to obey the prince whom we should choose by our unanimous suffrage Baldwin

Comneni a son of the virtuous Manuel a grandson of the tyrant Andronicus His name was Alexius and the epithet of great was applied perhaps to his stature, rather than to his exploits. By the indulgence of the Angeli he was appointed governor or duke of Trebizond[21] his birth gave him ambition the revolution independence and without changing his title, he reigned in peace from Sinope to the Phasis, along the coast of the Black Sea. His nameless son and successor is described as the vassal of the sultan whom he served with two hundred lances that Comnenian prince was no more than duke of Trebizond and the title of emperor was first assumed by the pride and envy of the grandsom of Alexius. In the West a third fragment was saved from the common shipwreck by Michael a bastard of the house of Angeli, who before the revolution had been known as an hostage a soldier and a rebel. His flight from the camp of the marquis Boniface secured his freedom by his marriage with the governor s daughter he commanded the important place of Durazzo assumed the title of despot, and founded a strong and conspicuous principality in Epirus, Ætolia and Thessaly which have ever been peopled by a warlike race. The Greeks, who had offered their service to their new sovereigns, were excluded by the haughty Latins[22] from all civil and military honours, as a nation born to tremble and obey Their resentment prompted them to show that they might have been useful friends, since they could be dangerous enemies their nerves were braced by adversity whatever was learned or holy whatever was noble or valiant, rolled away into the independent states of Trebizond Epirus, and Nice and a single patrician is marked by the ambiguous praise of attachment and loyalty to the Franks The vulgar herd of the cities and the country would have gladly submitted to a mild and regular servitude and the transient disorders of war would have been obliterated by some years of industry and peace. But peace was banished and industry was crushed in the disorders of the feudal system. The Roman emperors of Constantinople if they were endowed with abilities, were armed with power for the protection of their subjects their laws were wise, and their administration was simple. The Latin throne was filled by a titular prince the chief and often the servant, of his licentious confederates the fiefs of the empire, from a kingdom to a castle, were held and ruled by the sword of the barons and their discord poverty and ignorance extended the ramifications of tyranny to the most sequestered villages. The Greeks were oppressed by the double weight of the priest, who was invested with temporal power and of the soldier who was inflamed by fanatic hatred and the insuperable bar of religion and language for ever separated the stranger and the native. As long as the crusaders were united at Constantinople, the memory of their conquest and the terror of their arms, imposed silence on the captive land their dispersion betrayed the smallness of their numbers and the defects of their discipline and some failures and mischances revealed the secret that they were not invincible. As the fear of the Greeks abated their hatred increased. They murmured they conspired and before a year of slavery had elapsed, they implored, or accepted the succour of a barbarian, whose power they had felt, and whose gratitude they trusted.[23]

The Latin conquerors had been saluted with a solemn and early embassy from John or Joannice or Calo John the revolted chief of the Bulgarians and Wallachians. He deemed himself their brother as the votary of the Roman pontiff from whom he had received the regal title and a holy banner and in the subversion of the Greek monarchy he might aspire to the name of their friend and accomplice But Calo-John was astonished to find that the count of Flanders had assumed the pomp and pride of the successors of Constantine and his ambassadors were dismissed with a haughty message, that the rebel must deserve a pardon by touching with his forehead the footstool of the Imperial throne His resentment[24] would have exhaled in acts of violence and blood his cooler policy watched the rising discontent of the Greeks, affected a tender concern for their sufferings, and promised that their first struggles for freedom should be supported by his person and kingdom. The conspiracy was propagated by national hatred the firmest band of association and secrecy the Greeks were impatient to sheathe their daggers in the breast of the victorious strangers but the execution was prudently delayed till Henry the emperor's brother had transported the flower of his troops beyond the Hellespont. Most of the towns and villages of Thrace were true to the moment and the signal and the Latins, without arms or suspicion were slaughtered by the vile and merciless revenge of their slaves. From Demotica, the first scene of the massacre, the surviving vassals of the count of St Pol escaped to Adrianople, but the French and Venetians, who occupied known cities of Thebes Athens and Argos, and assaulted the fortifications of Corinth and Napoli[13] which resisted his arms The lots of the Latin pilgrims were regulated by chance or choice, or subsequent exchange and they abused with intemperate joy their triumph over the lives and fortunes of a great people After a minute survey of the provinces, they weighed in the scales of avarice the revenue of each district the advantage of the situation, and the ample or scanty supplies for the maintenance of soldiers and horses Their presumption claimed and divided the long lost dependencies of the Roman sceptre the Nile and Euphrates rolled through their imaginary realms and happy was the warrior who drew for his prize the palace of the Turkish sultan of Iconium[14] I shall not descend to the pedigree of families and the rent roll of estates but I wish to specify that the counts of Blois and St. Pol were invested with the duchy of Nice and the lordship of Demotica[15] the principal fiefs were held by the service of constable, chamberlain cup bearer, butler and chief cook and our historian Jeffrey of Villehardouin obtained a fair establishment on the banks of the Hebrus, and united the double office of marshal of Champagne and Romania At the head of his knights and archers each baron mounted on horseback to secure the possession of his share and their first efforts were generally successful But the public force was weakened by their dispersion and a thousand quarrels must arise under a law and among men whose sole umpire was the sword Within three months after the conquest of Constantinople the emperor and the king of Thessalonica drew their hostile followers into the field they were reconciled by the authority of the doge the advice of the marshal, and the firm freedom of their peers[16]

Two fugitives who had reigned at Constantinople still asserted the title of emperor and the subjects of their fallen throne might be moved to pity by the misfortunes of the elder Alexius or excited to revenge by the spirit of Mourzoufle A domestic alliance a common interest, a similar guilt and the merit of extinguishing his enemies a brother and a nephew induced the more recent usurper to unite with the former the relics of his power Mourzoufle was received with smiles and honours in the camp of his father Alexius, but the wicked can never love and should rarely trust their fellow criminals he was seized in the bath deprived of his eyes, stripped of his troops and treasures and turned out to wander an object of horror and contempt to those who with more propriety could hate and with more justice could punish the assassin of the emperor Isaac and his son As the tyrant, pursued by fear or remorse, was stealing over to Asia, he was seized by the Latins of Constantinople and condemned after an open trial, to an ignominious death His judges debated the mode of execution the axe the wheel or the stake and it was resolved that Mourzoufle[17] should ascend the Theodosian column a pillar of white marble of one hundred and forty seven feet in height[18] From the summit he was cast down headlong and dashed in pieces on the pavement in the presence of innumerable spectators, who filled the forum of Taurus and admired the accomplishment of an old prediction which was explained by this singular event.[19] The fate of Alexius is less tragical he was sent by the marquis a captive to Italy and a gift to the king of the Romans but he had not much to applaud his fortune if the sentence of imprisonment and exile were changed from a fortress in the Alps to a monastery in Asia But his daughter before the national calamity had been given in marriage to a young hero who continued the succession and restored the throne of the Greek princes[20] The valour of Theodore Lascaris was signalised in the two sieges of Constantinople After the flight of Mourzoufle when the Latins were already in the city he offered himself as their emperor to the soldiers and people and his ambition which might be virtuous was undoubtedly brave Could he have infused a soul into the multitude they might have crushed the strangers under their feet their abject despair refused his aid and Theodore retired to breathe the air of freedom in Anatolia beyond the immediate view and pursuit of the conquerors. Under the title at first of despot and afterwards of emperor he drew to his standard the bolder spirits who were fortified against slavery by the contempt of life and as every means was lawful for the public safety, implored without scruple the alliance of the Turkish sultan Nice where Theodore established his residence Prusa and Philadelphia Smyrna and Ephesus opened their gates to their deliverer he derived strength and reputation from his victories, and even from his defeats and the successor of Constantine preserved a fragment of the empire from the banks of the Mæander to the suburbs of Nicomedia and at length of Constantinople Another portion distant and obscure was possessed by the lineal heir of the

he breathed three days before he was devoured by the birds of prey[79] About twenty years afterwards in a wood of the Netherlands, a hermit announced himself as the true Baldwin, the emperor of Constantinople and lawful sovereign of Flanders. He related the wonders of his escape, his adventures, and his penance, among a people prone to believe and to rebel and, in the first transport, Flanders acknowledged her long lost sovereign. A short examination before the French court detected the impostor who was punished with an ignominious death but the Flemings still adhered to the pleasing error and the countess Jane is accused by the gravest historians of sacrificing to her ambition the life of an unfortunate father[80]

In all civilised hostility a treaty is established for the exchange or ransom of prisoners and if their captivity be prolonged, their condition is known, and they are treated according to their rank with humanity or honour But the savage Bulgarian was a stranger to the laws of war his prisons were involved in darkness and silence and above a year elapsed before the Latins could be assured of the death of Baldwin before his brother the regent Henry would consent to assume the title of emperor His moderation was applauded by the Greeks as an act of rare and inimitable virtue. Their light and perfidious ambition was eager to seize or anticipate the moment of a vacancy while a law of succession, the guardian both of the prince and people, was gradually defined and confirmed in the hereditary monarchies of Europe. In the support of the Eastern empire Henry was gradually left without an associate, as the heroes of the crusade retired from the world or from the war The doge of Venice, the venerable Dandolo, in the fulness of years and glory sunk into the grave. The marquis of Montferrat was slowly recalled from the Peloponnesian war to the revenge of Baldwin and the defence of Thessalonica. Some nice disputes of feudal homage and service were reconciled in a personal interview between the emperor and the king they were firmly united by mutual esteem and the common danger and their alliance was sealed by the nuptials of Henry with the daughter of the Italian prince. He soon deplored the loss of his friend and father At the persuasion of some faithful Greeks, Boniface made a bold and successful inroad among the hills of Rhodope the Bulgarians fled on his approach they assembled to harass his retreat. On the intelligence that his rear was attacked, without waiting for any defensive armour he leaped on horseback, couched his lance and drove the enemies before him but in the rash pursuit he was pierced with a mortal wound and the head of the king of Thessalonica was presented to Calo-John who enjoyed the honours without the merit, of victory It is here at this melancholy event, that the pen or the voice of Jeffrey of Villehardouin seems to drop or to expire[81] and if he still exercised his military office of marshal of Romania his subsequent exploits are buried in oblivion[82] The character of Henry was not unequal to his arduous situation in the siege of Constantinople and beyond the Hellespont, he had deserved the fame of a valiant knight and a skilful commander and his courage was tempered with a degree of prudence and mildness unknown to his impetuous brother In the double war against the Greeks of Asia and the Bulgarians of Europe he was ever the foremost on shipboard or on horseback and though he cautiously provided for the success of his arms, the drooping Latins were often roused by his example to save and to second their fearless emperor But such efforts, and some supplies of men and money from France, were of less avail than the errors, the cruelty and death of their most formidable adversary When the despair of the Greek subjects invited Calo-John as their deliverer they hoped that he would protect their liberty and adopt their laws they were soon taught to compare the degrees of national ferocity and to execrate the savage conqueror who no longer dissembled his intention of dispeopling Thrace, of demolishing the cities, and of transplanting the inhabitants beyond the Danube Many towns and villages of Thrace were already evacuated a heap of ruins marked the place of Philippopolis, and a similar calamity was expected at Demotica and Adrianople by the first authors of the revolt. They raised a cry of grief and repentance to the throne of Henry the emperor alone had the magnanimity to forgive and trust them. No more than four hundred knights, with their serjeants and archers, could be assembled under his banner and with this slender force he fought and repulsed the Bulgarian, who besides his infantry was at the head of forty thousand horse In this expedition Henry felt the difference between a hostile and a friendly country the remaining cities were preserved by his arms and the savage with shame and loss, was compelled to relinquish his prey The siege of Thessalonica was the last of the evils which Calo-John inflicted or suffered he was stabbed in the night in his tent, and the

that city, were slain or expelled by the furious multitude, the garrisons that could effect their retreat fell back on each other towards the metropolis, and the fortresses, that separately stood against the rebels were ignorant of each other's and of their sovereign's fate The voice of fame and fear announced the revolt of the Greeks and the rapid approach of their Bulgarian ally, and Calo John, not depending on the forces of his own kingdom, had drawn from the Scythian wilderness a body of fourteen thousand Comans, who drank, as it was said, the blood of their captives and sacrificed the Christians on the altars of their gods[25]

Alarmed by this sudden and growing danger, the emperor despatched a swift messenger to recall Count Henry and his troops, and had Baldwin expected the return of his gallant brother, with a supply of twenty thousand Armenians, he might have encountered the invader with equal numbers and a decisive superiority of arms and discipline But the spirit of chivalry could seldom discriminate caution from cowardice, and the emperor took the field with a hundred and forty knights, and their train of archers and serjeants The marshal, who dissuaded and obeyed, led the vanguard in their march to Adrianople the main body was commanded by the count of Blois, the aged doge of Venice followed with the rear, and their scanty numbers were increased from all sides by the fugitive Latins They undertook to besiege the rebels of Adrianople and such was the pious tendency of the crusades, that they employed the holy week in pillaging the country for their subsistence and in framing engines for the destruction of their fellow Christians But the Latins were soon interrupted and alarmed by the light cavalry of the Comans who boldly skirmished to the edge of their imperfect lines and a proclamation was issued by the marshal of Romania that, on the trumpet's sound, the cavalry should mount and form but that none, under pain of death should abandon themselves to a desultory and dangerous pursuit This wise injunction was first disobeyed by the count of Blois, who involved the emperor in his rashness and ruin The Comans of the Parthian or Tartar school, fled before their first charge, but after a career of two leagues when the knights and their horses were almost breathless, they suddenly turned, rallied, and encompassed the heavy squadrons of the Franks The count was slain on the field the emperor was made prisoner, and if the one disdained to fly if the other refused to yield, their personal bravery made a poor atonement for their ignorance or neglect of the duties of a general[26]

Proud of his victory and his royal prize, the Bulgarian advanced to relieve Adrianople and achieve the destruction of the Latins They must inevitably have been destroyed if the marshal of Romania had not displayed a cool courage and consummate skill, uncommon in all ages, but most uncommon in those times, when war was a passion rather than a science His grief and fears were poured into the firm and faithful bosom of the doge, but in the camp he diffused an assurance of safety which could only be realised by the general belief All day he maintained his perilous station between the city and the barbarians, Villehardouin decamped in silence at the dead of night and his masterly retreat of three days would have deserved the praise of Xenophon and the ten thousand In the rear the marshal supported the weight of the pursuit in the front, he moderated the impatience of the fugitives, and wherever the Comans approached they were repelled by a line of impenetrable spears On the third day the weary troops beheld the sea, the solitary town of Rodosto[27] and their friends, who had landed from the Asiatic shore They embraced, they wept but they united their arms and counsels, and in his brother's absence, Count Henry assumed the regency of the empire at once in a state of childhood and caducity[28] If the Comans withdrew from the summer heats seven thousand Latins in the hour of danger deserted Constantinople their brethren and their vows Some partial success was overbalanced by the loss of one hundred and twenty knights in the field of Rusium and of the imperial domain no more was left than the capital with two or three adjacent fortresses on the shores of Europe and Asia The king of Bulgaria was resistless and inexorable and Calo John respectfully eluded the demands of the pope who conjured his new proselyte to restore peace and the emperor to the afflicted Latins The deliverance of Baldwin was no longer he said in the power of man that prince had died in prison and the manner of his death is variously related by ignorance and credulity The lovers of a tragic legend will be pleased to hear that the royal captive was tempted by the amorous queen of the Bulgarians that his chaste refusal exposed him to the falsehood of a woman and the jealousy of a savage that his hands and feet were severed from his body that his bleeding trunk was cast among the carcases of dogs and horses and that he breathed three days before he was devoured by the birds of prey[29] About twenty years afterwards, in a wood of the Netherlands, a hermit announced himself as the true Baldwin, the emperor of Constantinople and lawful sovereign of Flanders. He related the wonders of his escape, his adventures, and his penance, among a people prone to believe and to rebel and, in the first transport, Flanders acknowledged her long lost sovereign. A short examination before the French court detected the impostor who was punished with an ignominious death but the Flemings still adhered to the pleasing error and the countess Jane is accused by the gravest historians of sacrificing to her ambition the life of an unfortunate father[30]

In all civilised hostility a treaty is established for the exchange or ransom of prisoners and if their captivity be prolonged their condition is known, and they are treated according to their rank with humanity or honour But the savage Bulgarian was a stranger to the laws of war his prisons were involved in darkness and silence and above a year elapsed before the Latins could be assured of the death of Baldwin before his brother the regent Henry would consent to assume the title of emperor His moderation was applauded by the Greeks as an act of rare and inimitable virtue. Their light and perfidious ambition was eager to seize or anticipate the moment of a vacancy while a law of succession, the guardian both of the prince and people, was gradually defined and confirmed in the hereditary monarchies of Europe. In the support of the Eastern empire Henry was gradually left without an associate, as the heroes of the crusade retired from the world or from the war The doge of Venice the venerable Dandolo in the fulness of years and glory sunk into the grave. The marquis of Montferrat was slowly recalled from the Peloponnesian war to the revenge of Baldwin and the defence of Thessalonica. Some nice disputes of feudal homage and service were reconciled in a personal interview between the emperor and the king they were firmly united by mutual esteem and the common danger and their alliance was sealed by the nuptials of Henry with the daughter of the Italian prince. He soon deplored the loss of his friend and father At the persuasion of some faithful Greeks, Boniface made a bold and successful inroad among the hills of Rhodope the Bulgarians fled on his approach they assembled to harass his retreat. On the intelligence that his rear was attacked, without waiting for any defensive armour he leaped on horseback, couched his lance and drove the enemies before him but in the rash pursuit he was pierced with a mortal wound and the head of the king of Thessalonica was presented to Calo-John who enjoyed the honours, without the merit, of victory It is here at this melancholy event, that the pen or the voice of Jeffrey of Villehardouin seems to drop or to expire[31] and if he still exercised his military office of marshal of Romania his subsequent exploits are buried in oblivion[32] The character of Henry was not unequal to his arduous situation in the siege of Constantinople, and beyond the Hellespont, he had deserved the fame of a valiant knight and a skilful commander and his courage was tempered with a degree of prudence and mildness unknown to his impetuous brother In the double war against the Greeks of Asia and the Bulgarians of Europe he was ever the foremost on shipboard or on horseback and though he cautiously provided for the success of his arms, the drooping Latins were often roused by his example to save and to second their fearless emperor But such efforts, and some supplies of men and money from France, were of less avail than the errors, the cruelty and death of their most formidable adversary When the despair of the Greek subjects invited Calo-John as their deliverer they hoped that he would protect their liberty and adopt their laws they were soon taught to compare the degrees of national ferocity and to execrate the savage conqueror who no longer dissembled his intention of dispeopling Thrace, of demolishing the cities, and of transplanting the inhabitants beyond the Danube. Many towns and villages of Thrace were already evacuated a heap of ruins marked the place of Philippopolis, and a similar calamity was expected at Demotica and Adrianople by the first authors of the revolt. They raised a cry of grief and repentance to the throne of Henry the emperor alone had the magnanimity to forgive and trust them. No more than four hundred knights, with their serjeants and archers, could be assembled under his banner and with this slender force he fought and repulsed the Bulgarian, who besides his infantry was at the head of forty thousand horse In this expedition Henry felt the difference between a hostile and a friendly country the remaining cities were preserved by his arms, and the savage, with shame and loss, was compelled to relinquish his prey The siege of Thessalonica was the last of the evils which Calo-John inflicted or suffered he was stabbed in the night in his tent, and the

that city were slain or expelled by the furious multitude the garrisons that could effect their retreat fell back on each other towards the metropolis, and the fortresses that separately stood against the rebels, were ignorant of each other's and of their sovereign s fate. The voice of fame and fear announced the revolt of the Greeks and the rapid approach of their Bulgarian ally, and Calo-John, not depending on the forces of his own kingdom, had drawn from the Scythian wilderness a body of fourteen thousand Comans who drank as it was said, the blood of their captives, and sacrificed the Christians on the altars of their gods [25]

Alarmed by this sudden and growing danger, the emperor despatched a swift messenger to recall Count Henry and his troops and had Baldwin expected the return of his gallant brother, with a supply of twenty thousand Armenians he might have encountered the invader with equal numbers and a decisive superiority of arms and discipline But the spirit of chivalry could seldom discriminate caution from cowardice and the emperor took the field with a hundred and forty knights, and their train of archers and serjeants The marshal, who dissuaded and obeyed led the vanguard in their march to Adrianople the main body was commanded by the count of Blois, the aged doge of Venice followed with the rear and their scanty numbers were increased from all sides by the fugitive Latins They undertook to besiege the rebels of Adrianople and such was the pious tendency of the crusades that they employed the holy week in pillaging the country for their subsistence and in framing engines for the destruction of their fellow Christians But the Latins were soon interrupted and alarmed by the light cavalry of the Comans who boldly skirmished to the edge of their imperfect lines and a proclamation was issued by the marshal of Romania that, on the trumpet s sound, the cavalry should mount and form but that none under pain of death should abandon themselves to a desultory and dangerous pursuit This wise injunction was first disobeyed by the count of Blois who involved the emperor in his rashness and ruin The Comans of the Parthian or Tartar school fled before their first charge but after a career of two leagues when the knights and their horses were almost breathless they suddenly turned rallied and encompassed the heavy squadrons of the Franks The count was slain on the field the emperor was made prisoner, and if the one disdained to fly if the other refused to yield, their personal bravery made a poor atonement for their ignorance or neglect of the duties of a general.[26]

Proud of his victory and his royal prize, the Bulgarian advanced to relieve Adrianople and achieve the destruction of the Latins. They must inevitably have been destroyed if the marshal of Romania had not displayed a cool courage and consummate skill, uncommon in all ages but most uncommon in those times, when war was a passion rather than a science. His grief and fears were poured into the firm and faithful bosom of the doge but in the camp he diffused an assurance of safety which could only be realised by the general belief All day he maintained his perilous station between the city and the barbarians Villehardouin decamped in silence at the dead of night and his masterly retreat of three days would have deserved the praise of Xenophon and the ten thousand In the rear the marshal supported the weight of the pursuit in the front, he moderated the impatience of the fugitives, and wherever the Comans approached they were repelled by a line of impenetrable spears. On the third day the weary troops beheld the sea the solitary town of Rodosto [27] and their friends, who had landed from the Asiatic shore They embraced they wept but they united their arms and counsels and, in his brother's absence Count Henry assumed the regency of the empire, at once in a state of childhood and caducity [28] If the Comans withdrew from the summer heats seven thousand Latins in the hour of danger deserted Constantinople their brethren and their vows Some partial success was overbalanced by the loss of one hundred and twenty knights in the field of Rusium and of the Imperial domain no more was left than the capital with two or three adjacent fortresses on the shores of Europe and Asia The king of Bulgaria was resistless and inexorable and Calo-John respectfully eluded the demands of the pope who conjured his new proselyte to restore peace and the emperor to the afflicted Latins The deliverance of Baldwin was no longer he said in the power of man that prince had died in prison and the manner of his death is variously related by ignorance and credulity The lovers of a tragic legend will be pleased to hear that the royal captive was tempted by the amorous queen of the Bulgarians that his chaste refusal exposed him to the falsehood of a woman and the jealousy of a savage that his hands and feet were severed from his body that his bleeding trunk was cast among the carcases of dogs and horses and that banquet, the French troops, without leaders or hopes, were eager to exchange their arms for the delusive promise of mercy and bread The Vatican thundered and the impious Theodore was threatened with the vengeance of earth and heaven but the captive emperor and his soldiers were forgotten and the reproaches of the pope are confined to the imprisonment of his legate No sooner was he satisfied by the deliverance of the priest and a promise of spiritual obedience, than he pardoned and protected the despot of Epirus. His peremptory commands suspended the ardour of the Venetians and the king of Hungary and it was only by a natural or untimely death[36] that Peter of Courtenay was released from his hopeless captivity [37]

The long ignorance of his fate, and the presence of the lawful sovereign of Yolande, his wife or widow delayed the proclamation of a new emperor Before her death and in the midst of her grief she was delivered of a son, who was named Baldwin, the last and most unfortunate of the Latin princes of Constantinople. His birth endeared him to the barons of Romania but his childhood would have prolonged the troubles of a minority and his claims were superseded by the elder claims of his brethren. The first of these Philip of Courtenay who derived from his mother the inheritance of Namur had the wisdom to prefer the substance of a marquisate to the shadow of an empire and on his refusal Robert, the second of the sons of Peter and Yolande was called to the throne of Constantinople Warned by his father's mischance he pursued his slow and secure journey through Germany and along the Danube a passage was opened by his sister's marriage with the king of Hungary and the emperor Robert was crowned by the patriarch in the cathedral of St. Sophia But his reign was an era of calamity and disgrace and the colony as it was styled of NEW FRANCE yielded on all sides to the Greeks of Nice and Epirus After a victory which he owed to his perfidy rather than his courage Theodore Angelus entered the kingdom of Thessalonica expelled the feeble Demetrius the son of the marquis Boniface erected his standard on the walls of Adrianople and added by his vanity a third or a fourth name to the list of rival emperors The relics of the Asiatic province were swept away by John Vataces, the son in law and successor of Theodore Lascaris, and who in a triumphant reign of thirty three years displayed the virtues both of peace and war Under his discipline, the swords of the French mercenaries were the most effectual instrument of his conquests, and their desertion from the service of their country was at once a symptom and a cause of the rising ascendant of the Greeks By the construction of a fleet he obtained the command of the Hellespont reduced the islands of Lesbos and Rhodes, attacked the Venetians of Candia, and intercepted the rare and parsimonious succours of the West. Once, and once only the Latin emperor sent an army against Vataces and in the defeat of that army the veteran knights, the last of the original conquerors, were left on the field of battle. But the success of a foreign enemy was less painful to the pusillanimous Robert than the insolence of his Latin subjects, who confounded the weakness of the emperor and of the empire. His personal misfortunes will prove the anarchy of the government and the ferociousness of the times. The amorous youth had neglected his Greek bride the daughter of Vataces to introduce into the palace a beautiful maid of a private, though noble family of Artois and her mother had been tempted by the lustre of the purple to forfeit her engagements with a gentleman of Burgundy His love was converted into rage he assembled his friends forced the palace gates, threw the mother into the sea, and inhumanly cut off the nose and lips of the wife or concubine of the emperor Instead of punishing the offender the barons avowed and applauded the savage deed [38] which as a prince and as a man it was impossible that Robert should forgive. He escaped from the guilty city to implore the justice or compassion of the pope the emperor was coolly exhorted to return to his station before he could obey he sunk under the weight of grief shame and impotent resentment.[39]

It was only in the age of chivalry that valour could ascend from a private station to the thrones of Jerusalem and Constantinople The titular kingdom of Jerusalem had devolved to Mary the daughter of Isabella and Conrad of Montferrat, and the grand-daughter of Almeric or Amaury She was given to John of Brienne of a noble family in Champagne by the public voice, and the judgment of Philip Augustus who named him as the most worthy champion of the Holy Land.[40] In the fifth crusade he led a hundred thousand Latins to the conquest of Egypt by him the siege of Damietta was achieved and the subsequent failure was justly ascribed to the pride and avarice of the legate. After the marriage of his daughter with Frederic the Second[41] he was provoked by the emperor's ingratitude to accept the command of the army general perhaps the assassin who found him weltering in his blood, ascribed the blow with general applause to the lance of St. Demetrius[35] After several victories the prudence of Henry concluded an honourable peace with the successor of the tyrant, and with the Greek princes of Nice and Epirus If he ceded some doubtful limits, an ample kingdom was reserved for himself and his feudatories, and his reign, which lasted only ten years afforded a short interval of prosperity and peace Far above the narrow policy of Baldwin and Boniface he freely intrusted to the Greeks the most important offices of the state and army, and this liberality of sentiment and practice was the more seasonable as the princes of Nice and Epirus had already learned to seduce and employ the mercenary valour of the Latins It was the aim of Henry to unite and reward his deserving subjects of every nation and language but he appeared less solicitous to accomplish the impracticable union of the two churches Pelagius, the pope s legate, who acted as the sovereign of Constantinople had interdicted the worship of the Greeks and sternly imposed the payment of tithes the double procession of the Holy Ghost and a blind obedience to the Roman pontiff As the weaker party they pleaded the duties of conscience and implored the rights of toleration Our bodies they said, ' are Cæsar's but our souls belong only to God ' The persecution was checked by the firmness of the emperor,[36] and if we can believe that the same prince was poisoned by the Greeks themselves, we must entertain a contemptible idea of the sense and gratitude of mankind His valour was a vulgar attribute, which he shared with ten thousand knights but Henry possessed the superior courage to oppose in a superstitious age the pride and avarice of the clergy In the cathedral of St Sophia he presumed to place his throne on the right hand of the patriarch and this presumption excited the sharpest censure of pope Innocent the Third By a salutary edict, one of the first examples of the laws of mortmain, he prohibited the alienation of fiefs many of the Latins desirous of returning to Europe resigned their estates to the church for a spiritual or temporal reward, these holy lands were immediately discharged from military service and a colony of soldiers would have been gradually transformed into a college of priests.[38]

The virtuous Henry died at Thessalonica in the defence of that kingdom and of an infant, the son of his friend Boniface. In the two first emperors of Constantinople the male line of the counts of Flanders was extinct But their sister Yolande was the wife of a French prince, the mother of a numerous progeny and one of her daughters had married Andrew king of Hungary a brave and pious champion of the cross. By seating him on the Byzantine throne the barons of Romania would have acquired the forces of a neighbouring and warlike kingdom, but the prudent Andrew revered the laws of succession and the princess Yolande with her husband Peter of Courtenay count of Auxerre, was invited by the Latins to assume the empire of the East. The royal birth of his father, the noble origin of his mother recommended to the barons of France the first-cousin of their king His reputation was fair, his possessions were ample and, in the bloody crusade against the Albigeois the soldiers and priests had been abundantly satisfied of his zeal and valour Vanity might applaud the elevation of a French emperor of Constantinople but prudence must pity rather than envy his treacherous and imaginary greatness To assert and adorn his title he was reduced to sell or mortgage the best of his patrimony By these expedients, the liberality of his royal kinsman Philip Augustus, and the national spirit of chivalry he was enabled to pass the Alps at the head of one hundred and forty knights and five thousand five hundred serjeants and archers After some hesitation pope Honorius the Third was persuaded to crown the successor of Constantine but he performed the ceremony in a church without the walls lest he should seem to imply or to bestow any right of sovereignty over the ancient capital of the empire The Venetians had engaged to transport Peter and his forces beyond the Adriatic and the empress with her four children to the Byzantine palace but they required as the price of their service that he should recover Durazzo from the despot of Epirus. Michael Angelus or Comnenus the first of his dynasty had bequeathed the succession of his power and ambition to Theodore his legitimate brother who already threatened and invaded the establishments of the Latins After discharging his debt by a fruitless assault the emperor raised the siege to prosecute a long and perilous journey over land from Durazzo to Thessalonica He was soon lost in the mountains of Epirus the passes were fortified his provisions exhausted he was delayed and deceived by a treacherous negotiation and after Peter of Courtenay and the Roman legate had been arrested in a sage accessible. But these expectations (if Baldwin was sincere) quickly vanished like a dream the troops and treasures of France melted away in his unskilful hands and the throne of the Latin emperor was protected by a dishonourable alliance with the Turks and Comans. To secure the former he consented to bestow his niece on the unbelieving sultan of Cogni to please the latter he complied with their pagan rites a dog was sacrificed between the two armies and the contracting parties tasted each other's blood as a pledge of their fidelity[42] In the palace, or prison of Constantinople, the successor of Augustus demolished the vacant houses for winter fuel and stripped the lead from the churches for the daily expense of his family Some usurious loans were dealt with a scanty hand by the merchants of Italy and Philip his son and heir was pawned at Venice as the security for a debt[43] Thirst, hunger and nakedness are positive evils but wealth is relative and a prince, who would be rich in a private station, may be exposed by the increase of his wants to all the anxiety and bitterness of poverty

But in this abject distress the emperor and empire were still possessed of an ideal treasure, which drew its fantastic value from the superstition of the Christian world The merit of the true cross was somewhat impaired by its frequent division and a long captivity among the infidels might shed some suspicion on the fragments that were produced in the East and West. But another relic of the Passion was preserved in the Imperial chapel of Constantinople and the crown of thorns which had been placed on the head of Christ was equally precious and authentic. It had formerly been the practice of the Egyptian debtors to deposit, as a security the mummies of their parents and both their honour and religion were bound for the redemption of the pledge In the same manner and in the absence of the emperor the barons of Romania borrowed the sum of thirteen thousand one hundred and thirty-four pieces of gold[44] on the credit of the holy crown they failed in the performance of their contract and a rich Venetian Nicholas Querini undertook to satisfy their impatient creditors, on condition that the relic should be lodged at Venice, to become his absolute property if it were not redeemed within a short and definite term. The barons apprised their sovereign of the hard treaty and impending loss and as the empire could not afford a ransom of seven thousand pounds sterling Baldwin was anxious to snatch the prize from the Venetians, and to vest it with more honour and emolument in the hands of the most Christian king[45] Yet the negotiation was attended with some delicacy In the purchase of relics the saint would have started at the guilt of simony but if the mode of expression were changed he might lawfully repay the debt, accept the gift and acknowledge the obligation. His ambassadors, two Dominicans, were despatched to Venice to redeem and receive the holy crown which had escaped the dangers of the sea and the galleys of Vataces. On opening a wooden box they recognised the seals of the doge and barons, which were applied on a shrine of silver and within this shrine the monument of the Passion was enclosed in a golden vase. The reluctant Venetians yielded to justice and power the emperor Frederic granted a free and honourable passage the court of France advanced as far as Troyes in Champagne to meet with devotion this inestimable relic it was borne in triumph through Paris by the king himself, barefoot and in his shirt and a free gift of ten thousand marks of silver reconciled Baldwin to his loss. The success of this transaction tempted the Latin emperor to offer with the same generosity the remaining furniture of his chapel[46] a large and authentic portion of the true cross the baby linen of the Son of God the lance, the sponge and the chain of his Passion the rod of Moses and part of the skull of St. John the Baptist. For the reception of these spiritual treasures twenty thousand marks were expended by St. Louis on a stately foundation the holy chapel of Paris, on which the muse of Boileau has bestowed a comic immortality The truth of such remote and ancient relics, which cannot be proved by any human testimony must be admitted by those who believe in the miracles which they have performed About the middle of the last age, an inveterate ulcer was touched and cured by a holy prickle of the holy crown[47] the prodigy is attested by the most pious and enlightened Christians of France nor will the fact be easily disproved except by those who are armed with a general antidote against religious credulity[48]

The Latins of Constantinople[49] were on all sides encompassed and pressed their sole hope, the last delay of their ruin was in the division of their Greek and Bulgarian enemies and of this hope they were deprived by the superior arms and policy of Vataces emperor of Nice. From the Propontis to the rocky coast of Pamphylia Asia was peaceful and prosperous under his reign and the events of every campaign extended his influence in Europe. The strong cities of the church, and though advanced in life and despoiled of royalty, the sword and spirit of John of Brienne were still ready for the service of Christendom In the seven years of his brother's reign, Baldwin of Courtenay had not emerged from a state of childhood and the barons of Romania felt the strong necessity of placing the sceptre in the hands of a man and a hero The veteran king of Jerusalem might have disdained the name and office of regent they agreed to invest him for his life with the title and prerogatives of emperor, on the sole condition that Baldwin should marry his second daughter and succeed at a mature age to the throne of Constantinople The expectation both of the Greeks and Latins was kindled by the renown, the choice and the presence of John of Brienne and they admired his martial aspect his green and vigorous age of more than fourscore years and his size and stature which surpassed the common measure of mankind [42] But avarice and the love of ease appear to have chilled the ardour of enterprise his troops were disbanded and two years rolled away without action or honour till he was awakened by the dangerous alliance of Vataces emperor of Nice and of Azan king of Bulgaria They besieged Constantinople by sea and land with an army of one hundred thousand men and a fleet of three hundred ships of war while the entire force of the Latin emperor was reduced to one hundred and sixty knights, and a small addition of serjeants and archers I tremble to relate that instead of defending the city the hero made a sally at the head of his cavalry and that, of forty-eight squadrons of the enemy no more than three escaped from the edge of his invincible sword Fired by his example the infantry and the citizens boarded the vessels that anchored close to the walls and twenty five were dragged in triumph into the harbour of Constantinople At the summons of the emperor the vassals and allies armed in her defence broke through every obstacle that opposed their passage and in the succeeding year obtained a second victory over the same enemies By the rude poets of the age John of Brienne is compared to Hector Roland and Judas Maccabæus [43] but their credit and his glory receives some abatement from the silence of the Greeks. The empire was soon deprived of the last of her champions, and the dying monarch was ambitious to enter paradise in the habit of a Franciscan friar [44]

In the double victory of John of Brienne I cannot discover the name or exploits of his pupil Baldwin, who had attained the age of military service, and who succeeded to the imperial dignity on the decease of his adoptive father [45] The royal youth was employed on a commission more suitable to his temper he was sent to visit the Western courts, of the pope more especially and of the king of France to excite their pity by the view of his innocence and distress and to obtain some supplies of men or money for the relief of the sinking empire. He thrice repeated these mendicant visits, in which he seemed to prolong his stay and postpone his return of the five and twenty years of his reign, a greater number were spent abroad than at home and in no place did the emperor deem himself less free and secure than in his native country and his capital On some public occasions his vanity might be soothed by the title of Augustus and by the honours of the purple and at the general council of Lyons when Frederic the Second was excommunicated and deposed his Oriental colleague was enthroned on the right hand of the pope But how often was the exile the vagrant the Imperial beggar, humbled with scorn insulted with pity and degraded in his own eyes and those of the nations! In his first visit to England he was stopped at Dover by a severe reprimand that he should presume without leave to enter an independent kingdom After some delay Baldwin however was permitted to pursue his journey was entertained with cold civility and thankfully departed with a present of seven hundred marks [46] From the avarice of Rome he could only obtain the proclamation of a crusade and a treasure of indulgences a coin whose currency was depreciated by too frequent and indiscriminate abuse His birth and misfortunes recommended him to the generosity of his cousin Louis the Ninth but the martial zeal of the saint was diverted from Constantinople to Egypt and Palestine and the public and private poverty of Baldwin was alleviated for a moment by the alienation of the marquisate of Namur and the lordship of Courtenay the last remains of his inheritance [47] By such shameful or ruinous expedients he once more returned to Romania with an army of thirty thousand soldiers whose numbers were doubled in the apprehension of the Greeks. His first despatches to France and England announced his victories and his hopes he had reduced the country round the capital to the distance of three days journey and if he succeeded against an important though nameless, city (most probably Chorli) the frontier would be safe and the pas

body to second and support his operations he might advance unperceived in the night with a chosen detachment While some applied scaling ladders to the lowest part of the walls, they were secure of an old Greek who would introduce their companions through a subterraneous passage into his house they could soon on the inside break an entrance through the golden gate, which had been long obstructed and the conqueror would be in the heart of the city before the Latins were conscious of their danger After some debate, the Cæsar resigned himself to the faith of the volunteers they were trusty bold, and successful and in describing the plan I have already related the execution and success.[61] But no sooner had Alexius passed the threshold of the golden gate than he trembled at his own rashness he paused he deliberated till the desperate volunteers urged him forwards by the assurance that in retreat lay the greatest and most inevitable danger Whilst the Cæsar kept his regulars in firm array the Comans dispersed themselves on all sides an alarm was sounded and the threats of fire and pillage compelled the citizens to a decisive resolution. The Greeks of Constantinople remembered their native sovereigns the Genoese merchants their recent alliance and Venetian foes every quarter was in arms and the air resounded with a general acclamation of Long life and victory to Michael and John the august emperors of the Romans! Their rival Baldwin was awakened by the sound but the most pressing danger could not prompt him to draw his sword in the defence of a city which he deserted perhaps with more pleasure than regret he fled from the palace to the seashore where he descried the welcome sails of the fleet returning from the vain and fruitless attempt on Daphnusia. Constantinople was irrecoverably lost but the Latin emperor and the principal families embarked on board the Venetian galleys, and steered for the isle of Eubœa, and after wards for Italy where the royal fugitive was entertained by the pope and Sicilian king with a mixture of contempt and pity From the loss of Constantinople to his death he consumed thirteen years soliciting the Catholic powers to join in his restoration the lesson had been familiar to his youth nor was his last exile more indigent or shameful than his three former pilgrimages to the courts of Europe. His son Philip was the heir of an ideal empire and the pretensions of his daughter Catherine were transported by her marriage, to Charles of Valois the brother of Philip the Fair king of France. The house of Courtenay was represented in the female line by successive alliances, till the title of emperor of Constantinople too bulky and sonorous for a private name, modesty expired in silence and oblivion [62]

After this narrative of the expeditions of the Latins to Palestine and Constantinople I can not dismiss the subject without revolving the general consequences on the countries that were the scene and on the nations that were the actors, of these memorable crusades.[63] As soon as the arms of the Franks were withdrawn the impression though not the memory was erased in the Mohammedan realms of Egypt and Syria. The faithful disciples of the prophet were never tempted by a profane desire to study the laws and languages of the idolaters nor did the simplicity of their primitive manners receive the slightest alteration from their intercourse in peace and war with the unknown strangers of the West. The Greeks, who thought themselves proud but who were only vain showed a disposition somewhat less inflexible. In the efforts for the recovery of their empire they emulated the valour discipline and tactics of their antagonists. The modern literature of the West they might justly despise but its free spirit would instruct them in the rights of man and some institutions of public and private life were adopted from the French. The correspondence of Constantinople and Italy diffused the knowledge of the Latin tongue and several of the fathers and classics were at length honoured with a Greek version.[64] But the national and religious prejudices of the Orientals were inflamed by persecution and the reign of the Latins confirmed the separation of the two churches.

If we compare the era of the crusades, the Latins of Europe with the Greeks and Arabians, their respective degrees of knowledge, industry and art, our rude ancestors must be content with the third rank in the scale of nations. Their successive improvement and present superiority may be ascribed to a peculiar energy of character to an active and imitative spirit, unknown to their more polished rivals, who at that time were in a stationary or retrograde state With such a disposition the Latins should have derived the most early and essential benefits from a series of events which opened to their eyes the prospect of the world and introduced them to a long and frequent intercourse with the more cultivated regions of the East. The first and most obvious progress was in trade and manufactures in the arts which are strongly prompted by the thirst of wealth, the calls of necessity, of the hills of Macedonia and Thrace were rescued from the Bulgarians and their kingdom was circumscribed by its present and proper limits along the southern banks of the Danube The sole emperor of the Romans could no longer brook that a lord of Epirus, a Comnenian prince of the West, should presume to dispute or share the honours of the purple, and the humble Demetrius changed the colour of his buskins, and accepted with gratitude the appellation of despot. His own subjects were exasperated by his baseness and incapacity, they implored the protection of their supreme lord After some resistance the kingdom of Thessalonica was united to the empire of Nice, and Vataces reigned without a competitor from the Turkish borders to the Adriatic gulf The princes of Europe revered his merit and power, and had he subscribed an orthodox creed, it should seem that the pope would have abandoned without reluctance the Latin throne of Constantinople But the death of Vataces the short and busy reign of Theodore his son and the helpless infancy of his grandson John suspended the restoration of the Greeks In the next chapter I shall explain their domestic revolutions, in this place it will be sufficient to observe that the young prince was oppressed by the ambition of his guardian and colleague Michael Palæologus who displayed the virtues and vices that belong to the founder of a new dynasty The emperor Baldwin had flattered himself that he might recover some provinces or cities by an impotent negociation His ambassadors were dismissed from Nice with mockery and contempt. At every place which they named Palæologus alleged some special reason which rendered it dear and valuable in his eyes in the one he was born in another he had been first promoted to military command and in a third he had enjoyed, and hoped long to enjoy the pleasures of the chase And what then do you propose to give us? ' said the astonished deputies Nothing ' replied the Greek not a foot of land If your master be desirous of peace let him pay me as an annual tribute the sum which he receives from the trade and customs of Constantinople On these terms I may allow him to reign If he refuses it is war I am not ignorant of the art of war, and I trust the event to God and my sword [56] An expedition against the despot of Epirus was the first prelude of his arms If a victory was followed by a defeat if the race of the Comneni or Angeli survived in those mountains his efforts and his reign the captivity of Villehardouin prince of Achaia deprived the Latins of the most active and powerful vassal of their expiring monarchy The republics of Venice and Genoa disputed in the first of their naval wars, the command of the sea and the commerce of the East. Pride and interest attached the Venetians to the defence of Constantinople their rivals were tempted to promote the designs of her enemies and the alliance of the Genoese with the schismatic conqueror provoked the indignation of the Latin church [57]

Intent on his great object, the emperor Michael visited in person and strengthened the troops and fortifications of Thrace The remains of the Latins were driven from their last possessions he assaulted without success the suburb of Galata and corresponded with a perfidious baron, who proved unwilling, or unable, to open the gates of the metropolis The next spring his favourite general Alexius Strategopulus whom he had decorated with the title of Cæsar, passed the Hellespont with eight hundred horse and some infantry[58] on a secret expedition His instructions enjoined him to approach to listen to watch but not to risk any doubtful or dangerous enterprise against the city The adjacent territory between the Propontis and the Black Sea was cultivated by a hardy race of peasants and outlaws exercised in arms uncertain in their allegiance but inclined by language religion and present advantage to the party of the Greeks. They were styled the volunteers [59] and by their free service the army of Alexius with the regulars of Thrace and the Coman auxiliaries [60] was augmented to the number of five and twenty thousand men. By the ardour of the volunteers and by his own ambition the Cæsar was stimulated to disobey the precise orders of his master in the just confidence that success would plead his pardon and reward The weakness of Constantinople and the distress and terror of the Latins were familiar to the observation of the volunteers and they represented the present moment as the most propitious to surprise and conquest. A rash youth the new governor of the Venetian colony had sailed away with thirty galleys and the best of the French knights on a wild expedition to Daphnusia a town on the Black Sea at the distance of forty leagues and the remaining Latins were without strength or suspicion They were informed that Alexius had passed the Hellespont but their apprehensions were lulled by the smallness of his original numbers and their imprudence had not watched the subsequent increase of his army If he left his main body to second and support his operations he might advance unperceived in the night with a chosen detachment. While some applied scaling ladders to the lowest part of the walls they were secure of an old Greek who would introduce their companions through a subterraneous passage into his house they could soon on the inside break an entrance through the golden gate, which had been long obstructed and the conqueror would be in the heart of the city before the Latins were conscious of their danger. After some debate, the Cæsar resigned himself to the faith of the volunteers they were trusty bold, and successful and in describing the plan I have already related the execution and success.[61] But no sooner had Alexius passed the threshold of the golden gate than he trembled at his own rashness he paused he deliberated till the desperate volunteers urged him forwards by the assurance that in retreat lay the greatest and most inevitable danger. Whilst the Cæsar kept his regulars in firm array the Comans dispersed themselves on all sides an alarm was sounded and the threats of fire and pillage compelled the citizens to a decisive resolution. The Greeks of Constantinople remembered their native sovereigns the Genoese merchants their recent alliance and Venetian foes every quarter was in arms and the air resounded with a general acclamation of Long life and victory to Michael and John, the august emperors of the Romans! Their rival Baldwin was awakened by the sound but the most pressing danger could not prompt him to draw his sword in the defence of a city which he deserted perhaps with more pleasure than regret he fled from the palace to the seashore where he descried the welcome sails of the fleet returning from the vain and fruitless attempt on Daphnusia. Constantinople was irrecoverably lost but the Latin emperor and the principal families embarked on board the Venetian galleys and steered for the isle of Eubœa, and afterwards for Italy where the royal fugitive was entertained by the pope and Sicilian king with a mixture of contempt and pity From the loss of Constantinople to his death he consumed thirteen years soliciting the Catholic powers to join in his restoration the lesson had been familiar to his youth nor was his last exile more indigent or shameful than his three former pilgrimages to the courts of Europe His son Philip was the heir of an ideal empire and the pretensions of his dau hter Catherine were transported by her marriage to Charles of Valois, the brother of Philip the Fa[illegible] of France. The house of Courtenay was represented in the female line by successive alliances, till the title of emperor of Constantinople too bulky and sonorous for a private name modesty expired in silence and oblivion.[62]

After this narrative of the expeditions of the Latins to Palestine and Constantinople I cannot dismiss the subject without revolving the general consequences on the countries that were the scene and on the nations that were the actors, of these memorable crusades.[63] As soon as the arms of the Franks were withdrawn the impression though not the memory, was erased in the Mohammedan realms of Egypt and Syria. The faithful disciples of the prophet were never tempted by a profane desire to study the laws and languages of the idolaters nor did the simplicity of their primitive manners receive the slightest alteration from their intercourse in peace and war with the unknown strangers of the West. The Greeks, who thought themselves proud but who were only vain showed a disposition somewhat less inflexible In the efforts for the recovery of their empire they emulated the valour discipline and tactics of their antagonists. The modern literature of the West they might justly despise but its free spirit would instruct them in the rights of man and some institutions of public and private life were adopted from the French. The correspondence of Constantinople and Italy diffused the knowledge of the Latin tongue and several of the fathers and classics were at length honoured with a Greek version.[64] But the national and religious prejudices of the Orientals were inflamed by persecution and the reign of the Latins confirmed the separation of the two churches.

If we compare the era of the crusades, the Latins of Europe with the Greeks and Arabians, their respective degrees of knowledge, industry and art, our rude ancestors must be content with the third rank in the scale of nations. Their successive improvement and present superiority may be ascribed to a peculiar energy of character to an active and imitative spirit, unknown to their more polished rivals, who at that time were in a stationary or retrograde state. With such a disposition the Latins should have derived the most early and essential benefits from a series of events which opened to their eyes the prospect of the world and introduced them to a long and frequent intercourse with the more cultivated regions of the East. The first and most obvious progress was in trade and manufactures, in the arts which are strongly prompted by the thirst of wealth, the calls of necessity and the gratification of the sense or vanity Among the crowd of unthinking fanatics a captive or a pilgrim might sometimes observe the superior refinements of Cairo and Constantinople the first importer of windmills[65] was the benefactor of nations and if such blessings are enjoyed without any grateful remembrance history has condescended to notice the more apparent luxuries of silk and sugar which were transported into Italy from Greece and Egypt But the intellectual wants of the Latins were more slowly felt and supplied the ardour of studious curiosity was awakened in Europe by different causes and more recent events, and, in the age of the crusaders they viewed with careless indifference the literature of the Greeks and Arabians Some rudiments of mathematical and medicinal knowledge might be imparted in practice and in figures necessity might produce some interpreters for the grosser business of merchants and soldiers, but the commerce of the Orientals had not diffused the study and knowledge of their languages in the schools of Europe [66] If a similar principle of religion repulsed the idiom of the Koran, it should have excited their patience and curiosity to understand the original text of the Gospel and the same grammar would have unfolded the sense of Plato and the beauties of Homer Yet, in a reign of sixty years, the Latins of Constantinople disdained the speech and learning of their subjects and the manuscripts were the only treasures which the natives might enjoy without rapine or envy Aristotle was indeed the oracle of the Western universities but it was a barbarous Aristotle and instead of ascending to the fountain head his Latin votaries humbly accepted a corrupt and remote version from the Jews and Moors of Andalusia The principle of the crusades was a savage fanaticism and the most important effects were analogous to the cause Each pilgrim was ambitious to return with his sacred spoils the relics of Greece and Palestine [67] and each relic was preceded and followed by a train of miracles and visions The belief of the Catholics was corrupted by new legends, their practice by new superstitions, and the establishment of the inquisition the mendicant orders of monks and friars the last abuse of indulgences and the final progress of idolatry, flowed from the baleful fountain of the holy war The active spirit of the Latins preyed on the vitals of their reason and religion and if the ninth and tenth centuries were the times of darkness, the thirteenth and fourteenth were the age of absurdity and fable.

In the profession of Christianity, in the cultivation of a fertile land the northern conquerors of the Roman empire insensibly mingled with the provincials and rekindled the embers of the arts of antiquity Their settlements about the age of Charlemagne had acquired some degree of order and stability, when they were overwhelmed by new swarms of invaders, the Normans Saracens [68] and Hungarians, who re-plunged the western countries of Europe into their former state of anarchy and barbarism. About the eleventh century the second tempest had subsided by the expulsion or conversion of the enemies of Christendom the tide of civilisation which had so long ebbed began to flow with a steady and accelerated course and a fairer prospect was opened to the hopes and efforts of the rising generations Great was the increase and rapid the progress during the two hundred years of the crusades and some philosophers have applauded the propitious influence of these holy wars which appear to me to have checked rather than forwarded the maturity of Europe [69] The lives and labours of millions which were buried in the East would have been more profitably employed in the improvement of their native country the accumulated stock of industry and wealth would have overflowed in navigation and trade and the Latins would have been enriched and enlightened by a pure and friendly correspondence with the climates of the East In one respect I can indeed perceive the accidental operation of the crusades, not so much in producing a benefit as in removing an evil The larger portion of the inhabitants of Europe was chained to the soil without freedom or property or knowledge and the two orders of ecclesiastics and nobles whose *numbers were comparatively small alone de*served the name of citizens and men This oppressive system was supported by the arts of the clergy and the swords of the barons The authority of the priests operated in the darker ages as a salutary antidote they prevented the total extinction of letters mitigated the fierceness of the times sheltered the poor and defenceless and preserved or revived the peace and order of civil society But the independence rapine and discord of the feudal lords were unmixed with any semblance of good and every hope of industry and improvement was crushed by the iron weight of the martial aristocracy Among the causes that undermined that Gothic edifice a conspicuous place must be allowed to the crusades The estates of the barons were dissipated and their race was often extinguished

Digression on the Family of Courtenay

The purple of three emperors who have reigned at Constantinople will authorise or excuse a digression on the origin and singular fortunes of the house of Courtenay [70] in the three principal branches, I Of Edessa II Of France and III Of England of which the last only has survived the revolutions of eight hundred years.

I Before the introduction of trade, which scatters riches, and of knowledge, which dispels prejudice, the prerogative of birth is most strongly felt and most humbly acknowledged. amples of genius or virtue must be rare in the annals of the oldest families, and in a remote age, their pride will embrace a deed of rapine and violence, such, however as could not be perpetrated without some superiority of cour age, or, at least, of power A descendant of Reginald of Courtenay may blush for the public robber who stripped and imprisoned several merchants after they had satisfied the king s duties at Sens and Orleans He will glory in the offence, since the bold offender could not be compelled to obedience and restitution till the regent and the count of Champagne prepared to march against him at the head of an army [74] Reginald bestowed his estates on his eldest daughter, and his daughter on the seventh son of king Louis the Fat, and their marriage was crowned with a numerous offspring We might expect that a private should have merged in a royal name, and that the descendants of Peter of France and Elizabeth of Courtenay would have enjoyed the title and honours of princes of the blood But this legitimate claim was long neglected, and finally denied, and the causes of their disgrace will represent the story of this second branch 1 Of all the families now ex tant the most ancient, doubtless, and the most illustrious is the house of France which has occupied the same throne above eight hundred years and descends in a clear and lineal series of males, from the middle of the ninth cen tury [75] In the age of the crusades it was already revered both in the East and West But from Hugh Capet to the marriage of Peter no more than five reigns or generations had elapsed and so precarious was their title that the eldest sons as a necessary precaution were previously crowned during the lifetime of their fathers The peers of France have long maintained their precedency before the younger branches of the royal line nor had the princes of the blood in the twelfth century acquired that hereditary lustre which is now diffused over the most re mote candidates for the succession 2 The barons of Courtenay must have stood high in their own estimation and in that of the world since they could impose on the son of a king the obligation of adopting for himself and all his descendants the name and arms of their daugh ter and his wife In the marriage of an heiress with her inferior or her equal such exchange was often required and allowed but as they continued to diverge from the regal stem the sons of Louis the Fat were insensibly confound ed with their maternal ancestors and the new Courtenays might deserve to forfeit the honours of their birth which a motive of interest had tempted them to renounce 3 The shame was far more permanent than the reward and a momentary blaze was followed by a long dark ness The eldest son of these nuptials Peter of Courtenay, had married as I have already mentioned the sister of the counts of Flanders, the two first emperors of Constantinople he rashly accepted the invitation of the barons of Romania his two sons Robert and Baldwin successively held and lost the remains of the Latin empire in the East, and the grand-daugh ter of Baldwin the Second again mingled her blood with the blood of France and of Valois. To support the expenses of a troubled and transitory reign their patrimonial estates were mortgaged or sold and the last emperors of Constantinople depended on the annual charity of Rome and Naples

While the elder brothers dissipated their wealth in romantic adventures and the castle of Courtenay was profaned by a plebeian own er the younger branches of that adopted name were propagated and multiplied But their splendour was clouded by poverty and time after the decease of Robert great butler of France they descended from princes to barons, the next generations were confounded with the simple gentry the descendants of Hugh Capet could no longer be visible in the rural lords of Tanlay and of Champignelles. The more ad venturous embraced without dishonour the profession of a soldier the least active and opu lent might sink like their cousins of the branch of Dreux into the condition of peasants. Their royal descent in a dark period of four hundred years became each day more obsolete and am biguous and their pedigree instead of being enrolled in the annals of the kingdom must be painfully searched by the minute diligence of heralds and genealogists It was not till the end of the sixteenth century on the accession of a family almost as remote as their own that the princely spirit of the Courtenays again revived and the question of the nobility provoked them to assert the royalty of their blood They ap pealed to the justice and compassion of Henry the Fourth obtained a favourable opinion from twenty lawyers of Italy and Germany and mod estly compared themselves to the descendants of king David whose prerogatives were not im paired by the lapse of ages or the trade of a car penter [6] But every ear was deaf and every cir cumstance was adverse to their lawful claims. The Bourbon kings were justified by the neglect of the Valois the princes of the blood more re cent and lofty disdained the alliance of this humble kindred the parliament, without de ciding their proofs, eluded a dangerous prece dent by an arbitrary distinction, and establish ed St. Louis as the first father of the royal line.[77] A repetition of complaints and protests was re peatedly disregarded and the hopeless pursuit was terminated in the present century by the death of the last male of the family[78] Their painful and anxious situation was alleviated by the pride of conscious virtue they sternly re jected th temptations of fortune and favour and a dying Courtenay would have sacrificed his son if the youth could have renounced for any temporal interest, the right and title of a legitimate prince of the blood of France.[79]

III. According to the old register of Ford Abbey the Courtenays of Devonshire are de scended from prince Florus the second son of Peter and the grandson of Louis the Fat.[80] This fable of the grateful or venal monks was too re spectfully entertained by our antiquaries, Cam den[81] and Dugdale[82] but it is so clearly repug nant to truth and time, that the rational pride of the family now refuses to accept this imagi nary founder Their most faithful historians be lieve that, after giving his daughter to the king's son, Reginald of Courtenay abandoned his pos sessions in France, and obtained from the Eng lish monarch a second wife and a new inher itance. It is certain, at least, that Henry the Sec ond distinguished in his camps and councils a Reginald of the name and arms, and as it may be fairly presumed of the genuine race, of the Courtenays of France. The right of wardship enabled a feudal lord to reward his vassal with the marriage and estate of a noble heiress and Reginald of Courtenay acquired a fair es tablishment in Devonshire, where his posterity has been seated above six hundred years[83] From a Norman baron Baldwin de Brionnis, who had been invested by the Conqueror Ha wise, the wife of Reginald derived the honour of Okehampton which was held by the service of ninety three knights and a female might claim the manly offices of hereditary viscount or sheriff and of captain of the royal castle of Exeter Their son Robert married the sister of the earl of Devon at the end of a century on the failure of the family of Rivers,[84] his great grandson, Hugh the Second succeeded to a title which was still considered as a territorial dignity and twelve earls of Devonshire of the name of Courtenay have flourished in a period of two hundred and twenty years. They were ranked among the chief of the barons of the realm nor was it till after a strenuous dispute that they yielded to the fief of Arundel the first place in the parliament of England their alli ances were contracted with the noblest families, the Veres, Despensers, St. Johns, Talbots Bo huns, and even the Plantagenets themselves and in a contest with John of Lancaster a Courtenay bishop of London and afterwards archbishop of Canterbury might be accused of profane confidence in the strength and number of his kindred. In peace the earls of Devon re sided in their numerous castles and manors of the west their ample revenue was appropriated to devotion and hospitality and the epitaph of Edward surnamed from his misfortune, the blind from his virtues, the good earl inculcates with much ingenuity a moral sentence, which may however be abused by thoughtless gener osity After a grateful commemoration of the fifty five years of union and happiness which he enjoyed with Mabel his wife the good earl thus speaks from the tomb —

What we gave we have
What we spent, we had
What we left we lost.[85]

But their losses in this sense were far superior to their gifts and expenses and their heirs, not less than the poor were the objects of their pa ternal care The sums which they paid for livery and seisin attest the greatness of their posses sions and several estates have remained in their family since the thirteenth and fourteenth cen turies. In war the Courtenays of England ful filled the duties, and deserved the honours of chivalry They were often intrusted to levy and command the militia of Devonshire and Corn wall they often attended their supreme lord to the borders of Scotland and in foreign service for a stipulated price, they sometimes maintain ed fourscore men at arms and as many archers. By sea and land they fought under the standard of the Edwards and Henries their names are conspicuous in battles, in tournaments and in the original list of the Order of the Garter three brothers shared the Spanish victory of the Black Prince and in the lapse of six generations the English Courtenays had learned to despise the nation and country from which they derived their origin In the quarrel of the two Roses the earls of Devon adhered to the house of Lancas ter and three brothers successively died either in the field or on the scaffold Their honours and estates were restored by Henry the Seventh a daughter of Edward the Fourth was not dis graced by the nuptials of a Courtenay their son who was created marquis of Exeter en amples of genius or virtue must be rare in the annals of the oldest families and in a remote age their pride will embrace a deed of rapine and violence, such, however as could not be perpetrated without some superiority of courage or, at least, of power A descendant of Reginald of Courtenay may blush for the public robber who stripped and imprisoned several merchants after they had satisfied the king s duties at Sens and Orleans He will glory in the offence, since the bold offender could not be compelled to obedience and restitution till the regent and the count of Champagne prepared to march against him at the head of an army [74] Reginald bestowed his estates on his eldest daughter, and his daughter on the seventh son of king Louis the Fat, and their marriage was crowned with a numerous offspring We might expect that a private should have merged in a royal name and that the descendants of Peter of France and Elizabeth of Courtenay would have enjoyed the title and honours of princes of the blood But this legitimate claim was long neglected, and finally denied and the causes of their disgrace will represent the story of this second branch 1 Of all the families now extant the most ancient, doubtless and the most illustrious is the house of France which has occupied the same throne above eight hundred years and descends, in a clear and lineal series of males, from the middle of the ninth century [75] In the age of the crusades it was already revered both in the East and West But from Hugh Capet to the marriage of Peter no more than five reigns or generations had elapsed and so precarious was their title that the eldest sons as a necessary precaution were previously crowned during the lifetime of their fathers The peers of France have long maintained their precedency before the younger branches of the royal line nor had the princes of the blood in the twelfth century acquired that hereditary lustre which is now diffused over the most remote candidates for the succession 2 The barons of Courtenay must have stood high in their own estimation and in that of the world since they could impose on the son of a king the obligation of adopting for himself and all his descendants the name and arms of their daughter and his wife In the marriage of an heiress with her inferior or her equal, such exchange was often required and allowed but as they continued to diverge from the regal stem the sons of Louis the Fat were insensibly confounded with their maternal ancestors and the new Courtenays might deserve to forfeit the honours of their birth which a motive of interest had tempted them to renounce 3 The shame was far more permanent than the reward and a momentary blaze was followed by a long darkness The eldest son of these nuptials Peter of Courtenay, had married, as I have already mentioned, the sister of the counts of Flanders, the two first emperors of Constantinople he rashly accepted the invitation of the barons of Romania his two sons Robert and Baldwin successively held and lost the remains of the Latin empire in the East and the grand-daughter of Baldwin the Second again mingled her blood with the blood of France and of Valois. To support the expenses of a troubled and transitory reign their patrimonial estates were mortgaged or sold and the last emperors of Constantinople depended on the annual charity of Rome and Naples

While the elder brothers dissipated their wealth in romantic adventures and the castle of Courtenay was profaned by a plebeian owner the younger branches of that adopted name were propagated and multiplied But their splendour was clouded by poverty and time after the decease of Robert, great butler of France they descended from princes to barons the next generations were confounded with the simple gentry the descendants of Hugh Capet could no longer be visible in the rural lords of Tanlay and of Champignelles. The more adventurous embraced without dishonour the profession of a soldier the least active and opulent might sink like their cousins of the branch of Dreux into the condition of peasants Their royal descent in a dark period of four hundred years became each day more obsolete and ambiguous and their pedigree instead of being enrolled in the annals of the kingdom must be painfully searched by the minute diligence of heralds and genealogists It was not till the end of the sixteenth century on the accession of a family almost as remote as their own that the princely spirit of the Courtenays again revived, and the question of the nobility provoked them to assert the royalty of their blood They appealed to the justice and compassion of Henry the Fourth obtained a favourable opinion from twenty lawyers of Italy and Germany and modestly compared themselves to the descendants of king David whose prerogatives were not impaired by the lapse of ages or the trade of a carpenter [76] But every ear was deaf and every circumstance was adverse, to their lawful claims. The Bourbon kings were justified by the neglect of the Valois the princes of the blood, more re cent and lofty disdained the alliance of this humble kindred the parliament, without de nying their proofs eluded a dangerous precedent by an arbitrary distinction and establish ed St. Louis as the first father of the royal line.[77] A repetition of complaints and protests was re peatedly disregarded and the hopeless pursuit was terminated in the present century by the death of the last male of the family [78] Their painful and anxious situation was alleviated by the pride of conscious virtue they sternly re jected the temptations of fortune and favour and a dying Courtenay would have sacrificed his son if the youth could have renounced, for any temporal interest, the right and title of a legitimate prince of the blood of France.[79]

joyed the favour of his cousin Henry the Eighth and in the camp of Cloth of Gold he broke a lance against the French monarch But the favour of Henry was the prelude of disgrace his disgrace was the signal of death and of the victims of the jealous tyrant the marquis of Exeter is one of the most noble and guiltless His son Edward lived a prisoner in the Tower and died in exile at Padua and the secret love of queen Mary, whom he slighted, perhaps for the princess Elizabeth, has shed a romantic colour on the story of this beautiful youth The relics of his patrimony were conveyed into strange families by the marriages of his four aunts and his personal honours as if they had been legally extinct were revived by the patents of succeeding princes But there still survived a lineal descendant of Hugh the first earl of Devon, a younger branch of the Courtenays who have been seated at Powderham Castle above four hundred years from the reign of Edward the Third to the present hour Their estates have been increased by the grant and improvement of lands in Ireland, and they have been recently restored to the honours of the peerage Yet the Courtenays still retain the plaintive motto which asserts the innocence and deplores the fall of their ancient house [86] While they sigh for past greatness, they are doubtless sensible of present blessings in the long series of the Courtenay annals the most splendid era is likewise the most unfortunate, nor can an opulent peer of Britain be inclined to envy the emperors of Constantinople who wandered over Europe to solicit alms for the support of their dignity and the defence of their capital

CHAPTER LXII

The Greek Emperors of Nice and Constantinople Elevation and Reign of Michael Palæologus His false Union with the Pope and the Latin Church Hostile Designs of Charles of Anjou Revolt of Sicily War of the Catalans in Asia and Greece Revolutions and Present State of Athens

THE loss of Constantinople restored a momentary vigour to the Greeks From their palaces the princes and nobles were driven into the field and the fragments of the falling monarchy were grasped by the hands of the most vigorous or the most skilful candidates In the long and barren pages of the Byzantine annals[1] it would not be an easy task to equal the two characters of Theodore Lascaris and John Ducas Vataces,[2] who replanted and upheld the Roman standard at Nice in Bithynia The difference of their virtues was happily suited to the diversity of their situation In his first efforts the fugitive Lascaris commanded only three cities and two thousand soldiers his reign was the season of generous and active despair in every military operation he staked his life and crown, and his enemies of the Hellespont and the Mæander were surprised by his celerity and subdued by his bold ness A victorious reign of eighteen years expanded the principality of Nice to the magnitude of an empire The throne of his successor and son in law Vataces was founded on a more solid basis a larger scope and more plentiful resources, and it was the temper, as well as the interest, of Vataces to calculate the risk to expect the moment and to insure the success, of his ambitious designs. In the decline of the Latins I have briefly exposed the progress of the Greeks the prudent and gradual advances of a conqueror who in a reign of thirty three years, rescued the provinces from national and foreign usurpers till he pressed on all sides the Imperial city a leafless and sapless trunk which must fall at the first stroke of the axe But his interior and peaceful administration is still more deserving of notice and praise [3] The calamities of the times had wasted the numbers and the substance of the Greeks the motives and the means of agriculture were extirpated and the most fertile lands were left without cultivation or inhabitants. A portion of this vacant property was occupied and improved by the command and for the benefit of the emperor a powerful hand and a vigilant eye supplied and surpassed by a skilful management the minute diligence of a private farmer the royal domain became the garden and granary of Asia and without impoverishing the people the sovereign acquired a fund of innocent and productive wealth According to the nature of the soil his lands were sown with corn or planted with vines the pastures were filled with horses and oxen, with sheep and hogs and when Vataces presented to the empress a crown of diamonds and pearls he informed her with a smile, that this precious ornament arose from the sale of the eggs of his innumerable poultry The produce of his domain was applied to the maintenance of his palace and hospitals, the calls of dignity and benevolence the lesson was still more useful than the revenue the plough was restored to its ancient security and honour and the nobles were taught to seek a sure and independent revenue from their estates, instead of adorning their splendid beggary by the oppression of the people or (what is almost the same) by the favours of the court. The superfluous stock of corn and cattle was eagerly purchased by the Turks, with whom Vataces preserved a strict and sincere alliance but he discouraged the importation of foreign manufactures, the costly silks of the East and the curious labours of the Italian looms. The demands of nature and necessity was he accustomed to say are indispensable but the influence of fashion may rise and sink at the breath of a monarch and both his precept and example recommended simplicity of manners and the use of domestic industry The education of youth and the revival of learning were the most serious objects of his care and without deciding the precedency he pronounced with truth that a prince and a philosopher[4] are the two most eminent characters of human society His first wife was Irene, the daughter of Theodore Lascaris a woman more illustrious by her personal merit, the milder virtues of her sex, than by the blood of the Angeli and Comneni that flowed in her veins, and transmitted the inheritance of the empire After her death he was contracted to Anne or Constance a natural daughter of the emperor Frederic the Second but as the bride had not attained the years of puberty Vataces placed in his solitary bed an Italian damsel of her train and his amorous weakness bestowed on the concubine the honours, though not the title, of lawful empress. His frailty was censured as a flagitious and damnable sin by the monks and their rude invectives exercised and displayed the patience of the royal lover A philosophic age may excuse a single vice, which was redeemed by a crowd of virtues and in the review of his faults, and the more intemperate passions of Lascaris, the judgment of their contemporaries was softened by gratitude to the second founders of the empire.[6] The slaves of the Latins, without law or peace, applauded the happiness of their brethren who had resumed their national freedom, and Vataces employed the laudable policy of convincing the Greeks of every dominion that it was their interest to be enrolled in the number of his subjects.

A strong shade of degeneracy is visible between John Vataces and his son Theodore between the founder who sustained the weight, and the heir who enjoyed the splendour of the Imperial crown[6] Yet the character of Theodore was not devoid of energy he had been educated in the school of his father in the exercise of war and hunting Constantinople was yet spared but in the three years of a short reign he thrice led his armies into the heart of Bulgaria. His virtues were sullied by a choleric and suspicious temper the first of these may be ascribed to the ignorance of control and the second might naturally arise from a dark and imperfect view of the corruption of mankind. On a march in Bulgaria he consulted on a question of policy his principal ministers and the Greek logothete, George Acropolita presumed to offend him by the declaration of a free and honest opinion The emperor half unsheathed his scimitar but his more deliberate rage reserved Acropolita for a baser punishment. One of the first officers of the empire was ordered to dismount stripped of his robes, and extended on the ground in the presence of the prince and army In this posture he was chastised with so many and such heavy blows from the clubs of two guards or executioners, that when Theodore commanded them to cease the great logothete was scarcely able to arise and crawl away to his tent. After a seclusion of some days he was recalled by a peremptory mandate to his seat in council and so dead were the Greeks to the sense of honour and shame that it is from the narrative of the sufferer himself that we acquire the knowledge of his disgrace[7] The cruelty of the emperor was exasperated by the pangs of sickness the approach of a premature end, and the suspicion of poison and magic. The lives and fortunes, the eyes and limbs, of his kinsmen and nobles, were sacrificed to each sally of passion and before he died the son of Vataces might deserve from the people or at least from the court, the appellation of tyrant. A matron of the family of the Palaeologi had provoked his anger by refusing to bestow her beauteous daughter on the vile plebeian who was recommended by his caprice Without regard to her birth or age her body as high as the neck was enclosed in a sack with several cats, who were pricked with pins to irritate their fury against their unfortunate fellow-captive.

In his last hours the emperor testified a wish to forgive and be forgiven, a just anxiety for the fate of John his son and successor, who at the age of eight years, was condemned to the dangers of a long minority His last choice instructed the office of guardian to the sanctity of the patriarch Arsenius and to the courage of George Muzalon, the great domestic, who was equally distinguished by the royal favour and the public hatred Since their connection with the Latins, the names and privileges of hereditary rank had insinuated themselves into the Greek monarchy and the noble families[8] were provoked by the elevation of a worthless favourite to whose influence they imputed the errors and calamities of the late reign In the first council after the emperor's death Muzalon from a lofty throne, pronounced a laboured apology of his conduct and intentions his modesty was subdued by a unanimous assurance of esteem and fidelity and his most inveterate enemies were the loudest to salute him as the guardian and saviour of the Romans Eight days were sufficient to prepare the execution of the conspiracy On the ninth the obsequies of the deceased monarch were solemnised in the cathedral of Magnesia[9] an Asiatic city, where he expired, on the banks of the Hermus and at the foot of Mount Sipylus The holy rites were interrupted by a sedition of the guards, Muzalon his brothers and his adherents were massacred at the foot of the altar and the absent patriarch was associated with a new colleague with Michael Palæologus the most illustrious, in birth and merit of the Greek nobles[10]

Of those who are proud of their ancestors the far greater part must be content with local or domestic renown and few there are who dare trust the memorials of their family to the public annals of their country As early as the middle of the eleventh century the noble race of the Palæologi[11] stands high and conspicuous in the Byzantine history it was the valiant George Palæologus who placed the father of the Comneni on the throne and his kinsmen or descendants continue in each generation to lead the armies and councils of the state The purple was not dishonoured by their alliance and had the law of succession and female succession been strictly observed, the wife of Theodore Lascaris must have yielded to her elder sister the mother of Michael Palæologus who afterwards raised his family to the throne In his person the splendour of birth was dignified by the merit of the soldier and statesman in his early youth he was promoted to the office of constable or commander of the French mercenaries the private expense of a day never exceeded three pieces of gold, but his ambition was rapacious and profuse, and his gifts were doubled by the graces of his conversation and manners The love of the soldiers and people excited the jealousy of the court, and Michael thrice escaped from the dangers in which he was involved by his own imprudence or that of his friends I Under the reign of Justice and Vataces a dispute arose[12] between two officers, one of whom accused the other of maintaining the hereditary right of the Palæologi The cause was decided according to the new jurisprudence of the Latins by single combat, the defendant was overthrown but he persisted in declaring that himself alone was guilty, and that he had uttered these rash or treasonable speeches without the approbation or knowledge of his patron Yet a cloud of suspicion hung over the innocence of the constable he was still pursued by the whispers of malevolence and a subtle courtier, the archbishop of Philadelphia urged him to accept the judgment of God in the fiery proof of the ordeal[13] Three days before the trial the patient's arm was enclosed in a bag, and secured by the royal signet and it was incumbent on him to bear a red hot ball of iron three times from the altar to the rails of the sanctuary without artifice and without injury Palæologus eluded the dangerous experiment with sense and pleasantry 'I am a soldier said he, and will boldly enter the lists with my accusers but a layman a sinner like myself, is not endowed with the gift of miracles. Your piety, most holy prelate may deserve the interposition of Heaven, and from your hands I will receive the fiery globe the pledge of my innocence The archbishop started the emperor smiled and the absolution or pardon of Michael was approved by new rewards and new services. II In the succeeding reign as he held the government of Nice he was secretly informed that the mind of the absent prince was poisoned with jealousy and that death or blindness would be his final reward Instead of awaiting the return and sentence of Theodore the constable with some followers escaped from the city and the empire and though he was plundered by the Turkmans of the desert he found an hospitable refuge in the court of the sultan In the ambiguous state of an exile Michael reconciled the duties of gratitude and loyalty drawing his sword against the Tartars admonishing the garrisons of the Roman limit and promoting, by his influence the restoration of peace, in which his pardon and recall were honourably included [11] While he guarded the West against the despot of Epirus Michael was again suspected and condemned in the palace and such was his loyalty or weakness, that he submitted to be led in chains above six hundred miles from Durazzo to Nice The civility of the messenger alleviated his disgrace the emperor s sickness dispelled his danger and the last breath of Theodore, which recommended his infant son, at once acknowledged the innocence and the power of Palæologus

But his innocence had been too unworthily treated and his power was too strongly felt to curb an aspiring subject in the fair field that was opened to his ambition [14] In the council after the death of Theodore, he was the first to pronounce, and the first to violate the oath of allegiance to Muzalon and so dexterous was his conduct that he reaped the benefit, without incurring the guilt or at least the reproach of the subsequent massacre. In the choice of a regent he balanced the interests and passions of the candidates, turned their envy and hatred from himself against each other and forced every competitor to own that, after his own claims, those of Palæologus were best entitled to the preference Under the title of great duke, he accepted or assumed during a long minority the active powers of government the patriarch was a venerable name and the factious nobles were seduced or oppressed by the ascendant of his genius. The fruits of the economy of Vataces were deposited in a strong castle on the banks of the Hermus, in the custody of the faithful Varangians the constable retained his command or influence over the foreign troops he employed the guards to possess the treasure, and the treasure to corrupt the guards and whatsoever might be the abuse of the public money his character was above the suspicion of private avarice. By himself or by his emissaries, he strove to persuade every rank of subjects that their own prosperity would rise in just proportion to the establishment of his authority The weight of taxes was suspended the perpetual theme of popular complaint and he prohibited the trials by the ordeal and judicial combat. These barbaric institutions were already abolished or undermined in France [15] and England [16] and the appeal to the sword offended the sense of a civilised [17] and the temper of an unwarlike, people For the future maintenance of their wives and children the veterans were grateful the priest and the philosopher applauded his ardent zeal for the advancement of religion and learning and his vague promise of rewarding merit was applied by every candidate to his own hopes Conscious of the influence of the clergy Michael successfully laboured to secure the suffrage of that powerful order Their expensive journey from Nice to Magnesia afforded a decent and ample pretence the leading prelates were tempted by the liberality of his nocturnal visits and the incorruptible patriarch was flattered by the homage of his new colleague who led his mule by the bridle into the town and removed to a respectful distance the importunity of the crowd Without renouncing his title by royal descent, Palæologus encouraged a free discussion into the advantages of elective monarchy and his adherents asked with the insolence of triumph what patient would trust his health or what merchant would abandon his vessel to the hereditary skill of a physician or a pilot? The youth of the emperor and the impending dangers of a minority required the support of a mature and experienced guardian of an associate raised above the envy of his equals, and invested with the name and prerogatives of royalty For the interest of the prince and people without any selfish views for himself or his family the great duke consented to guard and instruct the son of Theodore but he sighed for the happy moment when he might restore to his firmer hands the administration of his patrimony and enjoy the blessings of a private station. He was first invested with the title and prerogatives of despot which bestowed the purple ornaments and the second place in the Roman monarchy It was afterwards agreed that John and Michael should be proclaimed as joint emperors, and raised on the buckler but that the pre-eminence should be reserved for the birth right of the former A mutual league of amity was pledged between the royal partners and in case of a rupture the subjects were bound by their oath of allegiance, to declare themselves against the aggressor an ambiguous name the seed of discord and civil war Palæologus was content but on the day of the coronation and in the cathedral of Nice his zealous adherents most vehemently urged the just priority of his age and merit. The unseasonable dispute was eluded by postponing to a more convenient opportunity the coronation of John Lascaris and he walked with a slight diadem in the train of his guardian who alone received the Imperial crown from the hands of the patriarch. It was not without extreme reluctance that Arsenius abandoned the cause of his pupil but the Va

rangians brandished their battle axes, a sign of assent was extorted from the trembling youth, and some voices were heard that the life of a child should no longer impede the settlement of the nation A full harvest of honours and employments was distributed among his friends by the grateful Palæologus In his own family he created a despot and two sebastocrators Alexius Strategopulus was decorated with the title of Cæsar and that veteran commander soon repaid the obligation by restoring Constantinople to the Greek emperor

It was in the second year of his reign while he resided in the palace and gardens of Nymphæum,[18] near Smyrna that the first messenger arrived at the dead of night and the stupendous intelligence was imparted to Michael after he had been gently waked by the tender precaution of his sister Eulogia The man was unknown or obscure he produced no letters from the victorious Cæsar nor could it easily be credited after the defeat of Vataces and the recent failure of Palæologus himself that the capital had been surprised by a detachment of eight hundred soldiers As a hostage the doubtful author was confined with the assurance of death or an ample recompense and the court was left some hours in the anxiety of hope and fear till the messengers of Alexius arrived with the authentic intelligence and displayed the trophies of the conquest the sword and sceptre [19] the buskins and bonnet [20] of the usurper Baldwin which he had dropped in his precipitate flight. A general assembly of the bishops senators and nobles was immediately convened and never perhaps was an event received with more heartfelt and universal joy In a studied oration the new sovereign of Constantinople congratulated his own and the public fortune 'There was a time,' said he, 'a far distant time when the Roman empire extended to the Adriatic the Tigris and the confines of Æthiopia After the loss of the provinces our capital itself in these last and calamitous days has been wrested from our hands by the barbarians of the West From the lowest ebb the tide of prosperity has again returned in our favour, but our prosperity was that of fugitives and exiles and when we were asked which was the country of the Romans we indicated with a blush the climate of the globe and the quarter of the heavens. The divine Providence has now restored to our arms the city of Constantine, the sacred seat of religion and empire, and it will depend on our valour and conduct to render this important acquisition the pledge and omen of future victories.'

So eager was the impatience of the prince and people, that Michael made his triumphal entry into Constantinople only twenty days after the expulsion of the Latins The golden gate was thrown open at his approach the devout conqueror dismounted from his horse and a miraculous image of Mary the Conductress was borne before him, that the divine Virgin in person might appear to conduct him to the temple of her Son the cathedral of St. Sophia. But after the first transport of devotion and pride he sighed at the dreary prospect of solitude and ruin The palace was defiled with smoke and dirt and the gross intemperance of the Franks whole streets had been consumed by fire, or were decayed by the injuries of time the sacred and profane edifices were stripped of their ornaments and as if they were conscious of their approaching exile, the industry of the Latins had been confined to the work of pillage and destruction Trade had expired under the pressure of anarchy and distress, and the numbers of inhabitants had decreased with the opulence of the city It was the first care of the Greek monarch to reinstate the nobles in the palaces of their fathers and the houses or the ground which they occupied were restored to the families that could exhibit a legal right of inheritance But the far greater part was extinct or lost the vacant property had devolved to the lord he repeopled Constantinople by a liberal invitation to the provinces, and the brave volunteers were seated in the capital which had been recovered by their arms The French barons and the principal families had retired with their emperor but the patient and humble crowd of Latins was attached to the country, and indifferent to the change of masters Instead of banishing the factories of the Pisans Venetians and Genoese the prudent conqueror accepted their oaths of allegiance encouraged their industry confirmed their privileges and allowed them to live under the jurisdiction of their proper magistrates. Of these nations the Pisans and Venetians preserved their respective quarters in the city but the services and power of the Genoese deserved at the same time the gratitude and the jealousy of the Greeks Their independent colony was first planted at the seaport town of Heraclea in Thrace They were speedily recalled and settled in the exclusive possession of the suburb of Galata an advantageous post in which they revived the commerce and insulted the majesty of the Byzantine empire [1]

brated as the era of a new empire the con queror alone, and by the right of the sword re newed his coronation in the church of St. Sophia and the name and honours of John Lascaris, his pupil and lawful sovereign, were in sensibly abolished. But his claims still lived in the minds of the people, and the royal youth must speedily attain the years of manhood and ambition. By fear or conscience Palæologus was restrained from dipping his hands in innocent and royal blood but the anxiety of a usurper and a parent urged him to secure his throne by one of those imperfect crimes so familiar to the modern Greeks. The loss of sight incapacitated the young prince for the active business of the world instead of the brutal violence of tearing out his eyes, the visual nerve was destroyed by the intense glare of a red hot basin [22] and John Lascaris was removed to a distant castle where he spent many years in privacy and oblivion. Such cool and deliberate guilt may seem in compatible with remorse but if Michael could trust the mercy of Heaven, he was not inaccessible to the reproaches and vengeance of mankind, which he had provoked by cruelty and treason. His cruelty imposed on a servile court the duties of applause or silence but the clergy had a right to speak in the name of their invisible Master and their holy legions were led by a prelate whose character was above the temptations of hope or fear After a short abdication of his dignity Arsenius [23] had consented to ascend the ecclesiastical throne of Constantinople, and to preside in the restoration of the church. His pious simplicity was long deceived by the arts of Palæologus, and his patience and submission might soothe the usurper and protect the safety of the young prince. On the news of his inhuman treatment the patriarch unsheathed the spiritual sword, and superstition on this occasion, was enlisted in the cause of humanity and justice. In a synod of bishops, who were stimulated by the example of his zeal, the patriarch pronounced a sentence of excommunication, though his prudence still repeated the name of Michael in the public prayers. The Eastern prelates had not adopted the dangerous maxims of ancient Rome nor did they presume to enforce their censures by deposing princes or absolving nations from their oaths of allegiance. But the Christian who had been separated from God and the church became an object of horror and, in a turbulent and fanatic capital, that horror might arm the hand of an assassin, or inflame a sedition of the people. Palæologus felt his danger confessed his guilt, and deprecated his judge the act was irretrievable, the prize was obtained and the most rigorous penance, which he solicited would have raised the sinner to the reputation of a saint. The unrelenting patriarch refused to announce any means of atonement or any hopes of mercy and condescended only to pronounce that, for so great a crime, great indeed must be the satisfaction. Do you require said Michael, that I should abdicate the empire? And at these words he offered or seemed to offer, the sword of state. Arsenius eagerly grasped this pledge of sovereignty but when he perceived that the emperor was unwilling to purchase absolution at so dear a rate, he indignantly escaped to his cell, and left the royal sinner kneeling and weeping before the door [24]

The danger and scandal of this excommunication subsisted above three years, till the popular clamour was assuaged by time and repentance till the brethren of Arsenius condemned his inflexible spirit, so repugnant to the unbounded forgiveness of the Gospel. The emperor had artfully insinuated that, if he were still rejected at home, he might seek, in the Roman pontiff a more indulgent judge but it was far more easy and effectual to find or to place that judge at the head of the Byzantine church.

Arsenius was involved in a vague rumour of conspiracy and disaffection some irregular steps in his ordination and government were liable to censure a synod deposed him from the episcopal office and he was transported under a guard of soldiers to a small island of the Propontis. Before his exile he sullenly requested that a strict account might be taken of the treasures of the church boasted that his sole riches, three pieces of gold had been earned by transcribing the psalms continued to assert the freedom of his mind and denied with his last breath, the pardon which was implored by the royal sinner [25] After some delay Gregory bishop of Adrianople, was translated to the Byzantine throne but his authority was found insufficient to support the absolution of the emperor and Joseph, a reverend monk was substituted to that important function This edifying scene was represented in the presence of the senate and people at the end of six years the humble penitent was restored to the communion of the faithful and humanity will rejoice that a milder treatment of the captive Lascaris was stipulated as a proof of his remorse. But the spirit of Arsenius still survived in a powerful faction of the monks and clergy who persevered above forty-eight years in an ob-

rangians brandished their battle axes a sign of assent was extorted from the trembling youth, and some voices were heard, that the life of a child should no longer impede the settlement of the nation A full harvest of honours and employments was distributed among his friends by the grateful Palæologus In his own family he created a despot and two sebastocrators Alexius Strategopulus was decorated with the title of Cæsar and that veteran commander soon repaid the obligation by restoring Constantinople to the Greek emperor

It was in the second year of his reign, while he resided in the palace and gardens of Nymphæum [18] near Smyrna, that the first messenger arrived at the dead of night, and the stupendous intelligence was imparted to Michael after he had been gently waked by the tender precaution of his sister Eulogia The man was unknown or obscure, he produced no letters from the victorious Cæsar nor could it easily be credited after the defeat of Vataces and the recent failure of Palæologus himself that the capital had been surprised by a detachment of eight hundred soldiers As a hostage the doubtful author was confined with the assurance of death or an ample recompense and the court was left some hours in the anxiety of hope and fear till the messengers of Alexius arrived with the authentic intelligence, and displayed the trophies of the conquest the sword and sceptre [19] the buskins and bonnet [20] of the usurper Baldwin, which he had dropped in his precipitate flight. A general assembly of the bishops senators and nobles was immediately convened and never perhaps was an event received with more heart felt and universal joy In a studied oration the new sovereign of Constantinople congratulated his own and the public fortune. ' There was a time, said he a far distant time when the Roman empire extended to the Adriatic the Tigris and the confines of Æthiopia After the loss of the provinces our capital itself in these last and calamitous days has been wrested from our hands by the barbarians of the West From the lowest ebb the tide of prosperity has again returned in our favour but our prosperity was that of fugitives and exiles, and when we were asked which was the country of the Romans we indicated with a blush the climate of the globe and the quarter of the heavens. The divine Providence has now restored to our arms the city of Constantine the sacred seat of religion and empire and it will depend on our valour and conduct to render this important acquisition the pledge and omen of future victories.

So eager was the impatience of the prince and people, that Michael made his triumphal entry into Constantinople only twenty days after the expulsion of the Latins. The golden gate was thrown open at his approach the devout conqueror dismounted from his horse, and a miraculous image of Mary the Conductress was borne before him, that the divine Virgin in person might appear to conduct him to the temple of her Son, the cathedral of St Sophia. But after the first transport of devotion and pride he sighed at the dreary prospect of solitude and ruin The palace was defiled with smoke and dirt and the gross intemperance of the Franks whole streets had been consumed by fire, or were decayed by the injuries of time the sacred and profane edifices were stripped of their ornaments and, as if they were conscious of their approaching exile the industry of the Latins had been confined to the work of pillage and destruction Trade had expired under the pressure of anarchy and distress, and the numbers of inhabitants had decreased with the opulence of the city It was the first care of the Greek monarch to reinstate the nobles in the palaces of their fathers and the houses, or the ground which they occupied were restored to the families that could exhibit a legal right of inheritance But the far greater part was extinct or lost the vacant property had devolved to the lord he repeopled Constantinople by a liberal invitation to the provinces, and the brave volunteers were seated in the capital which had been recovered by their arms. The French barons and the principal families had retired with their emperor but the patient and humble crowd of Latins was attached to the country, and indifferent to the change of masters Instead of banishing the factories of the Pisans Venetians and Genoese, the prudent conqueror accepted their oaths of allegiance encouraged their industry confirmed their privileges and allowed them to live under the jurisdiction of their proper magistrates Of these nations the Pisans and Venetians preserved their respective quarters in the city but the services and power of the Genoese deserved at the same time the gratitude and the jealousy of the Greeks Their independent colony was first planted at the seaport town of Heraclea in Thrace They were speedily recalled and settled in the exclusive possession of the suburb of Galata an advantageous post in which they revived the commerce and insulted the majesty of the Byzantine empire [21]

He protested that he would sacrifice his life and empire rather than yield the smallest point of orthodox faith or national independence and this declaration was seal d and ratified by a golden bull The patriarch Joseph withdrew to a monastery to resign or resume his throne according to the event of the treaty the letters of union and obedience were subscribed by the emperor his son Andronicus and thirty five archbishops and metropolitans with their respective synods and the episcopal list was multiplied by many dioceses which were annihilated under the yoke of the infidels An embassy was composed of some trusty ministers and prelates they embarked for Italy with rich ornaments and rare perfumes for the altar of St Peter and their secret orders authorised and commended a boundless compliance They were received in the general council of Lyons by pope Gregory the Tenth, at the head of five hundred bishops.[33] He embraced with tears his long lost and repentant children accepted the oath of the ambassadors who abjured the schism in the name of the two emperors adorned the prelates with the ring and mitre chanted in Greek and Latin the Nicene creed with the addition of filioque and rejoiced in the union of the East and West, which had been reserved for his reign. To consummate this pious work, the Byzantine deputies were speedily followed by the pope s nuncios and their instruction discloses the policy of the Vatican which could not be satisfied with the vain title of supremacy After viewing the temper of the prince and people they were enjoined to absolve the schismatic clergy who should subscribe and swear their abjuration and obedience to establish in all the churches the use of the perfect creed to prepare the entrance of a cardinal legate, with the full powers and dignity of his office and to instruct the emperor in the advantages which he might derive from the temporal protection of the Roman pontiff[34]

But they found a country without a friend a nation in which the names of Rome and Union were pronounced with abhorrence. The patriarch Joseph was indeed removed his place was filled by Veccus, an ecclesiastic of learning and moderation and the emperor was still urged by the same motives to persevere in the same professions. But in his private language Palæologus affected to deplore the pride and to blame the innovations, of the Latins and while he debased his character by this double hypocrisy he justified and punished the opposition of his subjects. By the joint suffrage of the new and the ancient Rome, a sentence of excommunication was pronounced against the obstinate schismatics the censures of the churches were executed by the sword of Michael on the failure of persuasion he tried the arguments of prison and exile, of whipping and mutilation—those touchstones says an historian of cowards and the brave Two Greeks still reigned in Ætolia Epirus, and Thessaly with the appellation of despots they had yielded to the sovereign of Constantinople but they rejected the chains of the Roman pontiff and supported their refusal by successful arms. Under their protection, the fugitive monks and bishops assembled in hostile synods and retorted the name of heretic with the galling addition of apostate the prince of Trebizond was tempted to assume the forfeit title of emperor and even the Latins of Negropont, Thebes, Athens, and the Morea forgot the merits of the convert to join with open or clandestine aid, the enemies of Palæologus. His favourite generals, of his own blood and family successively deserted or betrayed the sacrilegious trust. His sister Eulogia a niece, and two female cousins conspired against him an other niece, Mary queen of Bulgaria negotiated his ruin with the sultan of Egypt and in the public eye, their treason was consecrated as the most sublime virtue.[35] To the pope s nuncios, who urged the consummation of the work Palæologus exposed a naked recital of all that he had done and suffered for their sake They were assured that the guilty sectaries, of both sexes and every rank, had been deprived of their honours, their fortunes and their liberty a spreading list of confiscation and punishment, which involved many persons the dearest to the emperor or the best deserving of his favour They were conducted to the prison to behold four princes of the royal blood chained in the four corners and shaking their fetters in an agony of grief and rage Two of these captives were afterwards released the one by submission the other by death but the obstinacy of their two companions was chastised by the loss of their eyes and the Greeks, the least adverse to the union deplore that cruel and inauspicious tragedy[36] Persecutors must expect the hatred of those whom they oppress but they commonly find some consolation in the testimony of their conscience the applause of their party and perhaps the success of their undertaking But the hypocrisy of Michael which was prompted only by political motives must have forced him to hate himself to despise his followers and to esteem and envy the rebel cham

stinate schism Their scruples were treated with tenderness and respect by Michael and his son and the reconciliation of the Arsenites was the serious labour of the church and state In the confidence of fanaticism, they had proposed to try their cause by a miracle and when the two papers that contained their own and the adverse cause, were cast into a fiery brazier, they expected that the Catholic verity would be respected by the flames Alas! the two papers were indiscriminately consumed, and this unforeseen accident produced the union of a day, and renewed the quarrel of an age [26] The final treaty displayed the victory of the Arsenites the clergy abstained during forty days from all ecclesiastical functions a slight penance was imposed on the laity the body of Arsenius was deposited in the sanctuary and in the name of the departed saint the prince and people were released from the sins of their fathers [27]

The establishment of his family was the motive, or at least the pretence of the crime of Palæologus and he was impatient to confirm the succession, by sharing with his eldest son the honours of the purple Andronicus, afterwards surnamed the Elder was proclaimed and crowned emperor of the Romans in the fifteenth year of his age, and from the first era of a prolix and inglorious reign he held that august title nine years as the colleague and fifty as the successor of his father Michael himself had he died in a private station would have been thought more worthy of the empire and the assaults of his temporal and spiritual enemies left him few moments to labour for his own fame or the happiness of his subjects He wrested from the Franks several of the noble*st islands of* the Archipelago—Lesbos, Chios and Rhodes his brother Constantine was sent to command in Malvasia and Sparta and the eastern side of the Morea, from Argos and Napoli to Cape Tænarus, was repossessed by the Greeks This effusion of Christian blood was loudly condemned by the patriarch and the insolent priest presumed to interpose his fears and scruples between the arms of princes But in the prosecution of these western conquests the countries beyond the Hellespont were left naked to the Turks and their depredations verified the prophecy of a dying senator that the recovery of Constantinople would be the ruin of Asia The victories of Michael were achieved by his lieutenants his sword rusted in the palace and in the transactions of the emperor with the popes and the king of Naples his political arts were stained with cruelty and fraud [28]

I The Vatican was the most natural refuge of a Latin emperor who had been driven from his throne, and pope Urban the Fourth appeared to pity the misfortunes, and vindicate the cause of the fugitive Baldwin A crusade, with plenary indulgence was preached by his command against the schismatic Greeks he excommunicated their allies and adherents solicited Louis the Ninth in favour of his kinsman, and demanded a tenth of the ecclesiastic revenues of France and England for the service of the holy war [29] The subtle Greek, who watched the rising tempest of the West, attempted to suspend or soothe the hostility of the pope by suppliant embassies and respectful letters, but he insinuated that the establishment of peace must prepare the reconciliation and obedience of the Eastern church The Roman court could not be deceived by so gross an artifice, and Michael was admonished that the repentance of the son should precede the forgiveness of the father and that faith (an ambiguous word) was the only basis of friendship and alliance After a long and affected delay the approach of danger and the importunity of Gregory the Tenth compelled him to enter on a more serious negotiation he alleged the example of the great Vataces and the Greek clergy who understood the intentions of their prince were not alarmed by the first steps of reconciliation and respect But when he pressed the conclusion of the treaty they strenuously declared that the Latins, though not in name, were heretics in fact, and that they despised those strangers as the vilest and most despicable portion of the human race [30] It was the task of the emperor to persuade to corrupt, to intimidate the most popular ecclesiastics to gain the vote of each individual and alternately to urge the arguments of Christian charity and the public welfare The texts of the fathers and the arms of the Franks were balanced in the theological and political scale and without approving the addition to the Nicene creed the most moderate were taught to confess that the two hostile propositions of proceeding from the Father BY the Son and of proceeding from the Father AND the Son might be reduced to a safe and Catholic sense [31] The supremacy of the pope was a doctrine more easy to conceive but more painful to acknowledge yet Michael represented to his monks and prelates that they might submit to name the Roman bishop as the first of the patriarchs and that their distance and discretion would guard the liberties of the Eastern church from the mischievous consequences of the right of appeal

Charles consisted of forty counts, ten thousand men at arms, a numerous body of infantry and a fleet of more than three hundred ships and transports. A distant day was appointed for assembling this mighty force in the harbour of Brindisi and a previous attempt was risked with a detachment of three hundred knights, who invaded Albania and besieged the fortress of Belgrade. Their defeat might amuse with a triumph the vanity of Constantinople but the more sagacious Michael despairing of his arms, depended on the effects of a conspiracy on the secret workings of a rat who gnawed the bow string[39] of the Sicilian tyrant

Among the proscribed adherents of the house of Swabia John of Procida forfeited a small island of that name in the bay of Naples. His birth was noble, but his education was learned and in the poverty of exile he was relieved by the practice of physic, which he had studied in the school of Salerno Fortune had left him nothing to lose except life and to despise life is the first qualification of a rebel Procida was endowed with the art of negotiation to enforce his reasons and disguise his motives and in his various transactions with nations and men he could persuade each party that he laboured solely for their interest. The new kingdoms of Charles were afflicted by every species of fiscal and military oppression[40] and the lives and fortunes of his Italian subjects were sacrificed to the greatness of their master and the licentiousness of his followers The hatred of Naples was repressed by his presence but the looser government of his vicegerents excited the contempt, as well as the aversion of the Sicilians the island was roused to a sense of freedom by the eloquence of Procida and he displayed to every baron his private interest in the common cause In the confidence of foreign aid he successively visited the courts of the Greek emperor and of Peter king of Arragon[41] who possessed the maritime countries of Valentia and Catalonia To the ambitious Peter a crown was presented which he might justly claim by his marriage with the sister of Mainfroy and by the dying voice of Conradin who from the scaffold had cast a ring to his heir and avenger Palæologus was easily persuaded to divert his enemy from a foreign war by a rebellion at home and a Greek subsidy of twenty five thousand ounces of gold was most profitably applied to arm a Catalan fleet, which sailed under a holy banner to the specious attack of the Saracens of Africa. In the disguise of a monk or beggar the indefatigable missionary of revolt flew from Constantinople to Rome, and from Sicily to Saragossa the treaty was sealed with the signet of pope Nicholas himself the enemy of Charles and his deed of gift transferred the fiefs of St. Peter from the house of Anjou to that of Arragon So widely diffused and so freely circulated, the secret was preserved above two years with impenetrable discretion and each of the conspirators imbibed the maxim of Peter who declared that he would cut off his left hand if it were conscious of the intentions of his right. The mine was prepared with deep and dangerous artifice but it may be questioned whether the instant explosion of Palermo were the effect of accident or design

On the vigil of Easter a procession of the disarmed citizens visited a church without the walls, and a noble damsel was rudely insulted by a French soldier[42] The ravisher was instantly punished with death and if the people was at first scattered by a military force their numbers and fury prevailed the conspirators seized the opportunity the flame spread over the island and eight thousand French were ex*terminated in a promiscuous massacre* which has obtained the name of the SICILIAN VESPERS.[43] From every city the banners of freedom and the church were displayed the revolt was inspired by the presence or the soul of Procida and Peter of Arragon who sailed from the African coast to Palermo was saluted as the king and saviour of the isle. He appears to have respected the disinterested mediation of Gregory the Tenth but Charles was insensibly disgusted by the pride and partiality of Nicholas the Third and his attachment to his kindred the Ursini family alienated the most strenuous champion from the service of the church The hostile league against the Greeks of Philip the Latin emperor the king of the Two Sicilies, and the republic of Venice was ripened into execution and the election of Martin the Fourth a French pope gave a sanction to the cause Of the allies, Philip supplied his name Martin a bull of excommunication the Venetians, a squadron of forty galleys and the formidable powers of

At the same moment the Catalan admiral the famous Roger de Loria, swept the channel with an invincible squadron the French fleet, more numerous in transports than in galleys was either burnt or destroyed and the same blow assured the independence of Sicily and the safety of the Greek empire A few days before his death the emperor Michael rejoiced in the fall of an enemy whom he hated and esteemed, and perhaps he might be content with the popular judgment that had they not been matched with each other, Constantinople and Italy must speedily have obeyed the same master [45] From this disastrous moment the life of Charles was a series of misfortunes his capital was insulted, his son was made prisoner and he sunk into the grave without recovering the isle of Sicily, which after a war of twenty years was finally severed from the throne of Naples, and transferred as an independent kingdom, to a younger branch of the house of Arragon [46]

I shall not I trust be accused of superstition but I must remark that even in this world the natural order of events will sometimes afford the strong appearances of moral retribution The first Palæologus had saved his empire by involving the kingdoms of the West in rebellion and blood, and from these seeds of discord uprose a generation of iron men who assaulted and endangered the empire of his son In modern times our debts and taxes are the secret poison which still corrodes the bosom of peace but in the weak and disorderly government of the middle ages it was agitated by the present evil of the disbanded armies Too idle to work too proud to beg the mercenaries were accustomed to a life of rapine they could rob with more dignity and effect under a banner and a chief and the sovereign to whom their service was useless and their presence importunate endeavoured to discharge the torrent on some neighbouring countries After the peace of Sicily, many thousands of Genoese Catalans [47] etc, who had fought by sea and land under the standard of Anjou or Arragon were blended into one nation by the resemblance of their manners and interest. They heard that the Greek provinces of Asia were invaded by the Turks they resolved to share the harvest of pay and plunder and Frederic king of Sicily most liberally contributed the means of their departure In a warfare of twenty years a ship or a camp was become their country arms were their sole profession and property valour was the only virtue which they knew their women had imbibed the fearless temper of their lovers and husbands it was reported that with a stroke of their broad sword the Catalans could cleave a horseman and a horse and the report itself was a powerful weapon Roger de Flor was the most popular of their chiefs and his personal merit overshadowed the dignity of his prouder rivals of Arragon The offspring of a marriage between a German gentleman of the court of Frederic the Second and a damsel of Brindisi, Roger was successively a templar, an apostate a pirate and at length the richest and most powerful admiral of the Mediterranean He sailed from Messina to Constantinople with eighteen galleys four great ships, and eight thousand adventurers and his previous treaty was faithfully accomplished by Andronicus the Elder who accepted with joy and terror this formidable succour A palace was allotted for his reception and a niece of the emperor was given in marriage to the valiant stranger who was immediately created great duke or admiral of Romania After a decent repose he transported his troops over the Propontis and boldly led them against the Turks in two bloody battles thirty thousand of the Moslems were slain he raised the siege of Philadelphia and deserved the name of the deliverer of Asia But after a short season of prosperity the cloud of slavery and ruin again burst on that unhappy province The inhabitants escaped (says a Greek historian) from the smoke into the flames and the hostility of the Turks was less pernicious than the friendship of the Catalans The lives and fortunes which they had rescued they considered as their own the willing or reluctant maid was saved from the race of circumcision for the embraces of a Christian soldier the exaction of fines and supplies was enforced by licentious rapine and arbitrary executions and, on the resistance of Magnesia the great duke besieged a city of the Roman empire [48] These disorders he excused by the wrongs and passions of a victorious army nor would his own authority or person have been safe had he dared to punish his faithful followers who were defrauded of the just and covenanted price of their services. The threats and complaints of Andronicus disclosed the nakedness of the empire His golden bull had invited no more than five hundred horse and a thousand foot soldiers yet the crowds of volunteers who migrated to the East had been enlisted and fed by his spontaneous bounty While his bravest allies were content with three byzants or pieces of gold for the monthly pay an ounce or even two ounces of gold were assigned to the Catalans whose an

Civil Wars, and Ruin of the Greek Empire Reigns of Andronicus the Elder and Younger, and John Palæologus Regency, Revolt, Reign, and Abdication of John Cantacuzene Establishment of a Genoese Colony at Pera or Galata Their Wars with the Empire and City of Constantinople

The long reign of Andronicus[1] the elder is chiefly memorable by the disputes of the Greek church the invasion of the Catalans, and the rise of the Ottoman power He is celebrated as the most learned and virtuous prince of the age but such virtue, and such learning contributed neither to the perfection of the individual nor to the happiness of society A slave of the most abject superstition he was surrounded on all sides by visible and invisible enemies nor were the flames of hell less dread ful to his fancy than those of a Catalan or Turkish war Under the reign of the Palæologi the choice of the patriarch was the most important business of the state the heads of the Greek church were ambitious and fanatic monks and their vices or virtues, their learning or ignorance, were equally mischievous or contemptible. By his intemperate discipline the patriarch Athanasius[2] excited the hatred of the clergy and people he was heard to declare that the sinner should swallow the last dregs of the cup of penance and the foolish tale was propagated of his punishing a sacrilegious ass that had tasted the lettuce of a convent garden Driven from the throne by the universal clamour Athanasius composed before his retreat two papers of a very opposite cast. His public testament was in the tone of charity and resignation the private codicil breathed the direst anathemas against the authors of his disgrace whom he excluded for ever from the communion of the Holy Trinity the angels, and the saints This last paper he enclosed in an earthen pot, which was placed, by his order on the top of one of the pillars in the dome of St. Sophia, in the distant hope of discovery and revenge At the end of four years some youths, climbing by a ladder in search of pigeons nests, detected the fatal secret and, as Andronicus felt himself touched and bound by the excommunication he trembled on the brink of the abyss which had been so treacherously dug under his feet. A synod of bishops was instantly convened to debate this important question the rashness of these clandestine anathemas was generally condemned but as the knot could be untied only by the same hand as that hand was now deprived of the crosier it appeared that this posthumous decree was irrevocable by any earthly power Some faint testimonies of repentance and pardon were extorted from the author of the mischief but the conscience of the emperor was still wounded and he desired with no less ardour than Athanasius himself the restoration of a patriarch by whom alone he could be healed At the dead of night a monk rudely knocked at the door of the royal bed-chamber announcing a revelation of plague and famine, of inundations and earthquakes. Andronicus started from his bed and spent the night in prayer till he felt, or thought that he felt a slight motion of the earth. The emperor on foot led the bishops and monks to the cell of Athanasius and after a proper resistance the saint from whom this message had been sent consented to absolve the prince and govern the church of Constantinople Untamed by disgrace and hardened by solitude the shepherd was again odious to the flock, and his enemies contrived a singular and as it proved a successful mode of revenge. In the night they stole away the foot stool or foot-cloth of his throne which they secretly replaced with the decoration of a satirical picture. The emperor was painted with a bridle in his mouth and Athanasius leading the tractable beast to the feet of Christ The authors of the libel were detected and punished but as their lives had been spared the Christian priest in sullen indignation retired to his cell and the eyes of Andronicus which had been opened for a moment, were again closed by his successor

If this transaction be one of the most curious and important of a reign of fifty years, I cannot at least accuse the brevity of my materials, since I reduce into some few pages the enormous folios of Pachymer[3] Cantacuzene[4] and Nicephorus Gregoras,[5] who have composed the prolix and languid story of the times The name and situation of the emperor John Cantacuzene might inspire the most lively curiosity His memorials of forty years extend from the revolt

riage, Walter de Brienne, succeeded to the duchy of Athens, and, with the aid of some Catalan mercenaries, whom he invested with fiefs reduced above thirty castles of the vassal or neighbouring lords But when he was informed of the approach and ambition of the great company he collected a force of seven hundred knights, six thousand four hundred horse, and eight thousand foot, and boldly met them on the banks of the river Cephisus in Bœotia The Catalans amounted to no more than three thousand five hundred horse and four thousand foot but the deficiency of numbers was compensated by stratagem and order They formed round their camp an artificial inundation, the duke and his knights advanced without fear or precaution on the verdant meadow their horses plunged into the bog and he was cut in pieces, with the greatest part of the French cavalry His family and nation were expelled and his son Walter de Brienne the titular duke of Athens, the tyrant of Florence, and the constable of France, lost his life in the field of Poitiers Attica and Bœotia were the rewards of the victorious Catalans they married the widows and daughters of the slain and during fourteen years the great company was the terror of the Grecian states Their factions drove them to acknowledge the sovereignty of the house of Arragon and during the remainder of the fourteenth century Athens as a government or an appanage was successively bestowed by the kings of Sicily After the French and Catalans the third dynasty was that of the Accaioli a family, plebeian at Florence potent at Naples and sovereign in Greece Athens which they embellished with new buildings, became the capital of a state that extended over Thebes, Argos Corinth, Delphi, and a part of Thessaly, and their reign was finally determined by Mohammed the Second who strangled the last duke and educated his sons in the discipline and religion of the seraglio

Athens [56] though no more than the shadow of her former self still contains about eight or ten thousand inhabitants of these three fourths are Greeks in religion and language and the Turks who compose the remainder have relaxed, in their intercourse with the citizens, somewhat of the pride and gravity of their national character The olive tree the gift of Minerva, flourishes in Attica, nor has the honey of Mount Hymettus lost any part of its exquisite flavor [57] but the languid trade is monopolised by strangers, and the agriculture of a barren land is abandoned to the vagrant Wallachians The Athenians are still distinguished by the subtlety and acuteness of their understandings but these qualities, unless ennobled by freedom and enlightened by study will degenerate into a low and selfish cunning and it is a proverbial saying of the country, 'From the Jews of Thessalonica the Turks of Negropont and the Greeks of Athens good Lord deliver us!' This artful people has eluded the tyranny of the Turkish bashaws by an expedient which alleviates their servitude and aggravates their shame About the middle of the last century the Athenians chose for their protector the Kislar Aga or chief black eunuch of the seraglio This Æthiopian slave who possesses the sultan's ear condescends to accept the tribute of thirty thousand crowns his lieutenant, the Waywode whom he annually confirms, may reserve for his own about five or six thousand more and such is the policy of the citizens, that they seldom fail to remove and punish an oppressive governor Their private differences are decided by the archbishop one of the richest prelates of the Greek church since he possesses a revenue of one thousand pounds sterling and by a tribunal of the eight geronti or elders, chosen in the eight quarters of the city the noble families cannot trace their pedigree above three hundred years but their principal members are distinguished by a grave demeanour a fur cap and the lofty appellation of archon By some who delight in the contrast the modern language of Athens is represented as the most corrupt and barbarous of the seventy dialects of the vulgar Greek [58] this picture is too darkly coloured but it would not be easy in the country of Plato and Demosthenes to find a reader or a copy of their works The Athenians walk with supine indifference among the glorious ruins of antiquity and such is the debasement of their character that they are incapable of admiring the genius of their predecessors.[59]

against the barbarians. Such a force might have saved or commanded the empire but their councils were discordant, their motions were slow and doubtful and their progress was checked by intrigue and negotiation The quarrel of the two Andronici was protracted and suspended, and renewed during a ruinous period of seven years In the first treaty the relics of the Greek empire were divided Constantinople, Thessalonica, and the islands were left to the elder while the younger acquired the sovereignty of the greatest part of Thrace from Philippi to the Byzantine limit. By the second treaty he stipulated the payment of his troops, his immediate coronation and an adequate share of the power and revenue of the state The third civil war was terminated by the surprise of Constantinople, the final retreat of the old emperor and the sole reign of his victorious grandson. The reasons of this delay may be found in the characters of the men and of the times When the heir of the monarchy first pleaded his wrongs and his apprehensions, he was heard with pity and applause and his adherents repeated on all sides the inconsistent promise that he would increase the pay of the soldiers and alleviate the burdens of the people. The grievances of forty years were mingled in his revolt and the rising generation was fatigued by the endless prospect of a reign whose favourites and maxims were of other times The youth of Andronicus had been without spirit his age was without reverence his taxes produced an annual revenue of five hundred thousand pounds yet the richest of the sovereigns of Christendom was incapable of maintaining three thousand horse and twenty galleys to resist the destructive progress of the Turks[8] How different," said the younger Andronicus is my situation from that of the son of Philip! Alexander might complain that his father would leave him nothing to conquer alas! my grandsire will leave me nothing to lose But the Greeks were soon admonished that the public disorders could not be healed by a civil war and that their young favourite was not destined to be the saviour of a falling empire On the first repulse his party was broken by his own levity their intestine discord and the intrigues of the ancient court which tempted each malcontent to desert or betray the cause of rebellion. Andronicus the younger was touched with remorse, or fatigued with business or deceived by negotiation pleasure rather than power was his aim and the licence of maintaining a thousand hounds, a thousand hawks, and a thousand huntsmen was sufficient to sully his fame and disarm his ambition

Let us now survey the catastrophe of this busy plot and the final situation of the principal actors[10] The age of Andronicus was consumed in civil discord and amidst the events of war and treaty his power and reputation continually decayed till the fatal night in which the gates of the city and palace were opened without resistance to his grandson His principal commander scorned the repeated warnings of danger and retiring to rest in the vain security of ignorance, abandoned the feeble monarch with some priests and pages, to the terrors of a sleepless night. These terrors were quickly realised by the hostile shouts which proclaimed the titles and victory of Andronicus the younger and the aged emperor falling prostrate before an image of the Virgin despatched a suppliant message to resign the sceptre and to obtain his life at the hands of the conqueror The answer of his grandson was decent and pious at the prayer of his friends the younger Andronicus assumed the sole administration but the elder still enjoyed the name and pre-eminence of the first emperor the use of the great palace and a pension of twenty four thousand pieces of gold one half of which was assigned on the royal treasure and the other on the fishery of Constantinople But his impotence was soon exposed to contempt and oblivion the vast silence of the palace was disturbed only by the cattle and poultry of the neighbourhood which roved with impunity through the solitary courts and a reduced allowance of ten thousand pieces of gold[11] was all that he could ask and more than he could hope His calamities were embittered by the gradual extinction of sight his confinement was rendered each day more rigorous and during the absence and sickness of his grandson his inhuman keepers, by the threats of instant death, compelled him to exchange the purple for the monastic habit and profession. The monk Antony had renounced the pomp of the world yet he had occasion for a coarse fur in the winter season and as wine was forbidden by his confessor and water by his physician the sherbet of Egypt was his common drink. It was not without difficulty that the late emperor could procure three or four pieces to satisfy these simple wants and if he bestowed the gold to relieve the more painful distress of a friend the sacrifice is of some weight in the scale of humanity and religion Four years after his abdication Andronicus, or Antony expired in a cell in the seventy fourth year of his age and the

of the younger Andronicus to his own abdication of the empire, and it is observed that, like Moses and Cæsar he was the principal actor in the scenes which he describes But in this eloquent work we should vainly seek the sincerity of a hero or a penitent Retired in a cloister from the vices and passions of the world, he presents not a confession, but an apology of the life of an ambitious statesman Instead of unfolding the true counsels and characters of men he displays the smooth and specious surface of events, highly varnished with his own praises and those of his friends Their motives are always pure their ends always legitimate they conspire and rebel without any views of interest and the violence which they inflict or suffer is celebrated as the spontaneous effect of reason and virtue

After the example of the first of the Palæologi the elder Andronicus associated his son Michael to the honours of the purple and from the age of eighteen to his premature death that prince was acknowledged above twenty five years, as the second emperor of the Greeks [6] At the head of an army he excited neither the fears of the enemy nor the jealousy of the court his modesty and patience were never tempted to compute the years of his father nor was that father compelled to repent of his liberality either by the virtues or vices of his son The son of Michael was named Andronicus from his grandfather, to whose early favour he was introduced by that nominal resemblance The blossoms of wit and beauty increased the fondness of the elder Andronicus and with the common vanity of age, he expected to realise in the second, the hope which had been disappointed in the first, generation The boy was educated in the palace as an heir and a favourite and in the oaths and acclamations of the people the august triad was formed by the names of the father the son, and the grandson But the younger Andronicus was speedily corrupted by his infant greatness, while he beheld with puerile impatience the double obstacle that hung and might long hang over his rising ambition It was not to acquire fame, or to diffuse happiness that he so eagerly aspired wealth and impunity were in his eyes the most precious attributes of a monarch, and his first indiscreet demand was the sovereignty of some rich and fertile island where he might lead a life of independence and pleasure The emperor was offended by the loud and frequent intemperance which disturbed his capital, the sums which his parsimony denied were supplied by the Genoese usurers of Pera, and the oppressive debt which consolidated the interest of a faction could be discharged only by a revolution A beautiful female a matron in rank a prostitute in manners, had instructed the younger Andronicus in the rudiments of love but he had reason to suspect the nocturnal visits of a rival, and a stranger passing through the street was pierced by the arrows of his guards who were placed in ambush at her door That stranger was his brother, prince Manuel who languished and died of his wound and the emperor Michael their common father, whose health was in a declining state, expired on the eighth day lamenting the loss of both his children [7] However guiltless in his intention, the younger Andronicus might impute a brother s and a father's death to the consequence of his own vices and deep was the sigh of thinking and feeling men when they perceived instead of sorrow and repentance, his ill dissembled joy on the removal of two odious competitors By these melancholy events, and the increase of his disorders the mind of the elder emperor was gradually alienated and, after many fruitless reproofs he transferred on another grandson[8] his hopes and affection The change was announced by the new oath of allegiance to the reigning sovereign and the person whom he should appoint for his successor and the acknowledged heir after a repetition of insults and complaints was exposed to the indignity of a public trial Before the sentence, which would probably have condemned him to a dungeon or a cell, the emperor was informed that the palace courts were filled with the armed followers of his grandson the judgment was softened to a treaty of reconciliation and the triumphant escape of the prince encouraged the ardour of the younger faction

Yet the capital the clergy and the senate adhered to the person or at least to the government, of the old emperor and it was only in the provinces by flight, and revolt and foreign succour that the malcontents could hope to vindicate their cause and subvert his throne The soul of the enterprise was the great domestic John Cantacuzene the sally from Constantinople is the first date of his actions and memorials and if his own pen be most descriptive of his patriotism an unfriendly historian has not refused to celebrate the zeal and ability which he displayed in the service of the young emperor That prince escaped from the capital under the pretence of hunting, erected his standard at Adrianople and in a few days, assembled fifty thousand horse and foot whom neither honour nor duty could have armed

But his impotence was soon exposed to contempt and oblivion the vast silence of the palace was disturbed only by the cattle and poultry of the neighbourhood which roved with impunity through the solitary courts and a reduced allowance of ten thousand pieces of gold[11] was all that he could ask and more than he could hope His calamities were embittered by the gradual extinction of sight his confinement was rendered each day more rigorous and during the absence and sickness of his grandson his inhuman keepers, by the threats of instant death compelled him to exchange the purple for the monastic habit and profession The monk Antony had renounced the pomp of the world yet he had occasion for a coarse fur in the winter season and as wine was forbidden by his confessor and water by his physician the sherbet of Egypt was his common drink. It was not without difficulty that the late emperor could procure three or four pieces to satisfy these simple wants and if he bestowed the gold to relieve the more painful distress of a friend, the sacrifice is of some weight in the scale of humanity and religion. Four years after his abdication Andronicus or Antony expired in a cell in the seventy fourth year of his age and the last strain of adulation could only promise a more splendid crown of glory in heaven than he had enjoyed upon earth [12]

Nor was the reign of the younger, more glorious or fortunate than that of the elder, Andronicus [13] He gathered the fruits of ambition but the taste was transient and bitter in the supreme station he lost the remains of his early popularity, and the defects of his character became still more conspicuous to the world The public reproach urged him to march in person against the Turks nor did his courage fail in the hour of trial, but a defeat and a wound were the only trophies of his expedition in Asia, which confirmed the establishment of the Ottoman monarchy The abuses of the civil government attained their full maturity and perfection his neglect of forms and the confusion of national dresses are deplored by the Greeks as the fatal symptoms of the decay of the empire Andronicus was old before his time, the intemperance of youth had accelerated the infirmities of age and after being rescued from a dangerous malady by nature, or physic or the Virgin, he was snatched away before he had accomplished his forty fifth year He was twice married and as the progress of the Latins in arms and arts had softened the prejudices of the Byzantine court, his two wives were chosen in the princely houses of Germany and Italy The first, Agnes at home, Irene in Greece, was daughter of the duke of Brunswick Her father[14] was a petty lord[15] in the poor and savage regions of the north of Germany [16] yet he derived some revenue from his silver mines,[17] and his family is celebrated by the Greeks as the most ancient and noble of the Teutonic name [18] After the death of this childless princess, Andronicus sought in marriage Jane the sister of the count of Savoy [19] and his suit was preferred to that of the French king [20] The count respected in his sister the superior majesty of a Roman empress her retinue was composed of knights and ladies she was regenerated and crowned in St. Sophia under the more orthodox appellation of Anne and at the nuptial feast, the Greeks and Italians vied with each other in the martial exercises of tilts and tournaments

The empress Anne of Savoy survived her husband their son John Palæologus was left an orphan and an emperor in the ninth year of his age, and his weakness was protected by the first and most deserving of the Greeks The long and cordial friendship of his father for John Cantacuzene is alike honourable to the prince and the subject. It had been formed amidst the pleasures of their youth their families were almost equally noble [1] and the recent lustre of the purple was amply compensated by the energy of a private education We have seen that the young emperor was saved by Cantacuzene from the power of his grandfather and after six years of civil war, the same favourite brought him back in triumph to the palace of Constantinople Under the reign of Andronicus the younger the great domestic ruled the emperor and the empire and it was by his valour and conduct that the isle of Lesbos and the principality of Ætolia were restored to their ancient allegiance His enemies confess that among the public robbers Cantacuzene alone was moderate and abstemious, and the free and voluntary account which he produces of his own wealth[22] may sustain the presumption that it was devolved by inheritance and not accumulated by rapine He does not indeed specify the value of his money, plate, and jewels, yet, after a voluntary gift of two hundred vases of silver after much had been secreted by his friends and plundered by his foes his forfeit treasures were sufficient for the equipment of a fleet of seventy galleys He does not measure the size and number of his estates but his granaries were heaped with an incredible store of wheat and barley and the labour of a thousand yoke of oxen might cultivate according to the practice of antiquity about sixty two thousand five hundred acres of arable land [23] His pastures were stocked with two thousand five hundred brood mares, two hundred camels three hundred mules, five hundred asses five thousand horned cattle fifty thousand hogs, and seventy thousand sheep [24] a precious record of rural opulence in the last period of the empire and in a land, most probably in Thrace, so repeatedly wasted by foreign and domestic hostility The favour of Cantacuzene was above his fortune. In the moments of familiarity in the hour of sickness, the emperor was desirous to level the distance between them and pressed his friend to accept the diadem and purple The virtue of the great domestic, which is attested by his own pen resisted the dangerous proposal but the last testament of Andronicus the younger named him the guardian of his son and the regent of the empire

Had the regent found a suitable return of obedience and gratitude perhaps he would have acted with pure and zealous fidelity in the service of his pupil [25] A guard of five hundred soldiers watched over his person and the palace the funeral of the late emperor was decently performed, the capital was silent and submistive, and five hundred letters, which Cantacuzene despatched in the first month informed the provinces of their loss and their duty The prospect of a tranquil minority was blasted by the great duke or admiral Apocaucus and to exaggerate his perfidy the Imperial historian is pleased to magnify his own imprudence in raising him to that office against the advice of his more sagacious sovereign Bold and subtle, rapacious and profuse, the avarice and ambition of Apocaucus were by turns subservient to each other and his talents were applied to the ruin of his country His arrogance was heightened by the command of a naval force and an impregnable castle, and under the mask of oaths and flattery he secretly conspired against his benefactor The female court of the empress was bribed and directed he encouraged Anne of Savoy to assert, by the law of nature the tutelage of her son the love of power was disguised by the anxiety of maternal tenderness and the founder of the Palæologi had instructed his posterity to dread the example of a perfidious guardian. The patriarch John of Apri was a proud and feeble old man, encompassed by a numerous and hungry kindred. He produced an obsolete epistle of Andronicus, which bequeathed the prince and people to his pious care the fate of his predecessor Arsenius prompted him to prevent, rather than punish, the crimes of a usurper and Apocaucus smiled at the success of his own flattery when he beheld the Byzantine priest assuming the state and temporal claims of the Roman pontiff [26] Between three persons so different in their station and character a private league was concluded a shadow of authority was restored to the senate and the people was tempted by the name of freedom. By this powerful confederacy the great domestic was assaulted at first with clandestine at length with open arms. His prerogatives were disputed his opinions slighted his friends persecuted and his safety was threatened both in the camp and city In his absence on the public service he was accused of treason proscribed as an enemy of the church and state, and delivered, with all his adherents to the sword of justice, the vengeance of the people, and the power of the devil his fortunes were confiscated, his aged mother was cast into prison all his past services were buried in oblivion, and he was driven by injustice to perpetrate the crime of which he was accused [27] From the review of his preceding conduct, Cantacuzene appears to have been guiltless of any treasonable designs and the only suspicion of his innocence must arise from the vehemence of his protestations, and the sublime purity which he ascribes to his own virtue. While the empress and patriarch still affected the appearances of harmony he repeatedly solicited the permission of retiring to a private and even a monastic life. After he had been declared a public enemy it was his fervent wish to throw himself at the feet of the young emperor and to receive without a murmur the stroke of the executioner it was not without reluctance that he listened to the voice of reason which inculcated the sacred duty of saving his family and friends, and proved that he could only save them by drawing the sword and assuming the Imperial title.

In the strong city of Demotica his peculiar domain, the emperor John Cantacuzenus was invested with the purple buskins his right leg was clothed by his noble kinsman the left by the Latin chiefs, on whom he conferred the order of knighthood. But even in this act of revolt he was still studious of loyalty and the titles of John Palæologus and Anne of Savoy were proclaimed before his own name and that of his *wife Irene. Such vain ceremony is a thin dis*guise of rebellion nor are there perhaps any personal wrongs that can authorise a subject to take arms against his sovereign but the want of preparation and success may confirm the assurance of the usurper that this decisive step was the effect of necessity rather than of choice. Constantinople adhered to the young emperor the king of Bulgaria was invited to the relief of Adrianople the principal cities of Thrace and Macedonia, after some hesitation, renounced their obedience to the great domestic and the leaders of the troops and provinces were induced by their private interest to prefer the loose dominion of a woman and a priest. The army of Cantacuzene in sixteen divisions, was stationed on the banks of the Melas to tempt or intimidate the capital it was dispersed by treachery or fear and the officers, more especially the mercenary Latins, accepted the bribes and embraced the service of the Byzantine court. After this loss, the rebel emperor (he fluctuated between the two characters) took the road to Thessalonica with a chosen remnant but he failed in his enterprise on that important place and he was closely pursued by the great duke, his enemy Apocaucus, at the head of a superior power by sea and land. Driven from the coast, in his march or rather flight, into the mountains of Servia, Cantacuzene assembled his troops to scrutinise those who were worthy and willing to accompany his broken fortunes

A base majority bowed and retired, and his trusty band was diminished to two thousand and at last to five hundred volunteers The cral,[28] or despot of the Servians received him with generous hospitality, but the ally was insensibly degraded to a suppliant, a hostage, a captive and, in this miserable dependence he waited at the door of the barbarian, who could dispose of the life and liberty of a Roman emperor The most tempting offers could not persuade the cral to violate his trust but he soon inclined to the stronger side and his friend was dismissed without injury to a new vicissitude of hopes and perils Near six years the flame of discord burnt with various success and unabated rage, the cities were distracted by the faction of the nobles and the plebeians—the Cantacuzeni and Palæologi and the Bulgarians, the Servians and the Turks were invoked on both sides as the instruments of private ambition and the common ruin The regent deplored the calamities of which he was the author and victim and his own experience might dictate a just and lively remark on the different nature of foreign and civil war The former said he, is the external warmth of summer always tolerable and often beneficial, the latter is the deadly heat of a fever, which consumes without a remedy the vitals of the constitution'[29]

The introduction of barbarians and savages into the contests of civilised nations is a measure pregnant with shame and mischief which the interest of the moment may compel but which is reprobated by the best principles of humanity and reason It is the practice of both sides to accuse their enemies of the guilt of the first alliances and those who fail in their negotiations are loudest in their censure of the example which they envy and would gladly imitate The Turks of Asia were less barbarous perhaps than the shepherds of Bulgaria and Servia but their religion rendered them the implacable foes of Rome and Christianity To acquire the friendship of their emirs the two factions vied with each other in baseness and profusion the dexterity of Cantacuzene obtained the preference but the succour and victory were dearly purchased by the marriage of his daughter with an infidel the captivity of many thousand Christians and the passage of the Ottomans into Europe the last and fatal stroke in the fall of the Roman empire The inclining scale was decided in his favour by the death of Apocaucus the just though singular retribution of his crimes. A crowd of nobles or plebeians whom he feared or hated had been seized by his orders in the capital and the provinces and the old palace of Constantine was assigned for the place of their confinement Some alterations in raising the walls and narrowing the cells had been ingeniously contrived to prevent their escape and aggravate their misery and the work was incessantly pressed by the daily visits of the tyrant. His guards watched at the gate and as he stood in the inner court to overlook the architects, without fear or suspicion, he was assaulted and laid breathless on the ground by two resolute prisoners of the Palæologian race[30] who were armed with sticks and animated by despair On the rumour of revenge and liberty the captive multitude broke their fetters fortified their prison and exposed from the battlements the tyrant's head presuming on the favour of the people and the clemency of the empress Anne of Savoy might rejoice in the fall of a haughty and ambitious minister but while she delayed to resolve or to act the populace, more especially the mariners were excited by the widow of the great duke to a sedition an assault, and a massacre The prisoners (of whom the far greater part were guiltless or inglorious of the deed) escaped to a neighbouring church they were slaughtered at the foot of the altar and in his death the monster was not less bloody and venomous than in his life Yet his talents alone upheld the cause of the young emperor and his surviving associates suspicious of each other abandoned the conduct of the war and rejected the fairest terms of accommodation In the beginning of the dispute the empress felt and complained that she was deceived by the enemies of Cantacuzene the patriarch was employed to preach against the forgiveness of injuries and her promise of immortal hatred was sealed by an oath under the penalty of excommunication[31] But Anne soon learned to hate without a teacher she beheld the misfortunes of the empire with the indifference of a stranger her jealousy was exasperated by the competition of a rival empress and on the first symptoms of a more yielding temper she threatened the patriarch to convene a synod and degrade him from his office Their incapacity and discord would have afforded the most decisive advantage but the civil war was protracted by the weakness of both parties and the moderation of Cantacuzene has not escaped the reproach of timidity and indolence He successively recovered the provinces and cities and the realm of his pupil was measured by the walls of Constantinople but the metropolis alone counterbalanced the rest of the empire nor could he attempt that important conquest till he had secured in his favour the public voice and a private correspondence. An Italian, of the name of Facciolati,[32] had succeeded to the office of great duke; the ships, the guards, and the golden gate were subject to his command; but his humble ambition was bribed to become the instrument of treachery; and the revolution was accomplished without danger or bloodshed. Destitute of the powers of resistance or the hope of relief, the inflexible Anne would have still defended the palace, and have smiled to behold the capital in flames rather than in the possession of a rival. She yielded to the prayers of her friends and enemies, and the treaty was dictated by the conqueror, who professed a loyal and zealous attachment to the son of his benefactor. The marriage of his daughter with John Palæologus was at length consummated; the hereditary right of the pupil was acknowledged; but the sole administration during ten years was vested in the guardian. Two emperors and three empresses were seated on the Byzantine throne; and a general amnesty quieted the apprehensions and confirmed the property of the most guilty subjects. The festival of the coronation and nuptials was celebrated with the appearances of concord and magnificence, and both were equally fallacious. During the late troubles the treasures of the state, and even the furniture of the palace, had been alienated or embezzled; the royal banquet was served in pewter or earthen-ware; and such was the proud poverty of the times, that the absence of gold and jewels was supplied by the paltry artifices of glass and gilt leather.[33]

I hasten to conclude the personal history of John Cantacuzene.[34] He triumphed and reigned; but his reign and triumph were clouded by the discontent of his own and the adverse faction. His followers might style the general amnesty an act of pardon for his enemies, and of oblivion for his friends; in his cause their estates had been forfeited or plundered; and as they wandered naked and hungry through the streets, they cursed the selfish generosity of a leader who, on the throne of the empire, might relinquish without merit his private inheritance.[35] The adherents of the empress blushed to hold their lives and fortunes by the precarious favour of a usurper; and the thirst of revenge was concealed by a tender concern for the succession, and even the safety, of her son. They were justly alarmed by a petition of the friends of Cantacuzene, that they might be released from their oath of allegiance to the Palæologi, and intrusted with the defence of some cautionary towns; a measure supported with argument and eloquence, and which was rejected (says the Imperial historian) by my sublime and almost incredible virtue. His repose was disturbed by the sound of plots and seditions; and he trembled lest the lawful prince should be stolen away by some foreign or domestic enemy, who would inscribe his name and his wrongs in the banners of rebellion. As the son of Andronicus advanced in the years of manhood, he began to feel and to act for himself; and his rising ambition was rather stimulated than checked by the imitation of his father's vices. If we may trust his own professions, Cantacuzene laboured with honest industry to correct these sordid and sensual appetites, and to raise the mind of the young prince to a level with his fortune. In the Servian expedition the two emperors showed themselves in cordial harmony to the troops and provinces, and the younger colleague was initiated by the elder in the mysteries of war and government. After the conclusion of the peace, Palæologus was left at Thessalonica, a royal residence and a frontier station, to secure by his absence the peace of Constantinople, and to withdraw his youth from the temptations of a luxurious capital. But the distance weakened the powers of control, and the son of Andronicus was surrounded with artful or unthinking companions, who taught him to hate his guardian, to deplore his exile, and to vindicate his rights. A private treaty with the cral or despot of Servia was soon followed by an open revolt; and Cantacuzene, on the throne of the elder Andronicus, defended the cause of age and prerogative, which in his youth he had so vigorously attacked. At his request the empress-mother undertook the voyage of Thessalonica, and the office of mediation; she returned without success; and unless Anne of Savoy was instructed by adversity, we may doubt the sincerity, or at least the fervour, of her zeal. While the regent grasped the sceptre with a firm and vigorous hand, she had been instructed to declare that the ten years of his legal administration would soon elapse; and that, after a full trial of the vanity of the world, the emperor Cantacuzene sighed for the repose of a cloister, and was ambitious only of a heavenly crown. Had these sentiments been genuine, his voluntary abdication would have restored the peace of the empire, and his conscience would have been relieved by an act of justice. Palæologus alone was responsible for his future government; and whatever might be his vices, they were surely less formidable than the calamities of a civil war in which the barbarians and infidels were again invited to assist the Greeks in their mutual destruction By the arms of the Turks who now struck a deep and everlasting root in Europe Cantacuzene prevailed in the third contest in which he had been involved, and the young emperor, driven from the sea and land, was compelled to take shelter among the Latins of the isle of Tenedos His insolence and obstinacy provoked the victor to a step which must render the quarrel irreconcilable and the association of his son Matthew, whom he invested with the purple, established the succession in the family of the Cantacuzeni But Constantinople was still attached to the blood of her ancient princes, and this last injury accelerated the restoration of the rightful heir A noble Genoese espoused the cause of Palæologus obtained a promise of his sister and achieved the revolution with two galleys and two thousand five hundred auxiliaries Under the pretence of distress they were admitted into the lesser port a gate was opened, and the Latin shout of 'Long life and victory to the emperor John Palæologus!' was answered by a general rising in his favour A numerous and loyal party yet adhered to the standard of Cantacuzene but he asserts in his history (does he hope for belief?) that his tender conscience rejected the assurance of conquest that in free obedience to the voice of religion and philosophy he descended from the throne and embraced with pleasure the monastic habit and profession [36] So soon as he ceased to be a prince, his successor was not unwilling that he should be a saint the remainder of his life was devoted to piety and learning in the cells of Constantinople and Mount Athos the monk Joasaph was respected as the temporal and spiritual father of the emperor and if he issued from his retreat, it was as the minister of peace to subdue the obstinacy and solicit the pardon of his rebellious son [37]

Yet in the cloister the mind of Cantacuzene was still exercised by theological war He sharpened a controversial pen against the Jews and Mohammedans [38] and in every state he defended with equal zeal the divine light of Mount Thabor, a memorable question which consummates the religious follies of the Greeks The fakirs of India[39] and the monks of the Oriental church were alike persuaded that in total abstraction of the faculties of the mind and body the purer spirit may ascend to the enjoyment and vision of the Deity The opinion and practice of the monasteries of Mount Athos[40] will be best represented in the words of an abbot who flourished in the eleventh century "When thou art alone in thy cell" says the ascetic teacher, 'shut thy door and seat thyself in a corner raise thy mind above all things vain and transitory recline thy beard and chin on thy breast, turn thy eyes and thy thought towards the middle of thy belly, the region of the naval and search the place of the heart, the seat of the soul At first all will be dark and comfortless but if you persevere day and night you will feel an ineffable joy and no sooner has the soul discovered the place of the heart than it is involved in a mystic and etherial light.' This light the production of a distempered fancy the creature of an empty stomach and an empty brain was adored by the Quietists as the pure and perfect essence of God himself and as long as the folly was confined to Mount Athos the simple solitaries were not inquisitive how the divine essence could be a material substance, or how an immaterial substance could be perceived by the eyes of the body But in the reign of the younger Andronicus these monasteries were visited by Barlaam [41] a Calabrian monk who was equally skilled in philosophy and theology who possessed the languages of the Greeks and Latins and whose versatile genius could maintain their opposite creeds, according to the interest of the moment. The indiscretion of an ascetic revealed to the curious traveller the secrets of mental prayer and Barlaam embraced the opportunity of ridiculing the Quietists, who placed the soul in the naval of accusing the monks of Mount Athos of heresy and blasphemy His attack compelled the more learned to renounce or dissemble the simple devotion of their brethren and Gregory Palamas introduced a scholastic distinction between the essence and operation of God His inaccessible essence dwells in the midst of an uncreated and eternal light and this beatific vision of the saints had been manifested to the disciples on Mount Thabor in the transfiguration of Christ Yet this distinction could not escape the reproach of polytheism the eternity of the light of Thabor was fiercely denied and Barlaam still charged the Palamites with holding two eternal substances a visible and an invisible God From the rage of the monks of Mount Athos who threatened his life the Calabrian retired to Constantinople where his smooth and specious manners introduced him to the favour of the great domestic and the emperor The court and the city were involved in this theological dispute which flamed amidst the civil war but the doctrine of Barlaam was disgraced by his flight and apostacy the Pala mites triumphed and their adversary the pa triarch John of Apri was deposed by the con sent of the adverse factions of the state. In the character of emperor and theologian Cantacu zene presided in the synod of the Greek church, which established as an article of faith, the un created light of Mount Thabor and after so many insults the reason of mankind was slight ly wounded by the addition of a single absurd ity Many rolls of paper or parchment have been blotted and the impenitent sectaries, who refused to subscribe the orthodox creed were deprived of the honours of Christian burial but in the next age the question was forgotten nor can I learn that the axe or the faggot were em ployed for the extirpation of the Barlaamite heresy [42]

For the conclusion of this chapter I have re served the Genoese war which shook the throne of Cantacuzene and betrayed the de bility of the Greek empire. The Genoese who, after the recovery of Constantinople, were seat ed in the suburb of Pera or Galata, received that honourable fief from the bounty of the em peror They were indulged in the use of their laws and magistrates, but they submitted to the duties of vassals and subjects the forcible word of ligemen[43] was borrowed from the Latin juris prudence, and their podestà or chief before he entered on his office saluted the emperor with loyal acclamations and vows of fidelity Genoa sealed a firm alliance with the Greeks and in the case of a defensive war a supply of fifty empty galleys, and a succour of fifty galleys completely armed and manned was promised by the republic to the empire. In the revival of a naval force it was the aim of Michael Palæ ologus to deliver himself from a foreign aid and his vigorous government contained the Genoese of Galata within those limits which the inso lence of wealth and freedom provoked them to exceed. A sailor threatened that they should soon be masters of Constantinople and slew the Greek who resented this national affront and an armed vessel after refusing to salute the palace, was guilty of some acts of piracy in the Black Sea. Their countrymen threatened to support their cause but the long and open vil lage of Galata was instantly surrounded by the Imperial troops till in the moment of the assault, the prostrate Genoese implored the clemency of their sovereign The defenceless sit uation which secured their obedience exposed them to the attack of their Venetian rivals, who, in the reign of the elder Andronicus, presumed to violate the majesty of the throne. On the ap proach of their fleets, the Genoese with their families and effects, retired into the city their empty habitations were reduced to ashes and the feeble prince, who had viewed the destruc tion of his suburb expressed his resentment, not by arms but by ambassadors. This misfor tune however was advantageous to the Geno ese who obtained and imperceptibly abused the dangerous licence of surrounding Galata with a strong wall, of introducing into the ditch the waters of the sea, of erecting lofty turrets and of mounting a train of military engines on the rampart. The narrow bounds in which they had been circumscribed were insufficient for the growing colony each day they acquired some addition of landed property and the adjacent hills were covered with their villas and castles, which they joined and protected by new forti fications.[44] The navigation and trade of the Euxine was the patrimony of the Greek emper ors, who commanded the narrow entrance the gates, as it were, of that inland sea. In the reign of Michael Palæologus their prerogative was acknowledged by the sultan of Egypt, who so licited and obtained the liberty of sending an annual ship for the purchase of slaves in Cir cassia and the Lesser Tartary a liberty preg nant with mischief to the Christian cause, since these youths were transformed by education and discipline into the formidable Mama lukes.[45] From the colony of Pera the Genoese engaged with superior advantage in the lucra tive trade of the Black Sea and their industry supplied the Greeks with fish and corn, two articles of food almost equally important to a superstitious people The spontaneous bounty of nature appears to have bestowed the harvests of the Ukraine, the produce of a rude and sav age husbandry and the endless exportation of salt fish and caviar is annually renewed by the enormous sturgeons that are caught at the mouth of the Don or Tanais in their last station of the rich mud and shallow water of the Mæ otis.[46] The waters of the Oxus, the Caspian the Volga, and the Don opened a rare and labori ous passage for the gems and spices of India and after three months march the caravans of Carizme met the Italian vessels in the harbours of Crimea.[47] These various branches of trade were monopolised by the diligence and power of the Genoese. Their rivals of Venice and Pisa were forcibly expelled the natives were awed by the castles and cities which arose on the

Yet this distinction could not escape the reproach of polytheism the eternity of the light of Thabor was fiercely denied and Barlaam still charged the Palamites with holding two eternal substances a visible and an invisible God From the rage of the monks of Mount Athos who threatened his life the Calabrian retired to Constantinople where his smooth and specious manners introduced him to the favour of the great domestic and the emperor The court and the city were involved in this the reach of their artillery Cantacuzene in standy signed his treaty with the Venetians but the weight of the Roman empire was scarcely felt in the balance of these opulent and powerful republics.[83] From the straits of Gibraltar to the mouth of the Tanais their fleets encountered each other with various success and a memorable battle was fought in the narrow sea under the walls of Constantinople It would not be an easy task to reconcile the accounts of the Greeks, the Venetians, and the Genoese and while I depend on the narrative of an impartial historian,[83] I shall borrow from each nation the facts that redound to their own disgrace and the honour of their foes The Venetians with their allies the Catalans had the advantage of number and their fleet, with the poor addition of eight Byzantine galleys amounted to seventy five sail the Genoese did not exceed sixty four but in those times their ships of war were distinguished by the superiority of their size and strength. The names and families of their naval commanders, Pisani and Doria are illustrious in the annals of their country but the personal merit of the former was eclipsed by the fame and abilities of his rival They engaged in tempestuous weather and the tumultuary conflict was continued from the dawn to the extinction of light. The enemies of the Genoese applaud their prowess the friends of the Venetians are dissatisfied with their behaviour but all parties agree in praising the skill and boldness of the Catalans, who with many wounds, sustained the brunt of the action On the separation of the fleets, the event might appear doubtful but the thirteen Genoese galleys that had been sunk or taken were compensated by a double loss of the allies of fourteen Venetians ten Catalans and two Greeks and even the grief of the conquerors expressed the assurance and habit of more decisive victories. Pisani confessed his defeat by retiring into a fortified harbour from whence under the pretext of the orders of the senate he steered with a broken and flying squadron for the isle of Candia and abandoned to his rivals the sovereignty of the sea. In a public epistle [84] addressed to the doge and senate Petrarch employs his eloquence to reconcile the maritime powers, the two luminaries of Italy The orator celebrates the valour and victory of the Genoese the first of men in the exercise of naval war he drops a tear on the misfortunes of their Venetian brethren but he exhorts them to pursue with fire and sword the base and perfidious Greeks to purge the metropolis of the East from the heresy with which it was infected Deserted by their friends the Greeks were incapable of resistance and three months after the battle the emperor Cantacuzene solicited and subscribed a treaty which for ever banished the Venetians and Catalans, and granted to the Genoese a monopoly of trade and almost a right of dominion The Roman Empire (I smile in transcribing the name) might soon have sunk into a province of Genoa if the ambition of the republic had not been checked by the ruin of her freedom and naval power A long contest of one hundred and thirty years was determined by the triumph of Venice and the factions of the Genoese compelled them to seek for domestic peace under the protection of a foreign lord the duke of Milan or the French king Yet the spirit of commerce survived that of conquest and the colony of Pera still awed the capital and navigated the Euxine till it was involved by the Turks in the final servitude of Constantinople itself

CHAPTER LXIV

Conquests of Zingis Khan and the Moguls from China to Poland Escape of Constantinople and the Greeks Origin of the Ottoman Turks in Bithynia Reigns and Victories of Othman, Orchan, Amurath the First, and Bajazet the First Foundation and Progress of the Turkish Monarchy in Asia and Europe Danger of Constantinople and the Greek Empire

From the petty quarrels of a city and her suburbs, from the cowardice and discord of the falling Greeks, I shall now ascend to the victorious Turks whose domestic slavery was ennobled by martial discipline religious enthusiasm, and the energy of the national character The rise and progress of the Ottomans, the present sovereigns of Constantinople are connected with the most important scenes of modern history but they are founded on a previous knowledge of the great eruption of the Moguls and Tartars whose rapid conquests foundations of their humble factories, and their principal establishment of Caffa[48] was besieged without effect by the Tartar powers Destitute of a navy, the Greeks were oppressed by these haughty merchants who fed or famished Constantinople according to their interest They proceeded to usurp the customs the fishery and even the toll of the Bosphorus and while they derived from these objects a revenue of two hundred thousand pieces of gold a remnant of thirty thousand was reluctantly allowed to the emperor [49] The colony of Pera or Galata acted in peace and war as an independent state and as it will happen in distant settlements, the Genoese podestà too often forgot that he was the servant of his own masters

These usurpations were encouraged by the weakness of the elder Andronicus and by the civil wars that afflicted his age and the minority of his grandson The talents of Cantacuzene were employed to the ruin rather than the restoration of the empire and after his domestic victory he was condemned to an ignominious trial whether the Greeks or the Genoese should reign in Constantinople The merchants of Pera were offended by his refusal of some contiguous lands some commanding heights which they proposed to cover with new fortifications and in the absence of the emperor who was detained at Damotica by sickness they ventured to brave the debility of a female reign A Byzantine vessel which had presumed to fish at the mouth of the harbour was sunk by these audacious strangers the fishermen were murdered Instead of suing for pardon the Genoese demanded satisfaction required in a haughty strain that the Greeks should renounce the exercise of navigation and encountered with regular arms the first sallies of the popular indignation They instantly occupied the debatable land and by the labour of a whole people of either sex and of every age the wall was raised and the ditch was sunk with incredible speed At the same time they attacked and burnt two Byzantine galleys while the three others the remainder of the Imperial navy escaped from their hands the habitations without the gates or along the shore were pillaged and destroyed and the care of the regent of the empress Irene was confined to the preservation of the city The return of Cantacuzene dispelled the public consternation the emperor inclined to peaceful counsels but he yielded to the obstinacy of his enemies who rejected all reasonable terms and to the ardour of his subjects, who threatened in the style of Scripture to break them in pieces like a potter's vessel Yet they reluctantly paid the taxes that he imposed for the construction of ships and the expenses of the war and as the two nations were masters, the one of the land the other of the sea, Constantinople and Pera were pressed by the evils of a mutual siege The merchants of the colony, who had believed that a few days would terminate the war already murmured at their losses the succours from their mother-country were delayed by the factions of Genoa and the most cautious embraced the opportunity of a Rhodian vessel to remove their families and effects from the scene of hostility In the spring the Byzantine fleet seven galleys and a train of smaller vessels issued from the mouth of the harbour, and steered in a single line along the shore of Pera unskilfully presenting their sides to the beaks of the adverse squadron The crews were composed of peasants and mechanics nor was their ignorance compensated by the native courage of barbarians the wind was strong the waves were rough and no sooner did the Greeks perceive a distant and inactive enemy than they leaped headlong into the sea from a doubtful to an inevitable peril The troops that marched to the attack of the lines of Pera were struck at the same moment with a similar panic and the Genoese were astonished and almost ashamed at their double victory Their triumphant vessels crowned with flowers and dragging after them the captive galleys repeatedly passed and repassed before the palace the only virtue of the emperor was patience, and the hope of revenge his sole consolation. Yet the distress of both parties interposed a temporary agreement and the shame of the empire was disguised by a thin vein of dignity and power Summoning the chiefs of the colony Cantacuzene affected to despise the trivial object of the debate and after a mild reproof most liberally granted the lands which had been previously resigned to the seeming custody of his officers [50]

But the emperor was soon solicited to violate the treaty and to join his arms with the Venetians the perpetual enemies of Genoa and her colonies. While he compared the reasons of peace and war his moderation was provoked by a wanton insult of the inhabitants of Pera who discharged from their rampart a large stone that fell in the midst of Constantinople. On his just complaint they coldly blamed the imprudence of their engineer but the next day the insult was repeated and they exulted in a second proof that the royal city was not beyond service and tribute in the mosque of Bochara the insolent victor might trample the Koran under his horse's feet but the calm legislator respected the prophets and pontiffs of the most hostile sects. The reason of Zingis was not informed by books the khan could neither read nor write and except the tribe of the Igours, the greatest part of the Moguls and Tartars were as illiterate as their sovereign The memory of their exploits was preserved by tradition sixty-eight years after the death of Zingis these traditions were collected and transcribed [7] the brevity of their domestic annals may be supplied by the Chinese,[8] Persians,[9] Armenians,[10] Syrians,[11] Arabians,[12] Greeks,[13] Russians,[14] Poles,[15] Hungarians,[16] and Latins [17] and each nation will deserve credit in the relation of their own disasters and defeats [18]

The arms of Zingis and his lieutenants successively reduced the hordes of the desert, who pitched their tents between the wall of China and the Volga and the Mogul emperor became the monarch of the pastoral world the lord of many millions of shepherds and soldiers, who felt their united strength and were impatient to rush on the mild and wealthy climates of the south. His ancestors had been the tributaries of the Chinese emperors and Temugin himself had been disgraced by a title of honour and servitude. The court of Pekin was astonished by an embassy from its former vassal who in the tone of the king of nations exacted the tribute and obedience which he had paid and who affected to treat the son of heaven as the most contemptible of mankind A haughty answer disguised their secret apprehensions and their fears were soon justified by the march of innumerable squadrons, who pierced on all sides the feeble rampart of the great wall Ninety cities were stormed or starved by the Moguls ten only escaped and Zingis, from a knowledge of the filial piety of the Chinese covered his vanguard with their captive parents an unworthy and by degrees a fruitless, abuse of the virtue of his enemies. His invasion was supported by the revolt of a hundred thousand Khitans, who guarded the frontier yet he listened to a treaty and a princess of China, three thousand horses, five hundred youths and as many virgins, and a tribute of gold and silk, were the price of his retreat In his second expedition he compelled the Chinese emperor to retire beyond the Yellow River to a more southern residence. The siege of Pekin[19] was long and laborious the inhabitants were reduced by famine to decimate and devour their fellow-citizens when their ammunition was spent, they discharged ingots of gold and silver from their engines but the Moguls introduced a mine to the centre of the capital and the conflagration of the palace burnt above thirty days. China was desolated by Tartar war and domestic faction and the five northern provinces were added to the empire of Zingis.

In the West he touched the dominions of Mohammed sultan of Carizme, who reigned from the Persian Gulf to the borders of India and Turkestan and who in the proud imitation of Alexander the Great, forgot the servitude and ingratitude of his fathers to the house of Seljuk. It was the wish of Zingis to establish a friendly and commercial intercourse with the most powerful of the Moslem princes nor could he be tempted by the secret solicitations of the caliph of Bagdad who sacrificed to his personal wrongs the safety of the church and state. A rash and inhuman deed provoked and justified the Tartar arms in the invasion of the southern Asia A caravan of three ambassadors and one hundred and fifty merchants was arrested and murdered at Otrar by the command of Mohammed nor was it till after a demand and denial of justice, till he had prayed and fasted three nights on a mountain, that the Mogul emperor appealed to the judgment of God and his sword Our European battles, says a philosophic writer [20] are petty skirmishes, if compared to the numbers that have fought and fallen in the fields of Asia Seven hundred thousand Moguls and Tartars are said to have marched under the standard of Zingis and his four sons. In the vast plains that extend to the north of the Sihon or Jaxartes they were encountered by four hundred thousand soldiers of the sultan and in the first battle which was suspended by the night, one hundred and sixty thousand Carizmians were slain. Mohammed was astonished by the multitude and valour of his enemies he withdrew from the scene of danger and distributed his troops in the frontier towns trusting that the barbarians, invincible in the field would be repulsed by the length and difficulty of so many regular sieges. But the prudence of Zingis had formed a body of Chinese engineers, skilled in the mechanic arts informed perhaps of the secret of gunpowder and capable, under his discipline of attacking a foreign country with more vigour and success than they had defended their own. The Persian historians will relate the sieges and reduction of Otrar Cogende Bochara Samarcand Carizme, Herat Merou Nisabour Balch, may be compared with the primitive convulsions of nature, which have agitated and altered the surface of the globe I have long since asserted my claim to introduce the nations, the immediate or remote authors of the fall of the Roman empire, nor can I refuse myself to those events which from their uncommon magnitude, will interest a philosophic mind in the history of blood [1]

From the spacious highlands between China Siberia and the Caspian Sea the tide of emigration and war has repeatedly been poured These ancient seats of the Huns and Turks were occupied in the twelfth century by many pastoral tribes of the same descent and similar manners which were united and led to conquest by the formidable Zingis In his ascent to greatness that barbarian (whose private appellation was Temugin) had trampled on the necks of his equals His birth was noble, but it was in the pride of victory that the prince or people deduced his seventh ancestor from the immaculate conception of a virgin His father had reigned over thirteen hordes which composed about thirty or forty thousand families above two-thirds refused to pay tithes or obedience to his infant son and at the age of thirteen Temugin fought a battle against his rebellious subjects The future conqueror of Asia was reduced to fly and to obey but he rose superior to his fortune and in his fortieth year he had established his fame and dominion over the circumjacent tribes In a state of society in which policy is rude and valour is universal the ascendant of one man must be founded on his power and resolution to punish his enemies and recompense his friends His first military league was ratified by the simple rites of sacrificing a horse and tasting of a running stream Temugin pledged himself to divide with his followers the sweets and bitters of life and when he had shared among them his horses and apparel he was rich in their gratitude and his own hopes After his first victory he placed seventy caldrons on the fire and seventy of the most guilty rebels were cast headlong into the boiling water The sphere of his attraction was continually enlarged by the ruin of the proud and the submission of the prudent and the boldest chieftains might tremble when they beheld enchased in silver the skull of the khan of the Keraites [2] who under the name of Prester John, had corresponded with the Roman pontiff and the princes of Europe The ambition of Temugin condescended to employ the arts of superstition and it was from a naked prophet who could ascend to heaven on a white horse, that he accepted the title of Zingis [3] the most great and a divine right to the conquest and dominion of the earth. In a general couroultai, or diet, he was seated on a felt, which was long afterwards revered as a relic, and solemnly proclaimed great khan or emperor of the Moguls[4] and Tartars [5] Of these kindred though rival names the former had given birth to the imperial race and the latter has been extended by accident or error over the spacious wilderness of the north

The code of laws which Zingis dictated to his subjects was adapted to the preservation of domestic peace and the exercise of foreign hostility The punishment of death was inflicted on the crimes of adultery, murder perjury and the capital thefts of a horse or ox, and the fiercest of men were mild and just in their intercourse with each other The future election of the great khan was vested in the princes of his family and the heads of the tribes and the regulations of the chase were essential to the pleasures and plenty of a Tartar camp The victorious nation was held sacred from all servile labours which were abandoned to slaves and strangers and every labour was servile except the profession of arms The service and discipline of the troops who were armed with bows scimitars and iron maces, and divided by hundreds, thousands and ten thousands were the institutions of a veteran commander Each officer and soldier was made responsible under pain of death for the safety and honour of his companions and the spirit of conquest breathed in the law that peace should never be granted unless to a vanquished and suppliant enemy But it is the religion of Zingis that best deserves our wonder and applause The Catholic inquisitors of Europe who defended nonsense by cruelty might have been confounded by the example of a barbarian who anticipated the lessons of philosophy [6] and established by his laws a system of pure theism and perfect toleration His first and only article of faith was the existence of one God the Author of all good who fills by his presence the heavens and earth, which he has created by his power The Tartars and Moguls were addicted to the idols of their peculiar tribes and many of them had been converted by the foreign missionaries to the religions of Moses, of Mohammed and of Christ. These various systems in freedom and concord were taught and practised within the precincts of the same camp and the Bonze the Imam, the Rabbi the Nestorian and the Latin priest, enjoyed the same honourable exemption from employed the use of gunpowder in cannon and bombs appears as a familiar practice [33] and the sieges were conducted by the Mohammedans and Franks, who had been liberally invited into the service of Cublai After passing the great river the troops and artillery were conveyed along a series of canals till they invested the royal residence of Hamcheu or Quinsay in the country of silk, the most delicious climate of China. The emperor a defenceless youth surrendered his person and sceptre and before he was sent in exile into Tartary he struck nine times the ground with his forehead to adore in prayer or thanksgiving the mercy of the great khan. Yet the war (it was now styled a rebellion) was still maintained in the southern provinces from Hamcheu to Canton and the obstinate remnant of independence and hostility was transported from the land to the sea. But when the fleet of the Song was surrounded and oppressed by a superior armament, their last champion leaped into the waves with his infant emperor in his arms. It is more glorious, he cried, to die a prince than to live a slave. A hundred thousand Chinese imitated his example and the whole empire from Tonkin to the great wall, submitted to the dominion of Cublai. His boundless ambition aspired to the conquest of Japan his fleet was twice shipwrecked and the lives of a hundred thousand Moguls and Chinese were sacrificed in the fruitless expedition. But the circumjacent kingdoms, Corea, Tonkin Cochin-china Pegu Bengal, and Thibet, were reduced in different degrees of tribute and obedience by the effort or terror of his arms. He explored the Indian Ocean with a fleet of a thousand ships they sailed in sixty-eight days most probably to the isle of Borneo under the equinoctial line and though they returned not without spoil or glory the emperor was dissatisfied that the savage king had escaped from their hands

II. The conquest of Hindostan by the Moguls was reserved in a later period for the house of Timour but that of Iran or Persia was achieved by Holagou Khan the grandson of Zingis, the brother and lieutenant of the two successive emperors Mangou and Cublai I shall not enumerate the crowd of sultans, emirs, and atabeks whom he trampled into dust but the extirpation of the Assassins or Ismaelians[34] of Persia, may be considered as a service to mankind. Among the hills to the south of the Caspian these odious sectaries had reigned with impunity above a hundred and sixty years and their prince, or imam, established his lieutenant to lead and govern the colony of Mount Libanus, so famous and formidable in the history of the crusades.[35] With the fanaticism of the Koran the Ismaelians had blended the Indian transmigration and the visions of their own prophets and it was their first duty to devote their souls and bodies in blind obedience to the vicar of God The daggers of his missionaries were felt both in the East and West the Christians and the Moslems enumerate and perhaps multiply the illustrious victims that were sacrificed to the zeal avarice or resentment of the old man (as he was corruptly styled) of the mountain. But these daggers, his only arms, were broken by the sword of Holagou and not a vestige is left of the enemies of mankind except the word assassin which in the most odious sense has been adopted in the languages of Europe The extinction of the Abbassides cannot be indifferent to the spectators of their greatness and decline. Since the fall of their Seljukian tyrants the caliphs had recovered their lawful dominion of Bagdad and the Arabian Irak but the city was distracted by theological factions, and the commander of the faithful was lost in a harem of seven hundred concubines. The invasion of the Moguls he encountered with feeble arms and haughty embassies. On the divine decree, said the caliph Mostasem is founded the throne of the sons of Abbas and their foes shall surely be destroyed in this world and in the next. Who is this Holagou that dares to rise against them? If he be desirous of peace let him instantly depart from the sacred territory and perhaps he may obtain from our clemency the pardon of his fault. This presumption was cherished by a perfidious vizir who assured his master that, even if the barbarians had entered the city the women and children from the terraces would be sufficient to overwhelm them with stones. But when Holagou touched the phantom, it instantly vanished into smoke. After a siege of two months Bagdad was stormed and sacked by the Moguls and their savage commander pronounced the death of the caliph Mostasem the last of the temporal successors of Mohammed whose noble kinsmen of the race of Abbas had reigned in Asia above five hundred years. Whatever might be the designs of the conqueror the holy cities of Mecca and Medina[36] were protected by the Arabian desert but the Moguls spread beyond the Tigris and Euphrates, pillaged Aleppo and Damascus, and threatened to join the Franks in the deliverance of Jerusalem. Egypt was lost had she been defended only by

and Candahar and the conquest of the rich and populous countries of Transoxiana, Carizme and Chorazan The destructive hostilities of Attila and the Huns have long since been elucidated by the example of Zingis and the Moguls, and in this more proper place I shall be content to observe, that, from the Caspian to the Indus they ruined a tract of many hundred miles, which was adorned with the habitations and labours of mankind and that five centuries have not been sufficient to repair the ravages of four years The Mogul emperor encouraged or indulged the fury of his troops the hope of future possession was lost in the ardour of rapine and slaughter and the cause of the war exasperated their native fierceness by the pretence of justice and revenge The downfall and death of the sultan Mohammed who expired unpitied and alone in a desert island of the Caspian Sea is a poor atonement for the calamities of which he was the author Could the Carizmian empire have been saved by a single hero it would have been saved by his son Gelaleddin whose active valour repeatedly checked the Moguls in the career of victory Retreating as he fought to the banks of the Indus he was oppressed by their innumerable host till, in the last moment of despair Gelaleddin spurred his horse into the waves swam one of the broadest and most rapid rivers of Asia and extorted the admiration and applause of Zingis himself It was in this camp that the Mogul conqueror yielded with reluctance to the murmurs of his weary and wealthy troops who sighed for the enjoyment of their native land Incumbered with the spoils of Asia he slowly measured back his footsteps, betrayed some pity for the misery of the vanquished and declared his intention of rebuilding the cities which had been swept away by the tempest of his arms After he had repassed the Oxus and Jaxartes he was joined by two generals whom he had detached with thirty thousand horse to subdue the western provinces of Persia They had trampled on the nations which opposed their passage penetrated through the gates of Derbend traversed the Volga and the desert and accomplished the circuit of the Caspian Sea by an expedition which had never been attempted, and has never been repeated The return of Zingis was signalised by the overthrow of the rebellious or independent kingdoms of Tartary and he died in the fulness of years and glory, with his last breath exhorting and instructing his sons to achieve the conquest of the Chinese empire

The harem of Zingis was composed of five hundred wives and concubines and of his numerous progeny four sons illustrious by their birth and merit exercised under their father the principal offices of peace and war Toushi was his great huntsman, Zagatai[21] his judge, Octai his minister and Tuli his general, and their names and actions are often conspicuous in the history of his conquests Firmly united for their own and the public interest, the three brothers and their families were content with dependent sceptres and Octai by general consent was proclaimed great khan or emperor of the Moguls and Tartars He was succeeded by his son Gayuk after whose death the empire devolved to his cousins Mangou and Cublai the sons of Tuli and the grandsons of Zingis. In the sixty-eight years of his four first successors the Mogul subdued almost all Asia and a large portion of Europe Without confining myself to the order of time without expatiating on the detail of events I shall present a general picture of the progress of their arms I In the East II In the South III In the West and IV In the North

I Before the invasion of Zingis, China was divided into two empires or dynasties of the North and South[22] and the difference of origin and interest was smoothed by a general conformity of laws, language and national manners The Northern empire which had been dismembered by Zingis was finally subdued seven years after his death After the loss of Pekin the emperor had fixed his residence at Kaifong a city many leagues in circumference and which contained according to the Chinese annals fourteen hundred thousand families of inhabitants and fugitives He escaped from thence with only seven horsemen and made his last stand in a third capital till at length the hopeless monarch protesting his innocence and accusing his fortune ascended a funeral pile and gave orders that as soon as he had stabbed himself the fire should be kindled by his attendants The dynasty of the Song the native and ancient sovereigns of the whole empire, survived about forty five years the fall of the Northern usurpers and the perfect conquest was reserved for the arms of Cublai During this interval the Moguls were often diverted by foreign wars and if the Chinese seldom dared to meet their victors in the field their passive courage presented an endless succession of cities to storm and of millions to slaughter In the attack and defence of places the engines of antiquity and the Greek fire were alternately religion and liberty it might be apprehended that the shepherds of Scythia would extinguish her cities, her arts, and all the institutions of civil society The Roman pontiff attempted to appease and convert these invincible pagans by a mission of Franciscan and Dominican friars but he was astonished by the reply of the khan that the sons of God and of Zingis were invested with a divine power to subdue or extirpate the nations and that the pope would be involved in the universal destruction unless he visited in person and as a suppliant the royal horde. The emperor Frederic the Second embraced a more generous mode of defence and his letters to the kings of France and England and the princes of Germany represented the common danger and urged them to arm their vassals in this just and rational crusade.[29] The Tartars themselves were awed by the fame and valour of the Franks the town of Neustadt in Austria was bravely defended against them by fifty knights and twenty cross-bows and they raised the siege on the appearance of a German army After wasting the adjacent kingdoms of Servia Bosnia, and Bulgaria Batou slowly retreated from the Danube to the Volga to enjoy the rewards of victory in the city and palace of Serai which started at his command from the midst of the desert.

IV Even the poor and frozen regions of the north attracted the arms of the Moguls Sheibani khan, the brother of the great Batou, led a horde of fifteen thousand families into the wilds of Siberia and his descendants reigned at Tobolskoi above three centuries till the Russian conquest. The spirit of enterprise which pursued the course of the Oby and Yenisei must have led to the discovery of the Icy Sea After brushing away the monstrous fables of men with dogs heads and cloven feet, we shall find that, fifteen years after the death of Zingis, the Moguls were informed of the name and manners of the Samoyedes in the neighbourhood of the polar circle, who dwelt in subterraneous huts and derived their furs and their food from the sole occupation of hunting [30]

While China Syria and Poland were invaded at the same time by the Moguls and Tartars, the authors of the mighty mischief were content with the knowledge and declaration that their word was the sword of death. Like the first caliphs, the first successors of Zingis seldom appeared in person at the head of their victorious armies. On the banks of the Onon and Selinga, the royal or golden horde exhibited the contrast of simplicity and greatness of the roasted sheep and mare s milk which composed their banquets and of a distribution in one day of five hundred waggons of gold and silver The ambassadors and princes of Europe and Asia were compelled to undertake this distant and laborious pilgrimage and the life and reign of the great dukes of Russia the kings of Georgia and Armenia the sultans of Iconium and the emirs of Persia, were decided by the frown or smile of the great khan. The sons and grandsons of Zingis had been accustomed to the pastoral life but the village of Caracorum[31] was gradually ennobled by their election and residence. A change of manners is implied in the removal of Octai and Mangou from a tent to a house and their example was imitated by the princes of their family and the great officers of the empire. Instead of the boundless forest, the enclosure of a park afforded the more indolent pleasures of the chase their new habitations were decorated with painting and sculpture their superfluous treasures were cast in fountains, and basins, and statues of massy silver and the artists of China and Paris vied with each other in the service of the great khan.[32] Caracorum contained two streets, the one of Chinese mechanics, the other of Mohammedan traders and the places of religious worship, one Nestorian church two mosques, and twelve temples of various idols, may represent in some degree the number and division of inhabitants. Yet a French missionary declares that the town of St. Denys, near Paris, was more considerable than the Tartar capital and that the whole palace of Mangou was scarcely equal to a tenth part of that Benedictine abbey The conquests of Russia and Syria might amuse the vanity of the great khans but they were seated on the borders of China the acquisition of that empire was the nearest and most interesting object and they might learn from their pastoral economy that it is for the advantage of the shepherd to protect and propagate his flock. I have already celebrated the wisdom and virtue of a mandarin who prevented the desolation of five populous and cultivated provinces. In a spotless administration of thirty years this friend of his country and of mankind continually laboured to mitigate or suspend the havoc of war to save the monuments, and to rekindle the flame, of science to restrain the military commander by the restoration of civil magistrates and to instil the love of peace and justice into the minds of the Moguls He struggled with the barbarism of the first conquerors but his salutary lessons produced a rich harvest in the second generation. The northern and by de her feeble offspring but the Mamalukes had breathed in their infancy the keenness of a Scythian air equal in valour superior in discipline, they met the Moguls in many a well fought field, and drove back the stream of hostility to the eastward of the Euphrates But it overflowed with resistless violence the kingdoms of Armenia and Anatolia of which the former was possessed by the Christians and the latter by the Turks The sultans of Iconium opposed some resistance to the Mogul arms till Azzadin sought a refuge among the Greeks of Constantinople and his feeble successors the last of the Seljukian dynasty, were finally extirpated by the khans of Persia

III No sooner had Octai subverted the northern empire of China than he resolved to visit with his arms the most remote countries of the West. Fifteen hundred thousand Moguls and Tartars were inscribed on the military roll of these the great khan selected a third which he intrusted to the command of his nephew Batou the son of Tuli who reigned over his father s conquests to the north of the Caspian Sea After a festival of forty da*ys Batou set for*wards on this great expedition and such was the speed and ardour of his innumerable squadrons that in less than six years they had measured a line of ninety degrees of longitude a fourth part of the circumference of the globe The great rivers of Asia and Europe the Volga and Kama, the Don and Borysthenes the Vistula and Danube they either swam with their horses or passed on the ice or traversed in leathern boats which followed the camp and transported their waggons and artillery By the first victories of Batou the remains of national freedom were eradicated in the immense plains of Turkestan and Kipzak [37] In his rapid progress he overran the kingdoms as they are now styled of Astracan and Cazan, and the troops which he detached towards Mount Caucasus explored the most secret recesses of Georgia and Circassia The civil discord of the great dukes or princes, of Russia betrayed their country to the Tartars They spread from Livonia to the Black Sea and both Moscow and Kiow the modern and the ancient capitals were reduced to ashes, a temporary ruin less fatal than the deep and perhaps indelible mark which a servitude of two hundred years has imprinted on the character of the Russians The Tartars ravaged with equal fury the countries which they hoped to possess and those which they were hastening to leave From the permanent conquest of Russia they made a deadly, though transient, inroad into the heart of Poland, and as far as the borders of Germany The cities of Lublin and Cracow were obliterated they approached the shores of the Baltic and in the battle of Lignitz they defeated the dukes of Silesia, the Polish palatines, and the great master of the Teutonic order and filled nine sacks with the right ears of the slain. From Lignitz, the extreme point of their western march they turned aside to the invasion of Hungary and the presence or spirit of Batou inspired the host of five hundred thousand men the Carpathian hills could not be long impervious to their divided columns and their approach had been fondly disbelieved till it was irresistibly felt The king, Bela the Fourth, assembled the military force of his counts and bishops but he had alienated the nation by adopting a vagrant horde of forty thousand families of Comans and these savage guests were provoked to revolt by the suspicion of treachery and the murder of their prince. The whole country north of the Danube was lost in a day and depopulated in a summer and the ruins of cities and churches were overspread with the bones of the natives who expiated the sins of their Turkish ancestors. An ecclesiastic who fled from the sack of Waradin describes the calamities which he had seen or suffered, and the sanguinary rage of sieges and battles is far less atrocious than the treatment of the fugitives who had been allured from the woods under a promise of peace and pardon and who were coolly slaughtered as soon as they had performed the labours of the harvest and vintage. In the winter the Tartars passed the Danube on the ice and advanced to Gran or Strigonium a German colony and the metropolis of the kingdom Thirty engines were planted against the walls the ditches were filled with sacks of earth and dead bodies and after a promiscuous massacre three hundred noble matrons were slain in the presence of the khan Of all the cities and fortresses of Hungary three alone survived the Tartar invasion and the unfortunate Bela hid his head among the islands of the Adriatic.

The Latin world was darkened by this cloud of savage hostility a Russian fugitive carried the alarm to Sweden and the remote nations of the Baltic and the ocean trembled at the approach of the Tartars [*] whom their fear and ignorance were inclined to separate from the human species Since the invasion of the Arabs in the eighth century Europe had never been exposed to a similar calamity and if the disciples of Mohammed would have oppressed her the groundless panic of the citizens of Nice will present an image of the terror which he had inspired The accident of a procession and the sound of a doleful litany From the fury of the Tartars, good Lord deliver us had scattered the hasty report of an assault and massacre In the blind credulity of fear the streets of Nice were crowded with thousands of both sexes, who knew not from what or to whom they fled and some hours elapsed before the firmness of the military officers could relieve the city from this imaginary foe. But the ambition of Hola gou and his successors was fortunately diverted by the conquest of Bagdad and a long vicissitude of Syrian wars their hostility to the Moslems inclined them to unite with the Greeks and Franks[37] and their generosity or contempt had offered the kingdom of Anatolia as the reward of an Armenian vassal. The fragments of the Seljukian monarchy were disputed by the emirs who had occupied the cities or the mountains but they all confessed the supremacy of the khans of Persia and he often interposed his authority and sometimes his arms, to check their depredations, and to preserve the peace and balance of his Turkish frontier The death of Cazan,[38] one of the greatest and most accom plished princes of the house of Zingis, removed this salutary control and the decline of the Moguls gave a free scope to the rise and prog ress of the OTTOMAN EMPIRE[39]

After the retreat of Zingis the sultan Gela leddin of Carizme had returned from India to the possession and defence of his Persian king doms. In the peace of eleven years that hero fought in person fourteen battles and such was his activity that he led his cavalry in seventeen days from Teflis to Kerman a march of a thou sand miles. Yet he was oppressed by the jeal ousy of the Moslem princes and the innumer able armies of th Moguls and after his last defeat Gelaleddin perished ignobly in the mountains of Curdistan His death dissolved a veteran and adventurous army which included under the name of Carizmians or Corasmins many Turkman hordes that had attached them selves to the sultan s fortune. The bolder and more powerful chiefs invaded Syria, and vio lated the holy sepulchre of Jerusalem the more humble engaged in the service of Aladin sultan of Iconium, and among these were the obscure fathers of the Ottoman line They had formerly pitched their tents near the southern banks of the Oxus, in the plains of Mahan and Nesa and it is somewhat remarkable that the same spot should have produced the first authors of the Parthian and Turkish empires. At the head, or in the rear of a Carizmian army Soliman Shah was drowned in the passage of the Eu phrates his son Orthogrul became the soldier and subject of Aladin and established at Sur gut, on the banks of the Sangar a camp of four hundred families or tents, whom he governed fifty two years both in peace and war He was the father of Thaman, or Athman whose Turk ish name has been melted into the appellation of the caliph Othman and if we describe that pastoral chief as a shepherd and a robber we must separate from those characters all idea of ignominy and baseness. Othman possessed and perhaps surpassed the ordinary virtues of a soldier and the circumstances of time and place were propitious to his independence and success. The Seljukian dynasty was no more, and the distance and decline of the Mogul khans soon enfranchised him from the control of a superior He was situate on the verge of the Greek empire the Koran sanctified his gazi or holy war against the infidels and their polit ical errors unlocked the passes of Mount Olym pus, and invited him to descend into the plains of Bithynia. Till the reign of Palæologus these passes had been vigilantly guarded by the militia of the country who were repaid by their own safety and an exemption from taxes. The emperor abolished their privilege and assumed their office but the tribute was rigorously col lected, the custody of the passes was neglected, and the hardy mountaineers degenerated into a trembling crowd of peasants without spirit or discipline. It was on the twenty-seventh of July in the year twelve hundred and ninety nine of the Christian era, that Othman first invaded the territory of Nicodemia[40] and the singular accuracy of the date seems to disclose some foresight of the rapid and destructive growth of the monster The annals of the twenty seven years of his reign would exhibit a repetition of the same inroads and his hereditary troops were multiplied in each campaign by the ac cession of captives and volunteers. Instead of retreating to the hills, he maintained the most useful and defensible posts, fortified the towns and castles which he had first pillaged and re nounced the pastoral life for the baths and palaces of his infant capitals. But it was not till Othman was oppressed by age and infirmities that he received the welcome news of the con quest of Prusa which had been surrendered by famine or treachery to the arms of his son Orchan. The glory of Othman is chiefly founded on that of his descendants but the Turks have grees the southern, empire acquiesced in the government of Cublai the lieutenant, and afterwards the successor, of Mangou, and the nation was loyal to a prince who had been educated in the manners of China He restored the forms of her venerable constitution, and the victors submitted to the laws the fashions and even the prejudices of the vanquished people This peaceful triumph which has been more than once repeated, may be ascribed in a great measure to the numbers and servitude of the Chinese The Mogul army was dissolved in a vast and populous country and their emperors adopted with pleasure a political system which gives to the prince the solid substance of despotism, and leaves to the subject the empty names of philosophy, freedom and filial obedience Under the reign of Cublai letters and commerce peace and justice were restored the great canal of five hundred miles was opened from Nankin to the capital he fixed his residence at Pekin and displayed in his court the magnificence of the greatest monarch of Asia Yet this learned prince declined from the pure and simple religion of his great ancestor he sacrificed to the idol Fo and his blind attachment to the lamas of Thibet and the bonzes of China[32] provoked the censure of the disciples of Confucius His successors polluted the palace with a crowd of eunuchs physicians and astrologers while thirteen millions of their subjects were consumed in the provinces by famine One hundred and forty years after the death of Zingis his degenerate race the dynasty of the Yuen was expelled by a revolt of the native Chinese and the Mogul emperors were lost in the oblivion of the desert Before this revolution they had forfeited their supremacy over the dependent branches of their house the khans of Kipzak and Russia the khans of Zagatai or Transoxiana and the khans of Iran or Persia By their distance and power these royal lieutenants had soon been released from the duties of obedience and after the death of Cublai they scorned to accept a sceptre or a title from his unworthy successors According to their respective situation they maintained the simplicity of the pastoral life or assumed the luxury of the cities of Asia but the princes and their hordes were alike disposed for the reception of a foreign worship After some hesitation between the Gospel and the Koran they conformed to the religion of Mohammed and while they adopted for their brethren the Arabs and Persians they renounced all intercourse with the ancient Moguls, the idolaters of China.

In this shipwreck of nations some surprise may be excited by the escape of the Roman empire, whose relics, at the time of the Mogul invasion were dismembered by the Greeks and Latins Less potent than Alexander, they were pressed like the Macedonian both in Europe and Asia by the shepherds of Scythia and had the Tartars undertaken the siege Constantinople must have yielded to the fate of Pekin, Samarcand, and Bagdad The glorious and voluntary retreat of Batou from the Danube was insulted by the vain triumph of the Franks and Greeks[34] and in a second expedition death surprised him in full march to attack the capital of the Cæsars His brother Borga carried the Tartar arms into Bulgaria and Thrace but he was diverted from the Byzantine war by a visit to Novogorod in the fifty seventh degree of latitude where he numbered the inhabitants, and regulated the tributes of Russia. The Mogul khan formed an alliance with the Mamalukes against his brethren of Persia three hundred thousand horse penetrated through the gates of Derbend and the Greeks might rejoice in the first example of domestic war After the recovery of Constantinople Michael Palæologus,[35] at a distance from his court and army was surprised and surrounded in a Thracian castle by twenty thousand Tartars But the object of their march was a private interest they came to the deliverance of Azzadin the Turkish sultan and were content with his person and the treasure of the emperor Their general Noga whose name is perpetuated in the hordes of Astracan raised a formidable rebellion against Mengo Timour, the third of the khans of Kipzak obtained in marriage Maria the natural daughter of Palæologus and guarded the dominions of his friend and father The subsequent invasions of a Scythian cast were those of outlaws and fugitives and some thousands of Alani and Comans who had been driven from their native seats were reclaimed from a vagrant life and enlisted in the service of the empire Such was the influence in Europe of the invasion of the Moguls The first terror of their arms secured rather than disturbed the peace of the Roman Asia The sultan of Iconium solicited a personal interview with John Vataces and his artful policy encouraged the Turks to defend their barrier against the common enemy[36] That barrier indeed was soon overthrown and the servitude and ruin of the Seljukians exposed the nakedness of the Greeks The formidable Holagou threatened to march to Constantinople at the head of four hundred thousand men and

Cantacuzene was tempted to prevent, or imitate his adversaries, by calling to his aid the public enemies of his religion and country Amir the son of Aidin concealed under a Turkish garb the humanity and politeness of a Greek he was united with the great domestic by mutual esteem and reciprocal services and their friendship is compared in the vain rhetoric of the times, to the perfect union of Orestes and Pylades.[47] On the report of the danger of his friend who was persecuted by an ungrateful court, the prince of Ionia assembled at Smyrna a fleet of three hundred vessels, with an army of twenty nine thousand men sailed in the depth of winter and cast anchor at the mouth of the Hebrus. From thence with a chosen band of two thousand Turks, he marched along the banks of the river and rescued the empress who was besieged in Demotica by the wild Bulgarians. At that disastrous moment the life or death of his beloved Cantacuzene was concealed by his flight into Servia but the grateful Irene, impatient to behold her deliverer invited him to enter the city and accompanied her message with a present of rich apparel and a hundred horses. By a peculiar strain of delicacy the gentle barbarian refused, in the absence of an unfortunate friend to visit his wife or to taste the luxuries of the palace sustained in his tent the rigour of the winter and rejected the hospitable gift, that he might share the hardships of two thousand companions, all as deserving as himself of that honour and distinction. Necessity and revenge might justify his predatory excursions by sea and land he left nine thousand five hundred men for the guard of his fleet and persevered in the fruitless search of Cantacuzene, till his embarkation was hastened by a fictitious letter the severity of the season, the clamours of his independent troops and the weight of his spoil and captives In the prosecution of the civil war the prince of Ionia twice returned to Europe, joined his arms with those of the emperor besieged Thessalonica, and threatened Constantinople Calumny might affix some reproach on his imperfect aid, his hasty departure and a bribe of ten thousand crowns which he accepted from the Byzantine court but his friend was satisfied and the conduct of Amir is excused by the more sacred duty of defending against the Latins his hereditary dominions The maritime power of the Turks had united the pope, the king of Cyprus the republic of Venice, and the order of St. John in a laudable crusade their galleys invaded the coast of Ionia and Amir was slain with an arrow in the attempt to wrest from the Rhodian knights the citadel of Smyrna.[48] Before his death he generously recommended another ally of his own nation not more sincere or zealous than himself but more able to afford a prompt and powerful succour, by his situation along the Propontis and in front of Constantinople. By the prospect of a more advantageous treaty the Turkish prince of Bithynia was detached from his engagements with Anne of Savoy and the pride of Orchan dictated the most solemn protestations, that if he could obtain the daughter of Cantacuzene he would invariably fulfil the duties of a subject and a son. Parental tenderness was silenced by the voice of ambition the Greek clergy connived at the marriage of a Christian princess with a sectary of Mohammed and the father of Theodora describes, with shameful satisfaction the dishonour of the purple.[49] A body of Turkish cavalry attended the ambassadors, who disembarked from thirty vessels, before his camp of Selymbria. A stately pavilion was erected in which the empress Irene passed the night with her daughters. In the morning Theodora ascended a throne, which was surrounded with curtains of silk and gold the troops were under arms but the emperor alone was on horseback. At a signal the curtains were suddenly withdrawn to disclose the bride, or the victim encircled by kneeling eunuchs and hymeneal torches the sound of flutes and trumpets proclaimed the joyful event and her pretended happiness was the theme of the nuptial song which was chanted by such poets as the age could produce. Without the rites of the church Theodora was delivered to her barbarous lord but it had been stipulated that she should preserve her religion in the harem of Bursa and her father celebrates her charity and devotion in this ambiguous situation. After his peaceful establishment on the throne of Constantinople the Greek emperor visited his Turkish ally who with four sons, by various wives, expected him at Scutari on the Asiatic shore The two princes partook, with seeming cordiality of the pleasures of the banquet and the chase and Theodora was permitted to repass the Bosphorus, and to enjoy some days in the society of her mother But the friendship of Orchan was subservient to his religion and interest and in the Genoese war he joined without a blush the enemies of Cantacuzene.

In the treaty with the empress Anne the Ottoman prince had inserted a singular condition, that it should be lawful for him to sell his pristranscribed or composed a royal testament of his last counsels of justice and moderation [41]

From the conquest of Prusa we may date the true era of the Ottoman empire The lives and possessions of the Christian subjects were redeemed by a tribute or ransom of thirty thousand crowns of gold and the city, by the labours of Orchan assumed the aspect of a Mohammedan capital Prusa was decorated with a mosque, a college and an hospital of royal foundation the Seljukian coin was changed for the name and impression of the new dynasty and the most skilful professors of human and divine knowledge attracted the Persian and Arabian students from the ancient schools of Oriental learning The office of vizir was instituted for Aladin the brother of Orchan and a different habit distinguished the citizens from the peasants the Moslems from the infidels All the troops of Othman had consisted of loose squadrons of Turkman cavalry, who served without pay and fought without discipline but a regular body of infantry was first established and trained by the prudence of his son A great number of volunteers was enrolled with a small stipend but with the permission of living at home, unless they were summoned to the field their rude manners and seditious temper disposed Orchan to educate his young captives as his soldiers and those of the prophet but the Turkish peasants were still allowed to mount on horseback and follow his standard with the appellation and the hopes of freebooters By these arts he formed an army of twenty five thousand Moslems a train of battering engines was framed for the use of sieges, and the first successful experiment was made on the cities of Nice and Nicomedia Orchan granted a safe conduct to all who were desirous of departing with their families and effects but the widows of the slain were given in marriage to the conquerors, and the sacrilegious plunder the books the vases and the images were sold or ransomed at Constantinople. The emperor Andronicus the Younger was vanquished and wounded by the son of Othman [42] he subdued the whole province or kingdom of Bithynia as far as the shores of the Bosphorus and Hellespont, and the Christians confessed the justice and clemency of a reign which claimed the voluntary attachment of the Turks of Asia Yet Orchan was content with the modest title of emir and in the list of his compeers the princes of Roum or Anatolia [43] his military forces were surpassed by the emirs of Ghermian and Caramania, each of whom could bring into the field an army of forty thousand men Their dominions were situate in the heart of the Seljukian kingdom but the holy warriors, though of inferior note who formed new principalities on the Greek empire are more conspicuous in the light of history The maritime country from the Propontis to the Mæander and the isle of Rhodes, so long threatened and so often pillaged was finally lost about the thirtieth year of Andronicus the Elder [44] Two Turkish chieftains, Sarukhan and Aidin left their names to their conquests and their conquests to their posterity The captivity or ruin of the seven churches of Asia was consummated and the barbarous lords of Ionia and Lydia still trample on the monuments of classic and Christian antiquity In the loss of Ephesus the Christians deplored the fall of the first angel the extinction of the first candlestick of the Revelations [45] the desolation is complete and the temple of Diana or the church of Mary will equally elude the search of the curious traveller The circus and three stately theatres of Laodicea are now peopled with wolves and foxes Sardes is reduced to a miserable village the God of Mohammed without a rival or a son is invoked in the mosques of Thyatira and Pergamus and the populousness of Smyrna is supported by the foreign trade of the Franks and Armenians. Philadelphia alone has been saved by prophecy or courage At a distance from the sea forgotten by the emperors encompassed on all sides by the Turks her valiant citizens defended their religion and freedom above fourscore years and at length capitulated with the proudest of the Ottomans Among the Greek colonies and churches of Asia Philadelphia is still erect—a column in a scene of ruins—a pleasing example that the paths of honour and safety may sometimes be the same The servitude of Rhodes was delayed above two centuries by the establishment of the knights of St John of Jerusalem [46] under the discipline of the order that island emerged into fame and opulence the noble and warlike monks were renowned by land and sea and the bulwark of Christendom provoked and repelled the arms of the Turks and Saracens.

The Greeks by their intestine divisions, were the authors of their final ruin During the civil wars of the elder and younger Andronicus, the son of Othman achieved almost without resistance the conquest of Bithynia and the same disorders encouraged the Turkish emirs of Lydia and Ionia to build a fleet and to pillage the adjacent islands and the sea-coast of Europe In the defence of his life and honour, called Janizaries (Yengi cheri or new soldiers) may their countenance be ever bright! their hand victorious! their sword keen! may their spear always hang over the heads of their enemies and wheresoever they go, may they return with a white face! [44] Such was the origin of these haughty troops, the terror of the nations, and sometimes of the sultans themselves. Their valour has declined their discipline is relaxed and their tumultuary array is incapable of contending with the order and weapons of modern tactics but at the time of their institution they possessed a decisive superiority in war since a regular body of infantry in constant exercise and pay was not maintained by any of the princes of Christendom. The Janizaries fought with the zeal of proselytes against their idolatrous countrymen and in the battle of Cossova the league and independence of the Sclavonian tribes was finally crushed As the conqueror walked over the field he observed that the greatest part of the slain consisted of beardless youths and listened to the flattering reply of his vizir that age and wisdom would have taught them not to oppose his irresistible arms. But the sword of his Janizaries could not defend him from the dagger of despair a Servian soldier started from the crowd of dead bodies, and Amurath was pierced to the belly with a mortal wound. The grandson of Othman was mild in his temper modest in his apparel and a lover of learning and virtue but the Moslems were scandalised at his absence from public worship and he was corrected by the firmness of the mufti, who dared to reject his testimony in a civil cause a mixture of servitude and freedom not unfrequent in Oriental history [45]

The character of Bajazet, the son and successor of Amurath is strongly expressed in his surname of Ilderim or the lightning and he might glory in an epithet which was drawn from the fiery energy of his soul and the rapidity of his destructive march. In the fourteen years of his reign [46] he incessantly moved at the head of his armies, from Boursa to Adrianople, from the Danube to the Euphrates and though he strenuously laboured for the propagation of the law he invaded with impartial ambition the Christian and Mohammedan princes of Europe and Asia From Angora to Amasia and Erzeroum, the northern regions of Anatolia were reduced to his obedience he stripped of their hereditary possessions his brother emirs of Ghermian and Caramania of Aidin and Sarukhan and after the conquest of Iconium the ancient kingdom of the Seljukians again revived in the Ottoman dynasty Nor were the conquests of Bajazet less rapid or important in Europe No sooner had he imposed a regular form of servitude on the Servians and Bulgarians than he passed the Danube to seek new enemies and new subjects in the heart of Moldavia.[47] Whatever yet adhered to the Greek empire in Thrace, Macedonia and Thessaly, acknowledged a Turkish master an obsequious bishop led him through the gates of Thermopylae into Greece and we may observe as a singular fact that the widow of a Spanish chief who possessed the ancient seat of the oracle of Delphi, deserved his favour by the sacrifice of a beauteous daughter The Turkish communication between Europe and Asia had been dangerous and doubtful till he stationed at Gallipoli a fleet of galleys, to command the Hellespont and intercept the Latin succours of Constantinople While the monarch indulged his passions in a boundless range of injustice and cruelty he imposed on his soldiers the most rigid laws of modesty and abstinence and the harvest was peaceably reaped and sold within the precincts of his camp Provoked by the loose and corrupt administration of justice he collected in a house the judges and lawyers of his dominions, who expected that in a few moments the fire would be kindled to reduce them to ashes. His ministers trembled in silence but an Æthiopian buffoon presumed to insinuate the true cause of the evil and future venality was left without excuse by annexing an adequate salary to the office of cadhi [48] The humble title of emir was no longer suitable to the Ottoman greatness and Bajazet condescended to accept a patent of sultan from the caliphs who served in Egypt under the yoke of the Mamalukes [49] a last and frivolous homage that was yielded by force to opinion by the Turkish conquerors to the house of Abbas and the successors of the Arabian prophet. The ambition of the sultan was inflamed by the obligation of deserving this august title and he turned his arms against the kingdom of Hungary the perpetual theatre of the Turkish victories and defeats. Sigismond the Hungarian king was the son and brother of the emperors of the West his cause was that of Europe and the church and on the report of his danger the bravest knights of France and Germany were eager to march under his standard and that of the cross. In the battle of Nicopolis Bajazet defeated a confederate army of a hundred thousand Christians, who had proudly boasted that if the sky should fall they could uphold it on their lances The far greater oners at Constantinople or transport them into Asia A naked crowd of Christians of both sexes and every age, of priests and monks of matrons and virgins was exposed in the public market, the whip was frequently used to quicken the charity of redemption and the indigent Greeks deplored the fate of their brethren who were led away to the worst evils of temporal and spiritual bondage [60] Cantacuzene was reduced to subscribe the same terms, and their execution must have been still more pernicious to the empire a body of ten thousand Turks had been detached to the assistance of the empress Anne, but the entire forces of Orchan were exerted in the service of his father Yet these calamities were of a transient nature as soon as the storm had passed away, the fugitives might return to their habitations and at the conclusion of the civil and foreign wars Europe was completely evacuated by the Moslems of Asia. It was in his last quarrel with his pupil that Cantacuzene inflicted the deep and deadly wound which could never be healed by his successors, and which is poorly expiated by his theological dialogues against the prophet Mohammed Ignorant of their own history, the modern Turks confound their first and their final passage of the Hellespont,[61] and describe the son of Orchan as a nocturnal robber who with eighty companions explores by stratagem a hostile and unknown shore Soliman at the head of ten thousand horse was transported in the vessels, and entertained as the friend of the Greek emperor In the civil wars of Romania he performed some service and perpetrated more mischief but the Chersonesus was insensibly filled with a Turkish colony, and the Byzantine court solicited in vain the restitution of the fortresses of Thrace After some artful delays between the Ottoman prince and his son their ransom was valued at sixty thousand crowns and the first payment had been made when an earthquake shook the walls and cities of the provinces the dismantled places were occupied by the Turks and Gallipoli the key of the Hellespont was rebuilt and repeopled by the policy of Soliman The abdication of Cantacuzene dissolved the feeble bands of domestic alliance and his last advice admonished his countrymen to decline a rash contest and to compare their own weakness with the numbers and valour, the discipline and enthusiasm of the Moslems His prudent counsels were despised by the headstrong vanity of youth and soon justified by the victories of the Ottomans But as he practised in the field the exercise of the jerid Soliman was killed by a fall from his horse ar the aged Orchan wept and expired on the ton of his valiant son

But the Greeks had not time to rejoice in tl death of their enemies and the Turkish scu mitar was wielded with the same spirit by Am rath the First the son of Orchan and tl brother of Soliman By the pale and faintu light of the Byzantine annals[62] we can discei that he subdued without resistance the who province of Romania or Thrace from the He lespont to Mount Hæmus and the verge of tl capital and that Adrianople was chosen for tl royal seat of his government and religion i Europe Constantinople whose decline is a most coeval with her foundation had often i the lapse of a thousand years been assaulted b the barbarians of the East and West but neve till this fatal hour had the Greeks been su rounded, both in Asia and Europe by the arm of the same hostile monarchy Yet the prudenc or generosity of Amurath postponed for a whil this easy conquest and his pride was satisfie with the frequent and humble attendance o the emperor John Palæologus and his four sons who followed at his summons the court an camp of the Ottoman prince He marche against the Sclavonian nations between th Danube and the Adriatic the Bulgarians Ser vians Bosnians and Albanians and these war like tribes who had so often insulted the maj esty of the empire were repeatedly broken b the destructive inroads Their countries did no abound either in gold or silver nor were thei rustic hamlets and townships enriched by com merce or decorated by the arts of luxury But the natives of the soil have been distinguished in every age by their hardiness of mind and body and they were converted by a prudent institu tion into the firmest and most faithful supporter of the Ottoman greatness [63] The vizir of Amu rath reminded his sovereign that according to the Mohammedan law he was entitled to a fifth part of the spoil and captives and that the duty might easily be levied if vigilant officers were stationed at Gallipoli to watch the passage and to select for his use the stoutest and most beautiful of the Christian youth The advice was followed the edict was proclaimed, many thousands of the European captives were educated in religion and arms and the new militia was consecrated and named by a celebrated dervish Standing in the front of their ranks he stretched the sleeve of his gown over the head of the foremost soldier and his blessing was delivered in these words Let them be hood and captivity of the eldest son of their lord. For the faithful discharge of the debt some merchants of Genoa gave security to the amount of five times the sum a lesson to those warlike times, that commerce and credit are the links of the society of nations. It had been stipulated in the treaty that the French captives should swear never to bear arms against the person of their conqueror but the ungenerous restraint was abolished by Bajazet himself I despise said he to the heir of Burgundy thy oaths and thy arms. Thou art young and mayest be am bitious of effacing the disgrace or misfortune of thy first chivalry Assemble thy powers pro-claim thy design and be assured that Bajazet will rejoice to meet thee a second time in a field of battle. Before their departure they were in lged in the freedom and hospitality of the urt of Boursa. The French princes admired e magnificence of the Ottoman, whose hunt g and hawking equipage was composed of ven thousand huntsmen and seven thousand lconers.[63] In their presence, and at his com mand the belly of one of his chamberlains was ut open, on a complaint against him for drink ng the goat s milk of a poor woman. The strangers were astonished by this act of justice but it was the justice of a sultan who disdains to balance the weight of evidence or to measure the degrees of guilt.

After his enfranchisement from an oppressive guardian, John Palæologus remained thirty six years the helpless, and as it should seem, the careless, spectator of the public ruin [64] Love or rather lust, was his only vigorous passion and in the embraces of the wives and virgins of the city the Turkish slave forgot the dishonour of the emperor of the Romans Andronicus, his eldest son, had formed at Adrianople an intimate and guilty friendship with Sauzes, the son of Amurath and the two youths conspired against the authority and lives of their parents. The presence of Amurath in Europe soon dis-covered and dissipated their rash counsels and after depriving Sauzes of his sight, the Ottoman threatened his vassal with the treatment of an accomplice and an enemy unless he inflicted a similar punishment on his own son Palæologus trembled and obeyed and a cruel precaution involved in the same sentence the childhood and innocence of John the son of the criminal. But the operation was so mildly or so unskilfully performed that the one retained the sight of an eye and the other was afflicted only with the infirmity of squinting Thus excluded from the succession the two princes were confined in the tower of Anema and the piety of Manuel, the second son of the reigning monarch was rewarded with the gift of the Imperial crown But at the end of two years the turbulence of the Latins and the levity of the Greeks produced a revolution and the two emperors were buried in the tower from whence the two prisoners were exalted to the throne. Another period of two years afforded Palæologus and Manuel the means of escape it was contrived by the magic or subtlety of a monk, who was alternately named the angel or the devil they fled to Scutari their adherents armed in their cause, and the two Byzantine factions displayed the ambition and animosity with which Cæsar and Pompey had disputed the empire of the world The Roman world was now contracted to a corner of Thrace, between the Propontis and the Black Sea about fifty miles in length and thirty in breadth a space of ground not more extensive than the lesser principalities of Germany or Italy if the remains of Constantinople had not still represented the wealth and populousness of a kingdom. To restore the public peace it was found necessary to divide this fragment of the empire and while Palæologus and Manuel were left in possession of the cap-ital almost all that lay without the walls was ceded to the blind princes, who fixed their residence at Rhodosto and Selymbria. In the tranquil slumber of royalty the passions of John Palæologus survived his reason and his strength he deprived his favourite and heir of a blooming princess of Trebizond and while the feeble emperor laboured to consummate his nuptials Manuel with a hundred of the noblest Greeks, was sent on a peremptory summons to the Ottoman Porte They served with honour in the wars of Bajazet but a plan of fortifying Constantinople excited his jealousy he threatened their lives the new works were instantly demolished and we shall bestow a praise perhaps above the merit of Palæologus, if we impute this last humiliation as the cause of his death

The earliest intelligence of that event was communicated to Manuel who escaped with speed and secrecy from the palace of Boursa to the Byzantine throne Bajazet affected a proud indifference at the loss of this valuable pledge and while he pursued his conquests in Europe and Asia he left the emperor to struggle with his blind cousin John of Selymbria who in eight years of civil war asserted his right of primogeniture. At length the ambition of the victorious sultan pointed to the conquest of part were slain or driven into the Danube, and Sigismond escaping to Constantinople by the river and the Black Sea, returned after a long circuit to his exhausted kingdom [60] In the pride of victory Bajazet threatened that he would besiege Buda that he would subdue the adjacent countries of Germany and Italy, and that he would feed his horse with a bushel of oats on the altar of St Peter at Rome. His progress was checked, not by the miraculous interposition of the apostle not by a crusade of the Christian powers, but by a long and painful fit of the gout. The disorders of the moral are sometimes corrected by those of the physical world and an acrimonious humour falling on a single fibre of one man may prevent or suspend the misery of nations

Such is the general idea of the Hungarian war, but the disastrous adventure of the French has procured us some memorials which illustrate the victory and character of Bajazet [61] The duke of Burgundy sovereign of Flanders and uncle of Charles the Sixth yielded to the ardour of his son John count of Nevers, and the fearless youth was accompanied by four princes, his cousins and those of the French monarch Their inexperience was guided by the Sire de Coucy, one of the best and oldest captains of Christendom [62] but the constable admiral and marshal of France[63] commanded an army which did not exceed the number of a thousand knights and squires These splendid names were the source of presumption and the bane of discipline So many might aspire to command, that none were willing to obey their national spirit despised both their enemies and their allies and in the persuasion that Bajazet would fly, or must fall they began to compute how soon they should visit Constantinople and deliver the holy sepulchre When their scouts announced the approach of the Turks the gay and thoughtless youths were at table already heated with wine they instantly clasped their armour mounted their horses rode full speed to the vanguard, and resented as an affront the advice of Sigismond which would have deprived them of the right and honour of the foremost attack The battle of Nicopolis would not have been lost if the French would have obeyed the prudence of the Hungarians but it might have been gloriously won had the Hungarians imitated the valour of the French They dispersed the first line consisting of the troops of Asia forced a rampart of stakes which had been planted against the cavalry broke after a bloody conflict the Janizaries themselves and were at length overwhelmed by the numerous squadrons that issued from the woods and charged on all sides this handful of intrepid warriors In the speed and secrecy of his march, in the order and evolutions of the battle, his enemies felt and admired the military talents of Bajazet They accuse his cruelty in the use of victory After reserving the count of Nevers and four and twenty lords, whose birth and riches were attested by his Latin interpreters, the remainder of the French captives who had survived the slaughter of the day were led before his throne and as they refused to abjure their faith, were successively beheaded in his presence The sultan was exasperated by the loss of his bravest Janizaries and if it be true that on the eve of the engagement the French had massacred their Turkish prisoners,[64] they might impute to themselves the consequences of a just retaliation A knight whose life had been spared was permitted to return to Paris that he might relate the deplorable tale and solicit the ransom of the noble captives In the mean while the count of Nevers with the princes and barons of France were dragged along in the marches of the Turkish camp, exposed as a grateful trophy to the Moslems of Europe and Asia and strictly confined at Boursa as often as Bajazet resided in his capital The sultan was pressed each day to expiate with their blood the blood of his martyrs but he had pronounced that they should live and either for mercy or destruction his word was irrevocable. He was assured of their value and importance by the return of the messenger and the gifts and intercessions of the kings of France and of Cyprus Lusignan presented him with a gold saltcellar of curious workmanship and of the price of ten thousand ducats and Charles the Sixth despatched by the way of Hungary a cast of Norwegian hawks and six horse loads of scarlet cloth of fine linen of Rheims and of Arras tapestry representing the battles of the great Alexander After much delay the effect of distance rather than of art Bajazet agreed to accept a ransom of two hundred thousand ducats for the count of Nevers and the surviving princes and barons the marshal Boucicault a famous warrior was of the number of the fortunate but the admiral of France had been slain in the battle and the constable with the Sire de Coucy died in the prison of Boursa This heavy demand which was doubled by incidental costs, fell chiefly on the duke of Burgundy or rather on his Flemish subjects, who were bound by the feudal laws to contribute for the knight precious memorials in the Mogul or Persian language were concealed from the world or at least, from the knowledge of Europe. The nations which he vanquished exercised a base and impotent revenge and ignorance has long repeated the tale of calumny[8] which had disfigured the birth and character the person and even the name, of Tamerlane.[9] Yet his real merit would be enhanced rather than debased by the elevation of a peasant to the throne of Asia nor can his lameness be a theme of reproach unless he had the weakness to blush at a natural or perhaps an honourable infirmity

In the eyes of the Moguls, who held the indefeasible succession of the house of Zingis he was doubtless a rebel subject yet he sprang from the noble tribe of Berlass his fifth ancestor Carashar Nevian, had been the vizir of Zagatai in his realm of Transoxiana and in the ascent of some generations, the branch of Timour is confounded at least by the females,[7] with the imperial stem.[8] He was born forty miles to the south of Samarcand, in the village of Sebzar in the fruitful territory of Cash, of which his fathers were the hereditary chiefs, as well as of a toman of ten thousand horse.[9] His birth[10] was cast on one of those periods of anarchy which announce the fall of the Asiatic dynasties and open a new field to adventurous ambition. The khans of Zagatai were extinct the emirs aspired to independence and their domestic feuds could only be suspended by the conquest and tyranny of the khans of Kashgar who with an army of Getes or Calmucks,[11] invaded the Transoxian kingdom. From the twelfth year of his age Timour had entered the field of action in the twenty fifth he stood forth as the deliverer of his country and the eyes and wishes of the people were turned towards a hero who suffered in their cause The chiefs of the law and of the army had pledged their salvation to support him with their lives and fortunes, but in the hour of danger they were silent and afraid and after waiting seven days on the hills of Samarcand, he retreated to the desert with only sixty horsemen. The fugitives were overtaken by a thousand Getes, whom he repulsed with incredible slaughter and his enemies were forced to exclaim, Timour is a wonderful man fortune and the divine favour are with him. But in this bloody action his own followers were reduced to ten, a number which was soon diminished by the desertion of three Carizmians. He wandered in the desert with his wife, seven companions, and four horses and sixty two days was he plunged in a loathsome dungeon, from whence he escaped by his own courage and the remorse of the oppressor After swimming the broad and rapid stream of the Jihoon or Oxus he led during some months the life of a vagrant and outlaw on the borders of the adjacent states. But his fame shone brighter in adversity he learned to distinguish the friends of his person the associates of his fortune, and to apply the various characters of men for their advantage, and above all for his own On his return to his native country Timour was successively joined by the parties of his confederates who anxiously sought him in the desert nor can I refuse to describe in his pathetic simplicity one of their fortunate encounters. He presented himself as a guide to three chiefs, who were at the head of seventy horse When their eyes fell upon me says Timour they were overwhelmed with joy and they alighted from their horses, and they came and kneeled, and they kissed my stirrup I also came down from my horse and took each of them in my arms. And I put my turban on the head of the first chief and my girdle rich in jewels and wrought with gold, I bound on the loins of the second and the third I clothed in my own coat. And they wept and I wept also and the hour of prayer was arrived and we prayed And we mounted our horses, and came to my dwelling and I collected my people and made a feast. His trusty bands were soon increased by the bravest of the tribes he led them against a superior foe and after some vicissitudes of war the Getes were finally driven from the kingdom of Transoxiana He had done much for his own glory but much remained to be done much art to be exerted and some blood to be spilt, before he could teach his equals to obey him as their master The birth and power of emir Houssein compelled him to accept a vicious and unworthy colleague whose sister was the best beloved of his wives. Their union was short and jealous but the policy of Timour in their frequent quarrels exposed his rival to the reproach of injustice and perfidy and after a final defeat, Houssein was slain by some sagacious friends, who presumed for the last time, to disobey the commands of their lord. At the age of thirty four[12] and in a general diet or couroultai he was invested with Imperial command but he affected to revere the house of Zingis and while the emir Timour reigned over Zagatai and the East a nominal khan served as a private officer in the armies of his servant. A fertile kingdom, five hundred miles in length and in breadth might have satisfied the ambition of a subject

Constantinople but he listened to the advice of his vizir who represented that such an enterprise might unite the powers of Christendom in a second and more formidable crusade His epistle to the emperor was conceived in these words — By the divine clemency, our invincible scimitar has reduced to our obedience almost all Asia, with many and large countries in Europe, excepting only the city of Constantinople for beyond the walls thou hast nothing left. Resign that city, stipulate thy reward or tremble, for thyself and thy unhappy people at the consequences of a rash refusal But his ambassadors were instructed to soften their tone, and to propose a treaty which was subscribed with submission and gratitude A truce of ten years was purchased by an annual tribute of thirty thousand crowns of gold the Greeks deplored the public toleration of the law of Mohammed and Bajazet enjoyed the glory of establishing a Turkish cadhi and founding a royal mosque, in the metropolis of the Eastern church [67] Yet this truce was soon violated by the restless sultan in the cause of the prince of Selymbria the lawful emperor an army of Ottomans again threatened Constantinople, and the distress of Manuel implored the protection of the king of France His plaintive embassy obtained much pity and some relief, and the conduct of the succour was intrusted to the marshal Boucicault [68] whose religious chivalry was inflamed by the desire of revenging his captivity on the infidels He sailed with four ships of war from Aiguesmortes to the Hellespont forced the passage which was guarded by seventeen Turkish galleys landed at Constantinople a supply of six hundred men at arms and sixteen hundred archers and reviewed them in the adjacent plain without condescending to number or array the multitude of Greeks. By his presence the blockade was raised both by sea and land, the flying squadrons of Bajazet were driven to a more respectful distance and several castles in Europe and Asia were stormed by the emperor and the marshal, who fought with equal valour by each other s side. But the Ottomans soon returned with an increase of numbers and the intrepid Boucicault, after a year's struggle resolved to evacuate a country which could no longer afford either pay or provisions for his soldiers The marshal offered to conduct Manuel to the French court, where he might solicit in person a supply of men and money and advised, in the meanwhile that to extinguish all domestic discord, he should leave his blind competitor on the throne The proposal was embraced the prince of Selymbria was introduced to the capital and such was the public misery that the lot of the exile seemed more fortunate than that of the sovereign Instead of applauding the success of his vassal, the Turkish sultan claimed the city as his own and on the refusal of the emperor John Constantinople was more closely pressed by the calamities of war and famine Against such an enemy prayers and resistance were alike unavailing, and the savage would have devoured his prey if in the fatal moment he had not been overthrown by another savage stronger than himself By the victory of Timour or Tamerlane the fall of Constantinople was delayed about fifty years and this important though accidental service may justly introduce the life and character of the Mogul conqueror

CHAPTER LXV

Elevation of Timour or Tamerlane to the Throne of Samarcand His Conquests in Persia, Georgia, Tartary, Russia, India, Syria, and Anatolia His Turkish War Defeat and Captivity of Bajazet Death to Timour Civil War of the Sons of Bajazet Restoration of the Turkish Monarchy by Mohammed the First Siege of Constantinople by Amurath the Second

THE conquest and monarchy of the world was the first object of the ambition of TIMOUR To live in the memory and esteem of future ages was the second wish of his magnanimous spirit All the civil and military transactions of his reign were diligently recorded in the journals of his secretaries [1] the authentic narrative was revised by the persons best informed of each particular transaction and it is believed in the empire and family of Timour that the monarch himself composed the commentaries[2] of his life and the institutions[3] of his government [4] But these cares were ineffectual for the preservation of his fame and these

perial standard of Kipzak determined the victory of the Zagatais and Toctamish (I speak the language of the Institutions) gave the tribe of Toushi to the wind of desolation[19] He fled to the Christian duke of Lithuania again returned to the banks of the Volga and after fifteen battles with a domestic rival at last perished in the wilds of Siberia. The pursuit of a flying enemy carried Timour into the tributary provinces of Russia a duke of the reigning family was made prisoner amidst the ruins of his capital and Yeletz, by the pride and ignorance of the Orientals, might easily be confounded with the genuine metropolis of the nation. Moscow trembled at the approach of the Tartar and the resistance would have been feeble since the hopes of the Russians were placed in a miraculous image of the Virgin to whose protection they ascribed the casual and voluntary retreat of the conqueror Ambition and prudence recalled him to the South the desolate country was exhausted and the Mogul soldiers were enriched with an immense spoil of precious furs, of linen of Antioch[20] and of ingots of gold and silver[21] On the banks o the Don or Tanais he received a humble deputation from the consuls and merchants of Egypt,[22] Venice, Genoa, Catalonia, and Biscay who occupied the commerce and city of Tana or Azoph at the mouth of the river They offered their gifts, admired his magnificence and trusted his royal word But the peaceful visit of an emir who explored the state of the magazines and harbour was speedily followed by the destructive presence of the Tartars. The city was reduced to ashes the Moslems were pillaged and dismissed but all the Christians who had not fled to their ships were condemned either to death or slavery[23] Revenge prompted him to burn the cities of Serai and Astrachan the monuments of rising civilisation and his vanity proclaimed that he had penetrated to the region of perpetual daylight, a strange phenomenon which authorised his Mohammedan doctors to dispense with the obligation of evening prayer[23]

III When Timour first proposed to his princes and emirs the invasion of India or Hindostan,[24] he was answered by a murmur of discontent The rivers! and the mountains and deserts! and the soldiers clad in armour! and the elephants, destroyers of men! But the displeasure of the emperor was more dreadful than all these terrors and his superior reason was convinced that an enterprise of such tremendous aspect was safe and easy in the execution. He was informed by his spies of the weakness and anarchy of Hindostan the soubahs of the provinces had erected the standard of rebellion and the perpetual infancy of sultan Mahmoud was despised even in the harem of Delhi The Mogul army moved in three great divisions and Timour observes with pleasure that the ninety two squadrons of a thousand horse most fortunately corresponded with the ninety two names or epithets of the prophet Mohammed. Between the Jihoon and the Indus they crossed one of the ridges of mountains which are styled by the Arabian geographers The Stony Girdles of the Earth. The highland robbers were subdued or extirpated but great numbers of men and horses perished in the snow, the emperor himself was let down a precipice on a portable scaffold—the ropes were one hundred and fifty cubits in length and before he could reach the bottom this dangerous operation was five times repeated Timour crossed the Indus at the ordinary passage of Attok and successively traversed in the footsteps of Alexander the Punjab or five rivers,[25] that fall into the master stream. From Attok to Delhi the high road measures no more than six hundred miles but the two conquerors deviated to the south-east and the motive of Timour was to join his grandson who had achieved by his command the conquest of Moultan. On the eastern bank of the Hyphasis, on the edge of the desert the Macedonian hero halted and wept the Mogul entered the desert reduced the fortress of Batnir and stood in arms before the gates of Delhi, a great and flourishing city which had subsisted three centuries under the dominion of the Mohammedan kings. The siege more especially of the castle might have been a work of time but he tempted by the appearance of weakness, the sultan Mahmoud and his vizir to descend into the plain with ten thousand cuirassiers, forty thousand of his foot guards, and one hundred and twenty elephants whose tusks are said to have been armed with sharp and poisoned daggers. Against these monsters, or rather against the imagination of his troops, he condescended to use some extraordinary precautions of fire and a ditch of iron spikes and a rampart of bucklers but the event taught the Moguls to smile at their own fears and as soon as these unwieldy animals were routed the inferior species (the men of India) disappeared from the field Timour made his triumphal entry into the capital of Hindostan and admired with a view to imitate, the architecture of the stately mosque but the order or licence of a general pillage and massacre polluted the

but Timour aspired to the dominion of the world, and before his death the crown of Zagatai was one of the twenty seven crowns which he had placed on his head Without expatiating on the victories of thirty five campaigns, without describing the lines of march which he repeatedly traced over the continent of Asia I shall briefly represent his conquests in, I Persia, II Tartary, and III India,[13] and from thence proceed to the more interesting narrative of his Ottoman war

I For every war a motive of safety or revenge of honour or zeal, of right or convenience, may be readily found in the jurisprudence of conquerors No sooner had Timour re united to the patrimony of Zagatai the dependent countries of Carizme and Candahar than he turned his eyes towards the kingdoms of Iran or Persia From the Oxus to the Tigris that extensive country was left without a lawful sovereign since the death of Abousaid the last of the descendants of the great Holacou Peace and justice had been banished from the land above forty years and the Mogul invader might seem to listen to the cries of an oppressed people Their petty tyrants might have opposed him with confederate arms they separately stood and successively fell and the difference of their fate was only marked by the promptitude of submission or the obstinacy of resistance. Ibrahim prince of Shirwan or Albania kissed the footstool of the Imperial throne His peace offerings of silks horses and jewels were composed according to the Tartar fashion each article of nine pieces but a critical spectator observed that there were only eight slaves I myself am the ninth ' replied Ibrahim who was prepared for the remark and his flattery was rewarded by the smile of Timour [14] Shah Mansour, prince of Fars, or the proper Persia, was one of the least powerful, but most dangerous, of his enemies. In a battle under the walls of Shiraz he broke with three or four thousand soldiers the coul or main body of thirty thousand horse where the emperor fought in person No more than fourteen or fifteen guards remained near the standard of Timour, he stood firm as a rock, and received on his helmet two weighty strokes of a scimitar,[15] the Moguls rallied the head of Mansour was thrown at his feet and he declared his esteem of the valour of a foe by extirpating all the males of so intrepid a race. From Shiraz his troops advanced to the Persian Gulf and the richness and weakness of Ormuz[16] were displayed in an annual tribute of six hundred thousand dinars of gold Bagdad was no longer the city of peace, the seat of the caliphs but the noblest conquest of Holacou could not be overlooked by his ambitious successor The whole course of the Tigris and Euphrates from the mouth to the sources of those rivers was reduced to his obedience he entered Edessa, and the Turkmans of the black sheep were chastised for the sacrilegious pillage of a caravan of Mecca In the mountains of Georgia the native Christians still braved the law and the sword of Mohammed, by three expeditions he obtained the merit of the gazie or holy war and the prince of Teflis became his proselyte and friend

II A just retaliation might be urged for the invasion of Turkestan or the Eastern Tartary The dignity of Timour could not endure the impunity of the Getes he passed the Sihoon, subdued the kingdom of Kashgar and marched seven times into the heart of their country His most distant camp was two months' journey or four hundred and eighty leagues to the north east of Samarcand and his emirs who traversed the river Irtish engraved in the forests of Siberia a rude memorial of their exploits. The conquest of Kipzak or the western Tartary [17] was founded on the double motive of aiding the distressed and chastising the ungrateful. Toctamish a fugitive prince, was entertained and protected in his court the ambassadors of Auruss Khan were dismissed with a haughty denial and followed on the same day by the armies of Zagatai and their success established Toctamish in the Mogul empire of the North. But after a reign of ten years the new khan forgot the merits and the strength of his benefactor the base usurper as he deemed him of the sacred rights of the house of Zingis Through the gates of Derbend he entered Persia at the head of ninety thousand horse with the innumerable forces of Kipzak Bulgaria Circassia and Russia he passed the Sihoon burnt the palaces of Timour and compelled him, amidst the winter snows to contend for Samarcand and his life After a mild expostulation and a glorious victory the emperor resolved on revenge and by the east and the west of the Caspian and the Volga he twice invaded Kipzak with such mighty powers that thirteen miles were measured from his right to his left wing In a march of five months they rarely beheld the footsteps of man and their daily subsistence was often trusted to the fortune of the chase At length the armies encountered each other but the treachery of the standard bearer who in the heat of action reversed the Im penal standard of Kipzak determined the victory of the Zagatais and Toctamish (I speak the language of the Institutions) gave the tribe of Toushi to the wind of desolation[18] He fled to the Christian duke of Lithuania again returned to the banks of the Volga and after fifteen battles with a domestic rival at last perished in the wilds of Siberia The pursuit of a flying enemy carried Timour into the tributary provinces of Russia a duke of the reigning family was made prisoner amidst the ruins of his capital and Yeletz, by the pride and ignorance of the Orientals, might easily be confounded with the genuine metropolis of the nation. Moscow trembled at the approach of the Tartar and the resistance would have been feeble since the hopes of the Russians were placed in a miraculous image of the Virgin to whose protection they ascribed the casual and voluntary retreat of the conqueror Ambition and prudence recalled him to the South the desolate country was exhausted, and the Mogul soldiers were enriched with an immense spoil of precious furs, of linen of Antioch[19] and of ingots of gold and silver[20] On the banks of the Don or Tanais, he received a humble deputation from the consuls and merchants of Egypt,[21] Venice, Genoa Catalonia, and Biscay who occupied the commerce and city of Tana or Azoph, at the mouth of the river They offered their gifts admired his magnificence and trusted his royal word. The city was reduced to ashes the Moslems were pillaged and dismissed but all the Christians who had not fled to their ships were condemned either to death or slavery[22] Revenge prompted him to burn the cities of Serai and Astrachan the monuments of rising civilisation and his vanity proclaimed that he had penetrated to the region of perpetual day light, a strange phenomenon which authorised his Mohammedan doctors to dispense with the obligation of evening prayer[23]

III When Timour first proposed to his princes and emirs the invasion of India or Hindostan, "he was answered by a murmur of discontent The rivers! and the mountains and deserts! and the soldiers clad in armour! and the elephants, destroyers of men! But the displeasure of the emperor was more dreadful than all these terrors and his superior reason was convinced that an enterprise of such tremendous aspect was safe and easy in the execution. On the eastern bank of the Hyphasis, on the edge of the desert the Macedonian hero halted and wept the Mogul entered the desert, reduced the fortress of Batnir and stood in arms before the gates of Delhi a great and flourishing city which had subsisted three centuries under the dominion of the Mohammedan kings. festival of his victory He resolved to purify his soldiers in the blood of the idolators or Gentoos, who still surpass, in the proportion of ten to one the numbers of the Moslems In this pious design he advanced one hundred miles to the north east of Delhi, passed the Ganges fought several battles by land and water and penetrated to the famous rock of Coupele the statue of the cow, that seems to discharge the mighty river, whose source is far distant among the mountains of Thibet [6] His return was along the skirts of the northern hills nor could this rapid campaign of one year justify the strange foresight of his emirs that their children in a warm climate would degenerate into a race of Hindoos

It was on the banks of the Ganges that Timour was informed, by his speedy messengers of the disturbances which had arisen on the confines of Georgia and Anatolia of the revolt of the Christians and the ambitious designs of the sultan Bajazet His vigour of mind and body was not impaired by sixty three years and innumerable fatigues and after enjoying some tranquil months in the palace of Samarcand he proclaimed a new expedition of seven years into the western countries of Asia [27] To the soldiers who had served in the Indian war he granted the choice of remaining at home, or following their prince but the troops of all the provinces and kingdoms of Persia were commanded to assemble at Ispahan and wait the arrival of the Imperial standard It was first directed against the Christians of Georgia who were strong only in their rocks their castles and the winter season, but these obstacles were overcome by the zeal and perseverance of Timour the rebels submitted to the tribute or the Koran, and if both religions boasted of their martyrs that name is more justly due to the Christian prisoners who were offered the choice of abjuration or death On his descent from the hills the emperor gave audience to the first ambassadors of Bajazet and opened the hostile correspondence of complaints and menaces which fermented two years before the final explosion Between two jealous and haughty neighbours the motives of quarrel will seldom be wanting The Mogul and Ottoman conquests now touched each other in the neighbourhood of Erzeroum and the Euphrates nor had the doubtful limit been ascertained by time and treaty Each of these ambitious monarchs might accuse his rival of violating his territory, of threatening his vassals and protecting his rebels and by the name of tribute each understood the fugitive princes whose kingdoms he had usurped and whose life or liberty he implacably pursued. The resemblance of character was still more dangerous than the opposition of interest, and in their victorious career, Timour was impatient of an equal and Bajazet was ignorant of a superior The first epistle [8] of the Mogul emperor must have provoked, instead of reconciling the Turkish sultan whose family and nation he affected to despise [9] 'Dost thou not know that the greatest part of Asia is subject to our arms and our laws? that our invincible forces extend from one sea to the other? that the potentates of the earth form a line before our gate? and that we have compelled Fortune herself to watch over the prosperity of our empire? What is the foundation of thy insolence and folly? Thou hast fought some battles in the woods of Anatolia, contemptible trophies! Thou hast obtained some victories over the Christians of Europe, thy sword was blessed by the apostle of God and thy obedience to the precept of the Koran in waging war against the infidels is the sole consideration that prevents us from destroying thy country the frontier and bulwark of the Moslem world Be wise in time reflect repent and avert the thunder of our vengeance which is yet suspended over thy head Thou art no more than a pismire why wilt thou seek to provoke the elephants? Alas! they will trample thee under their feet' In his replies Bajazet poured forth the indignation of a soul which was deeply stung by such unusual contempt. After retorting the basest reproaches on the thief and rebel of the desert the Ottoman recapitulates his boasted victories in Iran Touran, and the Indies and labours to prove that Timour had never triumphed unless by his own perfidy and the vices of his foes Thy armies are innumerable be they so but what are the arrows of the flying Tartar against the scimitars and battle axes of my firm and invincible Janizaries? I will guard the princes who have implored my protection seek them in my tents. The cities of Arzingan and Erzeroum are mine and unless the tribute be duly paid I will demand the arrears under the walls of Tauris and Sultania The ungovernable rage of the sultan at length betrayed him to an insult of a more domestic kind If I fly from thy arms said he may my wives be thrice divorced from my bed but if thou hast not courage to meet me in the field mayest thou again receive thy wives after they have thrice endured the embraces of a stranger [10] Any violation by word or deed of the secrecy of the harem is an unpardonable offence among the Turkish nations [11] and the political quarrel of the two monarchs was embittered by private and personal resentment Yet in his first expedition Timour was satisfied with the siege and destruction of Suvas or Sebaste, a strong city on the borders of Anatolia and he revenged the indiscretion of the Ottoman on a garrison of four thousand Armenians, who were buried alive for the brave and faithful discharge of their duty As a Musulman he seemed to respect the pious occupation of Bajazet, who was still engaged in the blockade of Constantinople and after this salutary lesson the Mogul conqueror checked his pursuit and turned aside to the invasion of Syria and Egypt. In these transactions, the Ottoman prince by the Orientals, and even by Timour is styled the Kaissar of Roum the Cæsar of the Romans a title which, by a small anticipation might be given to a monarch who possessed the provinces, and threatened the city of the successors of Constantine.[12]

The military republic of the Mamalukes still reigned in Egypt and Syria but the dynasty of the Turks was overthrown by that of the Circassians [13] and their favourite Barkok, from a slave and a prisoner was raised and restored to the throne. In the midst of rebellion and discord, he braved the menaces, corresponded with the enemies, and detained the ambassadors, of the Mogul, who patiently expected his decease, to revenge the crimes of the father on the feeble reign of his son Farage. The Syrian emirs[14] were assembled at Aleppo to repel the invasion they confided in the fame and discipline of the Mamalukes, in the temper of their swords and lances of the purest steel of Damascus, in the strength of their walled cities and in the populousness of sixty thousand villages and instead of sustaining a siege they threw open their gates, and arrayed their forces in the plain. But these forces were not cemented by virtue and union and some powerful emirs had been seduced to desert or betray their more loyal companions. Timour s front was covered with a line of Indian elephants whose turrets were filled with archers and Greek fire the rapid evolutions of his cavalry completed the dismay and disorder the Syrian crowds fell back on each other many thousands were stifled or slaughtered in the entrance of the great street the Moguls entered with the fugitives and after a short defence, the citadel the impregnable citadel of Aleppo was surrendered by cowardice or treachery Among the suppliants and captives Timour distinguished the doctors of the law whom he invited to the dangerous honour of a personal conference [15] The Mogul prince was a zealous Musulman but his Persian schools had taught him to revere the memory of Ali and Hosein and he had imbibed a deep prejudice against the Syrians, as the enemies of the son of the daughter of the apostle of God To these doctors he proposed a captious question which the casuists of Bochara Samarcand and Herat were incapable of resolving Who are the true martyrs of those who are slain on my side or on that of my enemies? But he was silenced or satisfied by the dexterity of one of the cadhis of Aleppo who replied in the words of Mohammed himself that the motive not the ensign constitutes the martyr and that the Moslems of either party who fight only for the glory of God may deserve that sacred appellation The true succession of the caliphs was a controversy of a still more delicate nature and the frankness of a doctor too honest for his situation provoked the emperor to exclaim, Ye are as false as those of Damascus Moawiyah was a usurper Yezid a tyrant and Ali alone is the lawful successor of the prophet. A prudent explanation restored his tranquillity and he passed to a more familiar topic of conversation. What is your age? said he to the cadhi. Fifty years. — It would be the age of my eldest son You see me here (continued Timour) a poor lame decrepit mortal Yet by my arm has the Almighty been pleased to subdue the kingdoms of Iran Touran and the Indies. I am not a man of blood and God is my witness that in all my wars I have never been the aggressor and that my enemies have always been the authors of their own calamity During this peaceful conversation the streets of Aleppo streamed with blood and re-echoed with the cries of mothers and children with the shrieks of violated virgins The rich plunder that was abandoned to his soldiers might stimulate their avarice but their cruelty was enforced by the peremptory command of producing an adequate number of heads, which according to his custom were curiously piled in columns and pyramids the Moguls celebrated the feast of victory while the surviving Moslems passed the night in tears and in chains. I shall not dwell on the march of the destroyer from Aleppo to Damascus where he was rudely encountered and almost overthrown by the armies of Egypt. A retrograde motion was imputed to his distress and despair one of his nephews deserted to the enemy and Syria rejoiced in the tale of his defeat, when the sultan was driven by the revolt of the Mamalukes to escape with precipitation and shame to his palace of Cairo Abandoned by their prince, the inhabitants of Damascus still defended their walls and Timour consented to raise the siege, if they would adorn his retreat with a gift or ransom each article of nine pieces But no sooner had he introduced himself into the city, under colour of a truce than he perfidiously violated the treaty, imposed a contribution of ten millions of gold and animated his troops to chastise the posterity of those Syrians who had executed or approved, the murder of the grandson of Mohammed A family which had given honourable burial to the head of Hosein, and a colony of artificers whom he sent to labour at Samarcand, were alone reserved in the general massacre and after a period of seven centuries Damascus was reduced to ashes, because a Tartar was moved by religious zeal to avenge the blood of an Arab The losses and fatigues of the campaign obliged Timour to renounce the conquest of Palestine and Egypt, but in his return to the Euphrates he delivered Aleppo to the flames and justified his pious motive by the pardon and reward of two thousand sectaries of Ali who were desirous to visit the tomb of his son I have expatiated on the personal anecdotes which mark the character of the Mogul hero, but I shall briefly mention[36] that he erected on the ruins of Bagdad a pyramid of ninety thousand heads again visited Georgia encamped on the banks of the Araxes and proclaimed his resolution of marching against the Ottoman emperor Conscious of the importance of the war, he collected his forces from every province eight hundred thousand men were enrolled on his military list[37] but the splendid commands of five and ten thousand horse may be rather expressive of the rank and pension of the chiefs than of the genuine number of effective soldiers[38] In the pillage of Syria the Moguls had acquired immense riches but the delivery of their pay and arrears for seven years more firmly attached them to the Imperial standard

During this diversion of the Mogul arms Bajazet had two years to collect his forces for a more serious encounter They consisted of four hundred thousand horse and foot[39] whose merit and fidelity were of an unequal complexion We may discriminate the Janizaries who have been gradually raised to an establishment of forty thousand men a national cavalry the Spahis of modern times twenty thousand cuirassiers of Europe clad in black and impenetrable armour the troops of Anatolia whose princes had taken refuge in the camp of Timour, and a colony of Tartars, whom he had driven from Kipzak, and to whom Bajazet had assigned a settlement in the plains of Adrianople. The fearless confidence of the sultan urged him to meet his antagonist and, as if he had chosen that spot for revenge, he displayed his banners near the ruins of the unfortunate Suvas In the meanwhile Timour moved from the Araxes through the countries of Armenia and Anatolia his boldness was secured by the wisest precautions, his speed was guided by order and discipline and the woods, the mountains and the rivers were diligently explored by the flying squadrons who marked his road and preceded his standard Firm in his plan of fighting in the heart of the Ottoman kingdom, he avoided their camp dexterously inclined to the left occupied Cæsarea traversed the salt desert and the river Halys and invested Angora, while the sultan immovable and ignorant in his post, compared the Tartar swiftness to the crawling of a snail,[40] he returned on the wings of indignation to the relief of Angora and as both generals were alike impatient for action, the plains round that city were the scene of a memorable battle, which has immortalised the glory of Timour and the shame of Bajazet For this signal victory the Mogul emperor was indebted to himself to the genius of the moment and the discipline of thirty years He had improved the tactics without violating the manners of his nation,[41] whose force still consisted in the missile weapons and rapid evolutions of a numerous cavalry From a single troop to a great army the mode of attack was the same a foremost line first advanced to the charge and was supported in a just order by the squadrons of the great vanguard The general s eye watched over the field and at his command the front and rear of the right and left wings successively moved forwards in their several divisions and in a direct or oblique line the enemy was pressed by eighteen or twenty attacks and each attack afforded a chance of victory If they all proved fruitless or unsuccessful the occasion was worthy of the emperor himself who gave the signal of advancing to the standard and main body which he led in person[42] But in the battle of Angora the main body itself was supported on the flanks and in the rear by the bravest squadrons of the reserve commanded by the sons and grandsons of Timour The conqueror of Hindostan ostentatiously showed a line of elephants, the trophies rather than the instru ments of victory the use of the Greek fire was familiar to the Moguls and Ottomans but had they borrowed from Europe the recent invention of gunpowder and cannon, the artificial thunder in the hands of either nation must have turned the fortune of the day[43] In that day Bajazet displayed the qualities of a soldier and a chief but his genius sunk under a stronger ascendant, and from various motives, the greatest part of his troops failed him in the decisive moment. His rigour and avarice had provoked a mutiny among the Turks and even his son Soliman too hastily withdrew from the field. The forces of Anatolia loyal in their revolt, were drawn away to the banners of their lawful princes. His Tartar allies had been tempted by the letters and emissaries of Timour[44] who reproached their ignoble servitude under the slaves of their fathers, and offered to their hopes the dominion of their new or the liberty of their ancient country In the right wing of Bajazet the cuirassiers of Europe charged with faithful hearts and irresistible arms but these men of iron were soon broken by an artful flight and headlong pursuit and the Janizaries alone, without cavalry or missile weapons, were encompassed by the circle of the Mogul hunters. Their valour was at length oppressed by heat, thirst, and the weight of numbers and the unfortunate sultan, afflicted with the gout in his hands and feet, was transported from the field on the fleetest of his horses He was pursued and taken by the titular khan of Zagatai and after his capture and the defeat of the Ottoman powers, the kingdom of Anatolia submitted to the conqueror who planted his standard at Kiotahia, and dispersed on all sides the ministers of rapine and destruction Mirza Mehemmed Sultan the eldest and best beloved of his grandsons, was despatched to Boursa with thirty thousand horse and such was his youthful ardour that he arrived with only four thousand at the gates of the capital after performing in five days a march of two hundred and thirty miles. Yet fear is still more rapid in its course and Soliman, the son of Bajazet, had already passed over to Europe with the royal treasure. The spoil, however of the palace and city was immense the inhabitants had escaped but the buildings, for the most part of wood, were reduced to ashes. From Boursa the grandson of Timour advanced to Nice even yet a fair and flourishing city and the Mogul squadrons were only stopped by the waves of the Propontis. The same success attended the other mirzas and emirs in their excursions and Smyrna, defended by the zeal and courage of the Rhodian knights, alone deserved the presence of the emperor himself After an obstinate defence the place was taken by storm all that breathed was put to the sword and the heads of the Christian heroes were launched from the engines, on board of two carracks or great ships of Europe that rode at anchor in the harbour The Moslems of Asia rejoiced in their deliverance from a dangerous and domestic foe and a parallel was drawn between the two rivals by observing that Timour in fourteen days, had reduced a fortress which had sustained seven years the siege, or at least the blockade of Bajazet.[45]

The iron cage in which Bajazet was imprisoned by Tamerlane, so long and so often repeated as a moral lesson is now rejected as a fable by the modern writers, who smile at the vulgar credulity[46] They appeal with confidence to the Persian history of Sherefeddin Ali which has been given to our curiosity in a French version and from which I shall collect and abridge a more specious narrative of this memorable transaction. No sooner was Timour informed that the captive Ottoman was at the door of his tent than he graciously stepped forward to receive him, seated him by his side, and mingled with just reproaches a soothing pity for his rank and misfortune. Alas! said the emperor the decree of fate is now accomplished by your own fault it is the web which you have woven the thorns of the tree which yourself have planted. I wished to spare and even to assist, the champion of the Moslems you braved our threats you despised our friendship you forced us to enter your kingdom with our invincible armies. Behold the event. Had you vanquished I am not ignorant of the fate which you reserved for myself and my troops. But I disdain to retaliate your life and honour are secure and I shall express my gratitude to God by my clemency to man The royal captive showed some signs of repentance, accepted the humiliation of a robe of honour and embraced with tears his son Mousa, who at his request was sought and found among the captives of the field The Ottoman princes were lodged in a splendid pavilion and the respect of the guards could be surpassed only by their vigilance On the arrival of the harem from Boursa Timour restored the queen Despina and her daughter to their father and husband but he piously required that the Servian princess, who had hitherto been indulged in the profession of Christianity should embrace without delay the religion of the prophet. In

was driven by the revolt of the Mamalukes to escape with precipitation and shame to his palace of Cairo Abandoned by their prince, the inhabitants of Damascus still defended their walls and Timour consented to raise the siege, if they would adorn his retreat with a gift or ransom each article of nine pieces But no sooner had he introduced himself into the city, under colour of a truce, than he perfidiously violated the treaty, imposed a contribution of ten millions of gold and animated his troops to chastise the posterity of those Syrians who had executed, or approved the murder of the grandson of Mohammed A family which had given honourable burial to the head of Hosein, and a colony of artificers whom he sent to labour at Samarcand were alone reserved in the general massacre, and after a period of seven centuries Damascus was reduced to ashes because a Tartar was moved by religious zeal to avenge the blood of an Arab The losses and fatigues of the campaign obliged Timour to renounce the conquest of Palestine and Egypt, but in his return to the Euphrates he delivered Aleppo to the flames and justified his pious motive by the pardon and reward of two thousand sectaries of Ali who were desirous to visit the tomb of his son I have expatiated on the personal anecdotes which mark the character of the Mogul hero but I shall briefly mention[36] that he erected on the ruins of Bagdad a pyramid of ninety thousand heads again visited Georgia, encamped on the banks of the Araxes and proclaimed his resolution of marching against the Ottoman emperor Conscious of the importance of the war he collected his forces from every province eight hundred thousand men were enrolled on his military list [37] but the splendid commands of five and ten thousand horse may be rather expressive of the rank and pension of the chiefs than of the genuine number of effective soldiers [38] In the pillage of Syria the Moguls had acquired immense riches but the delivery of their pay and arrears for seven years more firmly attached them to the Imperial standard

During this diversion of the Mogul arms Bajazet had two years to collect his forces for a more serious encounter They consisted of four hundred thousand horse and foot [39] whose merit and fidelity were of an unequal complexion We may discriminate the Janizaries who have been gradually raised to an establishment of forty thousand men a national cavalry the Spahis of modern times, twenty thousand cuirassiers of Europe clad in black and impenetrable armour, the troops of Anatolia, whose princes had taken refuge in the camp of Timour, and a colony of Tartars whom he had driven from Kipzak, and to whom Bajazet had assigned a settlement in the plains of Adrianople. The fearless confidence of the sultan urged him to meet his antagonist, and as if he had chosen that spot for revenge he displayed his banners near the ruins of the unfortunate Suvas. In the meanwhile Timour moved from the Araxes through the countries of Armenia and Anatolia his boldness was secured by the wisest precautions his speed was guided by order and discipline and the woods, the mountains, and the rivers were diligently explored by the flying squadrons who marked his road and preceded his standard Firm in his plan of fighting in the heart of the Ottoman kingdom he avoided their camp dexterously inclined to the left, occupied Cæsarea traversed the salt desert and the river Halys and invested Angora while the sultan immovable and ignorant in his post, compared the Tartar swiftness to the crawling of a snail [40] he returned on the wings of indignation to the relief of Angora and as both generals were alike impatient for action the plains round that city were the scene of a memorable battle, which has immortalised the glory of Timour and the shame of Bajazet For this signal victory the Mogul emperor was indebted to himself to the genius of the moment, and the discipline of thirty years He had improved the tactics without violating the manners of his nation [41] whose force still consisted in the missile weapons and rapid evolutions of a numerous cavalry From a single troop to a great army the mode of attack was the same a foremost line first advanced to the charge and was supported in a just order by the squadrons of the great vanguard The general's eye watched over the field, and at his command the front and rear of the right and left wings successively moved forwards in their several divisions and in a direct or oblique line the enemy was pressed by eighteen or twenty attacks and each attack afforded a chance of victory If they all proved fruitless or unsuccessful the occasion was worthy of the emperor himself who gave the signal of advancing to the standard and main body which he led in person [42] But in the battle of Angora the main body itself was supported on the flanks and in the rear by the bravest squadrons of the reserve, commanded by the sons and grandsons of Timour The conqueror of Hindostan ostentatiously showed a line of elephants the trophies rather than the instru

plaints of his enemies, the Anatolian princes, were just and vehement and Timour betrayed a design of leading his royal captive in triumph to Samarcand An attempt to facilitate his escape, by digging a mine under the tent, provoked the Mogul emperor to impose a harsher restraint and in his perpetual marches an iron cage on a waggon might be invented not as a wanton insult, but as a rigorous precaution. Timour had read in some fabulous history a similar treatment of one of his predecessors a king of Persia and Bajazet was condemned to represent the person and expiate the guilt of the Roman Cæsar [58] But the strength of his mind and body fainted under the trial and his premature death might, without injustice be ascribed to the severity of Timour He warred not with the dead a tear and a sepulchre were all that he could bestow on a captive who was delivered from his power and if Mousa, the son of Bajazet, was permitted to reign over the ruins of Boursa, the greatest part of the provinces of Anatolia had been restored by the conqueror to their lawful sovereigns.

From the Irtish and Volga to the Persian Gulf and from the Ganges to Damascus and the Archipelago Asia was in the hand of Timour his armies were invincible his ambition was boundless, and his zeal might aspire to conquer and convert the Christian kingdoms of the West, which already trembled at his name. He touched the utmost verge of the land but an insuperable though narrow sea, rolled between the two continents of Europe and Asia,[59] but the lord of so many tomans or myriads of horse was not master of a single galley The two passages of the Bosphorus and Hellespont of Constantinople and Gallipoli, were possessed the one by the Christians, the other by the Turks. On this great occasion they forgot the difference of religion to act with union and firmness in the common cause the double straits were guarded with ships and fortifications and they separately withheld the transports which Timour demanded of either nation under the pretence of attacking their enemy At the same time they soothed his pride with tributary gifts and suppliant embassies and prudently tempted him to retreat with the honours of victory Soliman the son of Bajazet implored his clemency for his father and himself accepted by a red patent, the investiture of the kingdom of Romania, which he already held by the sword, and reiterated his ardent wish of casting himself in person at the feet of the king of the world. The Greek emperor[60] (either John or Manuel) submitted to pay the same tribute which he had stipulated with the Turkish sultan and ratified the treaty by an oath of allegiance from which he could absolve his conscience so soon as the Mogul arms had retired from Anatolia. But the fears and fancy of nations ascribed to the ambitious Tamerlane a new design of vast and romantic compass a design of subduing Egypt and Africa, marching from the Nile to the Atlantic Ocean entering Europe by the Straits of Gibraltar and after imposing his yoke on the kingdoms of Christendom, of returning home by the deserts of Russia and Tartary This remote and perhaps imaginary danger, was averted by the submission of the sultan of Egypt the honours of the prayer and the coin attested at Cairo the supremacy of Timour and a rare gift of a giraffe or camelopard and nine ostriches, represented at Samarcand the tribute of the African world Our imagination is not less astonished by the portrait of a Mogul who in his camp before Smyrna meditates and almost accomplishes the invasion of the Chinese empire [61] Timour was urged to this enterprise by national honour and religious zeal The torrents which he had shed of Musulman blood could be expiated only by an equal destruction of the infidels, and as he now stood at the gates of paradise, he might best secure his glorious entrance by demolishing the idols of China founding mosques in every city and establishing the profession of faith in one God and his prophet Mohammed The recent expulsion of the house of Zingis was an insult on the Mogul name and the disorders of the empire afforded the fairest opportunity for revenge The illustrious Hongvou founder of the dynasty of Ming died four years before the battle of Angora, and his grandson a weak and unfortunate youth, was burnt in his palace after a million of Chinese had perished in the civil war [62] Before he evacuated Anatolia Timour despatched beyond the Sihoon a numerous army or rather colony of his old and new subjects, to open the road to subdue the pagan Calmucks and Mungals, and to found cities and magazines in the desert, and by the diligence of his lieutenant he soon received a perfect map and description of the unknown regions, from the source of the Irtish to the wall of China. During these preparations the emperor achieved the final conquest of Georgia passed the winter on the banks of the Araxes appeased the troubles of Persia and slowly returned to his capital after a campaign of four years and nine months.

the feast of victory, to which Bajazet was invited, the Mogul emperor placed a crown on his head and a sceptre in his hand, with a solemn assurance of restoring him with an increase of glory to the throne of his ancestors But the effect of this promise was disappointed by the sultan's untimely death, amidst the care of the most skilful physicians he expired of an apoplexy at Akshehr, the Antioch of Pisidia about nine months after his defeat The victor dropped a tear over his grave his body, with royal pomp was conveyed to the mausoleum which he had erected at Boursa and his son Mousa, after receiving a rich present of gold and jewels of horses and arms was invested by a patent in red ink with the kingdom of Anatolia

Such is the portrait of a generous conqueror, which has been extracted from his own memorials and dedicated to his son and grandson, nineteen years after his decease [47] and at a time when the truth was remembered by thousands, a manifest falsehood would have implied a satire on his real conduct Weighty indeed is this evidence adopted by all the Persian histories [48] yet flattery more especially in the East is base and audacious and the harsh and ignominious treatment of Bajazet is attested by a chain of witnesses, some of whom shall be produced in the order of their time and country 1 The reader has not forgot the garrison of French whom the marshal Boucicault left behind him for the defence of Constantinople They were on the spot to receive the earliest and most faithful intelligence of the overthrow of their great adversary, and it is more than probable that some of them accompanied the Greek embassy to the camp of Tamerlane From their account the hardships of the prison and death of Bajazet are affirmed by the marshal s servant and historian within the distance of seven years [49] 2 The name of Poggius the Italian[50] is deservedly famous among the revivers of learning in the fifteenth century His elegant dialogue on the vicissitudes of fortune[51] was composed in his fiftieth year twenty-eight years after the Turkish victory of Tamerlane [52] whom he celebrates as not inferior to the illustrious barbarians of antiquity Of his exploits and discipline Poggius was informed by several ocular witnesses nor does he forget an example so apposite to his theme as the Ottoman monarch, whom the Scythian confined like a wild beast in an iron cage and exhibited a spectacle to Asia I might add the authority of two Italian chronicles perhaps of an earlier date which would prove at least that the same story whether false or true was imported into Europe with the first tidings of the revolution [53] 3 At the time when Poggius flourished at Rome, Ahmed Ebn Arabshah composed at Damascus the florid and malevolent history of Timour, for which he had collected materials in his journeys over Turkey and Tartary [54] Without any possible correspondence between the Latin and the Arabian writer they agree in the fact of the iron cage and their agreement is a striking proof of their common veracity Ahmed Arabshah likewise relates another outrage which Bajazet endured of a more domestic and tender nature His indiscreet mention of women and divorces was deeply resented by the jealous Tartar in the feast of victory the wine was served by female cupbearers and the sultan beheld his own concubines and wives confounded among the slaves and exposed without a veil to the eyes of intemperance To escape a similar indignity it is said that his successors, except in a single instance have abstained from legitimate nuptials and the Ottoman practice and belief at least in the sixteenth century, is attested by the observing Busbequius,[55] ambassador from the court of Vienna to the great Soliman. 4 Such is the separation of language that the testimony of a Greek is not less independent than that of a Latin or an Arab I suppress the names of Chalcocondyles and Ducas who flourished in a later period and who speak in a less positive tone but more attention is due to George Phranza [56] protovestiare of the last emperors and who was born a year before the battle of Angora Twenty two years after that event he was sent ambassador to Amurath the Second and the historian might converse with some veteran Janizaries who had been made prisoners with the sultan and had themselves seen him in his iron cage 5 The last evidence, in every sense is that of the Turkish annals, which have been consulted or transcribed by Leunclavius Pocock and Cantemir [57] They unanimously deplore the captivity of the iron cage, and some credit may be allowed to national historians who cannot stigmatise the Tartar without uncovering the shame of their king and country

From these opposite premises a fair and moderate conclusion may be deduced I am satisfied that Sherefeddin Ali has faithfully described the first ostentatious interview in which the conqueror whose spirits were harmonised by success affected the character of generosity But his mind was insensibly alienated by the unseasonable arrogance of Bajazet the com

afterwards restored to honour and command. Perhaps his heart was not devoid of the social virtues perhaps he was not incapable of loving his friends and pardoning his enemies but the rules of morality are founded on the public interest and it may be sufficient to applaud the wisdom of a monarch, for the liberality by which he is not impoverished and for the justice by which he is strengthened and enriched. To maintain the harmony of authority and obedience, to chastise the proud to protect the weak to reward the deserving to banish vice and idleness from his dominions to secure the traveller and merchant to restrain the depredations of the soldier, to cherish the labours of the husbandman, to encourage industry and learning, and by an equal and moderate assessment, to increase the revenue without increasing the taxes, are indeed the duties of a prince but, in the discharge of these duties, he finds an ample and immediate recompense Timour might boast that, at his accession to the throne Asia was the prey to anarchy and rapine whilst under his prosperous monarchy a child, fearless and unhurt, might carry a purse of gold from the East to the West. Such was his confidence of merit, that from this reformation he derived an excuse for his victories and a title to universal dominion. The four following observations will serve to appreciate his claim to the public gratitude and perhaps we shall conclude that the Mogul emperor was rather the scourge than the benefactor of mankind 1 If some partial disorders, some local oppressions, were healed by the sword of Timour the remedy was far more pernicious than the disease By their rapine, cruelty and discord the petty tyrants of Persia might afflict their subjects but whole nations were crushed under the footsteps of the reformer The ground which had been occupied by flourishing cities was often marked by his abominable trophies by columns or pyramids, of human heads. Astracan Carizme, Delhi Ispahan, Ba dad, Aleppo Damascus Boursa Smyrna and a thousand others were sacked o burnt, or utterly destroyed in his presence and by his troops and perhaps his conscience would have been startled if a priest or philosopher had dared to number the millions of victims whom he had sacrificed to the establishment of peace and order [30] 2 His most destructive wars were rather inroads than conquests He invaded Turkestan, Kipzak, Russia Hindostan Syria Anatolia, Armenia, and Georgia without a hope or a desire of preserving those distant provinces. From thence he departed laden with spoil but he left behind him neither troops to awe the contumacious, nor magistrates to protect the obedient, natives When he had broken the fabric of their ancient government he abandoned them to the evils which his invasion had aggravated or caused nor were these evils compensated by any present or possible benefits. 3 The kingdoms of Transoxiana and Persia were the proper field which he laboured to cultivate and adorn as the perpetual inheritance of his family But his peaceful labours were often interrupted and sometimes blasted by the absence of the conqueror While he triumphed on the Volga or the Ganges, his servants, and even his sons, forgot their master and their duty The public and private injuries were poorly redressed by the tardy rigour of inquiry and punishment and we must be content to praise the Institutions of Timour as the specious idea of a perfect monarchy 4. Whatsoever might be the blessings of his administration they evaporated with his life. To reign rather than to govern, was the ambition of his children and grand children [30] the enemies of each other and of the people. A fragment of the empire was upheld with some glory by Sharokh his youngest son but after his decease the scene was again involved in darkness and blood and before the end of a century Transoxiana and Persia were trampled by the Uzbeks from the north and the Turkmans of the black and white sheep The race of Timour would have been extinct if a hero his descendant in the fifth degree had not fled before the Uzbek arms to the conquest of Hindostan. His successors (the great Moguls[31]) extended their sway from the mountains of Cashmir to Cape Comorin, and from Candahar to the gulf of Bengal. Since the reign of Aurungzebe their empire has been dissolved their treasures of Delhi have been rifled by a Persian robber and the richest of their kingdoms is now possessed by a company of Christian merchants of a remote island in the Northern Ocean.

Far different was the fate of the Ottoman monarchy The massy trunk was bent to the ground but no sooner did the hurricane pass away than it again rose with fresh vigour and more lively vegetation. When Timour in every sense had evacuated Anatolia he left the cities without a palace a treasure or a king The open country was overspread with hordes of shepherds and robbers of Tartar or Turkman origin the recent conquests of Bajazet were restored to the emirs one of whom in base revenge demolished his sepulchre and his five

On the throne of Samarcand[61] he displayed, in a short repose, his magnificence and power listened to the complaints of the people dis tributed a just measure of rewards and punish ments employed his riches in the architecture of palaces and temples and gave audience to the ambassadors of Egypt, Arabia India Tar tary Russia, and Spain the last of whom pre sented a suit of tapestry which eclipsed the pencil of the Oriental artists The marriage of six of the emperor s grandsons was esteemed an act of religion as well as of paternal tenderness and the pomp of the ancient caliphs was revived in their nuptials They were celebrated in the gardens of Canighul decorated with innumer able tents and pavilions which displayed the luxury of a great city and the spoils of a vic torious camp Whole forests were cut down to supply fuel for the kitchens the plain was spread with pyramids of meat and vases of every liquor, to which thousands of guests were courteously invited the orders of the state and the nations of the earth were marshalled at the royal banquet nor were the ambassadors of Europe (says the haughty Persian) excluded from the feast since even the casses the smallest of fish, find their place in the ocean [64] The public joy was testified by illuminations and masquerades, the trades of Samarcand passed in review and every trade was emulous to exe cute some quaint device, some marvellous pag eant with the materials of their peculiar art. After the marriage contracts had been ratified by the cadhis, the bridegrooms and their brides retired to the nuptial chambers nine times ac cording to the Asiatic fashion they were dressed and undressed and at each change of apparel pearls and rubies were showered on their heads, and contemptuously abandoned to their at tendants A general indulgence was proclaimed every law was relaxed every pleasure was al lowed the people was free the sovereign was idle and the historian of Timour may remark, that, after devoting fifty years to the attainment of empire the only happy period of his life were the two months in which he ceased to exercise his power But he was soon awakened to the cares of government and war The standard was unfurled for the invasion of China the emirs made their report of two hundred thousand the select and veteran soldiers of Iran and Touran their baggage and provisions were transported by five hundred great waggons and an immense train of horses and camels, and the troops might prepare for a long absence since more than six months were employed in the tranquil journey of a caravan from Samarcand to Pekin Neither age nor the severity of the winter could retard the impatience of Timour he mounted on horseback, passed the Sihoon on the ice marched seventy six parasangs, three hundred miles, from his capital and pitched his last camp in the neighbourhood of Otrar, where he was expected by the angel of death. Fatigue and the indiscreet use of iced water accelerated the progress of his fever, and the conqueror of Asia expired in the seventieth year of his age thirty five years after he had ascended the throne of Zagatai. His designs were lost his armies were disbanded, China was saved and fourteen years after his decease, the most pow erful of his children sent an embassy of friend ship and commerce to the court of Pekin.[65]

The fame of Timour has pervaded the East and West his posterity is still invested with the Imperial title and the admiration of his sub jects, who revered him almost as a deity, may be justified in some degree by the praise or con fession of his bitterest enemies.[66] Although he was lame of a hand and foot, his form and stature were not unworthy of his rank and his vigorous health so essential to himself and to the world was corroborated by temperance and exercise In his familiar discourse he was grave and modest and if he was ignorant of the Arabic language he spoke with fluency and elegance the Persian and Turkish idioms. It was his delight to converse with the learned on topics of history and science and the amuse ment of his leisure hours was the game of chess, which he improved or corrupted with new re finements [67] In his religion he was a zealous, though not perhaps an orthodox Musulman [68] but his sound understanding may tempt us to believe that a superstitious reverence for omens and prophecies for saints and astrologers was only affected as an instrument of policy In the government of a vast empire he stood alone and absolute without a rebel to oppose his power, a favourite to seduce his affections or a minister to mislead his judgment. It was his firmest maxim that, whatever might be the conse quence the word of the prince should never be disputed or recalled but his foes have mali ciously observed that the commands of anger and destruction were more strictly executed than those of beneficence and favour His sons and grandsons, of whom Timour left six and thirty at his decease were his first and most sub missive subjects and whenever they deviated from their duty they were corrected according to the laws of Zingis, with the bastonade, and their union and prudence, that they concealed above forty days the emperor's death till the arrival of his successor in the palace of Boursa. A new war was kindled in Europe by the prince, or impostor Mustapha the first vizir lost his army and his head but the more fortunate Ibrahim, whose name and family are still revered extinguished the last pretender to the throne of Bajazet, and closed the scene of domestic hostility

In these conflicts the wisest Turks, and indeed the body of the nation were strongly attached to the unity of the empire and Romania and Anatolia, so often torn asunder by private ambition, were animated by a strong and invincible tendency of cohesion Their efforts might have instructed the Christian powers and had they occupied with a confederate fleet, the straits of Gallipoli the Ottomans, at least in Europe, must have been speedily annihilated. But the schism of the West, and the factions and wars of France and England diverted the Latins from this generous enterprise they enjoyed the present respite without a thought of futurity and were often tempted by a momentary interest to serve the common enemy of their religion A colony of Genoese,[76] which had been planted at Phocaea[77] on the Ionian coast, was enriched by the lucrative monopoly of alum [78] and their tranquillity under the Turkish empire, was secured by the annual payment of tribute. In the last civil war of the Ottomans, the Genoese governor Adorno a bold and ambitious youth embraced the party of Amurath and undertook, with seven stout galleys, to transport him from Asia to Europe. The sultan and five hundred guards embarked on board the admiral's ship which was manned by eight hundred of the bravest Franks. His life and liberty were in their hands nor can we without reluctance, applaud the fidelity of Adorno who in the midst of the passage knelt before him and gratefully accepted a discharge of his arrears of tribute They landed in sight of Mustapha and Gallipoli two thousand Italians, armed with lances and battle axes, attended Amurath to the conquest of Adrianople and this venal service was soon repaid by the ruin of the commerce and colony of Phocaea.

If Timour had generously marched at the request, and to the relief of the Greek emperor he might be entitled to the praise and gratitude of the Christians.[79] But a Musulman who carried into Georgia the sword of persecution and respected the holy warfare of Bajazet was not disposed to pity or succour the idolaters of Europe. The Tartar followed the impulse of ambition and the deliverance of Constantinople was the accidental consequence When Manuel abdicated the government it was his prayer rather than his hope that the ruin of the church and state might be delayed beyond his unhappy days and after his return from a western pilgrimage, he expected every hour the news of a sad catastrophe On a sudden he was astonished and rejoiced by the intelligence of the retreat the overthrow and the captivity of the Ottoman. Manuel[80] immediately sailed from Modon in the Morea ascended the throne of Constantinople and dismissed his blind competitor to an easy exile in the isle of Lesbos The ambassadors of the son of Bajazet were soon introduced to his presence but their pride was fallen, their tone was modest they were awed by the just apprehension lest the Greeks should open to the Moguls the gates of Europe Soliman saluted the emperor by the name of father solicited at his hands the government or gift of Romania and promised to deserve his favour by inviolable friendship and the restitution of Thessalonica with the most important places along the Strymon the Propontis, and the Black Sea. The alliance of Soliman exposed the emperor to the enmity and revenge of Mousa the Turks appeared in arms before the gates of Constantinople but they were repulsed by sea and land and unless the city was guarded by some foreign mercenaries, the Greeks must have wondered at their own triumph. But, instead of prolonging the division of the Ottoman powers the policy or passion of Manuel was tempted to assist the most formidable of the sons of Bajazet. He concluded a treaty with Mohammed whose progress was checked by the insuperable barrier of Gallipoli the sultan and his troops were transported over the Bosphorus he was hospitably entertained in the capital and his successful sally was the first step to the conquest of Romania. The ruin was suspended by the prudence and moderation of the conqueror he faithfully discharged his own obligations and those of Soliman respected the laws of gratitude and peace and left the emperor guardian of his two younger sons, in the vain hope of saving them from the jealous cruelty of their brother Amurath But the execution of his last testament would have offended the national honour and religion and the divan unanimously pronounced that the royal youths should never be abandoned to the custody and education of a Christian dog On this refusal the By sons were eager, by civil discord to consume the remnant of their patrimony I shall enumerate their names in the order of their age and actions [72] 1 It is doubtful whether I relate the story of the true Mustapha, or of an impostor who personated that lost prince He fought by his father's side in the battle of Angora but when the captive sultan was permitted to inquire for his children, Mousa alone could be found and the Turkish historians the slaves of the triumphant faction are persuaded that his brother was confounded among the slain If Mustapha escaped from that disastrous field he was concealed twelve years from his friends and enemies till he emerged in Thessaly and was hailed by a numerous party as the son and successor of Bajazet His first defeat would have been his last had not the true or false Mustapha been saved by the Greeks and restored, after the decease of his brother Mohammed to liberty and empire A degenerate mind seemed to argue his spurious birth and if on the throne of Adrianople he was adored as the Ottoman sultan his flight, his fetters, and an ignominious gibbet delivered the impostor to popular contempt. A similar character and claim was asserted by several rival pretenders thirty persons are said to have suffered under the name of Mustapha, and these frequent executions may perhaps insinuate that the Turkish court was not perfectly secure of the death of the lawful prince 2 After his father's captivity Isa [3] reigned for some time in the neighbourhood of Angora, Sinope and the Black Sea and his ambassadors were dismissed from the presence of Timour with fair promises and honourable gifts But their master was soon deprived of his province and life by a jealous brother the sovereign of Amasia and the final event suggested a pious allusion that the law of Moses and Jesus of Isa and Mousa had been abrogated by the greater Mohammed 3 Soliman is not numbered in the list of the Turkish emperors yet he checked the victorious progress of the Moguls, and after their departure, united for a while the thrones of Adrianople and Boursa In war he was brave active and fortunate his courage was softened by clemency but it was likewise inflamed by presumption, and corrupted by intemperance and idleness He relaxed the nerves of discipline in a government where either the subject or the sovereign must continually tremble his vices alienated the chiefs of the army and the law, and his daily drunkenness, so contemptible in a prince and a man was doubly odious in a disciple of the prophet. In the slumber of intoxication he was surprised by his brother Mousa and as he fled from Adrianople towards the Byzantine capital, Soliman was overtaken and slain in a bath, after a reign of seven years and ten months. 4 The investiture of Mousa degraded him as the slave of the Moguls his tributary kingdom of Anatolia was confined within a narrow limit, nor could his broken militia and empty treasury contend with the hardy and veteran bands of the sovereign of Romania Mousa fled in disguise from the palace of Boursa traversed the Propontis in an open boat wandered over the Wallachian and Servian hills, and after some vain attempts, ascended the throne of Adrianople so recently stained with the blood of Soliman In a reign of three years and a half his troops were victorious against the Christians of Hungary and the Morea but Mousa was ruined by his timorous disposition and unseasonable clemency After resigning the sovereignty of Anatolia he fell a victim to the perfidy of his ministers and the su*perior ascendant of his brother* Mohammed 5 The final victory of Mohammed was the just recompense of his prudence and moderation. Before his father's captivity the royal youth had been intrusted with the government of Amasia thirty days journey from Constantinople, and the Turkish frontier against the Christians of Trebizond and Georgia. The castle in Asiatic warfare was esteemed impregnable and the city of Amasia [4] which is equally divided by the river Iris rises on either side in the form of an amphitheatre and represents on a smaller scale the image of Bagdad In his rapid career Timour appears to have overlooked this obscure and contumacious angle of Anatolia and Mohammed without provoking the conqueror, maintained his silent independence and chased from the province the last stragglers of the Tartar host He relieved himself from the dangerous neighbourhood of Isa but in the contests of their more powerful brethren his firm neutrality was respected till after the triumph of Mousa he stood forth the heir and avenger of the unfortunate Soliman. Mohammed obtained Anatolia by treaty and Romania by arms and the soldier who presented him with the head of Mousa was rewarded as the benefactor of his king and country The eight years of his sole and peaceful reign were usefully employed in banishing the vices of civil discord and restoring on a firmer basis the fabric of the Ottoman monarchy His last care was the choice of two vizirs, Bajazet and Ibrahim [75] who might guide the youth of his son Amurath and such was first and most honourable inhabitants but they have abandoned at least in Romania the villages and the cultivation of the land to the Christian peasants. In the vigorous age of the Ottoman government the Turks were themselves excluded from all civil and military honours and a servile class, an artificial people, was raised by the discipline of education to obey to conquer and to command [87] From the time of Orchan and the first Amurath the sultans were persuaded that a government of the sword must be renewed in each generation with new soldiers and that such soldiers must be sought not in effeminate Asia, but among the hardy and warlike natives of Europe The provinces of Thrace Macedonia Albania Bulgaria, and Servia became the perpetual seminary of the Turkish army and when the royal fifth of the captives was diminished by conquest, an inhuman tax of the fifth child or of every fifth year was rigorously levied on the Christian families. At the age of twelve or fourteen years the most robust youths were torn from their parents their names were enrolled in a book and from that moment they were clothed taught, and maintained for the public service. According to the promise of their appearance they were selected for the royal schools of Boursa, Pera, and Adrianople intrusted to the care of the bashaws, or dispersed in the houses of the Anatolian peasantry It was the first care of their masters to instruct them in the Turkish language their bodies were exercised by every labour that could fortify their strength they learned to wrestle, to leap to run to shoot with the bow and afterwards with the musket till they were drafted into the chambers and companies of the Janizaries, and severely trained in the military or monastic discipline of the order The youths most conspicuous for birth talents, and beauty were admitted into the inferior class of Agiamoglans or the more liberal rank of Ichoglans of whom the former were attached to the palace and the latter to the person of the prince. In four successive schools, under the rod of the white eunuchs, the arts of horsemanship and of darting the javelin were their daily exercise, while those of a more studious cast applied themselves to the study of the Koran and the knowledge of the Arabic and Persian tongues. As they advanced in seniority and merit, they were gradually dismissed to military civil and even ecclesiastical employments the longer their stay the higher was their expectation till at a mature period, they were admitted into the number of the forty agas, who stood before the sultan, and were promoted by his choice to the government of provinces and the first honours of the empire.[88] Such a mode of institution was admirably adapted to the form and spirit of a despotic monarchy The ministers and generals were, in the strictest sense the slaves of the emperor to whose bounty they were indebted for their instruction and support. When they left the seraglio and suffered their beards to grow as the symbol of enfranchisement, they found themselves in an important office, without faction or friendship without parents and without heirs, dependent on the hand which had raised them from the dust, and which on the slightest displeasure could break in pieces these statues of glass, as they are aptly termed by the Turkish proverb.[89] In the slow and painful steps of education their characters and talents were unfolded to a discerning eye the man, naked and alone was reduced to the standard of his personal merit and if the sovereign had wisdom to choose, he possessed a pure and boundless liberty of choice The Ottoman candidates were trained by the virtues of abstinence to those of action by the habits of submission to those of command A similar spirit was diffused among the troops and their silence and sobriety their patience and modesty, have extorted the reluctant praise of their Christian enemies.[90] Nor can the victory appear doubtful if we compare the discipline and exercise of the Janizaries with the pride of birth the independence of chivalry the ignorance of the new levies, the mutinous temper of the veterans, and the vices of intemperance and disorder which so long contaminated the armies of Europe

The only hope of salvation for the Greek empire and the adjacent kingdoms would have been some more powerful weapon some discovery in the art of war that should give them a decisive superiority over their Turkish foes. Such a weapon was in their hands such a discovery had been made in the critical moment of their fate. The chemists of China or Europe had found by casual or elaborate experiments, that a mixture of saltpetre, sulphur and charcoal produces, with a spark of fire a tremendous explosion It was soon observed that, if the expansive force were compressed in a strong tube a ball of stone or iron might be expelled with irresistible and destructive velocity The precise era of the invention and application of gunpowder[91] is involved in doubtful traditions and equivocal language yet we may clearly discern that it was known before the middle of the fourteenth century and that before the end

zantine councils were divided but the age and caution of Manuel yielded to the presumption of his son John and they unsheathed a dangerous weapon of revenge, by dismissing the true or false Mustapha, who had long been detained as a captive and hostage, and for whose maintenance they received an annual pension of three hundred thousand aspers[81] At the door of his prison Mustapha subscribed to every proposal, and the keys of Gallipoli or rather of Europe were stipulated as the price of his deliverance But no sooner was he seated on the throne of Romania than he dismissed the Greek ambassadors with a smile of contempt declaring in a pious tone that, at the day of judgment, he would rather answer for the violation of an oath, than for the surrender of a Musulman city into the hands of the infidels The emperor was at once the enemy of the two rivals from whom he had sustained and to whom he had offered, an injury, and the victory of Amurath was followed in the ensuing spring, by the siege of Constantinople.[82]

The religious merit of subduing the city of the Cæsars attracted from Asia a crowd of volunteers who aspired to the crown of martyrdom their military ardour was inflamed by the promise of rich spoils and beautiful females and the sultan's ambition was consecrated by the presence and prediction of Seid Bechar a descendant of the prophet[83] who arrived in the camp on a mule with a venerable train of five hundred disciples But he might blush if a fanatic could blush at the failure of his assurances The strength of the walls resisted an army of two hundred thousand Turks their assaults were repelled by the sallies of the Greeks and their foreign mercenaries the old resources of defence were opposed to the new engines of attack and the enthusiasm of the dervish, who was snatched to heaven in visionary converse with Mohammed, was answered by the credulity of the Christians who beheld the Virgin Mary in a violet garment walking on the rampart and animating their courage[84] After a siege of two months Amurath was recalled to Boursa by a domestic revolt, which had been kindled by Greek treachery and was soon extinguished by the death of a guiltless brother While he led his Janizaries to new conquests in Europe and Asia the Byzantine empire was indulged in a servile and precarious respite of thirty years Manuel sank into the grave and John Palæologus was permitted to reign for an annual tribute of three hundred thousand aspers and the dereliction of almost all that he held beyond the suburbs of Constantinople.

In the establishment and restoration of the Turkish empire the first merit must doubtless be assigned to the personal qualities of the sultans, since in human life, the most important scenes will depend on the character of a single actor By some shades of wisdom and virtue they may be discriminated from each other but, except in a single instance, a period of nine reigns, and two hundred and sixty five years is occupied from the elevation of Othman to the death of Soliman by a rare series of warlike and active princes who impressed their subjects with obedience and their enemies with terror Instead of the slothful luxury of the seraglio, the heirs of royalty were educated in the council and the field from early youth they were entrusted by their fathers with the command of provinces and armies and this manly institution, which was often productive of civil war must have essentially contributed to the discipline and vigour of the monarchy The Ottomans cannot style themselves, like the Arabian caliphs the descendants or successors of the apostle of God, and the kindred which they claim with the Tartar khans of the house of Zingis appears to be founded in flattery rather than in truth[85] Their origin is obscure but their sacred and indefeasible right, which no time can erase and no violence can fringe, was soon and unalterably implanted in the minds of their subjects A weak or vicious sultan may be deposed and strangled but his inheritance devolves to an infant or an idiot nor has the most daring rebel presumed to ascend the throne of his lawful sovereign[86]

While the transient dynasties of Asia have been continually subverted by a crafty vizir in the palace or a victorious general in the camp the Ottoman succession has been confirmed by the practice of five centuries and is now incorporated with the vital principle of the Turkish nation.

To the spirit and constitution of that nation a strong and singular influence may however be ascribed The primitive subjects of Othman were the four hundred families of wandering Turkmans who had followed his ancestors from the Oxus to the Sangar and the plains of Anatolia are still covered with the white and black tents of their rustic brethren But this original drop was dissolved in the mass of voluntary and vanquished subjects who under the name of Turks are united by the common ties of religion language and manners. In the cities from Erzeroum to Belgrade, that national appellation is common to all the Moslems, the Greeks. The method of persuasion though slow is sure and permanent. A deputation of thirty or forty of our doctors would probably agree with those of the Vatican in the love of truth and the unity of belief but on their return what would be the use, the recompense of such agreement? the scorn of their brethren and the reproaches of a blind and obstinate nation. Yet that nation is accustomed to reverence the general councils which have fixed the articles of our faith and if they reprobate the decrees of Lyons, it is because the Eastern churches were neither heard nor represented in that arbitrary meeting For this salutary end it will be expedient, and even necessary that a well-chosen legate should be sent into Greece to convene the patriarchs of Constantinople Alexandria Antioch, and Jerusalem, and with their aid to prepare a free and universal synod. But at this moment, continued the subtle agent, the empire is assaulted and endangered by the Turks, who have occupied four of the greatest cities of Anatolia. The Christian inhabitants have expressed a wish of returning to their allegiance and religion but the forces and revenues of the emperor are insufficient for their deliverance and the Roman legate must be accompanied or preceded by an army of Franks to expel the infidels, and open a way to the holy sepulchre. If the suspicious Latins should require some pledge, some previous effect of the sincerity of the Greeks, the answers of Barlaam were perspicuous and rational. 1 A general synod can alone consummate the union of the churches nor can such a synod be held till the three Oriental patriarchs and a great number of bishops are enfranchised from the Mohammedan yoke. 2 The Greeks are alienated by a long series of oppression and injury they must be reconciled by some act of brotherly love some effectual succour which may fortify the authority and arguments of the emperor and the friends of the union 3 If some difference of faith or ceremonies should be found incurable the Greeks however are the disciples of Christ, and the Turks are the common enemies of the Christian name. The Armenians, Cyprians and Rhodians are equally attacked and it will become the piety of the French princes to draw their swords in the general defence of religion 4. Should the subjects of Andronicus be treated as the worst of schismatics, of heretics, of pagans, a judicious policy may yet instruct the powers of the West to embrace a useful ally to uphold a sinking empire to guard the confines of Europe and rather to join the Greeks against the Turks than to expect the union of the Turkish arms with the troops and treasures of captive Greece The reasons, the offers and the demands of Andronicus were eluded with cold and stately indifference. The kings of France and Naples declined the dangers and glory of a crusade the pope refused to call a new synod to determine old articles of faith and his regard for the obsolete claims of the Latin emperor and clergy engaged him to use an offensive superscription—

To the moderator[3] of the Greeks, and the persons who style themselves the patriarchs of the Eastern churches. For such an embassy a time and character less propitious could not easily have been found Benedict the Twelfth[3] was a dull peasant perplexed with scruples, and immersed in sloth and wine his pride might enrich with a third crown the papal tiara, but he was alike unfit for the regal and the pastoral office.

After the decease of Andronicus, while the Greeks were distracted by intestine war they could not presume to agitate a general union of the Christians. But as soon as Cantacuzene had subdued and pardoned his enemies, he was anxious to justify or at least to extenuate the introduction of the Turks into Europe and the nuptials of his daughter with a Musulman prince. Two officers of state with a Latin interpreter were sent in his name to the Roman court which was transplanted to Avignon on the banks of the Rhône during a period of seventy years they represented the hard necessity which had urged him to embrace the alliance of the miscreants, and pronounced by his command the specious and edifying sounds of union and crusade Pope Clement the Sixth[4] the successor of Benedict, received them with hospitality and honour acknowledged the innocence of their sovereign excused his distress, applauded his magnanimity and displayed a clear knowledge of the state and revolutions of the Greek empire which he had imbibed from the honest accounts of a Savoyard lady an attendant of the empress Anne.[5] If Clement was ill endowed with the virtues of a priest, he possessed however the spirit and magnificence of a prince whose liberal hand distributed benefices and kingdoms with equal facility Under his reign Avignon was the seat of pomp and pleasure in his youth he had surpassed the licentiousness of a baron and the palace nay the bed-chamber of the pope was adorned or polluted by the visits of his female favourites The wars of France and England were adverse to the holy enterprise but his vanity was amused by

of the same the use of artillery in battles and sieges by sea and land was familiar to the states of Germany Italy Spain, France, and England [92] The priority of nations is of small account, none could derive any exclusive benefit from their previous or superior knowledge and in the common improvement they stood on the same level of relative power and military science. Nor was it possible to circumscribe the secret within the pale of the church it was disclosed to the Turks by the treachery of apostates and the selfish policy of rivals and the sultans had sense to adopt and wealth to reward the talents of a Christian engineer The Genoese who transported Amurath into Europe must be accused as his preceptors and it was probably by their hands that his cannon was cast and directed at the siege of Constantinople [93] The first attempt was indeed unsuccessful but in the general warfare of the age the advantage was on their side who were most commonly the assailants, for a while the proportion of the attack and defence was suspended and this thundering artillery was pointed against the walls and towers which had been erected only to resist the less potent engines of antiquity By the Venetians the use of gunpowder was communicated without reproach to the sultans of Egypt and Persia, their allies against the Ottoman power, the secret was soon propagated to the extremities of Asia and the advantage of the European was confined to his easy victories over the savages of the new world If we contrast the rapid progress of this mischievous discovery with the slow and laborious advances of reason science and the arts of peace a philosopher, according to his temper, will laugh or weep at the folly of mankind

CHAPTER LXVI

Applications of the Eastern Emperors to the Popes Visits to the West of John the First, Manuel, and John the Second, Palæologus Union of the Greek and Latin Churches promoted by the Council of Basil, and concluded at Ferrara and Florence State of Literature at Constantinople Its Revival in Italy by the Greek Fugitives Curiosity and Emulation of the Latins

In the four last centuries of the Greek emperors their friendly or hostile aspect towards the pope and the Latins may be observed as the thermometer of their prosperity or distress—as the scale of the rise and fall of the barbarian dynasties When the Turks of the house of Seljuk pervaded Asia and threatened Constantinople we have seen at the council of Placentia the suppliant ambassadors of Alexius imploring the protection of the common father of the Christians No sooner had the arms of the French pilgrims removed the sultan from Nice to Iconium than the Greek princes resumed or avowed their genuine hatred and contempt for the schismatics of the West which precipitated the first downfall of their empire The date of the Mogul invasion is marked in the soft and charitable language of John Vataces After the recovery of Constantinople the throne of the first Palæologus was encompassed by foreign and domestic enemies as long as the sword of Charles was suspended over his head he basely courted the favour of the Roman pontiff and sacrificed to the present danger his faith his virtue and the affection of his subjects. On the decease of Michael the prince and people asserted the independence of their church and the purity of their creed the elder Andronicus neither feared nor loved the Latins in his last distress pride was the safeguard of superstition, nor could he decently retract in his age the firm and orthodox declarations of his youth His grandson the younger Andronicus was less a slave in his temper and situation and the conquest of Bithynia by the Turks admonished him to seek a temporal and spiritual alliance with the Western princes After a separation and silence of fifty years a secret agent the monk Barlaam was despatched to Pope Benedict the Twelfth, and his artful instructions appear to have been drawn by the master hand of the great domestic.[1] Most holy father was he commissioned to say the emperor is not less desirous than yourself of a union between the two churches but in this delicate transaction he is obliged to respect his own dignity and the prejudices of his subjects The ways of union are twofold force and persuasion Of force the inefficacy has been already tried since the Latins have subdued the empire without subduing the minds of the relief and with less violation of his dignity he might appear in the sacred college than at the Ottoman Porte After a long absence the Roman pontiffs were returning from Avignon to the banks of the Tiber Urban the Fifth [8] of a mild and virtuous character encouraged or allowed the pilgrimage of the Greek prince and, within the same year enjoyed the glory of receiving in the Vatican the two Imperial shadows who represented the majesty of Constantine and Charlemagne. In this suppliant visit the emperor of Constantinople, whose vanity was lost in his distress gave more than could be expected of empty sounds and formal submissions. A previous trial was imposed and in the presence of four cardinals he acknowledged as a true Catholic, the supremacy of the pope and the double procession of the Holy Ghost. After this purification he was introduced to a public audience in the church of St. Peter Urban in the midst of the cardinals was seated on his throne the Greek monarch, after three genuflexions devoutly kissed the feet the hands and at length the mouth of the holy father who celebrated high mass in his presence, allowed him to lead the bridle of his mule and treated him with a sumptuous banquet in the Vatican. The entertainment of Palæologus was friendly and honourable, yet some difference was observed between the emperors of the East and West [9] nor could the former be entitled to the rare privilege of chanting the Gospel in the rank of a deacon [10] In favour of his proselyte Urban strove to rekindle the zeal of the French king and the other powers of the West but he found them cold in the general cause and active only in their domestic quarrels. The last hope of the emperor was in an English mercenary John Hawkwood [11] or Acuto who with a band of adventurers, the White Brotherhood had ravaged Italy from the Alps to Calabria, sold his services to the hostile states, and incurred a just excommunication by shooting his arrows against the papal residence A special licence was granted to negotiate with the outlaw but the forces, or the spirit, of Hawkwood were unequal to the enterprise and it was for the advantage perhaps of Palæologus to be disappointed of a succour that must have been costly that could not be effectual and which might have been dangerous [12] The disconsolate Greek [13] prepared for his return but even his return was impeded by a most ignominious obstacle. On his arrival at Venice he had borrowed large sums at exorbitant usury but his coffers were empty his creditors were impatient, and his person was detained as the best security for the payment. His eldest son Andronicus, the regent of Constantinople, was repeatedly urged to exhaust every resource, and even by stripping the churches to extricate his father from captivity and disgrace. But the unnatural youth was insensible of the disgrace, and secretly pleased with the captivity of the emperor the state was poor the clergy was obstinate nor could some religious scruple be wanting to excuse the guilt of his indifference and delay Such undutiful neglect was severely reproved by the piety of his brother Manuel who instantly sold or mortgaged all that he possessed embarked for Venice relieved his father and pledged his own freedom to be responsible for the debt. On his return to Constantinople the parent and king distinguished his two sons with suitable rewards but the faith and manners of the slothful Palæologus had not been improved by his Roman pilgrimage and his apostacy or conversion devoid of any spiritual or temporal effects, was speedily forgotten by the Greeks and Latins.[14]

Thirty years after the return of Palæologus his son and successor Manuel from a similar motive but on a larger scale again visited the countries of the West. In a preceding chapter I have related his treaty with Bajazet, the violation of that treaty the siege or blockade of Constantinople and the French succour under the command of the gallant Boucicault.[15] By his ambassadors Manuel had solicited the Latin powers but it was thought that the presence of a distressed monarch would draw tears and supplies from the hardest barbarians,[16] and the marshal who advised the journey prepared the reception of the Byzantine prince The land was occupied by the Turks but the navigation of Venice was safe and open Italy received him as the first, or at least as the second of the Christian princes Manuel was pitied as the champion and confessor of the faith and the dignity of his behaviour prevented that pity from sinking into contempt. From Venice he proceeded to Padua and Pavia and even the Duke of Milan a secret ally of Bajazet, gave him safe and honourable conduct to the verge of his dominions.[17] On the confines of France[18] the royal officers undertook the care of his person, journey and expenses and two thousand of the richest citizens in arms and on horse back, came forth to meet him as far as Charenton in the neighbourhood of the capital At the gates of Paris he was saluted by the chancellor and the parliament and Charles the splendid idea and the Greek ambassadors returned with two Latin bishops, the ministers of the pontiff On their arrival at Constantinople the emperor and the nuncios admired each other's piety and eloquence and their frequent conferences were filled with mutual praises and promises, by which both parties were amused and neither could be deceived 'I am delighted" said the devout Cantacuzene, with the project of our holy war which must redound to my personal glory as well as to the public benefit of Christendom My dominions will give a free passage to the armies of France my troops, my galleys my treasures shall be consecrated to the common cause and happy would be my fate could I deserve and obtain the crown of martyrdom. Words are insufficient to express the ardour with which I sigh for the reunion of the scattered members of Christ If my death could avail I would gladly present my sword and my neck if the spiritual phoenix could arise from my ashes, I would erect the pile and kindle the flame with my own hands" Yet the Greek emperor presumed to observe that the articles of faith which divided the two churches had been introduced by the pride and precipitation of the Latins he disclaimed the servile and arbitrary steps of the first Palæologus and firmly declared that he would never submit his conscience unless to the decrees of a free and universal synod The situation of the times continued he will not allow the pope and myself to meet either at Rome or Constantinople but some maritime city may be chosen on the verge of the two empires, to unite the bishops and to instruct the faithful of the East and West.' The nuncios seemed content with the proposition and Cantacuzene affects to deplore the failure of his hopes, which were soon overthrown by the death of Clement, and the different temper of his successor His own life was prolonged but it was prolonged in a cloister and except by his prayers, the humble monk was incapable of directing the counsels of his pupil or the state [6]

Yet of all the Byzantine princes, that pupil John Palæologus was the best disposed to embrace to believe, and to obey the shepherd of the West His mother Anne of Savoy was baptised in the bosom of the Latin church her marriage with Andronicus imposed a change of name, of apparel and of worship but her heart was still faithful to her country and religion she had formed the infancy of her son, and she governed the emperor after his mind or at least his stature, was enlarged to the size of man. In the first year of his deliverance and restoration the Turks were still masters of the Hellespont the son of Cantacuzene was in arms at Adrianople, and Palæologus could depend neither on himself nor on his people. By his mother's advice, and in the hope of foreign aid he abjured the rights both of the church and state and the act of slavery [7] subscribed in purple ink, and sealed with the golden bull was privately intrusted to an Italian agent. The first article of the treaty is an oath of fidelity and obedience to Innocent the Sixth and his successors, the supreme pontiffs of the Roman and Catholic church The emperor promises to entertain with due reverence their legates and nuncios, to assign a palace for their residence and a temple for their worship and to deliver his second son Manuel as the hostage of his faith. For these condescensions he requires a prompt succour of fifteen galleys with five hundred men at arms and a thousand archers, to serve against his Christian and Musulman enemies. Palæologus engages to impose on his clergy and people the same spiritual yoke, but as the resistance of the Greeks might be justly foreseen he adopts the two effectual methods of corruption and education The legate was empowered to distribute the vacant benefices among the ecclesiastics who should subscribe the creed of the Vatican three schools were instituted to instruct the youth of Constantinople in the language and doctrine of the Latins and the name of Andronicus, the heir of the empire, was enrolled as the first student. Should he fail in the measures of persuasion or force Palæologus declares himself unworthy to reign transfers to the pope all regal and paternal authority and invests Innocent with full power to regulate the family the government and the marriage of his son and successor But this treaty was neither executed nor published the Roman galleys were as vain and imaginary as the submission of the Greeks and it was only by the secrecy that their sovereign escaped the dishonour of this fruitless humiliation

The tempest of the Turkish arms soon burst on his head and after the loss of Adrianople and Romania he was enclosed in his capital the vassal of the haughty Amurath with the miserable hope of being the last devoured by the savage In this abject state Palæologus embraced the resolution of embarking for Venice, and casting himself at the feet of the pope he was the first of the Byzantine princes who had ever visited the unknown regions of the West yet in them alone he could seek consolation or

tached to the faith and obedience of the Latin patriarch. The greatest part of the country is divided among the princes and prelates but Strasburg Cologne, Hamburg and more than two hundred free cities, are governed by sage and equal laws, according to the will and for the advantage of the whole community The use of duels, or single combats on foot, prevails among them in peace and war their industry excels in all the mechanic arts and the Germans may boast of the invention of gunpowder and cannon which is now diffused over the greatest part of the world II The kingdom of FRANCE is spread above fifteen or twenty days journey from Germany to Spain and from the Alps to the British Ocean containing many flourishing cities, and among these Paris, the seat of the king which surpasses the rest in riches and luxury Many princes and lords alternately wait in his palace and acknowledge him as their sovereign the most powerful are the dukes of Bretagne and Burgundy of whom the latter possesses the wealthy province of Flanders, whose harbours are frequented by the ships and merchants of our own and the more remote seas. The French are an ancient and opulent people, and their language and manners, though somewhat different, are not dissimilar from those of the Italians. Vain of the Imperial dignity of Charlemagne, of their victories over the Saracens, and of the exploits of their heroes Oliver and Rowland [25] they esteem themselves the first of the western nations but this foolish arrogance has been recently humbled by the unfortunate events of their wars against the English, the inhabitants of the British island. III. BRITAIN in the ocean and opposite to the shores of Flanders, may be considered either as one or as three islands but the whole is united by a common interest, by the same manners, and by a similar government. The measure of its circumference is five thousand stadia the land is overspread with towns and villages though destitute of wine and not abounding in fruit trees, it is fertile in wheat and barley in honey and wool and much cloth is manufactured by the inhabitants. In populousness and power in riches and luxury London,[26] the metropolis of the isle, may claim a pre-eminence over all the cities of the West. It is situate on the Thames, a broad and rapid river which at the distance of thirty miles falls into the Gallic Sea and the daily flow and ebb of the tide affords a safe entrance and departure to the vessels of commerce. The king is the head of a powerful and turbulent aristocracy his principal vassals hold their estates by a free and unalterable tenure and the laws define the limits of his authority and their obedience. The kingdom has been often afflicted by foreign conquest and domestic sedition but the natives are bold and hardy renowned in arms and victorious in war The form of their shields or targets is derived from the Italians, that of their swords from the Greeks the use of the long bow is the peculiar and decisive advantage of the English. Their language bears no affinity to the idioms of the continent in the habits of domestic life they are not easily distinguished from their neighbours of France but the most singular circumstance of their manners is their disregard of conjugal honour and of female chastity In their mutual visits, as the first act of hospitality, the guest is welcomed in the embraces of their wives and daughters among friends they are lent and borrowed without shame nor are the islanders offended at this strange commerce and its inevitable consequences.[27] Informed as we are of the customs of old England and assured of the virtue of our mothers, we may smile at the credulity or resent the injustice, of the Greek, who must have confounded a modest salute[28] with a criminal embrace But his credulity and injustice may teach an important lesson, to distrust the accounts of foreign and remote nations, and to suspend our belief of every tale that deviates from the laws of nature and the character of man.[29]

After his return and the victory of Timour Manuel reigned many years in prosperity and peace As long as the sons of Bajazet solicited his friendship and spared his dominions, he was satisfied with the national religion and his leisure was employed in composing twenty theological dialogues for its defence. The appearance of the Byzantine ambassadors at the council of Constance[30] announces the restoration of the Turkish power as well as of the Latin church the conquest of the sultans, Mohammed and Amurath, reconciled the emperor to the Vatican and the siege of Constantinople almost tempted him to acquiesce in the double procession of the Holy Ghost. When Martin the Fifth ascended without a rival the chair of St. Peter a friendly intercourse of letters and embassies was revived between the East and West. Ambition on one side and distress on the other dictated the same decent language of charity and peace the artful Greek expressed a desire of marrying his six sons to Italian princesses and the Roman not less artful despatched the daughter of the marquis of Montferrat, with a

the Sixth attended by his princes and nobles, welcomed his brother with a cordial embrace. The successor of Constantine was clothed in a robe of white silk and mounted on a milk white steed a circumstance, in the French ceremonial, of singular importance the white colour is considered as the symbol of sovereignty and in a late visit the German emperor after a haughty demand and a peevish refusal had been reduced to content himself with a black courser Manuel was lodged in the Louvre a succession of feasts and balls, the pleasures of the banquet and the chase were ingeniously varied by the politeness of the French to display their magnificence and amuse his grief he was indulged in the liberty of his chapel and the doctors of the Sorbonne were astonished, and possibly scandalised, by the language the rites and the vestments of his Greek clergy But the slightest glance on the state of the kingdom must teach him to despair of any effectual assistance The unfortunate Charles though he enjoyed some lucid intervals, continually relapsed into furious or stupid insanity the reigns of government were alternately seized by his brother and uncle, the dukes of Orleans and Burgundy, whose factious competition prepared the miseries of civil war The former was a gay youth dissolved in luxury and love the latter was the father of John count of Nevers who had so lately been ransomed from Turkish captivity and if the fearless son was ardent to revenge his defeat the more prudent Burgundy was content with the cost and peril of the first experiment When Manuel had satiated the curiosity and perhaps fatigued the patience of the French he resolved on a visit to the adjacent island. In his progress from Dover he was entertained at Canterbury with due reverence by the prior and monks of St Austin and on Blackheath king Henry the Fourth with the English court saluted the Greek hero (I copy our old historian) who during many days was lodged and treated in London as emperor of the East.[19] But the state of England was still more adverse to the design of the holy war In the same year the hereditary sovereign had been deposed and murdered the reigning prince was a successful usurper whose ambition was punished by jealousy and remorse nor could Henry of Lancaster withdraw his person or forces from the defence of a throne incessantly shaken by conspiracy and rebellion He pitied he praised he feasted the emperor of Constantinople but if the English monarch assumed the cross it was only to appease his people, and perhaps his conscience by the merit or semblance of this pious intention[20] Satisfied, however, with gifts and honours, Manuel returned to Paris, and after a residence of two years in the West, shaped his course through Germany and Italy, embarked at Venice, and patiently expected in the Morea the moment of his ruin or deliverance. Yet he had escaped the ignominious necessity of offering his religion to public or private sale The Latin church was distracted by the great schism the kings, the nations the universities of Europe, were divided in their obedience between the popes of Rome and Avignon and the emperor anxious to conciliate the friendship of both parties abstained from any correspondence with the indigent and unpopular rivals His journey coincided with the year of the jubilee but he passed through Italy without desiring or deserving the plenary indulgence which abolished the guilt or penance of the sins of the faithful The Roman pope was offended by this neglect accused him of irreverence to an image of Christ, and exhorted the princes of Italy to reject and abandon the obstinate schismatic[21]

During the period of the crusades the Greeks beheld with astonishment and terror the perpetual stream of emigration that flowed and continued to flow from the unknown climates of the West. The visits of their last emperors removed the veil of separation and they disclosed to their eyes the powerful nations of Europe whom they no longer presumed to brand with the name of barbarians The observations of Manuel and his more inquisitive followers have been preserved by a Byzantine historian of the times[22] his scattered ideas I shall collect and abridge and it may be amusing enough perhaps instructive to contemplate the rude pictures of Germany France and England whose ancient and modern state are so familiar to our minds I GERMANY (says the Greek Chalcocondyles) is of ample latitude from Vienna to the Ocean and it stretches (a strange geography) from Prague in Bohemia to the river Tartessus and the Pyrenæan mountains[23] The soil except in figs and olives is sufficiently fruitful the air is salubrious the bodies of the natives are robust and healthy and these cold regions are seldom visited with the calamities of pestilence or earthquakes After the Scythians or Tartars the Germans are the most numerous of nations they are brave and patient, and were they united under a single head their force would be irresistible. By the gift of the pope they have acquired the privilege of choosing the Roman emperor[24] nor is any people more devoutly at

The Roman pontiff had fought and conquered in the cause of ecclesiastical freedom but the victorious clergy were soon exposed to the tyranny of their deliverer and his sacred character was invulnerable to those arms which they found so keen and effectual against the civil magistrate. Their great charter the right of election, was annihilated by appeals, evaded by trusts or commendams disappointed by reversionary grants, and superseded by previous and arbitrary reservations.[36] A public auction was instituted in the court of Rome the cardinals and favourites were enriched with the spoils of nations and every country might complain that the most important and valuable benefices were accumulated on the heads of aliens and absentees. During their residence at Avignon, the ambition of the popes subsided in the meaner passions of avarice[37] and luxury they rigorously imposed on the clergy the tributes of first fruits and tenths but they freely tolerated the impunity of vice, disorder and corruption. These manifold scandals were aggravated by the great schism of the West, which continued above fifty years. In the furious conflicts of Rome and Avignon, the vices of the rivals were mutually exposed and their precarious situation degraded their authority relaxed their discipline, and multiplied their wants and exactions. To heal the wounds, and restore the monarchy of the church, the synods of Pisa and Constance[38] were successively convened but these great assemblies conscious of their strength solved to vindicate the privileges of the Christian aristocracy From a personal sentence against two pontiffs whom they rejected and a third, their acknowledged sovereign, whom they deposed the fathers of Constance proceeded to examine the nature and limits of the Roman supremacy nor did they separate till they had established the authority above the pope, of a general council. It was enacted that, for the government and reformation of the church, such assemblies should be held at regular intervals and that each synod before its dissolution, should appoint the time and place of the subsequent meeting By the influence of the court of Rome the next convocation at Sienna was easily eluded but the bold and vigorous proceedings of the council of Basil[39] had almost been fatal to the reigning pontiff Eugenius the Fourth. A just suspicion of his design prompted the fathers to hasten the promulgation of their first decree, that the representatives of the church militant on earth were invested with a divine and spiritual jurisdiction over all Christians without excepting the pope and that a general council could not be dissolved prorogued or transferred unless by their free deliberation and consent. On the notice that Eugenius had fulminated a bull for that purpose, they ventured to summon to admonish to threaten to censure, the contumacious successor of St. Peter After many delays, to allow time for repentance they finally declared that, unless he submitted within the term of sixty days, he was suspended from the exercise of all temporal and ecclesiastical authority And to mark their jurisdiction over the prince as well as the priest, they assumed the government of Avignon, annulled the alienation of the sacred patrimony and protected Rome from the imposition of new taxes. Their boldness was justified, not only by the general opinion of the clergy but by the support and power of the first monarchs of Christendom the emperor Sigismond declared himself the servant and protector of the synod Germany and France adhered to their cause the duke of Milan was the enemy of Eugenius and he was driven from the Vatican by an insurrection of the Roman people Rejected at the same time by his temporal and spiritual subjects, submission was his only choice by a most humiliating bull, the pope repealed his own acts, and ratified those of the council incorporated his legates and cardinals with that venerable body and seemed to resign himself to the decrees of the supreme legislature. Their fame pervaded the countries of the East and it was in their presence that Sigismond received the ambassadors of the Turkish sultan,[40] who laid at his feet twelve large vases filled with robes of silk and pieces of gold The fathers of Basil aspired to the glory of reducing the Greeks, as well as the Bohemians, within the pale of the church and their deputies invited the emperor and patriarch of Constantinople to unite with an assembly which possessed the confidence of the Western nations Palæologus was not averse to the proposal and his ambassadors were introduced with due honours into the Catholic senate. But the choice of the place appeared to be an insuperable obstacle, since he refused to pass the Alps or the sea of Sicily and positively required that the synod should be adjourned to some convenient city in Italy or at least on the Danube. The other articles of this treaty were more readily stipulated it was agreed to defray the travelling expenses of the emperor with a train of seven hundred persons,[41] to remit an immediate sum of eight thousand ducats[42] for the accommodation of the company of noble virgins, to soften, by their charms the obstinacy of the schismatics Yet under this mask of zeal a discerning eye will perceive that all was hollow and insincere in the court and church of Constantinople According to the vicissitudes of danger and repose, the emperor advanced or retreated alternately instructed and disavowed his ministers, and escaped from an importunate pressure by urging the duty of inquiry the obligation of collecting the sense of his patriarchs and bishops, and the impossibility of convening them at a time when the Turkish arms were at the gates of his capital From a review of the public transactions it will appear that the Greeks insisted on three successive measures, a succour, a council and a final reunion, while the Latins eluded the second and only promised the first as a consequential and voluntary reward of the third But we have an opportunity of unfolding the most secret intentions of Manuel as he explained them in a private conversation without artifice or disguise In his declining age the emperor had associated John Palæologus, the second of the name, and the eldest of his sons, on whom he devolved the greatest part of the authority and weight of government One day, in the presence only of the historian Phranza,[31] his favourite chamberlain, he opened to his colleague and successor the true principle of his negotiations with the pope [32] ' Our last resource," said Manuel 'against the Turks is their fear of our union with the Latins, of the warlike nations of the West, who may arm for our relief and for their destruction As often as you are threatened by the miscreants, present this danger before their eyes Propose a council, consult on the means but ever delay and avoid the convocation of an assembly, which cannot tend either to our spiritual or temporal emolument The Latins are proud the Greeks are obstinate, neither party will recede or retract and the attempt of a perfect union will confirm the schism alienate the churches and leave us, without hope or defence at the mercy of the barbarians ' Impatient of this salutary lesson the royal youth arose from his seat and departed in silence and the wise monarch (continues Phranza) casting his eyes on me, thus resumed his discourse ' My son deems himself a great and heroic prince, but, alas! our miserable age does not afford scope for heroism or greatness His daring spirit might have suited the happier times of our ancestors but the present state requires not an emperor, but a cautious steward of the last relics of our fortunes. Well do I remember the lofty expectations which he built on our alliance with Mustapha, and much do I fear that his rash courage will urge the ruin of our house, and that even religion may precipitate our downfall " Yet the experience and authority of Manuel preserved the peace and eluded the council till in the seventy-eighth year of his age, and in the habit of a monk, he terminated his career dividing his precious movables among his children and the poor, his physicians and his favourite servants Of his six sons,[33] Andronicus the Second was invested with the principality of Thessalonica and died of a leprosy soon after the sale of that city to the Venetians and its final conquest by the Turks Some fortunate incidents had restored Peloponnesus, or the Morea, to the empire, and in his more prosperous days Manuel had fortified the narrow isthmus of six miles[34] with a stone wall and one hundred and fifty three towers The wall was overthrown by the first blast of the Ottomans, the fertile peninsula might have been sufficient for the four younger brothers Theodore and Constantine, Demetrius and Thomas but they wasted in domestic contests the remains of their strength and the least successful of the rivals were reduced to a life of dependence in the Byzantine palace

The eldest of the sons of Manuel John Palæologus the Second was acknowledged after his father's death as the sole emperor of the Greeks. He immediately proceeded to repudiate his wife and to contract a new marriage with the princess of Trebizond beauty was in his eyes the first qualification of an empress and the clergy had yielded to his firm assurance that, unless he might be indulged in a divorce, he would retire to a cloister and leave the throne to his brother Constantine The first, and in truth the only victory of Palæologus was over a Jew [35] whom after a long and learned dispute, he converted to the Christian faith and this momentous conquest is carefully recorded in the history of the times But he soon resumed the design of uniting the East and the West and regardless of his father's advice listened as it should seem with sincerity to the proposal of meeting the pope in a general council beyond the Adriatic. This dangerous project was encouraged by Martin the Fifth and coldly entertained by his successor Eugenius till after a tedious negotiation the emperor received a summons from a Latin assembly of a new character the independent prelates of Basil who styled themselves the representatives and judges of the Catholic church.

expended in the massy ornaments of his bed and chariot [52] and while they affected to main tain the prosperity of their ancient fortune they quarrelled for the division of fifteen thousand ducats, the first alms of the Roman pontiff After the necessary preparations, John Palæologus, with a numerous train, accompanied by his brother Demetrius and the most respectable persons of the church and state, embarked in eight vessels with sails and oars, which steered through the Turkish straits of Gallipoli to the Archipelago the Morea, and the Adriatic Gulf.[53]

After a tedious and troublesome navigation of seventy seven days this religious squadron cast anchor before Venice and their reception proclaimed the joy and magnificence of that powerful republic. In the command of the world the modest Augustus had never claimed such honours from his subjects as were paid to his feeble successor by an independent state Seated on the poop on a lofty throne, he re ceived the visit, or in the Greek style the adora tion, of the doge and senators.[54] They sailed in the Bucentaur which was accompanied by twelve stately galleys the sea was overspread with innumerable gondolas of pomp and plea sure the air resounded with music and acclama tions the mariners, and even the vessels, were dressed in silk and gold and in all the emblems and pageants the Roman eagles were blended with the lions of St Mark. The triumphal procession ascending the great canal passed under the bridge of the Rialto and the Eastern stran gers gazed with admiration on the palaces, the churches, and the populousness of a city that seems to float on the bosom of the waves [55] They sighed to behold the spoils and trophies with which it had been decorated after the sack of Constantinople. After an hospitable entertain ment of fifteen days, Palæologus pursued his journey by land and water from Venice to Fer rara and on this occasion the pride of the Vati can was tempered by policy to indulge the an cient dignity of the emperor of the East. He made his entry on a black horse but a milk white steed, whose trappings were embroidered with golden eagles, was led before him and the canopy was borne over his head by the princes of Este, the sons or kinsmen of Nicholas, mar quis of the city and a sovereign more powerful than himself.[56] Palæologus did not alight till he reached the bottom of the staircase the pope advanced to the door of the apartment refused his proffered genuflexion and after a paternal embrace conducted the emperor to a seat on his left hand Nor would the patriarch descend from his galley till a ceremony almost equal, had been stipulated between the bishops of Rome and Constantinople. The latter was salu ted by his brother with a kiss of union and char ity nor would any of the Greek ecclesiastics submit to kiss the feet of the Western primate On the opening of the synod, the place of hon our in the centre was claimed by the temporal and ecclesiastical chiefs and it was only by al leging that his predecessors had not assisted in person at Nice or Chalcedon that Eugenius could evade the ancient precedents of Constan tine and Marcian After much debate it was agreed that the right and left sides of the church should be occupied by the two nations that the solitary chair of St. Peter should be raised the first of the Latin line and that the throne of the Greek emperor at the head of his clergy should be equal and opposite to the second place the vacant seat of the emperor of the West.[57]

But as soon as festivity and form had given place to a more serious treaty the Greeks were dissatisfied with their journey with themselves, and with the pope. The artful pencil of his emissaries had painted him in a prosperous state at the head of the princes and prelates of Europe obedient at his voice to believe and to arm. The thin appearance of the universal synod of Fer rara betrayed his weakness and the Latins opened the first session with only five arch bishops eighteen bishops, and ten abbots the greatest part of whom were the subjects or countrymen of the Italian pontiff Except the duke of Burgundy none of the potentates of the West condescended to appear in person or by their ambassadors nor was it possible to sup press the judicial acts of Basil against the dig nity and person of Eugenius which were finally concluded by a new election Under these cir cumstances a truce or delay was asked and granted till Palæologus could expect from the consent of the Latins some temporal reward for an unpopular union and after the first session the public proceedings were adjourned above six months. The emperor with a chosen band of his favourites and Janizaries fixed his sum mer residence at a pleasant spacious monastery six miles from Ferrara forgot, in the pleasures of the chase the distress of the church and state and persisted in destroying the game, without listening to the just complaints of the marquis or the husbandmen [58] In the mean while his unfortunate Greeks were exposed to all the miseries of exile and poverty for the sup port of each stranger a monthly allowance was

Greek clergy, and in his absence to grant a supply of ten thousand ducats with three hundred archers and some galleys for the protection of Constantinople The city of Avignon advanced the funds for the preliminary expenses, and the embarkation was prepared at Marseilles with some difficulty and delay

In his distress the friendship of Palæologus was disputed by the ecclesiastical powers of the West but the dexterous activity of a monarch prevailed over the slow debates and inflexible temper of a republic The decrees of Basil continually tended to circumscribe the despotism of the pope, and to erect a supreme and perpetual tribunal in the church Eugenius was impatient of the yoke, and the union of the Greeks might afford a decent pretence for translating a rebellious synod from the Rhine to the Po The independence of the fathers was lost if they passed the Alps Savoy or Avignon to which they acceded with reluctance were described at Constantinople as situate far beyond the Pillars of Hercules,[43] the emperor and his clergy were apprehensive of the dangers of a long navigation they were offended by a haughty declaration that after suppressing the new heresy of the Bohemians the council would soon eradicate the old heresy of the Greeks [44] On the side of Eugenius all was smooth, and yielding, and respectful and he invited the Byzantine monarch to heal by his presence the schism of the Latin as well as of the Eastern church Ferrara near the coast of the Adriatic was proposed for their amicable interview and with some indulgence of forgery and theft a surreptitious decree was procured which transferred the synod with its own consent to that Italian city Nine galleys were equipped for this service at Venice and in the isle of Candia their diligence anticipated the slower vessels of Basil the Roman admiral was commissioned to burn, sink and destroy [45] and these priestly squadrons might have encountered each other in the same seas where Athens and Sparta had formerly contended for the pre-eminence of glory Assaulted by the importunity of the factions, who were ready to fight for the possession of his person, Palæologus hesitated before he left his palace and country on a perilous experiment His father s advice still dwelt on his memory and reason must suggest that since the Latins were divided among themselves they could never unite in a foreign cause Sigismond dissuaded the unseasonable adventure his advice was impartial since he adhered to the council and it was enforced by the strange belief that the German Cæsar would nominate a Greek his heir and successor in the empire of the West [46] Even the Turkish sultan was a counsellor whom it might be unsafe to trust but whom it was dangerous to offend Amurath was unskilled in the disputes, but he was apprehensive of the union of the Christians. From his own treasures he offered to relieve the wants of the Byzantine court yet he declared with seeming magnanimity that Constantinople should be secure and inviolate in the absence of her sovereign [47] The resolution of Palæologus was decided by the most splendid gifts and the most specious promises he wished to escape for a while from a scene of danger and distress and after dismissing with an ambiguous answer the messengers of the council he declared his intention of embarking in the Roman galleys. The age of the patriarch Joseph was more susceptible of fear than of hope he trembled at the perils of the sea and expressed his apprehension that his feeble voice, with thirty perhaps of his orthodox brethren, would be oppressed in a foreign land by the power and numbers of a Latin synod He yielded to the royal mandate, to the flattering assurance that he would be heard as the oracle of nations and to the secret wish of learning from his brother of the West to deliver the church from the yoke of kings [48] The five crossbearers or dignitaries of St. Sophia were bound to attend his person and one of these, the great ecclesiarch or preacher, Sylvester Syropulus,[49] has composed a free and curious history[50] of the false union [51] Of the clergy that reluctantly obeyed the summons of the emperor and the patriarch submission was the first duty, and patience the most useful virtue In a chosen list of twenty bishops we discover the metropolitan titles of Heraclea and Cyzicus Nice and Nicomedia Ephesus and Trebizond and the personal merit of Mark and Bessarion who in the confidence of their learning and eloquence, were promoted to the episcopal rank Some monks and philosophers were named to display the science and sanctity of the Greek church and the service of the choir was performed by a select band of singers and musicians The patriarchs of Alexandria Antioch and Jerusalem appeared by their genuine or fictitious deputies the primate of Russia represented a national church, and the Greeks might contend with the Latins in the extent of their spiritual empire The precious vases of St. Sophia were exposed to the winds and waves that the patriarch might officiate with becoming splendour whatever gold the emperor could procure was rom their infancy to repeat a form of mysteri us words their national and personal honour depended on the repetition of the same sounds, and their narrow minds were hardened and in flamed by the acrimony of a public dispute.

While they were lost in a cloud of dust and darkness, the pope and emperor were desirous of a seeming union which could alone accom plish the purposes of their interview and the obstinacy of public dispute was softened by the arts of private and personal negotiation. The patriarch Joseph had sunk under the weight of age and infirmities his dying voice breathed the counsels of charity and concord and his vacant benefice might tempt the hopes of the ambitious clergy The ready and active obedi ence of the archbishops of Russia and Nice of Isidore and Bessarion was prompted and re compensed by their speedy promotion to the dignity of cardinals. Bessarion in the first de bates, had stood forth the most strenuous and eloquent champion of the Greek church and if the apostate the bastard was reprobated by his country [65] he appears in ecclesiastical story a rare example of a patriot who was recom mended to court favour by loud opposition and well timed compliance. With the aid of his two spiritual coadjutors, the emperor applied his arguments to the general situation and personal haracters of the bishops and each was succes ively moved by authority and example. Their revenues were in the hands of the Turks their persons in those of the Latins an episcopal treasure, three robes and forty ducats, was soon exhausted [66] the hopes of their return still de pended on the ships of Venice and the alms of Rome and such was their indigence, that their arrears, the payment of a debt, would be ac cepted as a favour and might operate as a bribe [67] The danger and relief of Constantinople might excuse some prudent and pious dissimu lation and it was insinuated that the obstinate heretics who should resist the consent of the East and West would be abandoned in a hostile land to the revenge or justice of the Roman pon tiff [68] In the first private assembly of the Greeks the formulary of union was approved by twenty four and rejected by twelve, members but the five crossbearers of St. Sophia, who aspired to represent the patriarch, were disqualified by ancient discipline, and their right of voting was transferred to an obsequious train of monks, grammarians, and profane laymen The will of the monarch produced a false and servile una nimity and no more than two patriots had cour age to speak their own sentiments and those of their country Demetrius, the emperor's broth er retired to Venice that he might not be wit ness of the union and Mark of Ephesus, mis taking perhaps his pride for his conscience, dis claimed all communion with the Latin heretics, and avowed himself the champion and confes sor of the orthodox creed [69] In the treaty be tween the two nations several forms of consent were proposed such as might satisfy the Latins without dishonouring the Greeks and they weighed the scruples of words and syllables till the theological balance trembled with a slight preponderance in favour of the Vatican. It was agreed (I must entreat the attention of the reader) that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and the Son as from one principle and one substance that he proceeds by the Son, be ing of the same nature and substance and that he proceeds from the Father and the Son by one spiration and production. It is less difficult to understand the articles of the preliminary treaty that the pope should defray all the ex penses of the Greeks in their return home that he should annually maintain two galleys and three hundred soldiers for the defence of Con stantinople that all the ships which transported pilgrims to Jerusalem should be obliged to touch at that port that as often as they were re quired the pope should furnish ten galleys for a year or twenty for six months and that he should powerfully solicit the princes of Europe if the emperor had occasion for land forces.

The same year and almost the same day were marked by the deposition of Eugenius at Basil and at Florence by his reunion of the Greeks and Latins. In the former synod (which he styled indeed an assembly of demons) the pope was branded with the guilt of simony per jury tyranny heresy and schism [70] and de clared to be incorrigible in his vices, unworthy of any title, and incapable of holding any eccle siastical office. In the latter he was revered as the true and holy vicar of Christ, who after a separation of six hundred years, had reconciled the Catholics of the East and West in one fold and under one shepherd. The act of union was subscribed by the pope the emperor and the principal members of both churches even by those who like Syropulus,[71] had been deprived of the right of voting Two copies might have sufficed for the East and West but Eugenius was not satisfied unless four authentic and sim ilar transcripts were signed and attested as the monuments of his victory [72] On a memorable day the sixth of July the successors of St. Peter and Constantine ascended their thrones the assigned of three or four gold florins, and, although the entire sum did not amount to seven hundred florins a long arrear was repeatedly incurred by the indigence or policy of the Roman court.[59] They sighed for a speedy deliverance, but their escape was prevented by a triple chain a passport from their superiors was required at the gates of Ferrara the government of Venice had engaged to arrest and send back the fugitives and inevitable punishment awaited them at Constantinople, excommunication, fines and a sentence, which did not respect the sacerdotal dignity, that they should be stripped naked and publicly whipped [60] It was only by the alternative of hunger or dispute that the Greeks could be persuaded to open the first conference, and they yielded with extreme reluctance to attend from Ferrara to Florence the rear of a flying synod This new translation was urged by inevitable necessity the city was visited by the plague the fidelity of the marquis might be suspected the mercenary troops of the duke of Milan were at the gates and as they occupied Romagna it was not without difficulty and danger that the pope, the emperor, and the bishops explored their way through the unfrequented paths of the Apennine [61]

Yet all these obstacles were surmounted by time and policy The violence of the fathers of Basil rather promoted than injured the cause of Eugenius the nations of Europe abhorred the schism and disowned the election of Felix the Fifth, who was successively a duke of Savoy a hermit and a pope and the great princes were gradually reclaimed by his competitor to a favourable neutrality and a firm attachment The legates with some respectable members, deserted to the Roman army, which insensibly rose in numbers and reputation the council of Basil was reduced to thirty nine bishops and three hundred of the inferior clergy [62] while the Latins of Florence could produce the subscriptions of the pope himself eight cardinals two patriarchs, eight archbishops fifty two bishops and forty five abbots or chiefs of religious orders After the labour of nine months and the debates of twenty five sessions they attained the advantage and glory of the reunion of the Greeks Four principal questions had been agitated between the two churches 1 The use of unleavened bread in the communion of Christ s body 2 The nature of purgatory 3 The supremacy of the pope And, 4. The single or double procession of the Holy Ghost. The cause of either nation was managed by ten theological champions the Latins were supported by the inexhaustible eloquence of Cardinal Julian, and Mark of Ephesus and Bessarion of Nice were the bold and able leaders of the Greek forces. We may bestow some praise on the progress of human reason by observing that the first of these questions was now treated as an immaterial rite, which might innocently vary with the fashion of the age and country With regard to the second both parties were agreed in the belief of an intermediate state of purgation for the venial sins of the faithful, and whether their souls were purified by elemental fire was a doubtful point, which in a few years might be conveniently settled on the spot by the disputants. The claims of supremacy appeared of a more weighty and substantial kind yet by the Orientals the Roman bishop had ever been respected as the first of the five patriarchs nor did they scruple to admit that his jurisdiction should be exercised agreeably to the holy canons a vague allowance which might be defined or eluded by occasional convenience The procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father alone, or from the Father and the Son, was an article of faith which had sunk much deeper into the minds of men and in the sessions of Ferrara and Florence the Latin addition of filioque was subdivided into two questions, whether it were legal and whether it were orthodox Perhaps it may not be necessary to boast on this subject of my own impartial indifference but I must think that the Greeks were strongly supported by the prohibition of the council of Chalcedon against adding any article whatsoever to the creed of Nice or rather of Constantinople [63] In earthly affairs it is not easy to conceive how an assembly of legislators can bind their successors invested with powers equal to their own But the dictates of inspiration must be true and unchangeable nor should a private bishop or a provincial synod have presumed to innovate against the judgment of the Catholic church. On the substance of the doctrine the controversy was equal and endless the reason is confounded by the procession of a deity the Gospel which lay on the altar was silent the various texts of the fathers might be corrupted by fraud or entangled by sophistry and the Greeks were ignorant of the characters and writings of the Latin saints.[64] Of this at least we may be sure that neither side could be convinced by the arguments of their opponents. Prejudice may be enlightened by reason and a superficial glance may be rectified by a clear and more perfect view of an object adapted to our faculties. But the bishops and monks had been taught manners, nor were they diverted like the Latin priests, by the pursuits and pleasures of a secular and even military life. After a large deduction for the time and talents that were lost in the devotion the laziness, and the discord of the church and cloister the more inquisitive and ambitious minds would explore the sacred and profane erudition of their native language. The ecclesiastics presided over the education of youth the schools of philosophy and eloquence were perpetuated till the fall of the empire and it may be affirmed that more books and more knowledge were included within the walls of Constantinople than could be dispersed over the extensive countries of the West.[83] But an important distinction has been already noticed the Greeks were stationary or retrograde, while the Latins were advancing with a rapid and progressive motion The nations were excited by the spirit of independence and emulation and even the little world of the Italian states contained more people and industry than the decreasing circle of the Byzantine empire In Europe the lower ranks of society were relieved from the yoke of feudal servitude and freedom is the first step to curiosity and knowledge The use, however rude and corrupt of the Latin tongue had been preserved by superstition the universities, from Bologna to Oxford,[84] were peopled with thousands of scholars and their misguided ardour might be directed to more liberal and manly studies In the resurrection of science Italy was the first that cast away her shroud and the eloquent Petrarch by his lessons and his example may justly be applauded as the first harbinger of day A purer style of composition a more generous and rational strain of sentiment, flowed from the study and imitation of the writers of ancient Rome and the disciples of Cicero and Virgil approached with reverence and love, the sanctuary of their Grecian masters. In the sack of Constantinople, the French and even the Venetians, had despised and destroyed the works of Lysippus and Homer the monuments of art may be annihilated by a single blow but the immortal mind is renewed and multiplied by the copies of the pen, and such copies it was the ambition of Petrarch and his friends to possess and understand. The arms of the Turks undoubtedly pressed the flight of the Muses yet we may tremble at the thought that Greece might have been overwhelmed with her schools and libraries, before Europe had emerged from the deluge of barbarism that the seeds of science might have been scattered by the winds before the Italian soil was prepared for their cultivation

The most learned Italians of the fifteenth century have confessed and applauded the restoration of Greek literature after a long oblivion of many hundred years.[85] Yet in that country and beyond the Alps, some names are quoted some profound scholars who in the darker ages were honourably distinguished by their knowledge of the Greek tongue and national vanity has been loud in the praise of such rare examples of erudition Without scrutinising the merit of individuals, truth must observe that their science is without a cause and without an effect that it was easy for them to satisfy themselves and their more ignorant contemporaries and that the idiom, which they had so marvellously acquired was transcribed in few manuscripts, and was not taught in any university of the West. In a corner of Italy it faintly existed as the popular or at least as the ecclesiastical dialect.[86] The first impression of the Doric and Ionic colonies has never been completely erased the Calabrian churches were long attached to the throne of Constantinople and the monks of St. Basil pursued their studies in Mount Athos and the schools of the East. Calabria was the native country of Barlaam, who has already appeared as a sectary and an ambassador and Barlaam was the first who revived beyond the Alps, the memory or at least the writings, of Homer[87] He is described by Petrarch and Boccace[88] as a man of a diminutive stature though truly great in the measure of learning and genius of a piercing discernment, though of a slow and painful elocution For many ages (as they affirm) Greece had not produced his equal in the knowledge of history grammar and philosophy and his merit was celebrated in the attestations of the princes and doctors of Constantinople. One of these attestations is still extant and the emperor Cantacuzene the protector of his adversaries is forced to allow that Euclid Aristotle and Plato were familiar to that profound and subtle logician[89] In the court of Avignon he formed an intimate connection with Petrarch[90] the first of the Latin scholars and the desire of mutual instruction was the principle of their literary commerce. The Tuscan applied himself with eager curiosity and assiduous diligence to the study of the Greek language, and in a laborious struggle with the dryness and difficulty of the first rudiments he began to reach the sense and to feel the spirit, of poets and philosophers whose minds were congenial to his own But he was soon deprived of the society and lessons of this two nations assembled in the cathedral of Florence their representatives, Cardinal Julian, and Bessarion archbishop of Nice appeared in the pulpit, and, after reading in their respective tongues the act of union they mutually embraced in the name and the presence of their applauding brethren The pope and his ministers then officiated according to the Roman liturgy the creed was chanted with the addition of filioque, the acquiescence of the Greeks was poorly excused by their ignorance of the harmonious but inarticulate sounds [73] and the more scrupulous Latins refused any public celebration of the Byzantine rite Yet the emperor and his clergy were not totally unmindful of national honour The treaty was ratified by their consent it was tacitly agreed that no innovation should be attempted in their creed or ceremonies they spared and secretly respected the generous firmness of Mark of Ephesus, and, on the decease of the patriarch, they refused to elect his successor except in the cathedral of St. Sophia In the distribution of public and private rewards the liberal pontiff exceeded their hopes and his promises the Greeks with less pomp and pride returned by the same road of Ferrara and Venice and their reception at Constantinople was such as will be described in the following chapter [74] The success of the first trial encouraged Eugenius to repeat the same edifying scenes and the deputies of the Armenians, the Maronites the Jacobites of Syria and Egypt, the Nestorians and the Æthiopians were successively introduced to kiss the feet of the Roman pontiff, and to announce the obedience and the orthodoxy of the East. These Oriental embassies, unknown in the countries which they presumed to represent [75] diffused over the West the fame of Eugenius and a clamour was artfully propagated against the remnant of a schism in Switzerland and Savoy which alone impeded the harmony of the Christian world The vigour of opposition was succeeded by the lassitude of despair the council of Basil was silently dissolved, and Felix renouncing the tiara, again withdrew to the devout or delicious hermitage of Ripaille [76] A general peace was secured by mutual acts of oblivion and indemnity all ideas of reformation subsided the popes continued to exercise and abuse their ecclesiastical despotism nor has Rome been since disturbed by the mischiefs of a contested election [77]

The journeys of three emperors were unavailing for their temporal or perhaps their spiritual salvation, but they were productive of a beneficial consequence, the revival of the Greek learning in Italy, from whence it was propagated to the last nations of the West and North In their lowest servitude and depression the subjects of the Byzantine throne were still possessed of a golden key that could unlock the treasures of antiquity of a musical and prolific language that gives a soul to the objects of sense, and a body to the abstractions of philosophy Since the barriers of the monarchy and even of the capital, had been trampled under foot the various barbarians had doubtless corrupted the form and substance of the national dialect, and ample glossaries have been composed, to interpret a multitude of words of Arabic, Turkish, Sclavonian Latin, or French origin [78] But a purer idiom was spoken in the court and taught in the college and the flourishing state of the language is described and perhaps embellished by a learned Italian [79] who by a long residence and noble marriage [80] was naturalised at Constantinople about thirty years before the Turkish conquest The vulgar speech, " says Philephus [81] "has been depraved by the people and infected by the multitude of strangers and merchants who every day flock to the city and mingle with the inhabitants It is from the disciples of such a school that the Latin language received the versions of Aristotle and Plato so obscure in sense and in spirit so poor But the Greeks who have escaped the contagion are those whom we follow and they alone are worthy of our imitation In familiar discourse they still speak the tongue of Aristophanes and Euripides of the historians and philosophers of Athens and the style of their writings is still more elaborate and correct. The persons who, by their birth and offices are attached to the Byzantine court are those who maintain with the least alloy the ancient standard of elegance and purity, and the native graces of language most conspicuously shine among the noble matrons, who are excluded from all intercourse with foreigners With foreigners do I say? They live retired and sequestered from the eyes of their fellow-citizens Seldom are they seen in the streets, and when they leave their houses it is in the dusk of evening on visits to the churches and their nearest kindred On these occasions they are on horseback covered with a veil and encompassed by their parents, their husbands, or their servants [82]

Among the Greeks a numerous and opulent clergy was dedicated to the service of religion their monks and bishops have ever been distinguished by the gravity and austerity of their

manners, nor were they diverted like the Latin priests, by the pursuits and pleasures of a secular and even military life. After a large deduction for the time and talents that were lost in the devotion, the laziness, and the discord of the church and cloister the more inquisitive and ambitious minds would explore the sacred and profane erudition of their native language. The ecclesiastics presided over the education of youth the schools of philosophy and eloquence were perpetuated till the fall of the empire and it may be affirmed that more books and more knowledge were included within the walls of Constantinople than could be dispersed over the extensive countries of the West.[83] But an important distinction has been already noticed the Greeks were stationary or retrograde, while the Latins were advancing with a rapid and progressive motion. The nations were excited by the spirit of independence and emulation and even the little world of the Italian states contained more people and industry than the decreasing circle of the Byzantine empire In Europe the lower ranks of society were relieved from the yoke of feudal servitude and freedom is the first step to curiosity and knowledge. The use, however rude and corrupt, of the Latin tongue had been preserved by superstition the universities, from Bologna to Oxford[84] were peopled with thousands of scholars and their misguided ardour might be directed to more liberal and manly studies. In the resurrection of science Italy was the first that cast away her shroud and the eloquent Petrarch by his lessons and his example may justly be applauded as the first harbinger of day A purer style of composition a more generous and rational strain of sentiment, flowed from the study and imitation of the writers of ancient Rome and the disciples of Cicero and Virgil approached with reverence and love the sanctuary of their Grecian masters. In the sack of Constantinople, the French and even the Venetians had despised and destroyed the works of Lysippus and Homer the monuments of art may be annihilated by a single blow but the immortal mind is renewed and multiplied by the copies of the pen, and such copies it was the ambition of Petrarch and his friends to possess and understand. The arms of the Turks undoubtedly pressed the flight of the Muses yet we may tremble at the thought that Greece might have been overwhelmed with her schools and libraries, before Europe had emerged from the deluge of barbarism that the seeds of science might have been scattered by the winds before the Italian soil was prepared for their cultivation.

The most learned Italians of the fifteenth century have confessed and applauded the restoration of Greek literature after a long oblivion of many hundred years.[85] Yet in that country and beyond the Alps some names are quoted some profound scholars who in the darker ages, were honourably distinguished by their knowledge of the Greek tongue and national vanity has been loud in the praise of such rare examples of erudition Without scrutinising the merit of individuals, truth must observe that their science is without a cause and without an effect that it was easy for them to satisfy themselves and their more ignorant contemporaries and that the idiom, which they had so marvellously acquired was transcribed in few manuscripts, and was not taught in any university of the West. In a corner of Italy it faintly existed as the popular or at least as the ecclesiastical, dialect.[86] The first impression of the Doric and Ionic colonies has never been completely erased the Calabrian churches were long attached to the throne of Constantinople and the monks of St. Basil pursued their studies in Mount Athos and the schools of the East. Calabria was the native country of Barlaam who has already appeared as a sectary and an ambassador and Barlaam was the first who revived beyond the Alps, the memory or at least the writings of Homer[87] He is described by Petrarch and Boccace,[88] as a man of a diminutive stature though truly great in the measure of learning and genius of a piercing discernment, though of a slow and painful elocution For many ages (as they affirm) Greece had not produced his equal in the knowledge of history, grammar and philosophy and his merit was celebrated in the attestations of the princes and doctors of Constantinople One of these attestations is still extant and the emperor Cantacuzene the protector of his adversaries is forced to allow that Euclid Aristotle and Plato were familiar to that profound and subtle logician[89] In the court of Avignon he formed an intimate connection with Petrarch[90] the first of the Latin scholars and the desire of mutual instruction was the principle of their literary commerce. The Tuscan applied himself with eager curiosity and assiduous diligence to the study of the Greek language and in a laborious struggle with the dryness and difficulty of the first rudiments he began to reach the sense and to feel the spirit, of poets and philosophers whose minds were congenial to his own. But he was soon deprived of the society and lessons of this useful assistant Barlaam relinquished his fruitless embassy, and, on his return to Greece, he rashly provoked the swarms of fanatic monks, by attempting to substitute the light of reason to that of their navel After a separation of three years the two friends again met in the court of Naples, but the generous pupil renounced the fairest occasion of improvement and by his recommendation Barlaam was finally settled in a small bishopric of his native Calabria [91] The manifold avocations of Petrarch love and friendship his various correspondence and frequent journeys, the Roman laurel and his elaborate compositions in prose and verse, in Latin and Italian diverted him from a foreign idiom and as he advanced in life the attainment of the Greek language was the object of his wishes rather than of his hopes. When he was about fifty years of age, a Byzantine ambassador, his friend, and a master of both tongues presented him with a copy of Homer, and the answer of Petrarch is at once expressive of his eloquence gratitude and regret After celebrating the generosity of the donor and the value of a gift more precious in his estimation than gold or rubies he thus proceeds — 'Your present of the genuine and original text of the divine poet the fountain of all invention is worthy of yourself and of me, you have fulfilled your promise and satisfied my desires Yet your liberality is still imperfect with Homer you should have given me yourself a guide who could lead me into the fields of light and disclose to my wondering eyes the specious miracles of the Iliad and Odyssey But alas! Homer is dumb or I am deaf, nor is it in my power to enjoy the beauty which I possess I have seated him by the side of Plato the prince of poets near the prince of philosophers, and I glory in the sight of my illustrious guests Of their immortal writings whatever had been translated into the Latin idiom I had already acquired but if there be no profit there is some pleasure in beholding these venerable Greeks in their proper and national habit I am delighted with the aspect of Homer and as often as I embrace the silent volume, I exclaim with a sigh Illustrious bard! with what pleasure should I listen to thy song if my sense of hearing were not obstructed and lost by the death of one friend, and in the much lamented absence of another! Nor do I yet despair and the example of Cato suggests some comfort and hope since it was in the last period of age that he attained the knowledge of the Greek letters '[92]

The prize which eluded the efforts of Petrarch was obtained by the fortune and industry of his friend Boccace,[93] the father of the Tuscan prose That particular writer who derives his reputation from the Decameron, a hundred novels of pleasantry and love, may aspire to the more serious praise of restoring in Italy the study of the Greek language In the year one thousand three hundred and sixty a disciple of Barlaam, whose name was Leo or Leontius Pilatus was detained in his way to Avignon by the advice and hospitality of Boccace, who lodged the stranger in his house prevailed on the republic of Florence to allow him an annual stipend and devoted his leisure to the first Greek professor who taught that language in the Western countries of Europe. The appearance of Leo might disgust the most eager disciple he was clothed in the mantle of a philosopher or a mendicant his countenance was hideous his face was overshadowed with black hair, his beard long and uncombed his deportment rustic his temper gloomy and inconstant nor could he grace his discourse with the ornaments or even the perspicuity of Latin elocution But his mind was stored with a treasure of Greek learning history and fable philosophy and grammar were alike at his command and he read the poems of Homer in the schools of Florence. It was from his explanation that Boccace composed and transcribed a literal prose version of the Iliad and Odyssey which satisfied the thirst of his friend Petrarch and which perhaps in the succeeding century, was clandestinely used by Laurentius Valla, the Latin interpreter It was from his narratives that the same Boccace collected the materials for his treatise on the genealogy of the heathen gods a work in that age of stupendous erudition and which he ostentatiously sprinkled with Greek characters and passages to excite the wonder and applause of his more ignorant readers.[94] The first steps of learning are slow and laborious no more than ten votaries of Homer could be enumerated in all Italy and neither Rome nor Venice nor Naples could add a single name to this studious catalogue But their numbers would have multiplied their progress would have been accelerated if the inconstant Leo at the end of three years had not relinquished an honourable and beneficial station In his passage Petrarch entertained him at Padua a short time he enjoyed the scholar but was justly offended with the gloomy and unsocial temper of the man Discontented with the world and with himself Leo depreciated his present enjoyments, while absent persons and objects were dear to his imagination. In Italy he was a Thessalian in Greece a native of Calabria in the company of the Latins he disdained their language religion and manners no sooner was he landed at Constantinople than he again sighed for the wealth of Venice and the elegance of Florence. His Italian friends were deaf to his importunity he depended on their curiosity and indulgence and embarked on a second voyage but on his entrance into the Adriatic the ship was assailed by a tempest, and the unfortunate teacher who like Ulysses had fastened himself to the mast was struck dead by a flash of lightning The humane Petrarch dropped a tear on his disaster but he was most anxious to learn whether some copy of Euripides or Sophocles might not be saved from the hands of the mariners [95]

But the faint rudiments of Greek learning which Petrarch had encouraged and Boccace had planted, soon withered and expired. The succeeding generation was content for a while with the improvement of Latin eloquence nor was it before the end of the fourteenth century that a new and perpetual flame was rekindled in Italy [96] Previous to his own journey the emperor Manuel despatched his envoys and orators to implore the compassion of the Western princes. Of these envoys the most conspicuous, or the most learned was Manuel Chrysoloras [97] of noble birth and whose Roman ancestors are supposed to have migrated with the great Constantine After visiting the courts of France and England, where he obtained some contributions and more promises, the envoy was invited to assume the office of a professor and Florence had again the honour of this second invitation By his knowledge, not only of the Greek but of the Latin tongue Chrysoloras deserved the stipend and surpassed the expectation of the republic. His school was frequented by a crowd of disciples of every rank and age and one of these, in a general history has described his motives and his success. At that time says Leonard Aretin [98] I was a student of the civil law but my soul was inflamed with the love of letters, and I bestowed some application on the sciences of logic and rhetoric On the arrival of Manuel I hesitated whether I should desert my legal studies or relinquish this golden opportunity and thus, in the ardour of youth I communed with my own mind—Wilt thou be wanting to thyself and thy fortune? Wilt thou refuse to be introduced to a familiar converse with Homer Plato and Demosthenes? with those poets philosophers, and orators of whom such wonders are related and who are celebrated by every age as the great masters of human science? Of professors and scholars in civil law a sufficient supply will always be found in our universities but a teacher and such a teacher of the Greek language if he once be suffered to escape, may never afterwards be retrieved. Convinced by these reasons, I gave myself to Chrysoloras, and so strong was my passion, that the lessons which I had imbibed in the day were the constant subject of my nightly dreams [99] At the same time and place the Latin classics were explained by John of Ravenna, the domestic pupil of Petrarch [100] the Italians who illustrated their age and country were formed in this double school and Florence became the fruitful seminary of Greek and Roman erudition [101] The presence of the emperor recalled Chrysoloras from the college to the court but he afterwards taught at Pavia and Rome with equal industry and applause. The remainder of his life, about fifteen years, was divided between embassies and lessons. In the noble office of enlightening a foreign nation, the grammarian was not unmindful of a more sacred duty to his prince and country and Emanuel Chrysoloras died at Constance on a public mission from the emperor to the council

After his example the restoration of the Greek letters in Italy was prosecuted by a series of emigrants who were destitute of fortune and endowed with learning or at least with language From the terror or oppression of the Turkish arms, the natives of Thessalonica and Constantinople escaped to a land of freedom curiosity and wealth. The synod introduced into Florence the lights of the Greek church and the oracles of the Platonic philosophy and the fugitives who adhered to the union had the double merit of renouncing their country not only for the Christian but for the Catholic cause A patriot, who sacrifices his party and conscience to the allurements of favour may be possessed however of the private and social virtues he no longer bears the reproachful epithets of slave and apostate and the consideration which he acquires among his new associates will restore in his own eyes the dignity of his character The prudent conformity of Bessarion was rewarded with the Roman purple he fixed his residence in Italy and the Greek cardinal the titular patriarch of Constantinople was respected as the chief and protector of his nation [102] his abilities were exercised in the legations of Bologna Venice Germany and France and his election to the chair of St. Peter floated for a moment on the uncertain breath of a conclave [103] His ecclesiastical honours diffused a splendour and pre eminence over his literary merit and service his palace was a school, as often as the cardinal visited the Vatican he was attended by a learned train of both nations [104] of men applauded by themselves and the public and whose writings now overspread with dust were popular and useful in their own times I shall not attempt to enumerate the restorers of Grecian literature in the fifteenth century and it may be sufficient to mention with gratitude the names of Theodore Gaza of George of Trebizond of John Argyropulus, and Demetrius Chalcocondyles, who taught their native language in the schools of Florence and Rome Their labours were not inferior to those of Bessarion whose purple they revered and whose fortune was the secret object of their envy But the lives of the e grammarians were humble and obscure they had declined the lucrative paths of the church their dress and manners secluded them from the commerce of the world and since they were confined to the merit, they might be content with the rewards of learning From this character Janus Lascaris[105] will deserve an exception His eloquence politeness and Imperial descent recommended him to the French monarchs and in the same cities he was alternately employed to teach and to negotiate Duty and interest prompted them to cultivate the study of the Latin language and the most successful attained the faculty of writing and speaking with fluency and elegance in a foreign idiom But they ever retained the inveterate vanity of their country their praise or at least their esteem was reserved for the national writers to whom they owed their fame and subsistence and they sometimes betrayed their contempt in licentious criticism or satire on Virgil s poetry and the oratory of Tully [106] The superiority of these masters arose from the familiar use of a living language and their first disciples were incapable of discerning how far they had degenerated from the knowledge and even the practice of their ancestors A vicious pronunciation [107] which they introduced was banished from the schools by the reason of the succeeding age Of the power of the Greek accents they were ignorant and those musical notes which from an Attic tongue and to an Attic ear, must have been the secret soul of harmony were to their eyes, as to our own no more than mute and unmeaning marks in prose superfluous and troublesome in verse The art of grammar they truly possessed, the valuable fragments of Apollonius and Herodian were transfused into their lessons and their treatises of syntax and etymology, though devoid of philosophic spirit, are still useful to the Greek student. In the shipwreck of the Byzantine libraries each fugitive seized a fragment of treasure a copy of some author who without his industry might have perished the transcripts were multiplied by an assiduous and sometimes an elegant pen and the text was corrected and explained by their own comments or those of the elder scholiasts. The sense though not the spirit of the Greek classics was interpreted to the Latin world the beauties of style evaporate in a version but the judgment of Theodore Gaza selected the more solid works of Aristotle and Theophrastus, and their natural histories of animals and plants opened a rich fund of genuine and experimental science

Yet the fleeting shadows of metaphysics were pursued with more curiosity and ardour After a long oblivion, Plato was revived in Italy by a venerable Greek [108] who taught in the house of Cosmo of Medicis While the synod of Florence was involved in theological debate some beneficial consequences might flow from the study of his elegant philosophy his style is the purest standard of the Attic dialect, and his sublime thoughts are sometimes adapted to familiar conversation and sometimes adorned with the richest colours of poetry and eloquence. The dialogues of Plato are a dramatic picture of the life and death of a sage and as often as he descends from the clouds his moral system inculcates the love of truth of our country and of mankind The precept and example of Socrates recommended a modest doubt and liberal inquiry and if the Platonists with blind devotion, adored the visions and errors of their divine master their enthusiasm might correct the dry, dogmatic method of the Peripatetic school So equal yet so opposite are the merits of Plato and Aristotle that they may be balanced in endless controversy but some spark of freedom may be produced by the collision of adverse servitude The modern Greeks were divided between the two sects with more fury than skill they fought under the banner of their leaders, and the field of battle was removed in their flight from Constantinople to Rome But this philosophical debate soon degenerated into an angry and personal quarrel of grammarians and Bessarion, though an advocate for Plato protected the national honour by interposing the advice and authority of a mediator In the gardens of the Medici the academical doctrine was enjoyed by the polite and learned but their philosophic society was quickly dissolved and if the writings of the Attic sage were perused in the closet, the more powerful Stagyrite continued to reign the oracle of the church and school.[109]

I have fairly represented the literary merits of the Greeks yet it must be confessed that they were seconded and surpassed by the ardour of the Latins Italy was divided into many independent states and at that time it was the ambition of princes and republics to vie with each other in the encouragement and reward of literature. The fame of Nicholas the Fifth[110] has not been adequate to his merits. From a plebeian origin he raised himself by his virtue and learning the character of the man prevailed over the interest of the pope and he sharpened those weapons which were soon pointed against the Roman church.[111] He had been the friend of the most eminent scholars of the age he became their patron and such was the humility of his manners, that the change was scarcely discernible either to them or to himself If he pressed the acceptance of a liberal gift, it was not as the measure of desert, but as the proof of benevolence and when modest merit declined his bounty Accept it, would he say with a consciousness of his own worth you will not always have a Nicholas among ye The influence of the holy see pervaded Christendom and he exerted that influence in the search not of benefices, but of books. From the ruins of the Byzantine libraries, from the darkest monasteries of Germany and Britain, he collected the dusty manuscripts of the writers of antiquity and wherever the original could not be removed, a faithful copy was transcribed and transmitted for his use The Vatican the old repository for bulls and legends for superstition and forgery was daily replenished with more precious furniture and such was the industry of Nicholas, that in a reign of eight years he formed a library of five thousand volumes. To his munificence the Latin world was indebted for the versions of Xenophon Diodorus, Polybius, Thucydides Herodotus, and Appian of Strabo s Geography of the Iliad of the most valuable works of Plato and Aristotle of Ptolemy and Theophrastus and of the fathers of the Greek church. The example of the Roman pontiff was preceded or imitated by a Florentine merchant, who governed the republic without arms, and without a title Cosmo of Medicis[112] was the father of a line of princes whose name and age are almost synonymous with the restoration of learning his credit was ennobled into fame his riches were dedicated to the service of mankind he corresponded at once with Cairo and London and a cargo of Indian spices and Greek books was often imported in the same vessel The genius and education of his grandson Lorenzo rendered him not only a patron but a judge and candidate in the literary race In his palace distress was entitled to relief and merit to reward his leisure hours were delightfully spent in the Platonic academy he encouraged the emulation of Demetrius Chalcocondyles and Angelo Politian and his active missionary Janus Lascaris returned from the East with a treasure of two hundred manuscripts, fourscore of which were as yet unknown in the libraries of Europe.[113] The rest of Italy was animated by a similar spirit and the progress of the nation repaid the liberality of her princes. The Latins held the exclusive property of their own literature and these disciples of Greece were soon capable of transmitting and improving the lessons which they had imbibed After a short succession of foreign teachers, the tide of emigration subsided but the language of Constantinople was spread beyond the Alps, and the natives of France Germany and England[114] imparted to their country the sacred fire which they had kindled in the schools of Florence and Rome.[115] In the productions of the mind as in those of the soil the gifts of nature are excelled by industry and skill the Greek authors, forgotten on the banks of the Ilissus, have been illustrated on those of the Elbe and the Thames and Bessarion or Gaza might have envied the superior science of the barbarians the accuracy of Budæus the taste of Erasmus the copiousness of Stephens the erudition of Scaliger the discernment of Reiske or of Bentley On the side of the Latins the discovery of printing was a casual advantage but this useful art has been applied by Aldus and his innumerable successors to perpetuate and multiply the works of antiquity.[116] A single manuscript imported from Greece is revived in ten thousand copies, and each copy is fairer than the original In this form Homer and Plato would peruse with more satisfaction their own writings and their scholiasts must resign the prize to the labours of our Western editors

Before the arrival of classic literature the barbarians in Europe were immersed in ignorance and their vulgar tongues were marked with the rudeness and poverty of their manners The students of the more perfect idioms of Rome and Greece were introduced to a new world of light and science, to the society of the free and polished nations of antiquity, and to a familiar converse with those immortal men who spoke the sublime language of eloquence and reason. Such an intercourse must tend to refine the taste and to elevate the genius of the moderns and yet from the first experiment it might appear that the study of the ancients had given fetters rather than wings to the human mind However laudable, the spirit of imitation is of a servile cast, and the first disciples of the Greeks and Romans were a colony of strangers in the midst of their age and country The minute and laborious diligence which explored the antiquities of remote times might have improved or adorned the present state of society the critic and metaphysician were the slaves of Aristotle, the poets, historians and orators were proud to repeat the thoughts and words of the Augustan age the works of nature were observed with the eyes of Pliny and Theophrastus and some Pagan votaries professed a secret devotion to the gods of Homer and Plato [117] The Italians were oppressed by the strength and number of their ancient auxiliaries the century after the deaths of Petrarch and Boccace was filled with a crowd of Latin imitators who decently repose on our shelves but in that era of learning it will not be easy to discern a real discovery of science, a work of invention or eloquence, in the popular language of the country [118] But as soon as it had been deeply saturated with the celestial dew the soil was quickened into vegetation and life, the modern idioms were refined the classics of Athens and Rome inspired a pure taste and a generous emulation and in Italy as afterwards in France and England the pleasing reign of poetry and fiction was succeeded by the light of speculative and experimental philosophy Genius may anticipate the season of maturity, but in the education of a people, as in that of an individual memory must be exercised before the powers of reason and fancy can be expanded nor may the artist hope to equal or surpass, till he has learned to imitate, the works of his predecessors

CHAPTER LXVII

Schism of the Greeks and Latins Reign and Character of Amurath the Second Crusade of Ladislaus, King of Hungary His Defeat and Death John Huniades Scanderbeg Constantine Palæologus, last Emperor of the East

The respective merits of Rome and Constantinople are compared and celebrated by an eloquent Greek the father of the Italian schools [1] The view of the ancient capital, the seat of his ancestors surpassed the most sanguine expectations of Manuel Chrysoloras and he no longer blamed the exclamation of an old sophist, that Rome was the habitation not of men but of gods Those gods and those men had long since vanished but, to the eye of liberal enthusiasm the majesty of ruin restored the image of her ancient prosperity The monuments of the consuls and Cæsars of the martyrs and apostles engaged on all sides the curiosity of the philosopher and the Christian and he confessed that in every age the arms and the religion of Rome were destined to reign over the earth While Chrysoloras admired the venerable beauties of the mother he was not forgetful of his native country her fairest daughter her Imperial colony and the Byzantine patriot expatiates with zeal and truth on the eternal advantages of nature and the more transitory glories of art and dominion, which adorned or had adorned the city of Constantine Yet the perfection of the copy still redounds (as he modestly observes) to the honour of the original and parents are delighted to be renewed, and even excelled, by the superior merit of their children Constantinople says the orator 'is situate on a commanding point between Europe and Asia between the Archipelago and the Euxine By her interposition the two seas and the two continents are united for the common benefit of nations and the gates of commerce may be shut or opened at her command The harbour encompassed on all sides by the sea and the continent is the most secure and capacious in the world The walls and gates of Constantinople may be compared with those of Babylon the towers are many each tower is a solid and lofty structure and the second wall the outer fortification would be sufficient for the defence and dignity of an ordinary capital. A broad and rapid stream may be introduced into the ditches and the artificial island may be encompassed like Athens[2] by land or water" Two strong and natural causes are alleged for the perfection of the model of new Rome. The royal founder reigned over the most illustrious nations of the globe and in the accomplishment of his designs the power of the Romans was combined with the art and science of the Greeks. Other cities have been reared to maturity by accident and time their beauties are mingled with disorder and deformity and the inhabitants, unwilling to remove from their natal spot, are incapable of correcting the errors of their ancestors and the original vices of situation or climate. But the free idea of Constantinople was formed and executed by a single mind and the primitive model was improved by the obedient zeal of the subjects and successors of the first monarch. The adjacent isles were stored with an inexhaustible supply of marble but the various materials were transported from the most remote shores of Europe and Asia and the public and private buildings, the palaces churches, aqueducts, cisterns, porticoes, columns, baths, and hippodromes, were adapted to the greatness of the capital of the East. The superfluity of wealth was spread along the shores of Europe and Asia and the Byzantine territory as far as the Euxine the Hellespont, and the long wall might be considered as a populous suburb and a perpetual garden. In this flattering picture, the past and the present, the times of prosperity and decay are artfully confounded but a sigh and a confession escape from the orator that his wretched country was the shadow and sepulchre of its former self. The works of ancient sculpture had been defaced by Christian zeal or barbaric violence the fairest structures were demolished and the marbles of Paros or Numidia were burnt for lime, or applied to the meanest uses. Of many a statue the place was marked by an empty pedestal of many a column, the size was determined by a broken capital the tombs of the emperors were scattered on the ground the stroke of time was accelerated by storms and earthquakes and the vacant space was adorned by vulgar tradition with fabulous monuments of gold and silver From these wonders, which lived only in memory or belief he distinguishes, however the porphyry pillar the column and colossus of Justinian,[3] and the church more especially the dome of St. Sophia the best conclusion, since it could not be described according to its merits, and after it no other object could deserve to be mentioned. But he forgets that, a century before, the trembling fabrics of the colossus and the church had been saved and supported by the timely care of Andronicus the Elder Thirty years after the emperor had fortified St Sophia with two new buttresses or pyramids the eastern hemisphere suddenly gave way and the images, the altars, and the sanctuary were crushed by the falling ruin The mischief indeed was speedily repaired the rubbish was cleared by the incessant labour of every rank and age, and the poor remains of riches and industry were consecrated by the Greeks to the most stately and venerable temple of the East.[4]

The last hope of the falling city and empire was placed in the harmony of the mother and daughter in the maternal tenderness of Rome, and the filial obedience of Constantinople In the synod of Florence the Greeks and Latins had embraced and subscribed, and promised but these signs of friendship were perfidious or fruitless [5] and the baseless fabric of the union vanished like a dream [6] The emperor and his prelates returned home in the Venetian galleys but as they touched at the Morea and the isles of Corfu and Lesbos, the subjects of the Latins complained that the pretended union would be an instrument of oppression No sooner did they land on the Byzantine shore than they were saluted or rather assailed with a general murmur of zeal and discontent. During their absence, above two years, the capital had been deprived of its civil and ecclesiastical rulers fanaticism fermented in anarchy, the most furious monks reigned over the conscience of women and bigots and the hatred of the Latin name was the first principle of nature and religion. Before his departure for Italy the emperor had flattered the city with the assurance of a prompt relief and a powerful succour and the clergy confident in their orthodoxy and science, had promised themselves and their flocks an easy victory over the blind shepherds of the West. The double disappointment exasperated the Greeks the conscience of the subscribing prelates was awakened the hour of temptation was past and they had more to dread from the public resentment than they could hope from the favour of the emperor or the pope Instead of justifying their conduct, they deplored their weakness, professed their contrition, and cast themselves on the mercy of God and of their brethren To the reproachful question what had been the event or the use of their Italian synod? they answered, with sighs and tears, Alas! we have made a new faith we have exchanged piety for impiety we have betrayed the immaculate sacrifice and we are become Azymites (The Azymites were those who celebrated the communion with unleav ened bread, and I must retract or qualify the praise which I have bestowed on the growing philosophy of the times) 'Alas' we have been seduced by distress by fraud, and by the hopes and fears of a transitory life The hand that has signed the union should be cut off, and the tongue that has pronounced the Latin creed deserves to be torn from the root ' The best proof of their repentance was an increase of zeal for the most trivial rites and the most incomprehensible doctrines and an absolute separation from all, without excepting their prince, who preserved some regard for honour and consistency After the decease of the patriarch Joseph the archbishops of Heraclea and Trebizond had courage to refuse the vacant office and Cardinal Bessarion preferred the warm and comfortable shelter of the Vatican The choice of the emperor and his clergy was confined to Metrophanes of Cyzicus he was consecrated in St Sophia, but the temple was vacant The crossbearers abdicated their service, the infection spread from the city to the villages, and Metrophanes discharged, without effect some ecclesiastical thunders against a nation of schismatics The eyes of the Greeks were directed to Mark of Ephesus, the champion of his country and the sufferings of the holy confessor were repaid with a tribute of admiration and applause His example and writings propagated the flame of religious discord age and infirmity soon removed him from the world but the gospel of Mark was not a law of forgiveness and he requested with his dying breath that none of the adherents of Rome might attend his obsequies or pray for his soul

The schism was not confined to the narrow limits of the Byzantine empire Secure under the Mamaluke sceptre, the three patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem assembled a numerous synod disowned their representatives at Ferrara and Florence condemned the creed and council of the Latins, and threatened the emperor of Constantinople with the censures of the Eastern church Of the sectaries of the Greek communion the Russians were the most powerful ignorant and superstitious. Their primate, the cardinal Isidore hastened from Florence to Moscow [7] to reduce the independent nation under the Roman yoke But the Russian bishops had been educated at Mount Athos and the prince and people embraced the theology of their priests They were scandalised by the title the pomp, the Latin cross of the legate the friend of those impious men who shaved their beards and performed the divine office with gloves on their hands and rings on their fingers Isidore was condemned by a synod, his person was imprisoned in a monastery and it was with extreme difficulty that the cardinal could escape from the hands of a fierce and fanatic people [8] The Russians refused a passage to the missionaries of Rome who aspired to convert the Pagans beyond the Tanais [9] and their refusal was justified by the maxim that the guilt of idolatry is less damnable than that of schism The errors of the Bohemians were excused by their abhorrence for the pope, and a deputation of the Greek clergy solicited the friendship of those sanguinary enthusiasts [10] While Eugenius triumphed in the union and orthodoxy of the Greeks his party was contracted to the walls or rather to the palace of Constantinople. The zeal of Palæologus had been excited by interest it was soon cooled by opposition an attempt to violate the national belief might endanger his life and crown, nor could the pious rebels be destitute of foreign and domestic aid The sword of his brother Demetrius who in Italy had maintained a prudent and popular silence, was half unsheathed in the cause of religion and Amurath the Turkish sultan, was displeased and alarmed by the seeming friendship of the Greeks and Latins.

Sultan Murad or Amurath lived forty nine and reigned thirty years six months and eight days He was a just and valiant prince of a great soul patient of labours learned, merciful, religious charitable a lover and encourager of the studious and of all who excelled in any art or science a good emperor and a great general No man obtained more or greater victories than Amurath, Belgrade alone withstood his attacks Under his reign the soldier was ever victorious the citizen rich and secure. If he subdued any country his first care was to build mosques and caravanseras, hospitals and colleges Every year he gave a thousand pieces of gold to the sons of the Prophet, and sent two thousand five hundred to the religious persons of Mecca Medina and Jerusalem.' [11] This portrait is transcribed from the historian of the Othman empire but the applause of a servile and superstitious people has been lavished on the worst of tyrants and the virtues of a sultan are often the vices most useful to himself or most agreeable to his subjects A nation ignorant of the equal benefits of liberty and law must be awed by the flashes of arbitrary power the cruelty of a despot will assume the character of justice his profusion of liberality his obstinacy, of firmness. If the most reasonable excuse be rejected, few acts of obedience will be found impossible and guilt must tremble where innocence cannot always be secure The tranquility of the people and the discipline of the troops, were best maintained by perpetual action in the field war was the trade of the Janizaries and those who survived the peril and divided the spoil, applauded the generous ambition of their sovereign To propagate the true religion was the duty of a faithful Musulman the unbelievers were his enemies, and those of the Prophet and in the hands of the Turks, the scimitar was the only instrument of conversion. Under these circumstances, however the justice and moderation of Amurath are attested by his conduct, and acknowledged by the Christians themselves who consider a prosperous reign and a peaceful death as the reward of his singular merits. In the vigour of his age and military power he seldom engaged in war till he was justified by a previous and adequate provocation the victorious sultan was disarmed by submission and in the observance of treaties, his word was inviolate and sacred [12] The Hungarians were commonly the aggressors he was provoked by the revolt of Scanderbeg and the perfidious Caramanian was twice vanquished and twice pardoned by the Ottoman monarch. Before he invaded the Morea Thebes had been surprised by the despot in the conquest of Thessalonica the grandson of Bajazet might dispute the recent purchase of the Venetians and after the first siege of Constantinople the sultan was never tempted by the distress the absence, or the injuries of Palaeologus to extinguish the dying light of the Byzantine empire

But the most striking feature in the life and character of Amurath is the double abdication of the Turkish throne and were not his motives debased by an alloy of superstition we must praise the royal philosopher [13] who at the age of forty could discern the vanity of human greatness. Resigning the sceptre to his son he retired to the pleasant residence of Magnesia but he retired to the society of saints and hermits. It was not till the fourth century of the Hegira that the religion of Mohammed had been corrupted by an institution so adverse to his genius but in the age of the crusades the various orders of dervishes were multiplied by the example of the Christian, and even the Latin monks [14] The lord of nations submitted to fast, and pray and turn round in endless rotation with the fanatics, who mistook the giddiness of the head for the illumination of the spirit.[15] But he was soon awakened from this dream of enthusiasm by the Hungarian invasion and his obedient son was the foremost to urge the public danger and the wishes of the people Under the banner of their veteran leader the Janizaries fought and conquered but he withdrew from the field of Varna again to pray to fast and to turn round with the Magnesian brethren These pious occupations were again interrupted by the danger of the state A victorious army disdained the inexperience of their youthful ruler the city of Adrianople was abandoned to rapine and slaughter and the unanimous divan implored his presence to appease the tumult and prevent the rebellion of the Janizaries At the well known voice of their master they trembled and obeyed and the reluctant sultan was compelled to support his splendid servitude till at the end of four years, he was relieved by the angel of death. Age or disease misfortune or caprice have tempted several princes to descend from the throne and they have had leisure to repent of their irretrievable step But Amurath alone in the full liberty of choice after the trial of empire and solitude has repeated his preference of a private life

After the departure of his Greek brethren Eugenius had not been unmindful of their temporal interest and his tender regard for the Byzantine empire was animated by a just apprehension of the Turks, who approached and might soon invade the borders of Italy But the spirit of the crusades had expired and the coldness of the Franks was not less unreasonable than their headlong passion In the eleventh century a fanatic monk could precipitate Europe on Asia for the recovery of the holy sepulchre but in the fifteenth the most pressing motives of religion and policy were insufficient to unite the Latins in the defence of Christendom Germany was an inexhaustible storehouse of men and arms [16] but that complex and languid body required the impulse of a vigorous hand and Frederic the Third was alike impotent in his personal character and his Imperial dignity A long war had impaired the strength without satiating the animosity of France and England [17] but Philip duke of Burgundy was a vain and magnificent prince and he enjoyed without danger or expense the adventurous piety of his subjects, who sailed in a gallant fleet, from the coast of Flanders to the Hellespont. The maritime republics of Venice and Genoa were less remote from the scene of action and their hostile fleets were associated under the standard of St. Peter The kingdoms of Hungary and Poland which covered as it were the interior pale of the Latin church, were the most nearly concerned to oppose the progress of the Turks. Arms were the patrimony of the Scythians and Sarmatians and these nations might appear equal to the contest, could they point, against the common foe those swords that were so wantonly drawn in bloody and domestic quarrels But the same spirit was adverse to concord and obedience a poor country and a limited monarch are incapable of maintaining a standing force, and the loose bodies of Polish and Hungarian horse were not armed with the sentiments and weapons which on some occasions have given irresistible weight to the French chivalry Yet on this side the designs of the Roman pontiff, and the eloquence of Cardinal Julian his legate, were promoted by the circumstances of the times [18] by the union of the two crowns on the head of Ladislaus [19] a young and ambitious soldier, by the valour of a hero whose name the name of John Huniades was already popular among the Christians, and formidable to the Turks An endless treasure of pardons and indulgences was scattered by the legate many private warriors of France and Germany enlisted under the holy banner and the crusade derived some strength or at least some reputation from the new allies both of Europe and Asia A fugitive despot of Servia exaggerated the distress and ardour of the Christians beyond the Danube, who would unanimously rise to vindicate their religion and liberty The Greek emperor [20] with a spirit unknown to his fathers, engaged to guard the Bosphorus, and to sally from Constantinople at the head of his national and mercenary troops The sultan of Caramania [1] announced the retreat of Amurath and a powerful diversion in the heart of Anatolia, and if the fleets of the West could occupy at the same moment the straits of the Hellespont, the Ottoman monarchy would be dissevered and destroyed Heaven and earth must rejoice in the perdition of the miscreants and the legate, with prudent ambiguity instilled the opinion of the invisible perhaps the visible, aid of the Son of God and his divine mother

Of the Polish and Hungarian diets a religious war was the unanimous cry and Ladislaus after passing the Danube led an army of his confederate subjects as far as Sophia the capital of the Bulgarian kingdom In this expedition they obtained two signal victories, which were justly ascribed to the valour and conduct of Huniades. In the first with a vanguard of ten thousand men he surprised the Turkish camp in the second he vanquished and made prisoner the most renowned of their generals, who possessed the double advantage of ground and numbers The approach of winter, and the natural and artificial obstacles of Mount Hæmus arrested the progress of the hero, who measured a narrow interval of six days' march from the foot of the mountains to the hostile towers of Adrianople and the friendly capital of the Greek empire The retreat was undisturbed and the entrance into Buda was at once a military and religious triumph An ecclesiastical procession was followed by the king and his warriors on foot he nicely balanced the merits and rewards of the two nations and the pride of conquest was blended with the humble temper of Christianity Thirteen bashaws, nine standards and four thousand captives were unquestionable trophies and as all were willing to believe and none were present to contradict, the crusaders multiplied with unblushing confidence the myriads of Turks whom they had left on the field of battle [22] The most solid proof and the most salutary consequence of victory was a deputation from the divan to solicit peace, to restore Servia, to ransom the prisoners and to evacuate the Hungarian frontier By this treaty the rational objects of the war were obtained the king the despot and Huniades himself, in the diet of Segedin were satisfied with public and private emolument, a truce of ten years was concluded and the followers of Jesus and Mohammed, who swore on the Gospel and the Koran attested the word of God as the guardian of truth and the avenger of perfidy In the place of the Gospel the Turkish ministers had proposed to substitute the Eucharist, the real presence of the Catholic Deity but the Christians refused to profane their holy mysteries and a superstitious conscience is less forcibly bound by the spiritual energy than by the outward and visible symbols of an oath [23]

During the whole transaction the cardinal legate had observed a sullen silence, unwilling to approve and unable to oppose the consent of the king and people But the diet was not dissolved before Julian was fortified by the welcome intelligence that Anatolia was invaded by the Caramanian and Thrace by the Greek emperor that the fleets of Genoa Venice and Burgundy were masters of the Hellespont and that the allies informed of the victory and ignorant of the treaty of Ladislaus impatiently waited for the return of his victorious army

"And is it thus, exclaimed the cardinal [34] that you will desert their expectations and your own fortune? It is to them to your God and your fellow Christians, that you have pledged your faith and that prior obligation annihilates a rash and sacrilegious oath to the enemies of Christ. His vicar on earth is the Roman pontiff without whose sanction you can neither promise nor perform. In his name I absolve your perjury and sanctify your arms follow my footsteps in the paths of glory and salvation and if still you have scruples devolve on my head the punishment and the sin This mischievous casuistry was seconded by his respectable character and the levity of popular assemblies war was resolved on the same spot where peace had so lately been sworn and in the execution of the treaty the Turks were assaulted by the Christians to whom, with some reason they might apply the epithet of Infidels The falsehood of Ladislaus to his word and oath was palliated by the religion of the times the most perfect, or at least the most popular excuse would have been the success of his arms and the deliverance of the Eastern church But the same treaty which should have bound his conscience had diminished his strength On the proclamation of the peace the French and German volunteers departed with indignant murmurs the Poles were exhausted by distant warfare, and perhaps disgusted with foreign command and their palatines accepted the first licence, and hastily retired to their provinces and castles. Even Hungary was divided by faction, or restrained by a laudable scruple and the relics of the crusade that marched in the second expedition were reduced to an inadequate force of twenty thousand men A Wallachian chief who joined the royal standard with his vassals presumed to remark that their numbers did not exceed the hunting retinue that sometimes attended the sultan and the gift of two horses of matchless speed might admonish Ladislaus of his secret foresight of the event. But the despot of Servia after the restoration of his country and children was tempted by the promise of new realms and the inexperience of the king the enthusiasm of the legate, and the martial presumption of Huniades himself were persuaded that every obstacle must yield to the invincible virtue of the sword and the cross After the passage of the Danube two roads might lead to Constantinople and the Hellespont the one direct abrupt and difficult, through the mountains of Hæmus the other more tedious and secure over a level country and along the shores of the Euxine in which their flanks, according to the Scythian discipline, might always be covered by a movable fortification of waggons. The latter was judiciously preferred the Catholics marched through the plains of Bulgaria burning with wanton cruelty the churches and villages of the Christian natives and their last station was at Varna, near the sea-shore on which the defeat and death of Ladislaus have bestowed a memorable name [35]

It was on this fatal spot that, instead of finding a confederate fleet to second their operations they were alarmed by the approach of Amurath himself who had issued from his Magnesian solitude and transported the forces of Asia to the defence of Europe. According to some writers the Greek emperor had been awed, or seduced to grant the passage of the Bosphorus and an indelible stain of corruption is fixed on the Genoese or the pope s nephew the Catholic admiral whose mercenary connivance betrayed the guard of the Hellespont. From Adrianople the sultan advanced by hasty marches at the head of sixty thousand men and when the cardinal and Huniades had taken a nearer survey of the numbers and order of the Turks, these ardent warriors proposed the tardy and impracticable measure of a retreat. The king alone was resolved to conquer or die and his resolution had almost been crowned with a glorious and salutary victory The princes were opposite to each other in the centre and the Beglerbegs, or generals of Anatolia and Romania commanded on the right and left against the adverse divisions of the despot and Huniades The Turkish wings were broken on the first onset but the advantage was fatal and the rash victors in the heat of the pursuit were carried away far from the annoyance of the enemy or the support of their friends. When Amurath beheld the flight of his squadrons he despaired of his fortune and that of the empire a veteran Janizary seized his horse s bridle and he had magnanimity to pardon and reward the soldier who dared to perceive the terror and arrest the flight, of his sovereign. A copy of the treaty the monument of Christian perfidy had been displayed in the front of battle and it is said that the sultan in his distress lifting his eyes and his hands to heaven implored the protection of the God of truth and called on the prophet Jesus himself to avenge the impious mockery of his name and religion [a] With inferior numbers and disordered ranks the king of Hungary rushed forwards in the confidence of plain of Cossova sustained till the third day, the shock of the Ottoman army four times more numerous than his own As he fled alone through the woods of Wallachia the hero was surprised by two robbers but while they disputed a gold chain that hung at his neck, he recovered his sword slew the one, terrified the other and, after new perils of captivity or death, consoled by his presence an afflicted kingdom. But the last and most glorious action of his life was the defence of Belgrade against the powers of Mohammed the Second in person. After a siege of forty days the Turks, who had already entered the town were compelled to retreat and the joyful nations celebrated Huniades and Belgrade as the bulwarks of Christendom.[33] About a month after this great deliverance the champion expired and his most splendid epitaph is the regret of the Ottoman prince, who sighed that he could no longer hope for revenge against the single antagonist who had triumphed over his arms. On the first vacancy of the throne Matthias Corvinus, a youth of eighteen years of age, was elected and crowned by the grateful Hungarians. His reign was prosperous and long Matthias aspired to the glory of a conqueror and a saint but his purest merit is the encouragement of learning and the Latin orators and historians who were invited from Italy by the son have shed the lustre of their eloquence on the father's character [34]

In the list of heroes John Huniades and Scanderbeg are commonly associated [35] and they are both entitled to our notice, since their occupation of the Ottoman arms delayed the ruin of the Greek empire. John Castriot, the father of Scanderbeg [36] was the hereditary prince of a small district of Epirus, or Albania between the mountains and the Adriatic Sea. Unable to contend with the sultan s power Castriot submitted to the hard conditions of peace and tribute he delivered his four sons as the pledges of his fidelity and the Christian youths after receiving the mark of circumcision were instructed in the Mohammedan religion and trained in the arms and arts of Turkish policy [37] The three elder brothers were confounded in the crowd of slaves and the poison to which their deaths are ascribed cannot be verified or disproved by any positive evidence Yet the suspicion is in a great measure removed by the kind and paternal treatment of George Castriot, the fourth brother who from his tender youth displayed the strength and spirit of a soldier The successive overthrow of a Tartar and two Persians, who carried a proud defiance to the Turkish court, recommended him to the favour of Amurath, and his Turkish appellation of Scanderbeg (Iskender beg), or the lord Alexander is an indelible memorial of his glory and servitude His father s principality was reduced into a province but the loss was compensated by the rank and title of Sanjiak, a command of five thousand horse, and the prospect of the first dignities of the empire He served with honour in the wars of Europe and Asia and we may smile at the art or credulity of the historian who supposes that in every encounter he spared the Christians while he fell with a thundering arm on his Musulman foes. The glory of Huniades is without reproach he fought in the defence of his religion and country but the enemies who applaud the patriot have branded his rival with the name of traitor and apostate. In the eyes of the Christians the rebellion of Scanderbeg is justified by his father s wrongs, the ambiguous death of his three brothers his own degradation, and the slavery of his country and they adore the generous, though tardy zeal with which he asserted the faith and independence of his ancestors. But he had imbibed from his ninth year the doctrines of the Koran he was ignorant of the Gospel the religion of a soldier is determined by authority and habit nor is it easy to conceive what new illumination at the age of forty[38] could be poured into his soul His motives would be less exposed to the suspicion of interest or revenge had he broken his chain from the moment that he was sensible of its weight but a long oblivion had surely impaired his original right and every year of obedience and reward had cemented the mutual bond of the sultan and his subject. If Scanderbeg had long harboured the belief of Christianity and the intention of revolt, a worthy mind must condemn the base dissimulation that could serve only to betray that could promise only to be forsworn that could actively join in the temporal and spiritual perdition of so many thousands of his unhappy brethren. Shall we praise a secret correspondence with Huniades while he commanded the vanguard of the Turkish army? Shall we excuse the desertion of his standard a treacherous desertion which abandoned the victory to the enemies of his benefactor? In the confusion of a defeat, the eye of Scanderbeg was fixed on the Reis Effendi or principal secretary with the dagger at his breast, he extorted a firman or patent for the government of Albania and the murder of the guiltless scribe and his train prevented the victory, till his career was stopped by the impenetrable phalanx of the Janizaries If we may credit the Ottoman annals, his horse was pierced by the javelin of Amurath [27] he fell among the spears of the infantry, and a Turkish soldier proclaimed with a loud voice, 'Hungarians, behold the head of your king!' The death of Ladislaus was the signal of their defeat On his return from an intemperate pursuit, Huniades deplored his error and the public loss he strove to rescue the royal body, till he was overwhelmed by the tumultuous crowd of the victors and vanquished and the last efforts of his courage and conduct were exerted to save the remnant of his Wallachian cavalry Ten thousand Christians were slain in the disastrous battle of Varna the loss of the Turks more considerable in numbers bore a smaller proportion to their total strength yet the philosophic sultan was not ashamed to confess that his ruin must be the consequence of a second and similar victory At his command a column was erected on the spot where Ladislaus had fallen but the modest inscription instead of accusing the rashness, recorded the valour and bewailed the misfortune of the Hungarian youth [28]

Before I lose sight of the field of Varna I am tempted to pause on the character and story of two principal actors the cardinal Julian and John Huniades Julian [29] Cæsarini was born of a noble family of Rome his studies had embraced both the Latin and Greek learning both the sciences of divinity and law and his versatile genius was equally adapted to the schools the camp and the court No sooner had he been invested with the Roman purple than he was sent into Germany to arm the empire against the rebels and heretics of Bohemia The spirit of persecution is unworthy of a Christian the military profession ill becomes a priest but the former is excused by the times and the latter was ennobled by the courage of Julian, who stood dauntless and alone in the disgraceful flight of the German host. As the pope s legate he opened the council of Basil, but the president soon appeared the most strenuous champion of ecclesiastical freedom and an opposition of seven years was conducted by his ability and zeal After promoting the strongest measures against the authority and person of Eugenius some secret motive of interest or conscience engaged him to desert on a sudden the popular party The cardinal withdrew himself from Basil to Ferrara, and in the debates of the Greeks and Latins, the two nations admired the dexterity of his arguments and the depth of his theological erudition [30] In his Hungarian embassy we have already seen the mischievous effects of his sophistry and eloquence, of which Julian himself was the first victim. The cardinal, who performed the duties of a priest and a soldier, was lost in the defeat of Varna The circumstances of his death are variously related, but it is believed that a weighty incumbrance of gold impeded his flight, and tempted the cru l avarice of some Christian fugitives

From a humble or at least a doubtful, origin the merit of John Huniades promoted him to the command of the Hungarian armies His father was a Wallachian his mother a Greek her unknown race might possibly ascend to the emperors of Constantinople and the claims of the Wallachians with the surname of Corvinus, from the place of his nativity might suggest a thin pretence for mingling his blood with the patricians of ancient Rome [31] In his youth he served in the wars of Italy and was retained, with twelve horsemen by the bishop of Zagrab the valour of the white knight[32] was soon conspicuous he increased his fortunes by a noble and wealthy marriage and in the defence of the Hungarian borders he won in the same year three battles against the Turks By his influence Ladislaus of Poland obtained the crown of Hungary and the important service was rewarded by the title and office of Waivod of Transylvania The first of Julian's crusades added two Turkish laurels on his brow and in the public distress the fatal errors of Varna were forgotten During the absence and minority of Ladislaus of Austria the titular king Huniades was elected supreme captain and governor of Hungary and if envy at first was silenced by terror a reign of twelve years supposes the arts of policy as well as of war Yet the idea of a consummate general is not delineated in his campaigns the white knight fought with the hand rather than the head as the chief of desultory barbarians who attack without fear and fly without shame and his military life is composed of a romantic alternative of victories and escapes By the Turks who employed his name to frighten their perverse children he was corruptly denominated Jancus Lain or the Wicked their hatred is the proof of their esteem the kingdom which he guarded was inaccessible to their arms and they felt him most daring and formidable when they fondly believed the captain and his country irrecoverably lost. Instead of confining himself to a defensive war four years after the defeat of Varna he again penetrated into the heart of Bulgaria and in the

their blood continues to flow in the noblest families of the realm. A colony of Albanian fugitives obtained a settlement in Calabria, and they preserve at this day the language and manners of their ancestors.[46]

In the long career of the decline and fall of the Roman empire I have reached at length the last reign of the princes of Constantinople, who so feebly sustained the name and majesty of the Cæsars. On the decease of John Palæologus, who survived about four years the Hungarian crusade [47] the royal family by the death of Andronicus and the monastic profession of Isidore, was reduced to three princes, Constantine, Demetrius, and Thomas, the surviving sons of the emperor Manuel. Of these the first and the last were far distant in the Morea but Demetrius, who possessed the domain of Selymbria, was in the suburbs, at the head of a party his ambition was not chilled by the public distress, and his conspiracy with the Turks and the schismatics had already disturbed the peace of his country The funeral of the late emperor was accelerated with singular and even suspicious haste the claim of Demetrius to the vacant throne was justified by a trite and flimsy sophism, that he was born in the purple the eldest son of his father s reign But the empress-mother the senate and soldiers the clergy and people, were unanimous in the cause of the lawful successor and the despot Thomas, who ignorant of the change accidentally returned to the capital asserted with becoming zeal the interest of his absent brother An ambassador the historian Phranza was immediately despatched to the court of Adrianople. Amurath received him with honour and dismissed him with gifts but the gracious approbation of the Turkish sultan announced his supremacy and the approaching downfall of the Eastern empire. By the hands of two illustrious deputies the Imperial crown was placed at Sparta on the head of Constantine. In the spring he sailed from the Morea escaped the encounter of a Turkish squadron enjoyed the acclamations of his subjects, celebrated the festival of a new reign, and exhausted by his donatives the treasure, or rather the indigence, of the state. The emperor immediately resigned to his brothers the possession of the Morea and the brittle friendship of the two princes, Demetrius and Thomas was confirmed in their mother's presence by the frail security of oaths and embraces. His next occupation was the choice of a consort. A daughter of the doge of Venice had been proposed but the Byzantine nobles objected the distance between an hereditary monarch and an elective magistrate and in their subsequent distress the chief of that powerful republic was not unmindful of the affront. Constantine afterwards hesitated between the royal families of Trebizond and Georgia and the embassy of Phranza represents in his public and private life the last days of the Byzantine empire.[48]

The proto vestiare or great chamberlain, Phranza sailed from Constantinople as the minister of a bridegroom and the relics of wealth and luxury were applied to his pompous appearance. His numerous retinue consisted of nobles and guards, of physicians and monks he was attended by a band of music and the term of his costly embassy was protracted above two years. On his arrival in Georgia or Iberia the natives from the towns and villages flocked around the strangers and such was their simplicity that they were delighted with the effects, without understanding the cause of musical harmony Among the crowd was an old man, above a hundred years of age who had formerly been carried away a captive by the barbarians,[49] and who amused his hearers with a tale of the wonders of India,[50] from whence he had returned to Portugal by an unknown sea [51] From this hospitable land Phranza proceeded to the court of Trebizond where he was informed by the Greek prince of the recent decease of Amurath. Instead of rejoicing in the deliverance the experienced statesman expressed his apprehension that an ambitious youth would not long adhere to the sage and pacific system of his father After the sultan s decease his Christian wife, Maria,[52] the daughter of the Servian despot had been honourably restored to her parents on the fame of her beauty and merit she was recommended by the ambassador as the most worthy object of the royal choice and Phranza recapitulates and refutes the specious objections that might be raised against the proposal. The majesty of the purple would ennoble an unequal alliance, the bar of affinity might be removed by liberal alms and the dispensation of the church the disgrace of Turkish nuptials had been repeatedly overlooked and though the fair Maria was near fifty years of age she might yet hope to give an heir to the empire Constantine listened to the advice which was transmitted in the first ship that sailed from Trebizond but the factions of the court opposed his marriage and it was finally prevented by the pious vow of the sultana who ended her days in the monastic profession consequences of an immediate discovery With some bold companions to whom he had revealed his design, he escaped in the night by rapid marches from the field of battle to his paternal mountains The gates of Croya were opened to the royal mandate and no sooner did he command the fortress than George Castriot dropped the mask of dissimulation abjured the prophet and the sultan and proclaimed himself the avenger of his family and country The names of religion and liberty provoked a general revolt the Albanians, a martial race were unanimous to live and die with their hereditary prince and the Ottoman garrisons were indulged in the choice of martyrdom or baptism In the assembly of the states of Epirus Scanderbeg was elected general of the Turkish war and each of the allies engaged to furnish his respective proportion of men and money From these contributions from his patrimonial estate and from the valuable salt pits of Selina he drew an annual revenue of two hundred thousand ducats [39] and the entire sum, exempt from the demands of luxury was strictly appropriated to the public use His manners were popular but his discipline was severe and every superfluous vice was banished from his camp his example strengthened his command and under his conduct the Albanians were invincible in their own opinion and that of their enemies The bravest adventurers of France and Germany were allured by his fame and retained in his service his standing militia consisted of eight thousand horse and seven thousand foot the horses were small the men were active but he viewed with a discerning eye the difficulties and resources of the mountains and at the blaze of the beacons the whole nation was distributed in the strongest posts With such unequal arms Scanderbeg resisted twenty three years the powers of the Ottoman empire and two conquerors Amurath the Second and his greater son were repeatedly baffled by a rebel whom they pursued with seeming contempt and implacable resentment At the head of sixty thousand horse and forty thousand Janizaries Amurath entered Albania he might ravage the open country occupy the defenceless towns convert the churches into mosques, circumcise the Christian youths and punish with death his adult and obstinate captives but the conquests of the sultan were confined to the petty fortress of Sfetigrade and the garrison invincible to his arms, was oppressed by a paltry artifice and a superstitious scruple [40] Amurath retired with shame and loss from the walls of Croya the castle and residence of the Castriots, the march, the siege, the retreat, were harassed by a vexatious, and almost invisible, adversary [41] and the disappointment might tend to embitter perhaps to shorten, the last days of the sultan.[42] In the fulness of conquest Mohammed the Second still felt at his bosom this domestic thorn his lieutenants were permitted to negotiate a truce, and the Albanian prince may justly be praised as a firm and able champion of his national independence The enthusiasm of chivalry and religion has ranked him with the names of Alexander and Pyrrhus nor would they blush to acknowledge their intrepid countryman but his narrow dominion and slender powers must leave him at a humble distance below the heroes of antiquity who triumphed over the East and the Roman legions His splendid achievements the bashaws whom he encountered the armies that he discomfited, and the three thousand Turks who were slain by his single hand must be weighed in the scales of suspicious criticism Against an illiterate enemy, and in the dark solitude of Epirus his partial biographers may safely indulge the latitude of romance but their fictions are exposed by the light of Italian history and they afford a strong presumption against their own truth by a fabulous tale of his exploits when he passed the Adriatic with eight hundred horse to the succour of the king of Naples [43] Without disparagement to his fame they might have owned that he was finally oppressed by the Ottoman powers in his extreme danger he applied to pope Pius the Second for a refuge in the ecclesiastical state and his resources were almost exhausted, since Scanderbeg died a fugitive at Lissus, on the Venetian territory [44] His sepulchre was soon violated by the Turkish conquerors but the Janizaries who wore his bones enchased in a bracelet declared by this superstitious amulet their involuntary reverence for his valour The instant ruin of his country may redound to the hero s glory yet had he balanced the consequences of submission and resistance a patriot perhaps would have declined the unequal contest which must depend on the life and genius of one man Scanderbeg might indeed be supported by the rational though fallacious hope that the pope the king of Naples and the Venetian republic would join in the defence of a free and Christian people who guarded the sea coast of the Adriatic and the narrow passage from Greece to Italy His infant son was saved from the national shipwreck the Castriots[45] were invested with a Neapolitan dukedom, and indiscretion must have been sacred from the vulgar ear and we should suspect the credulity of strangers and sectaries, so prone to believe that a mind which is hardened against truth must be armed with superior contempt for absurdity and error Under the tuition of the most skilful masters Mohammed advanced with an early and rapid progress in the paths of knowledge and besides his native tongue it is affirmed that he spoke or understood five languages,[3] the Arabic, the Persian the Chaldaean or Hebrew the Latin and the Greek. The Persian might indeed contribute to his amusement, and the Arabic to his edification and such studies are familiar to the Oriental youth. In the intercourse of the Greeks and Turks a conqueror might wish to converse with the people over whom he was ambitious to reign his own praises in Latin poetry[4] or prose[5] might find a passage to the royal ear but what use or merit could recommend to the statesman or the scholar the uncouth dialect of his Hebrew slaves? The history and geography of the world were familiar to his memory the lives of the heroes of the East, perhaps of the West[6] excited his emulation his skill in astrology is excused by the folly the times and supposes some rudiments of mathematical science and a profane taste for the arts is betrayed in his liberal invitation and reward of the painters of Italy[7] But the influence of religion and learning were employed without effect on his savage and licentious nature. I will not transcribe nor do I firmly believe, the stories of his fourteen pages whose bellies were ripped open in search of a stolen melon or of the beauteous slave whose head he severed from her body to convince the Janizaries that their master was not the votary of love. His sobriety is attested by the silence of the Turkish annals, which accuse three and three only of the Ottoman line of the vice of drunkenness.[8] But it cannot be denied that his passions were at once furious and inexorable that in the palace as in the field a torrent of blood was spilt on the slightest provocation and that the noblest of the captive youth were often dishonoured by his unnatural lust. In the Albanian war he studied the lessons and soon surpassed the example of his father and the conquest of two empires, twelve kingdoms, and two hundred cities, a vain and flattering account, is ascribed to his invincible sword. He was doubtless a soldier and possibly a general Constantinople has sealed his glory but if we compare the means, the obstacles and the achievements, Mohammed the Second must blush to sustain a parallel with Alexander or Timour Under his command the Ottoman forces were always more numerous than their enemies, yet their progress was bounded by the Euphrates and the Adriatic and his arms were checked by Huniades and Scanderbeg by the Rhodian knights, and by the Persian king

In the reign of Amurath he twice tasted of royalty and twice descended from the throne his tender age was incapable of opposing his father's restoration but never could he forgive the vizirs who had recommended that salutary measure. His nuptials were celebrated with the daughter of a Turkman emir and after a festival of two months, he departed from Adrianople with his bride to reside in the government of Magnesia. Before the end of six weeks he was recalled by a sudden message from the divan which announced the decease of Amurath and the mutinous spirit of the Janizaries. His speed and vigour commanded their obedience he passed the Hellespont with a chosen guard and at the distance of a mile from Adrianople the vizirs and emirs, the imams and cadhis, the soldiers and the people fell prostrate before the new sultan. They affected to weep they affected to rejoice he ascended the throne at the age of twenty-one years, and removed the cause of sedition by the death the inevitable death of his infant brothers.[9] The ambassadors of Europe and Asia soon appeared to congratulate his accession and solicit his friendship and to all he spoke the language of moderation and peace The confidence of the Greek emperor was revived by the solemn oaths and fair assurances with which he sealed the ratification of the treaty and a rich domain on the banks of the Strymon was assigned for the annual payment of three hundred thousand aspers the pension of an Ottoman prince who was detained at his request in the Byzantine court. Yet the neighbours of Mohammed might tremble at the severity with which a youthful monarch reformed the pomp of his father's household the expenses of luxury were applied to those of ambition and a useless train of seven thousand falconers was either dismissed from his service or enlisted in his troops. In the first summer of his reign he visited with an army the Asiatic provinces but after humbling the pride Mohammed accepted the submission of the Caramanian that he might not be diverted by the smallest obstacle from the execution of his great design[10]

The Mohammedan and more especially the Turkish casuists, have pronounced that no promise can bind the faithful against the inter-

Reduced to the first alternative the choice of Phranza was decided in favour of a Georgian princess and the vanity of her father was dazzled by the glorious alliance Instead of demanding, according to the primitive and national custom a price for his daughter,[53] he offered a portion of fifty six thousand, with an annual pension of five thousand ducats and the services of the ambassador were repaid by an assurance that as his son had been adopted in baptism by the emperor the establishment of his daughter should be the peculiar care of the empress of Constantinople On the return of Phranza the treaty was ratified by the Greek monarch who with his own hand impressed three vermilion crosses on the golden bull, and assured the Georgian envoy that in the spring his galleys should conduct the bride to her Imperial palace But Constantine embraced his faithful servant not with the cold approbation of a sovereign but with the warm confidence of a friend who after a long absence is impatient to pour his secrets into the bosom of his friend

Since the death of my mother and of Cantacuzene who alone advised me without interest or passion [54] I am surrounded said the emperor, 'by men whom I can neither love nor trust, nor esteem You are not a stranger to Lucas Notaras the great admiral obstinately attached to his own sentiments he declares both in private and public that his sentiments are the absolute measure of my thoughts and actions The rest of the courtiers are swayed by their personal or factious views, and how can I consult the monks on questions of policy and marriage? I have yet much employment for your diligence and fidelity In the spring you shall engage one of my brothers to solicit the succour of the Western powers from the Morea you shall sail to Cyprus on a particular commission and from thence proceed to Georgia to receive and conduct the future empress.

Your commands ' replied Phranza, are irresistible, but deign great sir, ' he added, with a serious smile, 'to consider that, if I am thus perpetually absent from my family, my wife may be tempted either to seek another husband or to throw herself into a monastery ' After laughing at his apprehensions, the emperor more gravely consoled him by the pleasing assurance that this should be his last service abroad and that he destined for his son a wealthy and noble heiress for himself the important office of great logothete or principal minister of state The marriage was immediately stipulated but the office however incompatible with his own had been usurped by the ambition of the admiral Some delay was requisite to negotiate a consent and an equivalent and the nomination of Phranza was half declared and half suppressed lest it might be displeasing to an insolent and powerful favourite The winter was spent in the preparations of his embassy and Phranza had resolved that the youth his son should embrace this opportunity of foreign travel and be left on the appearance of danger with his maternal kindred on the Morea Such were the private and public designs which were interrupted by a Turkish war, and finally buried in the ruins of the empire.

CHAPTER LXVIII

Reign and Character of Mohammed the Second Siege, Assault, and Final Conquest of Constantinople by the Turks Death of Constantine Palæologus Servitude of the Greeks Extinction of the Roman Empire in the East Consternation of Europe Conquests and Death of Mohammed the Second

THE siege of Constantinople by the Turks attracts our first attention to the person and character of the great destroyer Mohammed the Second[1] was the son of the second Amurath and though his mother has been decorated with the titles of Christian and princess, she is more probably confounded with the numerous concubines who peopled from every climate the harem of the sultan His first education and sentiments were those of a devout Musulman and as often as he conversed with an infidel he purified his hands and face by the legal rites of ablution Age and empire appear to have relaxed this narrow bigotry his aspiring genius disdained to acknowledge a power above his own and in his looser hours he presumed (it is said) to brand the prophet of Mecca as a robber and impostor Yet the sultan persevered in a decent reverence for the doctrine and discipline of the Koran [2] his private

March the appointed spot of Asomaton was covered with an active swarm of Turkish artificers and the materials by sea and land were diligently transported from Europe and Asia.[a] The lime had been burnt in Cataphrygia, the timber was cut down in the woods of Heraclea and Nicomedia and the stones were dug from the Anatolian quarries. Each of the thousand masons was assisted by two workmen and a measure of two cubits was marked for their daily task. The fortress[b] was built in a triangular form each angle was flanked by a strong and massy tower one on the declivity of the hill, two along the sea shore a thickness of twenty two feet was assigned for the walls, thirty for the towers and the whole building was covered with a solid platform of lead. Mohammed himself pressed and directed the work with indefatigable ardour his three vizirs claimed the honour of finishing their respective towers the zeal of the cadhis emulated that of the Janizaries the meanest labour was ennobled by the service of God and the sultan and the diligence of the multitude was quickened by the eye of a despot whose smile was the hope of fortune, and whose frown was the messenger of death. The Greek emperor beheld with terror the irresistible progress of the work and vainly strove by flattery and gifts to assuage an implacable foe, who sought and secretly fomented, the slightest occasion of a quarrel Such occasions must soon and inevitably be found The ruins of stately churches and even the marble columns which had been consecrated to Saint Michael the archangel were employed without scruple by the profane and rapacious Moslems and some Christians who presumed to oppose the removal received from their hands the crown of martyrdom. Constantine had solicited a Turkish guard to protect the fields and harvests of his subjects the guard was fixed but their first order was to allow free pasture to the mules and horses of the camp and to defend their brethren if they should be molested by the natives. The retinue of an Ottoman chief had left their horses to pass the night among the ripe corn the damage was felt, the insult was resented, and several of both nations were slain in a tumultuous conflict. Mohammed listened with joy to the complaint and a detachment was commanded to exterminate the guilty village the guilty had fled but forty innocent and unsuspecting reapers were massacred by the soldiers. Till this provocation Constantinople had been open to the visits of commerce and curiosity on the first alarm the gates were shut but the emperor still anxious for peace released on the third day his Turkish captives,[17] and expressed in a last message the firm resignation of a Christian and a soldier Since neither oaths nor treaty nor submission can secure peace pursue said he to Mohammed your impious warfare. My trust is in God alone if it should please him to mollify your heart, I shall rejoice in the happy change if he delivers the city into your hands I submit without a murmur to his holy will. But until the Judge of the earth shall pronounce between us, it is my duty to live and die in the defence of my people. The sultan's answer was hostile and decisive his fortifications were completed and before his departure for Adrianople he stationed a vigilant Aga and four hundred Janizaries to levy a tribute on the ships of every nation that should pass within the reach of their cannon A Venetian vessel refusing obedience to the new lords of the Bosphorus, was sunk with a single bullet. The master and thirty sailors escaped in the boat but they were dragged in chains to the Porte the chief was impaled his companions were beheaded and the historian Ducas[a] beheld at Demotica their bodies exposed to the wild beasts. The siege of Constantinople was deferred till the ensuing spring but an Ottoman army marched into the Morea to divert the force of the brothers of Constantine At this era of calamity one of these princes, the despot Thomas, was blessed or afflicted with the birth of a son— the last heir says the plaintive Phranza of the last spark of the Roman empire.[a]

The Greeks and the Turks passed an anxious and sleepless winter the former were kept awake by their fears, the latter by their hopes both by the preparations of defence and attack and the two emperors, who had the most to lose or to gain were the most deeply affected by the national sentiment. In Mohammed that sentiment was inflamed by the ardour of his youth and temper he amused his leisure with building at Adrianople[18] the lofty palace of Jehan Numa (the watchtower of the world) but his serious thoughts were irrevocably bent on the conquest of the city of Caesar At the dead of night, about the second watch he started from his bed and commanded the instant attendance of his prime vizir The message the hour the prince and his own situation alarmed the guilty conscience of Calil Basha who had possessed the confidence and advised the restoration of Amurath On the accession of the son the vizir was confirmed in his office and the ap-

est and duty of their religion and that the sultan may abrogate his own treaties and those of his predecessors The justice and magnanimity of Amurath had scorned this immoral privilege, but his son though the proudest of men could stoop from ambition to the basest arts of dissimulation and deceit Peace was on his lips while war was in his heart he incessantly sighed for the possession of Constantinople and the Greeks, by their own indiscretion afforded the first pretence of the fatal rupture[11] Instead of labouring to be forgotten their ambassadors pursued his camp to demand the payment and even the increase of their annual stipend the divan was importuned by their complaints and the vizir, a secret friend of the Christians, was constrained to deliver the sense of his brethren Ye foolish and miserable Romans' said Calil 'we know your devices and ye are ignorant of your own danger! the scrupulous Amurath is no more his throne is occupied by a young conqueror whom no laws can bind, and no obstacles can resist and if you escape from his hands, give praise to the divine clemency which yet delays the chastisement of your sins Why do you seek to affright us by vain and indirect menaces? Release the fugitive Orchan crown him sultan of Romania call the Hungarians from beyond the Danube arm against us the nations of the West and be assured that you will only provoke and precipitate your ruin' But if the fears of the ambassadors were alarmed by the stern language of the vizir they were soothed by the courteous audience and friendly speeches of the Ottoman prince and Mohammed assured them that on his return to Adrianople he would redress the grievances, and consult the true interests of the Greeks. No sooner had he repassed the Hellespont than he issued a mandate to suppress their pension and to expel their officers from the banks of the Strymon in this measure he betrayed a hostile mind and the second order announced and in some degree commenced the siege of Constantinople In the narrow pass of the Bosphorus an Asiatic fortress had formerly been raised by his grandfather, in the opposite situation, on the European side he resolved to erect a more formidable castle and a thousand masons were commanded to assemble in the spring on a spot named Asomaton about five miles from the Greek metropolis.[12] Persuasion is the resource of the feeble and the feeble can seldom persuade the ambassadors of the emperor attempted, without success to divert Mohammed from the execution of his design They represented that his grandfather had solicited the permission of Manuel to build a castle on his own territories, but that this double fortification which would command the strait could only tend to violate the alliance of the nations, to intercept the Latins who traded in the Black Sea, and perhaps to annihilate the subsistence of the city 'I form no enterprise' replied the perfidious sultan against the city, but the empire of Constantinople is measured by her walls. Have you forgot the distress to which my father was reduced when you formed a league with the Hungarians, when they invaded our country by land and the Hellespont was occupied by the French galleys? Amurath was compelled to force the passage of the Bosphorus and your strength was not equal to your malevolence. I was then a child at Adrianople the Moslems trembled, and for a while the Gabours[13] insulted our disgrace But when my father had triumphed in the field of Varna he vowed to erect a fort on the western shore and that vow it is my duty to accomplish Have ye the right have ye the power, to control my actions on my own ground? For that ground is my own as far as the shores of the Bosphorus Asia is inhabited by the Turks, and Europe is deserted by the Romans. Return and inform your king that the present Ottoman is far different from his predecessors, that his resolutions surpass their wishes, and that he performs more than they could resolve Return in safety but the next who delivers a similar message may expect to be flayed alive After this declaration Constantine, the first of the Greeks in spirit as in rank[14] had determined to unsheathe the sword and to resist the approach and establishment of the Turks on the Bosphorus. He was disarmed by the advice of his civil and ecclesiastical ministers, who recommended a system less generous and even less prudent than his own to approve their patience and long suffering to brand the Ottoman with the name and guilt of an aggressor and to depend on chance and time for their own safety and the destruction of a fort which could not long be maintained in the neighbourhood of a great and populous city Amidst hope and fear the fears of the wise and the hopes of the credulous the winter rolled away the proper business of each man and each hour was postponed and the Greeks shut their eyes against the impending danger till the arrival of the spring and the sultan decided the assurance of their ruin

Of a master who never forgives the orders are seldom disobeyed On the twenty sixth of Dardanelles and if the use be inconvenient it has been found on a late trial that the effect was far from contemptible A stone bullet of eleven hundred pounds weight was once discharged with three hundred and thirty pounds of powder at the distance of six hundred yards it shivered into three rocky fragments traversed the strait and leaving the waters in a foam again rose and bounded against the opposite hill [26]

While Mohammed threatened the capital of the East, the Greek emperor implored with fervent prayers the assistance of earth and Heaven. But the invisible powers were deaf to his supplications and Christendom beheld with indifference the fall of Constantinople, while she derived at least some promise of supply from the jealous and temporal policy of the sultan of Egypt. Some states were too weak and others too remote by some the danger was considered as imaginary by others as inevitable the Western princes were involved in their endless and domestic quarrels and the Roman pontiff was exasperated by the falsehood or obstinacy of the Greeks. Instead of employing in their favour the arms and treasures of Italy Nicholas the Fifth had foretold their approaching ruin and his honour was engaged in the accomplishment of his prophecy Perhaps he was softened by the last extremity of their distress but his compassion was tardy his efforts were faint and unavailing and Constantinople had fallen before the squadrons of Genoa and Venice could sail from their harbours [27] Even the princes of the Morea and of the Greek islands affected a cold neutrality the Genoese colony of Galata negotiated a private treaty and the sultan indulged them in the delusive hope that by his clemency they might survive the ruin of the empire A plebeian crowd and some Byzantine nobles basely withdrew from the danger of their country and the avarice of the rich denied the emperor and reserved for the Turks, the secret treasures which might have raised in their defence whole armies of mercenaries.[28] The indigent and solitary prince prepared however to sustain his formidable adversary but if his courage were equal to the peril his strength was inadequate to the contest. In the beginning of the spring the Turkish vanguard swept the towns and villages as far as the gates of Constantinople submission was spared and protected whatever presumed to resist was exterminated with fire and sword The Greek places on the Black Sea Mesembria Acheloum and Bizon surrendered on the first summons ... bria alone deserved the honours of a siege or blockade and the bold inhabitants while they were invested by land launched their boats pillaged the opposite coast of Cyzicus, and sold their captives in the public market. But on the approach of Mohammed himself all was silent and prostrate he first halted at the distance of five miles and from thence advancing in battle array planted before the gate of St. Romanus the Imperial standard and on the sixth day of April formed the memorable siege of Constantinople

The troops of Asia and Europe extended on the right and left from the Propontis to the harbour the Janizaries in the front were stationed before the sultan's tent the Ottoman line was covered by a deep intrenchment and a subordinate army enclosed the suburb of Galata and watched the doubtful faith of the Genoese The inquisitive Philelphus, who resided in Greece about thirty years before the siege, is confident that all the Turkish forces of any name or value could not exceed the number of sixty thousand horse and twenty thousand foot and he upbraids the pusillanimity of the nations who had tamely yielded to a handful of barbarians. Such indeed might be the regular establishment of the Capiculi [29] the troops of the Porte who marched with the prince, and were paid from his royal treasury But the bashaws, in their respective governments, maintained or levied a provincial militia many lands were held by a military tenure many volunteers were attracted by the hope of spoil and the sound of the holy trumpet invited a swarm of hungry and fearless fanatics, who might contribute at least to multiply the terrors and in a first attack to blunt the swords of the Christians. The whole mass of the Turkish powers is magnified by Ducas Chalcocondyles and Leonard of Chios, to the amount of three or four hundred thousand men but Phranza was a less remote and more accurate judge and his precise definition of two hundred and fifty-eight thousand does not exceed the measure of experience and probability [30] The navy of the besiegers was less formidable the Propontis was overspread with three hundred and twenty sail but of these no more than eighteen could be rated as galleys of war and the far greater part must be degraded to the condition of store-ships and transports which poured into the camp fresh supplies of men ammunition and provisions In her last decay Constantinople was still peopled with more than a hundred thousand inhabitants but these numbers are found in the accounts, not of war but of captivity and they

pearances of favour, but the veteran statesman was not insensible that he trod on a thin and slippery ice, which might break under his foot steps and plunge him in the abyss His friend ship for the Christians, which might be inno cent under the late reign had stigmatised him with the name of Gabour Ortachi, or foster brother of the infidels [21] and his avarice enter tained a venal and treasonable correspondence, which was detected and punished after the con clusion of the war On receiving the royal man date he embraced, perhaps for the last time, his wife and children filled a cup with pieces of gold hastened to the palace adored the sultan, and offered according to the Oriental custom the slight tribute of his duty and gratitude [22] ' It is not my wish " said Mohammed 'to resume my gifts but rather to heap and multiply them on thy head In my turn I ask a present far more valuable and important—Constanti nople ' As soon as the vizir had recovered from his surprise, The same God, ' said he "who has already given thee so large a portion of the Roman empire will not deny the remnant and the capital His providence and thy power, assure thy success and myself with the rest of thy faithful slaves, will sacrifice our lives and fortunes '— Lala' [2] (or preceptor) continued the sultan ' do you see this pillow? all the night, in my agitation I have pulled it on one side and the other, I have risen from my bed again have I lain down yet sleep has not visited these weary eyes Beware of the gold and silver of the Romans in arms we are superior and with the aid of God and the prayers of the prophet we shall speedily become masters of Constanti nople To sound the disposition of his soldiers he often wandered through the streets alone and in disguise and it was fatal to discover the sultan when he wished to escape from the vul gar eye His hours were spent in delineating the plan of the hostile city, in debating with his generals and engineers on what spot he should erect his batteries on which side he should as sault the walls where he should spring his mines to what place he should apply his scal ing ladders and the exercises of the day re peated and proved the lucubrations of the night.

Among the implements of destruction he studied with peculiar care the recent and tre mendous discovery of the Latins, and his artil lery surpassed whatever had yet appeared in the world A founder of cannon a Dane or Hungarian who had been almost starved in the Greek service deserted to the Moslems and was liberally entertained by the Turkish sultan. Mohammed was satisfied with the answer to his first question, which he eagerly pressed on the artist Am I able to cast a cannon capable of throwing a ball or stone of sufficient size to bat ter the walls of Constantinople? I am not ig norant of their strength but were they more solid than those of Babylon I could oppose an engine of superior power, the position and management of that engine must be left to your engineers ' On this assurance a foundry was established at Adrianople the metal was pre pared and at the end of three months Urban produced a piece of brass ordnance of stupen dous and almost incredible magnitude a measure of twelve palms is assigned to the bore, and the stone bullet weighed above six hundred pounds [24] A vacant place before the new palace was chosen for the first experiment but to pre vent the sudden and mischievous effects of as tonishment and fear a proclamation was issued that the cannon would be discharged the en suing day The explosion was felt or heard in a circuit of a hundred furlongs the ball by the force of gunpowder, was driven above a mile and on the spot where it fell it buried itself a fathom deep in the ground For the conveyance of this destructive engine a frame or carriage of thirty wagons was linked together and drawn along by a team of sixty oxen two hundred men on both sides were stationed to poise and support the rolling weight two hundred and fifty workmen marched before to smooth the way and repair the bridges and near two months were employed in a laborious journey of one hundred and fifty miles A lively philosopher[25] derides on this occasion the credulity of the Greeks and observes with much reason that we should always distrust the exaggerations of a vanquished people He calculates that a ball even of two hundred pounds would require a charge of one hundred and fifty pounds of powder and that the stroke would be feeble and impotent since not a fifteenth part of the mass could be inflamed at the same moment A stranger as I am to the art of destruction I can discern that the modern improvements of ar tillery prefer the number of pieces to the weight of metal the quickness of the fire to the sound or even the consequences of a single explosion Yet I dare not reject the positive and unani mous evidence of contemporary writers nor can it seem improbable that the first artists in their rude and ambitious efforts should have transgressed the standard of moderation A Turkish cannon more enormous than that of Mohammed still guards the entrance of the

the truth and why instead of confiding in God will ye put your trust in the Italians? In losing your faith you will lose your city Have mercy on me O Lord! I protest in thy presence that I am innocent of the crime O miserable Romans consider pause and repent. At the same moment that you renounce the religion of your fathers, by embracing impiety you submit to a foreign servitude. According to the advice of Gennadius, the religious virgins, as pure as angels, and as proud as demons, rejected the act of union and abjured all communion with the present and future associates of the Latins and their example was applauded and imitated by the greatest part of the clergy and people From the monastery the devout Greeks dispersed themselves in the taverns drank confusion to the slaves of the pope emptied their glasses in honour of the image of the holy Virgin and sought her to defend against Mohammed the city which she had formerly saved from Chosroes and the Chagan In the double intoxication of zeal and wine they valiantly exclaimed, What occasion have we for succour or union or Latins? far from us be the worship of the Azymites! During the winter that preceded the Turkish conquest the nation was distracted by this epidemical frenzy and the season of Lent, the approach of Easter instead of breathing charity and love, served only to fortify the obstinacy and influence of the zealots The confessors scrutinised and alarmed the conscience of their votaries, and a rigorous penance was imposed on those who had received the communion from a priest who had given an express or tacit consent to the union His service at the altar propagated the infection to the mute and simple spectators of the ceremony they forfeited by the impure spectacle, the virtue of the sacerdotal character nor was it lawful, even in danger of sudden death to invoke the assistance of their prayers or absolution No sooner had the church of St. Sophia been polluted by the Latin sacrifice than it was deserted as a Jewish synagogue or a heathen temple by the clergy and people and a vast and gloomy silence prevailed in that venerable dome, which had so often smoked with a cloud of incense blazed with innumerable lights, and resounded with the voice of prayer and thanksgiving The Latins were the most odious of heretics and infidels and the first minister of the empire, the great duke was heard to declare that he had rather behold in Constantinople the turban of Mohammed than the pope's tiara or a cardinal's hat.[25] A sentiment so unworthy of Christians and patriots was familiar and fatal to the Greeks the emperor was deprived of the affection and support of his subjects and their native cowardice was sanctified by resignation to the divine decree or the visionary hope of a miraculous deliverance

Of the triangle which composes the figure of Constantinople the two sides along the sea were made inaccessible to an enemy the Propontis by nature and the harbour by art. Between the two waters, the basis of the triangle the land side was protected by a double wall and a deep ditch of the depth of one hundred feet. Against this line of fortification which Phranza an eye witness, prolongs to the measure of six miles,[26] the Ottomans directed their principal attack and the emperor after distributing the service and command of the most perilous stations, undertook the defence of the external wall In the first days of the siege the Greek soldiers descended into the ditch or sallied into the field but they soon discovered that in the proportion of their numbers, one Christian was of more value than twenty Turks and after these bold preludes they were prudently content to maintain the rampart with their missile weapons. Nor should this prudence be accused of pusillanimity The nation was indeed pusillanimous and base but the last Constantine deserves the name of a hero his noble band of volunteers was inspired with Roman virtue and the foreign auxiliaries supported the honour of the Western chivalry The incessant volleys of lances and arrows were accompanied with the smoke the sound and the fire of their musketry and cannon. Their small arms discharged at the same time either five or even ten balls of lead of the size of a walnut and according to the closeness of the ranks and the force of the powder several breastplates and bodies were transpierced by the same shot. But the Turkish approaches were soon sunk in trenches or covered with ruins Each day added to the science of the Christians but their inadequate stock of gunpowder was wasted in the operations of each day Their ordnance was not powerful either in size or number and if they possessed some heavy cannon they feared to plant them on the walls, lest the aged structure should be shaken and overthrown by the explosion[27] The same destructive secret had been revealed to the Moslems by whom it was employed with the superior energy of zeal riches, and despotism. The great cannon of Mohammed has been separately noticed an important and visible object in the history of the times but that enor

mostly consisted of mechanics of priests, of women and of men devoid of that spirit which even women have sometimes exerted for the common safety I can suppose, I could almost excuse the reluctance of subjects to serve on a distant frontier, at the will of a tyrant but the man who dares not expose his life in the defence of his children and his property has lost in society the first and most active energies of nature By the emperor s command a particular inquiry had been made through the streets and houses, how many of the citizens or even of the monks were able and willing to bear arms for their country The lists were intrusted to Phranza,[21] and after a diligent addition he informed his master, with grief and surprise that the national defence was reduced to four thousand nine hundred and seventy Romans Between Constantine and his faithful minister this comfortless secret was preserved and a sufficient proportion of shields cross bows and muskets was distributed from the arsenal to the city bands They derived some accession from a body of two thousand strangers under the command of John Justiniani a noble Genoese, a liberal donative was advanced to these auxiliaries and a princely recompense the isle of Lemnos was promised to the valour and victory of their chief A strong chain was drawn across the mouth of the harbour it was supported by some Greek and Italian vessels of war and merchandise and the ships of every Christian nation, that successively arrived from Candia and the Black Sea were detained for the public service Against the powers of the Ottoman empire a city of the extent of thirteen perhaps of sixteen, miles was defended by a scanty garrison of seven or eight thousand soldiers Europe and Asia were open to the besiegers but the strength and provisions of the Greeks must sustain a daily decrease nor could they indulge the expectation of any foreign succour or supply

The primitive Romans would have drawn their swords in the resolution of death or conquest The primitive Christians might have embraced each other and awaited in patience and charity the stroke of martyrdom But the Greeks of Constantinople were animated only by the spirit of religion, and that spirit was productive only of animosity and discord Before his death the emperor John Palæologus had renounced the unpopular measure of a union with the Latins nor was the idea revived till the distress of his brother Constantine imposed a last trial of flattery and dissimulation [22] With the demand of temporal aid his ambassadors were instructed to mingle the assurance of spiritual obedience his neglect of the church was excused by the urgent cares of the state, and his orthodox wishes solicited the presence of a Roman legate The Vatican had been too often deluded, yet the signs of repentance could not decently be overlooked a legate was more easily granted than an army and about six months before the final destruction, the cardinal Isidore of Russia appeared in that character with a retinue of priests and soldiers. The emperor saluted him as a friend and father respectfully listened to his public and private sermons and with the most obsequious of the clergy and laymen subscribed the act of union as it had been ratified in the council of Florence On the twelfth of December the two nations in the church of St Sophia joined in the communion of sacrifice and prayer and the names of the two pontiffs were solemnly commemorated, the names of Nicholas the Fifth, the vicar of Christ and of the patriarch Gregory who had been driven into exile by a rebellious people.

But the dress and language of the Latin priest who officiated at the altar were an object of scandal and it was observed with horror that he consecrated a cake or wafer of unleavened bread, and poured cold water into the cup of the sacrament. A national historian acknowledges with a blush that none of his countrymen, not the emperor himself, were sincere in this occasional conformity [23] Their hasty and unconditional submission was palliated by a promise of future revisal but the best or the worst of their excuses was the confession of their own perjury When they were pressed by the reproaches of their honest brethren Have patience they whispered have patience till God shall have delivered the city from the great dragon who seeks to devour us You shall then perceive whether we are truly reconciled with the Azymites But patience is not the attribute of zeal nor can the arts of a court be adapted to the freedom and violence of popular enthusiasm. From the dome of St Sophia the inhabitants of either sex and of every degree rushed in crowds to the cell of the monk Gennadius [24] to consult the oracle of the church The holy man was invisible entranced as it should seem in deep meditation or divine rapture but he had exposed on the door of his cell a speaking tablet and they successively withdrew after reading these tremendous words ' O miserable Romans why will ye abandon ships continued to advance with joyful shouts, and a full press both of sails and oars against the hostile fleet of three hundred vessels and the rampart, the camp the coasts of Europe and Asia were lined with innumerable spectators, who anxiously awaited the event of this momentous succour At the first view that event could not appear doubtful the superiority of the Moslems was beyond all measure or account, and in a calm their numbers and valour must inevitably have prevailed But their hasty and imperfect navy had been created not by the genius of the people but by the will of the sultan in the height of their prosperity the Turks have acknowledged that if God had given them the earth he had left the sea to the infidels [44] and a series of defeats a rapid progress of decay had established the truth of their modest confession Except eighteen galleys of some force the rest of their fleet consisted of open boats rudely constructed and awkwardly managed, crowded with troops and destitute of cannon and since courage arises in a great measure from the consciousness of strength the bravest of the Janizaries might tremble on a new element. In the Christian squadron five stout and lofty ships were guided by skilful pilots, and manned with the veterans of Italy and Greece long practised in the arts and perils of the sea Their weight was directed to sink or scatter the weak obstacles that impeded their passage their artillery swept the waters their liquid fire was *poured on the heads of the ad*versaries, who with the design of boarding presumed to approach them and the winds and waves are always on the side of the ablest navigators In this conflict the Imperial vessel which had been almost overpowered was rescued by the Genoese but the Turks in a distant and a closer attack, were twice repulsed with considerable loss Mohammed himself sat on horseback on the beach to encourage their valour by his voice and presence, by the promise of reward and by fear more potent than the fear of the enemy The passions of his soul and even the gestures of his body [45] seemed to imitate the actions of the combatants and as if he had been the lord of nature he spurred his horse with a fearless and impotent effort into the sea His loud reproaches and the clamours of the camp urged the Ottomans to a third attack, more fatal and bloody than the two former and I must repeat, though I cannot credit, the evidence of Phranza who affirms, from their own mouth that they lost above twelve thousand men in the slaughter of the day They fled in disorder to the shores of Europe and Asia while the Christian squadron, triumphant and unhurt, steered along the Bosphorus and securely anchored within the chain of the harbour In the confidence of victory they boasted that the whole Turkish power must have yielded to their arms but the admiral or captain bashaw found some consolation for a painful wound in his eye by representing that accident as the cause of his defeat. Baltha Ogli was a renegade of the race of the Bulgarian princes his military character was tainted with the unpopular vice of avarice and under the despotism of the prince or people misfortune is a sufficient evidence of guilt. His rank and services were annihilated by the displeasure of Mohammed In the royal presence the captain bashaw was extended on the ground by four slaves, and received one hundred strokes with a golden rod [46] his death had been pronounced and he adored the clemency of the sultan who was satisfied with the milder punishment of confiscation and exile The introduction of this supply revived the hopes of the Greeks, and accused the supineness of their Western allies. Amidst the deserts of Anatolia and the rocks of Palestine the millions of the crusades had buried themselves in a voluntary and inevitable grave but the situation of the Imperial city was strong against her enemies, and accessible to her friends and a rational and moderate armament of the maritime states might have saved the relics of the Roman name and maintained a Christian fortress in the heart of the Ottoman empire Yet this was the sole and feeble attempt for the deliverance of Constantinople the more distant powers were insensible of its danger and the ambassador of Hungary or at least of Huniades, resided in the Turkish camp to remove the fears and to direct the operations of the sultan [47]

It was difficult for the Greeks to penetrate the secret of the divan yet the Greeks are persuaded that a resistance so obstinate and surprising had fatigued the perseverance of Mohammed He began to meditate a retreat and the siege would have been speedily raised if the ambition and jealousy of the second vizir had not opposed the perfidious advice of Calil Bashaw who still maintained a secret correspondence with the Byzantine court. The reduction of the city appeared to be hopeless, unless a double attack could be made from the harbour as well as from the land but the harbour was inaccessible an impenetrable chain was now defended by eight large ships more than twenty

mous engine was flanked by two fellows almost of equal magnitude [38] the long order of the Turkish artillery was pointed against the walls, fourteen batteries thundered at once on the most accessible places and of one of these it is ambiguously expressed that it was mounted with one hundred and thirty guns or that it discharged one hundred and thirty bullets Yet in the power and activity of the sultan we may discern the infancy of the new science Under a master who counted the moments the great cannon could be loaded and fired no more than seven times in one day [39] The heated metal unfortunately burst several workmen were destroyed and the skill of an artist was admired who bethought himself of preventing the danger and the accident, by pouring oil after each explosion into the mouth of the cannon

The first random shots were productive of more sound than effect and it was by the advice of a Christian that the engineers were taught to level their aim against the two opposite sides of the salient angles of a bastion However imperfect the weight and repetition of the fire made some impression on the walls and the Turks pushing their approaches to the edge of the ditch attempted to fill the enormous chasm and to build a road to the assault [40] Innumerable fascines, and hogsheads and trunks of trees were heaped on each other and such was the impetuosity of the throng that the foremost and the weakest were pushed headlong down the precipice and instantly buried under the accumulated mass To fill the ditch was the toil of the besiegers to clear away the rubbish was the safety of the besieged and after a long and bloody conflict, the web that had been woven in the day was still unravelled in the night. The next resource of Mohammed was the practice of mines but the soil was rocky in every attempt he was stopped and undermined by the Christian engineers nor had the art been yet invented of replenishing those subterraneous passages with gunpowder and blowing whole towers and cities into the air [41] A circumstance that distinguishes the siege of Constantinople is the reunion of the ancient and modern artillery The cannon were intermingled with the mechanical engines for casting stones and darts the bullet and the battering ram were directed against the same walls nor had the discovery of gunpowder superseded the use of the liquid and unextinguishable fire A wooden turret of the largest size was advanced on rollers this portable magazine of ammunition and fascines was protected by a threefold covering of bulls hides incessant volleys were securely discharged from the loopholes, in the front three doors were contrived for the alternate sally and retreat of the soldiers and workmen They ascended by a staircase to the upper platform, and as high as the level of that platform a scaling ladder could be raised by pulleys to form a bridge and grapple with the adverse rampart. By these various arts of annoyance some as new as they were pernicious to the Greeks, the tower of St Romanus was at length overturned after a severe struggle the Turks were repulsed from the breach and interrupted by darkness but they trusted that with the return of light they should renew the attack with fresh vigour and decisive success Of this pause of action, this interval of hope, each moment was improved by the activity of the emperor and Justiniani who passed the night on the spot and urged the labours which involved the safety of the church and city At the dawn of day the impatient sultan perceived with astonishment and grief that his wooden turret had been reduced to ashes the ditch was cleared and restored and the tower of St Romanus was again strong and entire He deplored the failure of his design and uttered a profane exclamation that the word of the thirty seven thousand prophets should not have compelled him to believe that such a work in so short a time could have been accomplished by the infidels

The generosity of the Christian princes was cold and tardy but in the first apprehension of a siege Constantine had negotiated in the isles of the Archipelago the Morea and Sicily, the most indispensable supplies As early as the beginning of April, five [42] great ships, equipped for merchandise and war would have sailed from the harbour of Chios had not the wind blown obstinately from the north [43] One of these ships bore the Imperial flag the remaining four belonged to the Genoese and they were laden with wheat and barley with wine oil and vegetables and above all with soldiers and mariners for the service of the capital After a tedious delay a gentle breeze and on the second day a strong gale from the south carried them through the Hellespont and the Propontis but the city was already invested by sea and land and the Turkish fleet at the entrance of the Bosphorus was stretched from shore to shore in the form of a crescent to intercept or at least to repel these bold auxiliaries The reader who has present to his mind the geographical picture of Constantinople will conceive and admire the greatness of the spectacle The five Christian and he determined to abide the last extremities of war Several days were employed by the sul tan in the preparations of the assault and a respite was granted by his favourite science of astrology which had fixed on the twenty ninth of May as the fortunate and fatal hour On the evening of the twenty seventh he issued his final orders assembled in his presence the military chiefs and dispersed his heralds through the camp to proclaim the duty and the motives of the perilous enterprise. Fear is the first principle of a despotic government and his menaces were expressed in the Oriental style, that the fugitives and deserters, had they the wings of a bird," should not escape from his inexorable justice. The greatest part of his bashaws and Janizaries were the offspring of Christian parents but the glories of the Turkish name were perpetuated by successive adoption and in the gradual change of individuals the spirit of a legion a regiment, or an oda, is kept alive y imitation and discipline. In this holy war re the Moslems were exhorted to purify their unds with prayer their bodies with seven blutions and to abstain from food till the close f the ensuing day A crowd of dervishes vis ted he tents, to instil the desire of martyrdom, and he assurance of spending an immortal youth imid t the rivers and gardens of paradise and n the embraces of the black-eyed virgins. Yet Mohammed principally trusted to the efficacy of temporal and visible rewards. A double pay was promised to the victorious troops The city and the buildings, said Mohammed are mine but I resign to your valour the captives and the spoil, the treasures of gold and beauty be rich and be happy Many are the provinces of my empire the intrepid soldier who first ascends the walls of Constantinople shall be re warded with the government of the fairest and most wealthy and my gratitude shall accumu late his honours and fortunes above the mea sure of his own hopes. Such various and potent motives diffused among the Turks a general ardour regardless of life and impatient for ac tion the camp re-echoed with the Moslem shouts of God is God there is but one God and Mohammed is the apostle of God" " and the sea and land from Galata to the seven towers were illuminated by the blaze of their nocturnal fires.

Far different was the state of the Christians who with loud and impotent complaints, de plored the guilt, or the punishment, of their sins. The celestial image of the Virgin had been exposed in solemn procession but their divine patroness was deaf to their entreaties they accused the obstinacy of the emperor for re fusing a timely surrender anticipated the hor rors of their fate and sighed for the repose and security of Turkish servitude The noblest of the Greeks and the bravest of the allies were summoned to the palace to prepare them, on the evening of the twenty-eighth for the duties and dangers of the general assault. The last speech of Palæologus was the funeral oration of the Roman empire " he promised he conjured and he vainly attempted to infuse the hope which was extinguished in his own mind In this world all was comfortless and gloomy and neither the Gospel nor the church have pro posed any conspicuous recompense to the heroes who fall in the service of their country But the example of their prince and the confinement of a siege had armed these warriors with the courage of despair and the pathetic scene is described by the feelings of the historian Phranza who was himself present at this mournful assembly They wept they embraced regardless of their families and fortunes, they devoted their lives and each commander, de parting to his station maintained all night a vig ilant and anxious watch on the rampart. The emperor and some faithful companions entered the dome of St Sophia, which in a few hours was to be converted into a mosque and de voutly received, with tears and prayers, the sacrament of the holy communion He reposed some moments in the palace which resounded with cries and lamentations solicited the par don of all whom he might have injured " and mounted on horseback to visit the guards and explore the motions of the enemy The distress and fall of the last Constantine are more glori ous than the long prosperity of the Byzantine Cæsars

In the confusion of darkness an assailant may sometimes succeed but in this great and general attack, the military judgment and astrological knowledge of Mohammed advised him to ex pect the morning, the memorable twenty ninth of May in the fourteen hundred and fifty third year of the Christian era The preceding night had been strenuously employed the troops the cannon and the fascines were advanced to the edge of the ditch which in many parts presented a smooth and level passage to the breach and his fourscore galleys almost touched with the prows and their scaling ladders the less defen sible walls of the harbour Under pain of death silence was enjoined but the physical laws of motion and sound are not obedient to discipline of a smaller size, with several galleys and sloops, and, instead of forcing this barrier, the Turk might apprehend a naval sally and a second encounter in the open sea. In this perplexity the genius of Mohammed conceived and executed a plan of a bold and marvellous cast, of transporting by land his lighter vessels and military stores from the Bosphorus into the higher part of the harbour The distance is about ten miles the ground is uneven and was overspread with thickets, and as the road must be opened behind the suburb of Galata their free passage or total destruction must depend on the option of the Genoese But these selfish merchants were ambitious of the favour of being the last devoured and the deficiency of art was supplied by the strength of obedient myriads A level way was covered with a broad platform of strong and solid planks and to render them more slippery and smooth they were anointed with the fat of sheep and oxen Fourscore light galleys and brigantines of fifty and thirty oars were disembarked on the Bosphorus shore arranged successively on rollers, and drawn forwards by the power of men and pulleys Two guides or pilots were stationed at the helm and the prow of each vessel the sails were unfurled to the winds and the labour was cheered by song and acclamation In the course of a single night this Turkish fleet painfully climbed the hill steered over the plain and was launched from the declivity into the shallow waters of the harbour, far above the molestation of the deeper vessels of the Greeks The real importance of this operation was magnified by the consternation and confidence which it inspired but the notorious unquestionable fact was displayed before the eyes, and is recorded by the pens, of the two nations [58] A similar stratagem had been repeatedly practised by the ancients [59] the Ottoman galleys (I must again repeat) should be considered as large boats and if we compare the magnitude and the distance, the obstacles and the means, the boasted miracle[60] has perhaps been equalled by the industry of our own times [61] As soon as Mohammed had occupied the upper harbour with a fleet and army he constructed in the narrowest part a bridge or rather mole of fifty cubits in breadth and one hundred in length it was formed of casks and hogsheads joined with rafters linked with iron and covered with a solid floor On this floating battery he planted one of his largest cannon, while the fourscore galleys with troops and scaling ladders approached the most accessible side, which had formerly been stormed by the Latin conquerors The indolence of the Christians has been accused for not destroying these unfinished works but their fire, by a superior fire was controlled and silenced, nor were they wanting in a nocturnal attempt to burn the vessels as well as the bridge of the sultan His vigilance prevented their approach their foremost galliots were sunk or taken forty youths, the bravest of Italy and Greece, were inhumanly massacred at his command nor could the emperor's grief be assuaged by the just though cruel retaliation of exposing from the walls the heads of two hundred and sixty Musulman captives After a siege of forty days the fate of Constantinople could no longer be averted The diminutive garrison was exhausted by a double attack the fortifications, which had stood for ages against hostile violence, were dismantled on all sides by the Ottoman cannon, many breaches were opened and near the gate of St. Romanus four towers had been levelled with the ground For the payment of his feeble and mutinous troops Constantine was compelled to despoil the churches with the promise of a fourfold restitution and his sacrilege offered a new reproach to the enemies of the union A spirit of discord impaired the remnant of the Christian strength the Genoese and Venetian auxiliaries asserted the pre-eminence of their respective service and Justiniani and the great duke whose ambition was not extinguished by the common danger accused each other of treachery and cowardice

During the siege of Constantinople the words of peace and capitulation had been sometimes pronounced and several embassies had passed between the camp and the city [62] The Greek emperor was humbled by adversity and would have yielded to any terms compatible with religion and royalty The Turkish sultan was desirous of sparing the blood of his soldiers still more desirous of securing for his own use the Byzantine treasures and he accomplished a sacred duty in presenting to the Gabours the choice of circumcision of tribute or of death The avarice of Mohammed might have been satisfied with an annual sum of one hundred thousand ducats, but his ambition grasped the capital of the East to the prince he offered a rich equivalent to the people a free toleration, or a safe departure but after some fruitless treaty he declared his resolution of finding either a throne or a grave under the walls of Constantinople A sense of honour and the fear of universal reproach forbade Palaeologus to resign the city into the hands of the Ottomans were instantly covered with a swarm of Turks and the Greeks, now driven from the vantage ground were overwhelmed by increasing multitudes. Amidst these multitudes, the emperor [59] who accomplished all the duties of a general and a soldier was long seen and finally lost. The nobles who fought round his person sustained till their last breath the honourable names of Palæologus and Cantacuzene his mournful exclamation was heard Cannot there be found a Christian to cut off my head? [60] and his last fear was that of falling alive into the hands of the infidels [61] The prudent despair of Constantine cast away the purple amidst the tumult he fell by an unknown hand and his body was buried under a mountain of the slain After his death resistance and order were no more the Greeks fled towards the city and many were pressed and stifled in the narrow pass of the gate of St. Romanus. The victorious Turks rushed through the breaches of the inner wall and as they advanced into the streets, they were soon joined by their brethren who had forced the gate Phenar on the side of the harbour [62] In the first heat of the pursuit about two thousand Christians were put to the sword but avarice soon prevailed over cruelty and the victors acknowledged that they should immediately have given quarter if the valour of the emperor and his chosen bands had not prepared them for a similar opposition in every part of the capital It was thus, after a siege of fifty three days that Constantinople which had defied the power of Chosroes, the Chagan and the caliphs was irretrievably subdued by the arms of Mohammed the Second. Her empire only had been subverted by the Latins her religion was trampled in the dust by the Moslem conquerors [63]

The tidings of misfortune fly with a rapid wing yet such was the extent of Constantinople that the more distant quarters might prolong some moments, the happy ignorance of their ruin.[64] But in the general consternation in the feelings of selfish or social anxiety in the tumult and thunder of the assault, a sleepless night and morning must have elapsed nor can I believe that many Grecian ladies were awakened by the Janizaries from a sound and tranquil slumber On the assurance of the public calamity the houses and convents were instantly deserted and the trembling inhabitants flocked together in the streets like a herd of timid animals, as if accumulated weakness could be productive of strength or in the vain hope that amid the crowd each individual might be safe and invisible. From every part of the capital they flowed into the church of St. Sophia in the space of an hour the sanctuary the choir the nave the upper and lower galleries were filled with the multitudes of fathers and husbands of women and children of priests, monks and religious virgins the doors were barred on the inside and they sought protection from the sacred dome which they had so lately abhorred as a profane and polluted edifice Their confidence was founded on the prophecy of an enthusiast or impostor that one day the Turks would enter Constantinople and pursue the Romans as far as the column of Constantine in the square before St. Sophia but that this would be the term of their calamities that an angel would descend from heaven with a sword in his hand and would deliver the empire with that celestial weapon to a poor man seated at the foot of the column Take this sword would he say and avenge the people of the Lord At these animating words the Turks would instantly fly and the victorious Romans would drive them from the West, and from all Anatolia as far as the frontiers of Persia. It is on this occasion that Ducas with some fancy and much truth upbraids the discord and obstinacy of the Greeks. Had that angel appeared exclaims the historian had he offered to exterminate your foes if you would consent to the union of the church even then in that fatal moment, you would have rejected your safety or have deceived your God. [65]

While they expected the descent of the tardy angel the doors were broken with axes and as the Turks encountered no resistance their bloodless hands were employed in selecting and securing the multitude of their prisoners Youth beauty and the appearance of wealth attracted their choice and the right of property was decided among themselves by a prior seizure by personal strength and by the authority of command In the space of an hour the male captives were bound with cords the females with their veils and girdles The senators were linked with their slaves the prelates with the porters of the church and young men of a plebeian class with noble maids whose faces had been invisible to the sun and their nearest kindred In this common captivity the ranks of society were confounded the ties of nature were cut asunder and the inexorable soldier was careless of the father s groans the tears of the mother and the lamentations of the children The loudest in their wailings were the nuns who were torn from the altar with naked bosoms, outstretched hands, and dishevelled hair and we should

or fear each individual might suppress his voice and measure his footsteps, but the march and labour of thousands must inevitably produce a strange confusion of dissonant clamours, which reached the ears of the watchmen of the towers At daybreak, without the customary signal of the morning gun, the Turks assaulted the city by sea and land, and the similitude of a twined or twisted thread has been applied to the closeness and continuity of their line of attack [57] The foremost ranks consisted of the refuse of the host a voluntary crowd who fought without order or command of the feebleness of age or childhood, of peasants and vagrants and of all who had joined the camp in the blind hope of plunder and martyrdom The common impulse drove them onwards to the wall, the most audacious to climb were instantly precipitated and not a dart not a bullet, of the Christians was idly wasted on the accumulated throng But their strength and ammunition were exhausted in this laborious defence the ditch was filled with the bodies of the slain they supported the footsteps of their companions and of this devoted vanguard the death was more serviceable than the life Under their respective bashaws and sanjaks the troops of Anatolia and Romania were successively led to the charge their progress was various and doubtful, but after a conflict of two hours the Greeks still maintained and improved their advantage and the voice of the emperor was heard encouraging his soldiers to achieve by a last effort the deliverance of their country In that fatal moment the Janizaries arose, fresh vigorous, and invincible The sultan himself on horseback with an iron mace in his hand, was the spectator and judge of their valour he was surrounded by ten thousand of his domestic troops whom he reserved for the decisive occasion and the tide of battle was directed and impelled by his voice and eye His numerous ministers of justice were posted behind the line to urge to restrain and to punish and if danger was in the front shame and inevitable death were in the rear of the fugitives The cries of fear and of pain were drowned in the martial music of drums trumpets and attaballs and experience has proved that the mechanical operation of sounds by quickening the circulation of the blood and spirits will act on the human machine more forcibly than the eloquence of reason and honour From the lines the galleys and the bridge the Ottoman artillery thundered on all sides and the camp and city the Greeks and the Turks, were involved in a cloud of smoke, which could only be dispelled by the final deliverance or destruction of the Roman empire The single combats of the heroes of history or fable amuse our fancy and engage our affections the skilful evolutions of war may inform the mind and improve a necessary, though pernicious, science But in the uniform and odious pictures of a general assault all is blood and horror and confusion nor shall I strive at the distance of three centuries and a thousand miles to delineate a scene of which there could be no spectators and of which the actors themselves were incapable of forming any just or adequate idea

The immediate loss of Constantinople may be ascribed to the bullet, or arrow, which pierced the gauntlet of John Justiniani The sight of his blood, and the exquisite pain appalled the courage of the chief whose arms and counsels were the firmest rampart of the city As he withdrew from his station in quest of a surgeon his flight was perceived and stopped by the indefatigable emperor 'Your wound' exclaimed Palæologus 'is slight the danger is pressing your presence is necessary, and whither will you retire?'— 'I will retire,' said the trembling Genoese 'by the same road which God has opened to the Turks' and at these words he hastily passed through one of the breaches of the inner wall By this pusillanimous act he stained the honours of a military life and the few days which he survived in Galata or the isle of Chios were embittered by his own and the public reproach [58] His example was imitated by the greatest part of the Latin auxiliaries and the defence began to slacken when the attack was pressed with redoubled vigour The number of the Ottomans was fifty, perhaps a hundred times superior to that of the Christians the double walls were reduced by the cannon to a heap of ruins in a circuit of several miles some places must be found more easy of access or more feebly guarded and if the besiegers could penetrate in a single point the whole city was irrecoverably lost. The first who deserved the sultan s reward was Hassan the Janizary of gigantic stature and strength With his scimitar in one hand and his buckler in the other he ascended the outward fortification of the thirty Janizaries who were emulous of his valour, eighteen perished in the bold adventure Hassan and his twelve companions had reached the summit the giant was precipitated from the rampart he rose on one knee and was again oppressed by a shower of darts and stones. But his success had proved that the achievement was possible the walls and towers were instantly covered with a swarm of Turks and the Greeks now driven from the vantage ground were overwhelmed by increasing multitudes. Amidst these multitudes the emperor[59] who accomplished all the duties of a general and a soldier was long seen and finally lost. The nobles, who fought round his person sustained till their last breath the honourable names of Palæologus and Cantacuzene his mournful exclamation was heard Cannot there be found a Christian to cut off my head[60] and his last fear was that of falling alive into the hands of the infidels.[61] The prudent despair of Constantine cast away the purple amidst the tumult he fell by an unknown hand and his body was buried under a mountain of the slain After his death resistance and order were no more the Greeks fled towards the city and many were pressed and stifled in the narrow pass of the gate of St. Romanus. The victorious Turks rushed through the breaches of the inner wall and as they advanced into the streets, they were soon joined by their brethren who had forced the gate Phenar on the side of the harbour[62] In the first heat of the pursuit about two thousand Christians were put to the sword but avarice soon prevailed over cruelty and the victors acknowledged that they should immediately have given quarter if the valour of the emperor and his chosen bands had not prepared them for a similar opposition in every part of the capital It was thus, after a siege of fifty three days that Constantinople which had defied the power of Chosroes, the Chagan and the caliphs was irretrievably subdued by the arms of Mohammed the Second Her empire only had been subverted by the Latins her religion was trampled in the dust by the Moslem conquerors[63]

The tidings of misfortune fly with a rapid wing yet such was the extent of Constantinople that the more distant quarters might prolong some moments, the happy ignorance of their ruin.[64] But in the general consternation in the feelings of selfish or social anxiety in the tumult and thunder of the assault, a sleepless night and morning must have elapsed nor can I believe that many Grecian ladies were awakened by the Janizaries from a sound and tranquil slumber On the assurance of the public calamity the houses and convents were instantly deserted and the trembling inhabitants flocked together in the street like a herd of timid animals as if accumulated weakness could be productive of strength or in the vain hope that amid the crowd each individual might be safe and invisible From every part of the capital they flowed into the church of St. Sophia in the space of an hour the sanctuary the choir the nave the upper and lower galleries were filled with the multitudes of fathers and husbands of women and children of priests monks and religious virgins the doors were barred on the inside and they sought protection from the sacred dome which they had so lately abhorred as a profane and polluted edifice Their confidence was founded on the prophecy of an enthusiast or impostor that one day the Turks would enter Constantinople and pursue the Romans as far as the column of Constantine in the square before St. Sophia but that this would be the term of their calamities that an angel would descend from heaven with a sword in his hand and would deliver the empire with that celestial weapon to a poor man seated at the foot of the column. Take this sword would he say and avenge the people of the Lord At these animating words the Turks would instantly fly, and the victorious Romans would drive them from the West, and from all Anatolia as far as the frontiers of Persia It is on this occasion that Ducas with some fancy and much truth upbraids the discord and obstinacy of the Greeks. Had that angel appeared exclaims the historian had he offered to exterminate your foes if you would consent to the union of the church even then in that fatal moment, you would have rejected your safety or have deceived your God[65]

While they expected the descent of the tardy angel the doors were broken with axes and as the Turks encountered no resistance their bloodless hands were employed in selecting and securing the multitude of their prisoners Youth beauty and the appearance of wealth attracted their choice and the right of property was decided among themselves by a prior seizure by personal strength and by the authority of command In the space of an hour the male captives were bound with cords the females with their veils and girdles The senators were linked with their slaves the prelates with the porters of the church and young men of a plebeian class with noble maids whose faces had been invisible to the sun and their nearest kindred In this common captivity the ranks of society were confounded the ties of nature were cut asunder and the inexorable soldier was careless of the father s groans the tears of the mother and the lamentations of the children The loudest in their wailings were the nuns who were torn from the altar with naked bosoms, outstretched hands, and dishevelled hair and we should

piously believe that few could be tempted to prefer the vigils of the harem to those of the monastery Of these unfortunate Greeks, of these domestic animals, whole strings were rudely driven through the streets and as the conquerors were eager to return for more prey, their trembling pace was quickened with menaces and blows At the same hour a similar rapine was exercised in all the churches and monasteries in all the palaces and habitations, of the capital nor could any place however sacred or sequestered protect the persons or the property of the Greeks Above sixty thousand of this devoted people were transported from the city to the camp and fleet, exchanged or sold according to the caprice or interest of their masters and dispersed in remote servitude through the provinces of the Ottoman empire Among these we may notice some remarkable characters The historian Phranza first chamberlain and principal secretary was involved with his family in the common lot After suffering four months the hardships of slavery he recovered his freedom in the ensuing winter he ventured to Adrianople, and ransomed his wife from the mir bashi, or master of the horse but his two children in the flower of youth and beauty, had been seized for the use of Mohammed himself The daughter of Phranza died in the seraglio perhaps a virgin his son in the fifteenth year of his age, preferred death to infamy and was stabbed by the hand of the royal lover [66] A deed thus inhuman cannot surely be expiated by the taste and liberality with which he released a Grecian matron and her two daughters on receiving a Latin ode from Philelphus who had chosen a wife in that noble family [67] The pride or cruelty of Mohammed would have been most sensibly gratified by the capture of a Roman legate but the dexterity of Cardinal Isidore eluded the search and he escaped from Galata in a plebeian habit [68] The chain and entrance of the outward harbour was still occupied by the Italian ships of merchandise and war They had signalised their valour in the siege they embraced the moment of retreat while the Turkish mariners were dissipated in the pillage of the city When they hoisted sail the beach was covered with a suppliant and lamentable crowd but the means of transportation were scanty the Venetians and Genoese selected their countrymen and notwithstanding the fairest promises of the sultan the inhabitants of Galata evacuated their houses and embarked with their most precious effects.

In the fall and the sack of great cities an historian is condemned to repeat the tale of uniform calamity the same effects must be produced by the same passions, and when those passions may be indulged without control, small, alas! is the difference between civilised and savage man Amidst the vague exclamations of bigotry and hatred, the Turks are not accused of a wanton or immoderate effusion of Christian blood but according to their maxims (the maxims of antiquity), the lives of the vanquished were forfeited, and the legitimate reward of the conqueror was derived from the service the sale or the ransom of his captives of both sexes [69] The wealth of Constantinople had been granted by the sultan to his victorious troops and the rapine of an hour is more productive than the industry of years But as no regular division was attempted of the spoil, the respective shares were not determined by merit, and the rewards of valour were stolen away by the followers of the camp who had declined the toil and danger of the battle The narrative of their depredations could not afford either amusement or instruction the total amount in the last poverty of the empire, has been valued at four millions of ducats [70] and of this sum a small part was the property of the Venetians, the Genoese, the Florentines and the merchants of Ancona Of these foreigners the stock was improved in quick and perpetual circulation but the riches of the Greeks were displayed in the idle ostentation of palaces and wardrobes, or deeply buried in treasures of ingots and old coin, lest it should be demanded at their hands for the defence of their country The profanation and plunder of the monasteries and churches excited the most tragic complaints The dome of St Sophia itself the earthly heaven the second firmament the vehicle of the cherubim the throne of the glory of God [71] was despoiled of the oblations of ages and the gold and silver the pearls and jewels the vases and sacerdotal ornaments were most wickedly converted to the service of mankind After the divine images had been stripped of all that could be valuable to a profane eye the canvas or the wood was torn or broken or burnt, or trod under foot or applied in the stables or the kitchen to the vilest uses The example of sacrilege was imitated however from the Latin conquerors of Constantinople and the treatment which Christ the Virgin and the saints had sustained from the guilty Catholic might be inflicted by the zealous Musulman on the monuments of idolatry Perhaps instead of joining the public clamour a philosopher will observe that in the decline of the arts the workmanship could not be more valuable than the work, and that a fresh supply of visions and miracles would speedily be renewed by the craft of the priest and the credulity of the people. He will more seriously deplore the loss of the Byzantine libraries, which were destroyed or scattered in the general confusion one hundred and twenty thousand manuscripts are said to have disappeared[72] ten volumes might be purchased for a single ducat, and the same ignominious price, too high perhaps for a shelf of theology, included the whole works of Aristotle and Homer the noblest productions of the science and literature of ancient Greece We may reflect with pleasure that an inestimable portion of our classic treasures was safely deposited in Italy and that the mechanics of a German town had invented an art which derides the havoc of time and barbarism

From the first hour[73] of the memorable twenty ninth of May disorder and rapine prevailed in Constantinople till the eighth hour of the same day when the sultan himself passed in triumph through the gate of St. Romanus He was attended by his vizirs bashaws, and guards each of whom (says a Byzantine historian) was robust as Hercules, dexterous as Apollo and equal in battle to any ten of the race of ordinary mortals The conqueror[74] gazed with satisfaction and wonder on the strange though splendid appearance of the domes and palaces so dissimilar from the style of Oriental architecture In the hippodrome, or atmeidan, his eye was attracted by the twisted column of the three serpents and as a trial of his strength he shattered with his iron mace or battle axe the under jaw of one of these monsters,[75] which in the eyes of the Turks were the idols or talismans of the city At the principal door of St. Sophia he alighted from his horse and entered the dome and such was his jealous regard for that monument of his glory that, on observing a zealous Musulman in the act of breaking the marble pavement, he admonished him with his scimitar that, if the spoil and captives were granted to the soldiers, the public and private buildings had been reserved for the prince. By his command the metropolis of the Eastern church was transformed into a mosque the rich and portable instruments of superstition had been removed the crosses were thrown down and the walls, which were covered with images and mosaics, were washed and purified and restored to a state of naked simplicity On the same day or on the ensuing Friday the muezin or crier ascended the most lofty turret, and proclaimed the ezan or public invitation in the name of God and his prophet the imam preached and Mohammed the Second performed the namaz of prayer and thanksgiving on the great altar where the Christian mysteries had so lately been celebrated before the last of the Cæsars.[76] From St. Sophia he proceeded to the august but desolate mansion of a hundred successors of the great Constantine but which in a few hours had been stripped of the pomp of royalty A melancholy reflection on the vicissitudes of human greatness forced itself on his mind and he repeated an elegant distich of Persian poetry The spider has wove his web in the Imperial palace and the owl hath sung her watch song on the towers of Afrasiab[77]

Yet his mind was not satisfied nor did the victory seem complete till he was informed of the fate of Constantine—whether he had escaped or been made prisoner or had fallen in the battle Two Janizaries claimed the honour and reward of his death the body under a heap of slain was discovered by the golden eagles embroidered on his shoes the Greeks acknowledged with tears the head of their late emperor and, after exposing the bloody trophy[78] Mohammed bestowed on his rival the honours of a decent funeral After his decease Lucas Notaras great duke[79] and first minister of the empire was the most important prisoner When he offered his person and his treasures at the foot of the throne, And why said the indignant sultan did you not employ these treasures in the defence of your prince and country? — They were yours, answered the slave God had reserved them for your hands. — If he reserved them for me replied the despot, how have you presumed to withhold them so long by a fruitless and fatal resistance? The great duke alleged the obstinacy of the strangers and some secret encouragement from the Turkish vizir and from this perilous interview he was at length dismissed with the assurance of pardon and protection Mohammed condescended to visit his wife, a venerable princess oppressed with sickness and grief and his consolation for her misfortunes was in the most tender strain of humanity and filial reverence. A similar clemency was extended to the principal officers of state of whom several were ransomed at his expense and during some days he declared himself the friend and father of the vanquished people But the scene was soon changed and before his departure the hippodrome streamed with the blood of his noblest captives His perfidious cruelty is execrated by the Christians they adorn with the colours of heroic martyrdom the execution of the great duke and his two sons and his death is ascribed to the generous refusal of delivering his children to the tyrant's lust Yet a Byzantine historian has dropped an unguarded word of conspiracy deliverance, and Italian succour such treason may be glorious, but the rebel who bravely ventures has justly forfeited his life nor should we blame a conqueror for destroying the enemies whom he can no longer trust On the eighteenth of June the victorious sultan returned to Adrianople and smiled at the base and hollow embassies of the Christian princes who viewed their approaching ruin in the fall of the Eastern empire

Constantinople had been left naked and desolate, without a prince or a people But she could not be despoiled of the incomparable situation which marks her for the metropolis of a great empire and the genius of the place will ever triumph over the accidents of time and fortune Boursa and Adrianople the ancient seats of the Ottomans sunk into provincial towns and Mohammed the Second established his own residence and that of his successors on the same commanding spot which had been chosen by Constantine [80] The fortifications of Galata which might afford a shelter to the Latins, were prudently destroyed but the damage of the Turkish cannon was soon repaired and before the month of August great quantities of lime had been burnt for the restoration of the walls of the capital As the entire property of the soil and buildings, whether public or private or profane or sacred was now transferred to the conqueror he first separated a space of eight furlongs from the point of the triangle for the establishment of his seraglio or palace It is here in the bosom of luxury that the Grand Signor (as he has been emphatically named by the Italians) appears to reign over Europe and Asia but his person on the shores of the Bosphorus may not always be secure from the insults of a hostile navy In the new character of a mosque the cathedral of St Sophia was endowed with an ample revenue crowned with lofty minarets and surrounded with groves and fountains for the devotion and refreshment of the Moslems The same model was imitated in the jami or royal mosques and the first of these was built by Mohammed himself, on the ruins of the church of the holy apostles and the tombs of the Greek emperors. On the third day after the conquest the grave of Abou Ayub or Job who had fallen in the first siege of the Arabs, was revealed in a vision, and it is before the sepulchre of the martyr that the new sultans are girded with the sword of empire.[81] Constantinople no longer appertains to the Roman historian, nor shall I enumerate the civil and religious edifices that were profaned or erected by its Turkish masters the population was speedily renewed, and before the end of September five thousand families of Anatolia and Romania had obeyed the royal mandate which enjoined them under pain of death to occupy their new habitations in the capital The throne of Mohammed was guarded by the numbers and fidelity of his Moslem subjects but his rational policy aspired to collect the remnant of the Greeks and they returned in crowds as soon as they were assured of their lives, their liberties, and the free exercise of their religion In the election and investiture of a patriarch the ceremonial of the Byzantine court was revived and imitated With a mixture of satisfaction and horror they beheld the sultan on his throne, who delivered into the hands of Gennadius the crosier or pastoral staff the symbol of his ecclesiastical office who conducted the patriarch to the gate of the seraglio, presented him with a horse richly caparisoned, and directed the vizirs and bashaws to lead him to the palace which had been allotted for his residence [82] The churches of Constantinople were shared between the two religions their limits were marked and till it was infringed by Selim the grandson of Mohammed the Greeks[83] enjoyed above sixty years the benefit of this equal partition Encouraged by the ministers of the divan who wished to elude the fanaticism of the sultan the Christian advocates presumed to allege that this division had been an act not of generosity but of justice not a concession but a compact and that if one half of the city had been taken by storm the other moiety had surrendered on the faith of a sacred capitulation The original grant had indeed been consumed by fire but the loss was supplied by the testimony of three aged Janizaries who remembered the transaction and their venal oaths are of more weight in the opinion of Cantemir than the positive and unanimous consent of the history of the times [84]

The remaining fragments of the Greek kingdom in Europe and Asia I shall abandon to the Turkish arms but the final extinction of the two last dynasties[85] which have reigned in Constantinople should terminate the decline and fall of the Roman empire in the East The despots of the Morea Demetrius and Thomas,[86] the two surviving brothers of the name of PALEOLOGUS, were astonished by the death of the emperor Constantine and the ruin of the monarchy Hopeless of defence they prepared, with the noble Greeks who adhered to their fortune to seek a refuge in Italy beyond the reach of the Ottoman thunder Their first apprehensions were dispelled by the victorious sultan who contented himself with a tribute of twelve thousand ducats and while his ambition explored the continent and the islands in search of prey, he indulged the Morea in a respite of seven years. But this respite was a period of grief discord and misery The hexamilion, the rampart of the isthmus, so often raised and so often subverted could not long be defended by three hundred Italian archers the keys of Corinth were seized by the Turks they returned from their summer excursions with a train of captives and spoil, and the complaints of the injured Greeks were heard with indifference and disdain. The Albanians, a vagrant tribe of shepherds and robbers, filled the peninsula with rapine and murder the two despots implored the dangerous and humiliating aid of a neighbouring bashaw and when he had quelled the revolt, his lessons inculcated the rule of their future conduct. Neither the ties of blood nor the oaths which they repeatedly pledged in the communion and before the altar nor the stronger pressure of necessity could reconcile or suspend their domestic quarrels. They ravaged each other's patrimony with fire and sword the alms and succours of the West were consumed in civil hostility and their power was only exerted in savage and arbitrary executions The distress and revenge of the weaker rival invoked their supreme lord and in the season of maturity and revenge Mohammed declared himself the friend of Demetrius and marched into the Morea with an irresistible force When he had taken possession of Sparta You are too weak, said the sultan to control this turbulent province I will take your daughter to my bed, and you shall pass the remainder of your life in security and honour Demetrius sighed and obeyed surrendered his daughter and his castles, followed to Adrianople his sovereign and son and received for his own maintenance and that of his followers a city in Thrace and the adjacent isles of Imbros, Lemnos, and Samothrace He was joined the next year by a companion of misfortune the last of the COMNENIAN race who after the taking of Constantinople by the Latins, had founded a new empire on the coast of the Black Sea[87] In the progress of his Anatolian conquests, Mohammed invested with a fleet and army the capital of David who presumed to style himself emperor of Trebizond[88] and the negotiation was comprised in a short and peremptory question Will you secure your life and treasures by resigning your kingdom? or had you rather forfeit your kingdom your treasures, and your life? ' The feeble Comnenus was subdued by his own fears, and the example of a Musulman neighbour the prince of Sinope[89] who on a similar summons, had yielded a fortified city with four hundred cannon and ten or twelve thousand soldiers. The capitulation of Trebizond was faithfully performed and the emperor with his family was transported to a castle in Romania but on a slight suspicion of corresponding with the Persian king David and the whole Comnenian race were sacrificed to the jealousy or avarice of the conqueror Nor could the name of father long protect the unfortunate Demetrius from exile and confiscation his abject submission moved the pity and contempt of the sultan his followers were transplanted to Constantinople and his poverty was alleviated by a pension of fifty thousand aspers, till a monastic habit and a tardy death released Palæologus from an earthly master It is not easy to pronounce whether the servitude of Demetrius or the exile of his brother Thomas,[90] be the most inglorious. On the conquest of the Morea the despot escaped to Corfu and from thence to Italy with some naked adherents his name his sufferings and the head of the apostle St. Andrew entitled him to the hospitality of the Vatican and his misery was prolonged by a pension of six thousand ducats from the pope and cardinals. His two sons, Andrew and Manuel were educated in Italy but the eldest, contemptible to his enemies and burdensome to his friends, was degraded by the baseness of his life and marriage A title was his sole inheritance and that inheritance he successively sold to the kings of France and Arragon.[91] During his transient prosperity Charles the Eighth was ambitious of joining the empire of the East with the kingdom of Naples in a public festival he assumed the appellation and the purple of Augustus the Greeks rejoiced and the Ottoman already trembled at the approach of the French chivalry[92] Manuel Palæologus the second son was tempted to revisit his native country his return might be grateful and could not be dangerous, to the Porte he was maintained at Constantinople in safety and ease and an honourable train of Christians and Moslems attended him to the grave. If there be some animals of so generous a nature that they refuse to propagate in a domestic state the last of the Imperial race must be ascribed to an inferior kind, he accepted from the sultan's liberality two beautiful females and his surviving son was lost in the habit and religion of a Turkish slave

The importance of Constantinople was felt and magnified in its loss the pontificate of Nicholas the Fifth, however peaceful and prosperous was dishonoured by the fall of the Eastern empire and the grief and terror of the Latins revived, or seemed to revive the old enthusiasm of the crusades In one of the most distant countries of the West Philip duke of Burgundy entertained at Lisle in Flanders an assembly of his nobles, and the pompous pageants of the feast were skilfully adapted to their fancy and feelings [93] In the midst of the banquet a gigantic Saracen entered the hall leading a fictitious elephant with a castle on his back a matron in a mourning robe, the symbol of religion, was seen to issue from the castle she deplored her oppression, and accused the slowness of her champions the principal herald of the golden fleece advanced bearing on his fist a live pheasant which according to the rites of chivalry he presented to the duke At this extraordinary summons Philip a wise and aged prince, engaged his person and powers in the holy war against the Turks his example was imitated by the barons and knights of the assembly they swore to God the Virgin the ladies and the pheasant and their particular vows were not less extravagant than the general sanction of their oath But the performance was made to depend on some future and foreign contingency and during twelve years, till the last hour of his life, the duke of Burgundy might be scrupulously and perhaps sincerely on the eve of his departure. Had every breast glowed with the same ardour had the union of the Christians corresponded with their bravery, had every country from Sweden[94] to Naples supplied a just proportion of cavalry and infantry of men and money it is indeed probable that Constantinople would have been delivered and that the Turks might have been chased beyond the Hellespont or the Euphrates. But the secretary of the emperor who composed every epistle and attended every meeting Æneas Sylvius,[95] a statesman and orator describes from his own experience the repugnant state and spirit of Christendom. "It is a body," says he, without a head a republic without laws or magistrates. The pope and the emperor may shine as lofty titles, as splendid images, but they are unable to command and none are willing to obey every state has a separate prince, and every prince has a separate interest What eloquence could unite so many discordant and hostile powers under the same standard? Could they be assembled in arms who would dare to assume the office of general? What order could be maintained?—what military discipline? Who would undertake to feed such an enormous multitude? Who would understand their various languages, or direct their stranger and incompatible manners? What mortal could reconcile the English with the French, Genoa with Arragon the Germans with the natives of Hungary and Bohemia? If a small number enlisted in the holy war they must be overthrown by the infidels if many by their own weight and confusion " Yet the same Æneas when he was raised to the papal throne, under the name of Pius the Second devoted his life to the prosecution of the Turkish war In the council of Mantua he excited some sparks of a false or feeble enthusiasm but when the pontiff appeared at Ancona to embark in person with the troops engagements vanished in excuses a precise day was adjourned to an indefinite term and his effective army consisted of some German pilgrims, whom he was obliged to disband with indulgences and alms Regardless of futurity his successors and the powers of Italy were involved in the schemes of present and domestic ambition and the distance or proximity of each object determined in their eyes its apparent magnitude A more enlarged view of their interest would have taught them to maintain a defensive and naval war against the common enemy and the support of Scanderbeg and his brave Albanians might have prevented the subsequent invasion of the kingdom of Naples. The siege and sack of Otranto by the Turks diffused a general consternation and Pope Sixtus was preparing to fly beyond the Alps, when the storm was instantly dispelled by the death of Mohammed the Second in the fifty first year of his age [96] His lofty genius aspired to the conquest of Italy he was possessed of a strong city and a capacious harbour and the same reign might have been decorated with the trophies of the NEW and the ANCIENT ROME.[97]

CHAPTER LXIX

State of Rome from the Twelfth Century Temporal Dominion of the Popes Seditions of the City Political Heresy of Arnold of Brescia Restoration of the Republic The Senators Pride of the Romans Their Wars They are deprived of the Election and Presence of the Popes, who retire to Avignon The Jubilee Noble Families of Rome Feud of the Colonna and Ursini

In the first ages of the decline and fall of the Roman empire our eye is invariably fixed on the royal city which had given laws to the fairest portion of the globe We contemplate her fortunes, at first with admiration at length with pity always with attention and when that attention is diverted from the Capitol to the provinces, they are considered as so many branches which have been successively severed from the Imperial trunk. The foundation of a second Rome on the shores of the Bosphorus, has compelled the historian to follow the successors of Constantine and our curiosity has been tempted to visit the most remote countries of Europe and Asia to explore the causes and the authors of the long decay of the Byzantine monarchy By the conquests of Justinian we have been recalled to the banks of the Tiber to the deliverance of the ancient metropolis but that deliverance was a change, or perhaps an aggravation of servitude. Rome had been already stripped of her trophies, her gods and her Cæsars nor was the Gothic dominion more inglorious and oppressive than the tyranny of the Greeks. In the eighth century of the Christian era a religious quarrel, the worship of images, provoked the Romans to assert their independence their bishop became the temporal as well as the spiritual father of a free people and of the Western empire which was restored by Charlemagne the title and image still decorate the singular constitution of modern Germany The name of Rome must yet command our involuntary respect the climate (whatsoever may be its influence) was no longer the same [1] the purity of blood had been contaminated through a thousand channels but the venerable aspect of her ruins and the memory of past greatness, rekindled a spark of the national character The darkness of the middle ages exhibits some scenes not unworthy of our notice Nor shall I dismiss the present work till I have reviewed the state and revolutions of the ROMAN CITY which acquiesced under the absolute dominion of the popes about the same time that Constantinople was enslaved by the Turkish arms

In the beginning of the twelfth century [2] the era of the first crusade Rome was revered by the Latins as the metropolis of the world, as the throne of the pope and the emperor who from the eternal city derived their title their honours and the right or exercise of temporal dominion. After so long an interruption it may not be useless to repeat that the successors of Charlemagne and the Othos were chosen beyond the Rhine in a national diet, but that these princes were content with the humble names of kings of Germany and Italy till they had passed the Alps and the Apennine, to seek their Imperial crown on the banks of the Tiber [3] At some distance from the city their approach was saluted by a long procession of the clergy and people with palms and crosses and the terrific emblems of wolves and lions, of dragons and eagles, that floated in the military banners, represented the departed legions and cohorts of the republic. The royal oath to maintain the liberties of Rome was thrice reiterated at the bridge, the gate, and on the stairs of the Vatican and the distribution of a customary donative feebly imitated the magnificence of the first Cæsars. In the church of St. Peter the coronation was performed by his successor the voice of God was confounded with that of the people and the public consent was declared in the acclamations of Long life and victory to our lord the pope! long life and victory to our lord the emperor long life and victory to the Roman and Teutonic armies! [4] The names of Cæsar and Augustus the laws of Constantine and Justinian the example of Charlemagne and Otho, established the supreme dominion of the emperors their title and image was engraved on the papal coins [5] and their jurisdiction was marked by the sword of justice which they delivered to the præfect of the city But every Roman prejudice was awakened by the name, the language and the manners of a barbarian lord. The Cæsars of Saxony or Franconia were the chiefs of a feudal aristocracy, nor could they exercise the discipline of civil and military power, which alone secures the obedience of a distant people, impatient of servitude, though perhaps incapable of freedom. Once, and once only, in his life each emperor, with an army of Teutonic vassals, descended from the Alps I have described the peaceful order of his entry and coronation but that order was commonly disturbed by the clamour and sedition of the Romans who encountered their sovereign as a foreign invader his departure was always speedy, and often shameful, and, in the absence of a long reign, his authority was insulted and his name was forgotten The progress of independence in Germany and Italy undermined the foundations of the Imperial sovereignty and the triumph of the popes was the deliverance of Rome

Of her two sovereigns the emperor had precariously reigned by the right of conquest but the authority of the pope was founded on the soft though more solid basis of opinion and habit The removal of a foreign influence restored and endeared the shepherd to his flock. Instead of the arbitrary or venal nomination of a German court the vicar of Christ was freely chosen by the college of cardinals most of whom were either natives or inhabitants of the city The applause of the magistrates and people confirmed his election, and the ecclesiastical power that was obeyed in Sweden and Britain had been ultimately derived from the suffrage of the Romans The same suffrage gave a prince, as well as a pontiff to the capital It was universally believed that Constantine had invested the popes with the temporal dominion of Rome, and the boldest civilians the most profane sceptics were satisfied with disputing the right of the emperor and the validity of his gift. The truth of the fact the authenticity of his donation was deeply rooted in the ignorance and tradition of four centuries and the fabulous origin was lost in the real and permanent effects. The name of Dominus or Lord was inscribed on the coin of the bishops their title was acknowledged by acclamations and oaths of allegiance, and with the free or reluctant consent of the German Cæsars they had long exercised a supreme or subordinate jurisdiction over the city and patrimony of St. Peter The reign of the popes, which gratified the prejudices, was not incompatible with the liberties of Rome and a more critical inquiry would have revealed a still nobler source of their power—the gratitude of a nation whom they had rescued from the heresy and oppression of the Greek tyrant. In an age of superstition it should seem that the union of the royal and sacerdotal characters would mutually fortify each other, and that the keys of Paradise would be the surest pledge of earthly obedience The sanctity of the office might indeed be degraded by the personal vices of the man But the scandals of the tenth century were obliterated by the austere and more dangerous virtues of Gregory the Seventh and his successors and in the ambitious contests which they maintained for the rights of the church their sufferings or their success must equally tend to increase the popular veneration. They sometimes wandered in poverty and exile the victims of persecution and the apostolic zeal with which they offered themselves to martyrdom must engage the favour and sympathy of every Catholic breast And sometimes thundering from the Vatican, they created, judged and deposed the kings of the world, nor could the proudest Roman be disgraced by submitting to a priest whose feet were kissed and whose stirrup was held by the successors of Charlemagne [6] Even the temporal interest of the city should have protected in peace and honour the residence of the popes from whence a vain and lazy people derived the greatest part of their subsistence and riches The fixed revenue of the popes was probably impaired many of the old patrimonial estates both in Italy and the provinces had been invaded by sacrilegious hands nor could the loss be compensated by the claim, rather than the possession, of the more ample gifts of Pepin and his descendants. But the Vatican and Capitol were nourished by the incessant and increasing swarms of pilgrims and suppliants the pale of Christianity was enlarged and the pope and cardinals were overwhelmed by the judgment of ecclesiastical and secular causes A new jurisprudence had established in the Latin church the right and practice of appeals [7] and from the North and West the bishops and abbots were invited or summoned to solicit, to complain to accuse or to justify before the threshold of the apostles A rare prodigy is once recorded that two horses belonging to the archbishops of Mentz and Cologne repassed the Alps, yet laden with gold and silver [8] but it was soon understood that the success, both of the pilgrims and clients depended much less on the justice of their cause than on the value of their offering The wealth and piety of these strangers were ostentatiously displayed and their expenses sacred or profane circulated in various channels for the emolument of the Romans

Such powerful motives should have firmly attached the voluntary and pious obedience of the Roman people to their spiritual and temporal father But the operation of prejudice and interest is often disturbed by the sallies of ungovernable passion. The Indian who fells the tree that he may gather the fruit,[9] and the Arab who plunders the caravans of commerce, are actuated by the same impulse of savage nature, which overlooks the future in the present, and relinquishes for momentary rapine the long and secure possession of the most important blessings. And it was thus that the shrine of St. Peter was profaned by the thoughtless Romans, who pillaged the offerings and wounded the pilgrims, without computing the number and value of similar visits, which they prevented by their inhospitable sacrilege Even the influence of superstition is fluctuating and precarious and the slave whose reason is subdued will often be delivered by his avarice or pride. A credulous devotion for the fables and oracles of the priesthood most powerfully acts on the mind of a barbarian yet such a mind is the least capable of preferring imagination to sense of sacrificing to a distant motive to an invisible perhaps an ideal object, the appetites and interests of the present world In the vigour of health and youth his practice will perpetually contradict his belief till the pressure of age or sickness, or calamity awakens his terrors, and compels him to satisfy the double debt of piety and remorse I have already observed that the modern times of religious indifference are the most favourable to the peace and security of the clergy Under the reign of superstition they had much to hope from the ignorance and much to fear from the violence of mankind The wealth, whose constant increase must have rendered them the sole proprietors of the earth was alternately bestowed by the repentant father and plundered by the rapacious son their persons were adored or violated and the same idol by the hands of the same votaries was placed on the altar or trampled in the dust. In the feudal system of Europe arms were the title of distinction and the measure of allegiance and amidst their tumult the still voice of law and reason was seldom heard or obeyed The turbulent Romans disdained the yoke and insulted the impotence of their bishop [10] nor would his education or character allow him to exercise, with decency or effect, the power of the sword The motives of his election and the frailties of his life were exposed to their familiar observation and proximity must diminish the reverence which his name and his decrees impressed on a barbarous world This difference has not escaped the notice of our philosophic historian Though the name and authority of the court of Rome were so terrible in the remote countries of Europe, which were sunk in profound ignorance and were entirely unacquainted with its character and conduct the pope was so little revered at home that his inveterate enemies surrounded the gates of Rome itself and even controlled his government in that city and the ambassadors, who from a distant extremity of Europe carried to him the humble, or rather abject, submissions of the greatest potentate of the age, found the utmost difficulty to make their way to him and to throw themselves at his feet. [11]

Since the primitive times the wealth of the popes was exposed to envy their power to opposition and their persons to violence But the long hostility of the mitre and the crown increased the numbers and inflamed the passions of their enemies. The deadly factions of the Guelphs and Ghibelines, so fatal to Italy could never be embraced with truth or constancy by the Romans, the subjects and adversaries both of the bishop and emperor but their support was solicited by both parties, and they alternately displayed in their banners the keys of St. Peter and the German eagle. Gregory the Seventh who may be adored or detested as the founder of the papal monarchy was driven from Rome and died in exile at Salerno Six and thirty of his successors [12] till their retreat to Avignon maintained an unequal contest with the Romans their age and dignity were often violated and the churches in the solemn rites of religion were polluted with sedition and murder A repetition[13] of such capricious brutality without connection or design would be tedious and disgusting and I shall content myself with some events of the twelfth century which represent the state of the popes and the city On Holy Thursday while Paschal officiated before the altar he was interrupted by the clamours of the multitude who imperiously demanded the confirmation of a favourite magistrate His silence exasperated their fury his pious refusal to mingle the affairs of earth and heaven was encountered with menaces and oaths that he should be the cause and the witness of the public ruin. During the festival of Easter while the bishop and the clergy, barefoot and in procession visited the tombs of the martyrs, they were twice assaulted at the bridge of St. Angelo and before the Capitol with volleys of stones and darts The houses of his adherents were levelled with the ground Paschal escaped with difficulty and danger he levied an army in the patrimony of St Peter, and his last days were embittered by suffering and inflicting the calamities of civil war The scenes that followed the election of his successor Gelasius the Second were still more scandalous to the church and city Cencio Frangipani[14] a potent and factious baron burst into the assembly furious and in arms the cardinals were stripped, beaten and trampled under foot and he seized, without pity or respect the vicar of Christ by the throat Gelasius was dragged by his hair along the ground buffeted with blows wounded with spurs and bound with an iron chain in the house of his brutal tyrant An insurrection of the people delivered their bishop the rival families opposed the violence of the Frangipani and Cencio who sued for pardon repented of the failure rather than of the guilt, of his enterprise Not many days had elapsed when the pope was again assaulted at the altar While his friends and enemies were engaged in a bloody contest, he escaped in his sacerdotal garments In this unworthy flight, which excited the compassion of the Roman matrons his attendants were scattered or unhorsed and, in the fields behind the church of St. Peter his successor was found alone and half dead with fear and fatigue Shaking the dust from his feet, the apostle withdrew from a city in which his dignity was insulted and his person was endangered and the vanity of sacerdotal ambition is revealed in the involuntary confession that one emperor was more tolerable than twenty[15] These examples might suffice but I cannot forget the sufferings of two pontiffs of the same age the second and third of the name of Lucius The former as he ascended in battle array to assault the Capitol was struck on the temple by a stone and expired in a few days the latter was severely wounded in the persons of his servants In a civil commotion several of his priests had been made prisoners and the inhuman Romans reserving one as a guide for his brethren, put out their eyes crowned them with ludicrous mitres mounted them on asses with their faces to the tail and extorted on oath that, in this wretched condition they should offer themselves as a lesson to the head of the church Hope or fear lassitude or remorse the characters of the men and the circumstances of the times, might sometimes obtain an interval of peace and obedience, and the pope was restored with joyful acclamations to the Lateran or Vatican from whence he had been driven with threats and violence But the root of mischief was deep and perennial and a momentary calm was preceded and followed by such tempests as had almost sunk the bark of St. Peter Rome continually presented the aspect of war and discord the churches and palaces were fortified and assaulted by the factions and families and, after giving peace to Europe, Calistus the Second alone had resolution and power to prohibit the use of private arms in the metropolis Among the nations who revered the apostolic throne the tumults of Rome provoked a general indignation, and in a letter to his disciple Eugenius the Third St. Bernard with the sharpness of his wit and zeal has stigmatised the vices of the rebellious people[16] 'Who is ignorant ' says the monk of Clairvaux, 'of the vanity and arrogance of the Romans? a nation nursed in sedition cruel untractable and scorning to obey, unless they are too feebl to resist When they promise to serve, they aspire to reign if they swear allegiance they watch the opportunity of revolt yet they vent their discontent in loud clamours if your doors or your counsels are shut against them. Dexterous in mischief they have never learnt the science of doing good Odious to earth and heaven, impious to God seditious among themselves jealous of their neighbours inhuman to strangers they love no one by no one are they beloved and while they wish to inspire fear they live in base and continual apprehension They will not submit they know not how to govern faithless to their superiors, intolerable to their equals ungrateful to their benefactors and alike impudent in their demands and their refusals Lofty in promise poor in execution adulation and calumny perfidy and treason are the familiar arts of their policy Surely this dark portrait is not coloured by the pencil of Christian charity[17] yet the features however harsh and ugly express a lively resemblance of the Romans of the twelfth century[18]

The Jews had rejected the Christ when he appeared among them in a plebeian character and the Romans might plead their ignorance of his vicar when he assumed the pomp and pride of a temporal sovereign In the busy age of the crusades some sparks of curiosity and reason were rekindled in the Western world the heresy of Bulgaria the Paulician sect was successfully transplanted into the soil of Italy and France the Gnostic visions were mingled with the simplicity of the Gospel and the enemies of the clergy reconciled their passions with their con science the desire of freedom with the profession of piety [19] The trumpet of Roman liberty was first sounded by Arnold of Brescia [20] whose promotion in the church was confined to the lowest rank and who wore the monastic habit rather as a garb of poverty than as a uniform of obedience His adversaries could not deny the wit and eloquence which they severely felt they confess with reluctance the specious purity of his morals and his errors were recommended to the public by a mixture of important and beneficial truths. In his theological studies he had been the disciple of the famous and unfortunate Abelard,[21] who was likewise involved in the suspicion of heresy but the lover of Eloisa was of a soft and flexible nature and his eccle siastic judges were edified and disarmed by the humility of his repentance From this master Arnold most probably imbibed some metaphysical definitions of the Trinity repugnant to the taste of the times his ideas of baptism and the eucharist are loosely censured but a political heresy was the source of his fame and misfortunes. He presumed to quote the declaration of Christ, that his kingdom is not of this world he boldly maintained that the sword and the sceptre were intrusted to the civil magistrate that temporal honours and possessions were lawfully vested in secular persons that the abbots, the bishops and the pope himself must renounce either their state or their salvation and that, after the loss of their revenues, the voluntary tithes and oblations of the faithful would suffice not indeed for luxury and avarice, but for a frugal life in the exercise of spiritual labours During a short time the preacher was revered as a patriot and the discontent, or revolt, of Brescia against her bishop was the first fruits of his dangerous lessons But the favour of the people is less permanent than the resentment of the priest and after the heresy of Arnold had been condemned by Innocent the Second,[22] in the general council of the Lateran, the magistrates themselves were urged by prejudice and fear to execute the sentence of the church. Italy could no longer afford a refuge and the disciple of Abelard escaped beyond the Alps till he found a safe and hospitable shelter in Zurich, now the first of the Swiss cantons. From a Roman station [23] a royal villa, a chapter of noble virgins, Zurich had gradually increased to a free and flourishing city where the appeals of the Milanese were sometimes tried by the Imperial commissaries [24] In an age less ripe for reformation the precursor of Zuinglius was heard with applause a brave and simple people imbibed and long retained the colour of his opinions and his art, or merit seduced the bishop of Constance and even the pope's legate who forgot for his sake the interest of their master and their order Their tardy zeal was quickened by the fierce exhortations of St. Bernard [25] and the enemy of the church was driven by persecution to the desperate measure of erecting his standard in Rome itself in the face of the successor of St. Peter

Yet the courage of Arnold was not devoid of discretion he was protected and had perhaps been invited by the nobles and people and in the service of freedom his eloquence thundered over the seven hills. Blending in the same discourse the texts of Livy and St. Paul uniting the motives of Gospel and of classic enthusiasm he admonished the Romans how strangely their patience and the vices of the clergy had degenerated from the primitive times of the church and the city He exhorted them to assert the inalienable rights of men and Christians to restore the laws and magistrates of the republic to respect the name of the emperor but to confine their shepherd to the spiritual government of his flock.[26] Nor could his spiritual govern ment escape the censure and control of the reformer and the inferior clergy were taught by his lessons to resist the cardinals, who had usurped a despotic command over the twenty eight regions or parishes of Rome [27] The revolution was not accomplished without rapine and violence the effusion of blood and the demolition of houses the victorious faction was enriched with the spoils of the clergy and the adverse nobles. Arnold of Brescia enjoyed or deplored the effects of his mission his reign continued above ten years, while two popes, Innocent the Second and Anastasius the Fourth either trembled in the Vatican or wandered as exiles in the adjacent cities They were succeeded by a more vigorous and fortunate pontiff Adrian the Fourth [28] the only Englishman who has ascended the throne of St. Peter and whose merit emerged from the mean condition of a monk and almost a beggar in the monastery of St. Albans. On the first provocation of a cardinal killed or wounded in the streets, he cast an interdict on the guilty people and from Christmas to Easter Rome was deprived of the real or imaginary comforts of religious worship The Romans had despised their temporal prince they submitted with grief and terror to the censures of their spiritual father their guilt was expiated by penance and the banishment of the seditious preacher was the price of their absolution But the revenge of Adrian was yet unsatisfied and the approaching coronation of Frederic Barbarossa was fatal to the bold reformer, who had offended, though not in an equal degree the heads of the church and state In their interview at Viterbo the pope represented to the emperor the furious, ungovernable spirit of the Romans the insults, the injuries the fears, to which his person and his clergy were continually exposed, and the pernicious tendency of the heresy of Arnold which must subvert the principles of civil as well as ecclesiastical subordination Frederic was convinced by these arguments or tempted by the desire of the Imperial crown in the balance of ambition the innocence or life of an individual is of small account and their common enemy was sacrificed to a moment of political concord After his retreat from Rome, Arnold had been protected by the viscounts of Campania, from whom he was extorted by the power of Cæsar the præfect of the city pronounced his sentence the martyr of freedom was burnt alive in the presence of a careless and ungrateful people and his ashes were cast into the Tiber lest the heretics should collect and worship the relics of their master [9] The clergy triumphed in his death with his ashes his sect was dispersed, his memory still lived in the minds of the Romans From his school they had probably derived a new article of faith, that the metropolis of the Catholic church is exempt from the penalties of excommunication and interdict Their bishops might argue that the supreme jurisdiction which they exercised over kings and nations more specially embraced the city and diocese of the prince of the apostles But they preached to the winds and the same principle that weakened the effect, must temper the abuse, of the thunders of the Vatican

The love of ancient freedom has encouraged a belief that as early as the tenth century in their first struggles against the Saxon Othos the commonwealth was vindicated and restored by the senate and people of Rome that two consuls were annually elected among the nobles and that ten or twelve plebeian magistrates revived the name and office of the tribunes of the commons [30] But this venerable structure disappears before the light of criticism In the darkness of the middle ages the appellations of senators, of consuls of the sons of consuls may sometimes be discovered [31] They were bestowed by the emperors or assumed by the most powerful citizens, to denote their rank their honours,[32] and perhaps the claim of a pure and patrician descent but they float on the surface without a series or a substance the titles of men not the orders of government,[33] and it is only from the year of Christ one thousand one hundred and forty four that the establishment of the senate is dated as a glorious era in the acts of the city A new constitution was hastily framed by private ambition or popular enthusiasm, nor could Rome in the twelfth century, produce an antiquary to explain, or a legislator to restore the harmony and proportions of the ancient model The assembly of a free or an armed, people will ever speak in loud and weighty acclamations But the regular distribution of the thirty five tribes the nice balance of the wealth and numbers of the centuries the debates of the adverse orators, and the slow operation of votes and ballots, could not easily be adapted by a blind multitude ignorant of the arts and insensible of the benefits of legal government It was proposed by Arnold to revive and discriminate the equestrian order but what could be the motive or measure of such distinction?[34] The pecuniary qualification of the knights must have been reduced to the poverty of the times those times no longer required their civil functions of judges and farmers of the revenue, and their primitive duty their military service on horseback was more nobly supplied by feudal tenures and the spirit of chivalry The jurisprudence of the republic was useless and unknown the nations and families of Italy who lived under the Roman and barbaric laws were insensibly mingled in a common mass and some faint tradition some imperfect fragments preserved the memory of the Code and Pandects of Justinian With their liberty the Romans might doubtless have restored the appellation and office of consuls had they not disdained a title so promiscuously adopted in the Italian cities that it has finally settled on the humble station of the agents of commerce in a foreign land But the rights of the tribunes the formidable word that arrested the public counsels suppose or must produce a legitimate democracy The old patricians were the subjects the modern barons the tyrants of the state, nor would the enemies of peace and order who insulted the vicar of Christ have long respected the unarmed sanctity of a plebeian magistrate [35]

In the revolution of the twelfth century which gave a new existence and era to Rome, we may observe the real and important events that marked or confirmed her political inde pendence. I. The Capitoline hill one of her seven eminences [36] is about four hundred yards in length, and two hundred in breadth A flight of a hundred steps led to the summit of the Tarpeian rock and far steeper was the ascent before the declivities had been smoothed and the precipices filled by the ruins of fallen edifices. From the earliest ages the Capitol had been used as a temple in peace a fortress in war after the loss of the city it maintained a siege against the victorious Gauls and the sanctuary of the empire was occupied assaulted and burnt, in the civil wars of Vitellius and Vespasian.[37] The temples of Jupiter and his kindred deities had crumbled into dust their place was supplied by monasteries and houses and the solid walls, the long and shelving porticoes, were decayed or ruined by the lapse of time. It was the first act of the Romans, an act of freedom, to restore the strength though not the beauty of the Capitol to fortify the seat of their arms and counsels and as often as they ascended the hill the coldest minds must have glowed with the remembrance of their ancestors. II. The first Cæsars had been invested with the exclusive coinage of the gold and silver to the senate they abandoned the baser metal of bronze or copper [38] the emblems and legends were inscribed on a more ample field by the genius of flattery and the prince was relieved from the care of celebrating his own virtues. The successors of Diocletian despised even the flattery of the senate their royal officers at Rome, and in the provinces assumed the sole direction of the mint and the same prerogative was inherited by the Gothic kings of Italy and the long series of the Greek the French and the German dynasties. After an abdication of eight hundred years the Roman senate asserted this honourable and lucrative privilege which was tacitly renounced by the popes from Paschal the Second to the establishment of their residence beyond the Alps Some of these republican coins of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries are shown in the cabinets of the curious. On one of these a gold medal Christ is depictured holding in his left hand a book with this inscription THE VOW OF THE ROMAN SENATE AND PEOPLE ROME THE CAPITAL OF THE WORLD on the reverse St. Peter delivering a banner to a kneeling senator in his cap and gown, with the name and arms of his family impressed on a shield.[39] III With the empire the præfect of the city had declined to a municipal officer yet he still exercised in the last appeal the civil and criminal jurisdiction and a drawn sword which he received from the successors of Otho was the mode of his investiture and the emblem of his functions.[40] The dignity was confined to the noble families of Rome the choice of the people was ratified by the pope, but a triple oath of fidelity must have often embarrassed the præfect in the conflict of adverse duties [41] A servant in whom they possessed but a third share was dismissed by the independent Romans in his place they elected a patrician but this title which Charlemagne had not disdained was too lofty for a citizen or a subject and after the first fervour of rebellion they consented without reluctance to the restoration of the præfect. About fifty years after this event, Innocent the Third the most ambitious or at least the most fortunate of the pontiffs, delivered the Romans and himself from this badge of foreign dominion he invested the præfect with a banner instead of a sword and absolved him from all dependence of oaths or service to the German emperors.[42] In his place an ecclesiastic, a present or future cardinal was named by the pope to the civil government of Rome but his jurisdiction has been reduced to a narrow compass and in the days of freedom the right or exercise was derived from the senate and people IV After the revival of the senate [43] the conscript fathers (if I may use the expression) were invested with the legislative and executive power but their views seldom reached beyond the present day and that day was most frequently disturbed by violence and tumult In its utmost plenitude the order or assembly consisted of fifty six senators,[44] the most eminent of whom were distinguished by the title of counsellors they were nominated perhaps annually by the people and a previous choice of their electors ten persons in each region or parish, might afford a basis for a free and permanent constitution. The popes who in this tempest submitted rather to bend than to break, confirmed by treaty the establishment and privileges of the senate and expected from time peace and religion the restoration of their government. The motives of public and private interest might sometimes draw from the Romans an occasional and temporary sacrifice of their claims and they renewed their oath of allegiance to the successor of St. Peter and Constantine the lawful head of the church and the republic.[45]

The union and vigour of a public council was dissolved in a lawless city and the Romans soon adopted a more strong and simple mode of administration. They condensed the name and authority of the senate in a single magistrate or two colleagues and as they were changed at the end of a year, or of six months, the greatness of the trust was compensated by the shortness of the term But in this transient reign the senators of Rome indulged their avarice and ambition their justice was perverted by the interest of their family and faction, and as they punished only their enemies they were obeyed only by their adherents Anarchy no longer tempered by the pastoral care of their bishop admonished the Romans that they were incapable of governing themselves and they sought abroad those blessings which they were hopeless of finding at home In the same age, and from the same motives most of the Italian republics were prompted to embrace a measure which however strange it may seem was adapted to their situation and productive of the most salutary effects [46] They chose in some foreign but friendly city, an impartial magistrate of noble birth and unblemished character, a soldier and a statesman recommended by the voice of fame and his country to whom they delegated for a time the supreme administration of peace and war The compact between the governor and the governed was sealed with oaths and subscriptions and the duration of his power the measure of his stipend the nature of their mutual obligations were defined with scrupulous precision They swore to obey him as their lawful superior he pledged his faith to unite the indifference of a stranger with the zeal of a patriot. At his choice four or six knights and civilians his assessors in arms and justice, attended the Podesta [47] who maintained at his own expense a decent retinue of servants and horses his wife, his son his brother who might bias the affections of the judge were left behind during the exercise of his office he was not permitted to purchase land to contract an alliance or even to accept an invitation in the house of a citizen nor could he honourably depart till he had satisfied the complaints that might be urged against his government.

It was thus about the middle of the thirteenth century that the Romans called from Bologna the senator Brancaleone [48] whose fame and merit have been rescued from oblivion by the pen of an English historian A just anxiety for his reputation, a clear foresight of the difficulties of the task had engaged him to refuse the honour of their choice the statutes of Rome were suspended and his office prolonged to the term of three years. By the guilty and licentious he was accused as cruel by the clergy he was suspected as partial, but the friends of peace and order applauded the firm and upright magistrate by whom those blessings were restored No criminals were so powerful as to brave so obscure as to elude, the justice of the senator By his sentence two nobles of the Annibaldi family were executed on a gibbet, and he inexorably demolished in the city and neighbourhood, one hundred and forty towers, the strong shelters of rapine and mischief The bishop as a simple bishop was compelled to reside in his diocese and the standard of Brancaleone was displayed in the field with terror and effect. His services were repaid by the ingratitude of a people unworthy of the happiness which they enjoyed By the public robbers, whom he had provoked for their sake, the Romans were excited to depose and imprison their benefactor nor would his life have been spared if Bologna had not possessed a pledge for his safety Before his departure the prudent senator had required the exchange of thirty hostages of the noblest families of Rome on the news of his danger and at the prayer of his wife, they were more strictly guarded and Bologna, in the cause of honour sustained the thunders of a papal interdict This generous resistance allowed the Romans to compare the present with the past, and Brancaleone was conducted from the prison to the Capitol amidst the acclamations of a repentant people The remainder of his government was firm and fortunate, and as soon as envy was appeased by death his head enclosed in a precious vase was deposited on a lofty column of marble [49]

The impotence of reason and virtue recommended in Italy a more effectual choice instead of a private citizen to whom they yielded a voluntary and precarious obedience the Romans elected for their senator some prince of independent power who could defend them from their enemies and themselves Charles of Anjou and Provence the most ambitious and warlike monarch of the age accepted at the same time the kingdom of Naples from the pope and the office of senator from the Roman people [50] As he passed through the city in his road to victory he received their oath of allegiance lodged in the Lateran palace and smoothed in a short visit the harsh features of his despotic character Yet even Charles was exposed to the inconstancy of the people who saluted with the same acclamations the passage of his rival the unfortunate Conradin and a powerful avenger who reigned in the Capitol, alarmed the fears and jealousy of the popes

The absolute term of his life was superseded by a renewal every third year and the enmity of Nicholas the Third obliged the Sicilian king to abdicate the government of Rome In his bull a perpetual law the imperious pontiff asserts the truth, validity and use of the donation of Constantine not less essential to the peace of the city than to the independence of the church establishes the annual election of the senator and formally disqualifies all emperors kings, princes, and persons of an eminent and conspicuous rank.[61] This prohibitory clause was repealed in his own behalf by Martin the Fourth who humbly solicited the suffrage of the Romans In the presence and by the authority of the people two electors conferred not on the pope, but on the noble and faithful Martin the dignity of senator and the supreme administration of the republic [62] to hold during his natural life and to exercise at pleasure by himself or his deputies. About fifty years afterwards the same title was granted to the emperor Lewis of Bavaria and the liberty of Rome was acknowledged by her two sovereigns who accepted a municipal office in the government of their own metropolis.

In the first moments of rebellion when Arnold of Brescia had inflamed their minds against the church, the Romans artfully laboured to conciliate the favour of the empire and to recommend their merit and services in the cause of Cæsar The style of their ambassadors to Conrad the Third and Frederic the First is a mixture of flattery and pride the tradition and the ignorance of their own history [63] After some complaint of his silence and neglect, they exhort the former of these princes to pass the Alps and assume from their hands the Imperial crown "We beseech your majesty not to disdain the humility of your sons and vassals not to listen to the accusations of our common enemies, who calumniate the senate as hostile to your throne, who sow the seeds of discord that they may reap the harvest of destruction The pope and the Sicilian are united in an impious league to oppose our liberty and your coronation With the blessing of God our zeal and courage has hither to defeated their attempts. Of their powerful and factious adherents, more especially the Frangipani we have taken by assault the houses and turrets some of these are occupied by our troops, and some are levelled with the ground The Milvian bridge which they had broken is restored and fortified for your safe passage, and your army may enter the city without being annoyed from the castle of St. Angelo All that we have done and all that we design is for your honour and service, in the loyal hope that you will speedily appear in person to vindicate those rights which have been invaded by the clergy to revive the dignity of the empire and to surpass the fame and glory of your predecessors. May you fix your residence in Rome the capital of the world give laws to Italy and the Teutonic kingdom and imitate the example of Constantine and Justinian [64] who by the vigour of the senate and people obtained the sceptre of the earth" [65] But these splendid and fallacious wishes were not cherished by Conrad the Franconian whose eyes were fixed on the Holy Land and who died without visiting Rome soon after his return from the Holy Land

His nephew and successor Frederic Barbarossa was more ambitious of the Imperial crown nor had any of the successors of Otho acquired such absolute sway over the kingdom of Italy Surrounded by his ecclesiastical and secular princes, he gave audience in his camp at Sutri to the ambassadors of Rome who thus addressed him in a free and florid oration "Incline your ear to the queen of cities approach with a peaceful and friendly mind the precincts of Rome which has cast away the yoke of the clergy and is impatient to crown her legitimate emperor Under your auspicious influence may the primitive times be restored. Assert the prerogatives of the eternal city and reduce under her monarchy the insolence of the world You are not ignorant that in former ages, by the wisdom of the senate by the valour and discipline of the equestrian order she extended her victorious arms to the East and West, beyond the Alps and over the islands of the ocean. By our sins in the absence of our princes, the noble institution of the senate has sunk in oblivion and with our prudence our strength has likewise decreased We have revived the senate and the equestrian order the counsels of the one the arms of the other will be devoted to your person and the service of the empire Do you not hear the language of the Roman matron? You were a guest, I have adopted you as a citizen a Transalpine stranger I have elected you for my sovereign [66] and given you myself and all that is mine Your first and most sacred duty is to swear and subscribe that you will shed your blood for the republic that you will maintain in peace and justice the laws of the city and the charters of your predecessors and that you will reward with five thousand pounds of silver the faithful senators who shall proclaim your titles in the Capitol With the name assume the character of Augustus' The flowers of Latin rhetoric were not yet exhausted but Frederic impatient of their vanity interrupted the orators in the high tone of royalty and conquest Famous indeed have been the fortitude and wisdom of the ancient Romans but your speech is not seasoned with wisdom and I could wish that fortitude were conspicuous in your actions Like all sublunary things Rome has felt the vicissitudes of time and fortune Your noblest families were translated to the East to the royal city of Constantine and the remains of your strength and freedom have long since been exhausted by the Greeks and Franks Are you desirous of beholding the ancient glory of Rome, the gravity of the senate the spirit of the knights the discipline of the camp, the valour of the legions? you will find them in the German republic It is not empire naked and alone the ornaments and virtues of empire have likewise migrated beyond the Alps to a more deserving people [57] they will be employed in your defence, but they claim your obedience You pretend that myself or my predecessors have been invited by the Romans you mistake the word they were not invited they were implored From its foreign and domestic tyrants the city was rescued by Charlemagne and Otho, whose ashes repose in our country and their dominion was the price of your deliverance Under that dominion your ancestors lived and died I claim by the right of inheritance and possession, and who shall dare to extort you from my hands? Is the hand of the Franks[58] and Germans enfeebled by age? Am I vanquished? Am I a captive? Am I not encompassed with the banners of a potent and invincible army? You impose conditions on your master you require oaths if the conditions are just, an oath is superfluous, if unjust it is criminal Can you doubt my equity? It is extended to the meanest of my subjects Will not my sword be unsheathed in the defence of the Capitol? By that sword the northern kingdom of Denmark has been restored to the Roman empire You prescribe the measure and the objects of my bounty which flows in a copious but a voluntary stream All will be given to patient merit all will be denied to rude importunity' [59] Neither the emperor nor the senate could maintain these lofty pretensions of dominion and liberty United with the pope and suspicious of the Romans Frederic continued his march to the Vatican his coronation was disturbed by a sally from the Capitol, and if the numbers and valour of the Germans prevailed in the bloody conflict he could not safely encamp in the presence of a city of which he styled himself the sovereign About twelve years afterwards he besieged Rome, to seat an antipope in the chair of St Peter, and twelve Pisan galleys were introduced into the Tiber, but the senate and people were saved by the arts of negotiation and the progress of disease, nor did Frederic or his successors reiterate the hostile attempt Their laborious reigns were exercised by the popes the crusades, and the independence of Lombardy and Germany they courted the alliance of the Romans and Frederic the Second offered in the Capitol the great standard, the Caroccio of Milan [60] After the extinction of the house of Swabia they were banished beyond the Alps, and their last coronations betrayed the impotence and poverty of the Teutonic Cæsars [61]

Under the reign of Hadrian, when the empire extended from the Euphrates to the ocean, from Mount Atlas to the Grampian hills, a fanciful historian[62] amused the Romans with the picture of their infant wars There was a time' says Florus when Tibur and Præneste our summer retreats were the objects of hostile vows in the Capitol, when we dreaded the shades of the Arician groves when we could triumph without a blush over the nameless villages of the Sabines and Latins and even Corioli could afford a title not unworthy of a victorious general The pride of his contemporaries was gratified by the contrast of the past and the present they would have been humbled by the prospect of futurity by the prediction that, after a thousand years, Rome despoiled of empire and contracted to her primæval limits, would renew the same hostilities on the same ground which was then decorated with her villas and gardens The adjacent territory on either side of the Tiber was always claimed and sometimes possessed as the patrimony of St. Peter but the barons assumed a lawless independence, and the cities too faithfully copied the revolt and discord of the metropolis In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries the Romans incessantly laboured to reduce or destroy the contumacious vassals of the church and senate and if their headstrong and selfish ambition was moderated by the pope he often encouraged their zeal by the alliance of his spiritual arms Their warfare was that of the first consuls and dictators, who were taken from the plough They assembled in arms at the foot of the Capitol sallied from the gates plundered or burnt

the harvests of their neighbours, engaged in tu multuary conflict and returned home after an expedition of fifteen or twenty days Their sieges were tedious and unskilful in the use of victory they indulged the meaner passions of jealousy and revenge and instead of adopting the valour they trampled on the misfortunes of their adversaries The captives in their shirts with a rope round their necks, solicited their pardon the fortifications and even the build ings, of the rival cities were demolished and the inhabitants were scattered in the adjacent villages. It was thus that the seats of the car dinal bishops Porto Ostia Albanum Tuscu lum, Præneste, and Tibur or Tivoli were suc cessively overthrown by the ferocious hostility of the Romans [63] Of these [64] Porto and Ostia the two keys of the Tiber are still vacant and desolate the marshy and unwholesome banks are peopled with herds of buffaloes, and the river is lost to every purpose of navigation and trade. The hills, which afford a shady retire ment from the autumnal heats have again smiled with the blessings of peace Frascati has arisen near the ruins of Tusculum Tibur or Tivoli has resumed the honours of a city [65] and the meaner towns of Albano and Palestrina are decorated with the villas of the cardinals and princes of Rome In the work of destruction the ambition of the Romans was often checked and repulsed by the neighbouring cities and their allies in the first siege of Tibur they were driven from their camp and the battles of Tusculum[66] and Viterbo[67] might be compared in their relative state to the memorable fields of Thrasymene and Cannæ In the first of these petty wars thirty thousand Romans were over thrown by a thousand German horse whom Frederic Barbarossa had detached to the relief of Tusculum and if we number the slain at three, the prisoners at two thousand we shall embrace the most authentic and moderate ac count. Sixty-eight years afterwards they march ed a ainst Viterbo in the ecclesiastical state with the whole force of the city by a rare coalition the Teutonic eagle was blended in the adverse banners, with the keys of St Peter and the pope s auxiliaries were commanded by a count of Toulouse and a bishop of Winchester The Romans were discomfited with shame and slaughter but the English prelate must have indulged the vanity of a pilgrim if he multi plied their numbers to one hundred and their loss in the field to thirty thousand men Had the policy of the senate and the discipline of the legions been restored with the Capitol the di vided condition of Italy would have offered the fairest opportunity of a second conquest. But in arms the modern Romans were not above and in arts they were far below, the common level of the neighbouring republics. Nor was their war like spirit of any long continuance after some irregular sallies they subsided in the national apathy, in the neglect of military institutions, and in the disgraceful and dangerous use of foreign mercenaries.

Ambition is a weed of quick and early vege tation in the vineyard of Christ. Under the first Christian princes the chair of St. Peter was dis puted by the votes the venality the violence, of a popular election the sanctuaries of Rome were polluted with blood and from the third to the twelfth century the church was distracted by the mischief of frequent schisms. As long as the final appeal was determined by the civil magistrate these mischiefs were transient and local *the merits were tried by equity or favour nor could the unsuccessful competitor long dis*turb the triumph of his rival But after the emperors had been divested of their prerogatives, after a maxim had been established that the vicar of Christ is amenable to no earthly tri bunal each vacancy of the holy see might in volve Christendom in controversy and war. The claims of the cardinals and inferior clergy of the nobles and people were vague and litigious the freedom of choice was overruled by the tumults of a city that no longer owned or obeyed a superior On the decease of a pope two factions proceeded in different churches to a double election the number and weight of votes the priority of time the merit of the can didates, might balance each other the most re spectable of the clergy were divided and the distant princes, who bowed before the spiritual throne, could not distinguish the spurious from the legitimate idol The emperors were often the authors of the schism from the political motive of opposing a friendly to a hostile pon tiff and each of the competitors was reduced to suffer the insults of his enemies who were not awed by conscience and to purchase the sup port of his adherents, who were instigated by avarice or ambition A peaceful and perpetual succession was ascertained by Alexander the Third [68] who finally abolished the tumultuary votes of the clergy and people and defined the right of election in the sole college of cardinals.[69] The three orders of bishops priests and dea cons were assimilated to each other by this im portant privilege the parochial clergy of Rome obtained the first rank in the hierarchy they were indifferently chosen among the nations of Christendom, and the possession of the richest benefices, of the most important bishoprics, was not incompatible with their title and office The senators of the Catholic church the coadjutors and legates of the supreme pontiff, were robed in purple the symbol of martyrdom or royalty, they claimed a proud equality with kings and their dignity was enhanced by the smallness of their number which, till the reign of Leo the Tenth seldom exceeded twenty or twenty five persons By this wise regulation all doubt and scandal were removed and the root of schism was so effectually destroyed that in a period of six hundred years a double choice has only once divided the unity of the sacred college But as the concurrence of two thirds of the votes had been made necessary the election was often delayed by the private interest and passions of the cardinals and while they prolonged their independent reign the Christian world was left destitute of a head A vacancy of almost three years had preceded the elevation of Gregory the Tenth, who resolved to prevent the future abuse, and his bull, after some opposition has been consecrated in the code of the canon law [70] Nine days are allowed for the obsequies of the deceased pope and the arrival of the absent cardinals on the tenth they are imprisoned each with one domestic in a common apartment or conclave without any separation of walls or curtains a small window is reserved for the introduction of necessaries but the door is locked on both sides and guarded by the magistrates of the city to seclude them from all correspondence with the world If the election be not consummated in three days the luxury of their table is contracted to a single dish at dinner and supper and after the eighth day they are reduced to a scanty allowance of bread, water and wine During the vacancy of the holy see the cardinals are prohibited from touching the revenues, or assuming, unless in some rare emergency the government of the church all agreements and promises among the electors are formally annulled and their integrity is fortified by their solemn oath and the prayers of the Catholics Some articles of inconvenient or superfluous rigour have been gradually relaxed, but the principle of confinement is vigorous and entire they are still urged, by the personal motives of health and freedom to accelerate the moment of their deliverance and the improvement of ballot or secret votes has wrapped the struggles of the conclave[71] in the silky veil of charity and politeness [2] By these institutions the Romans were excluded from the election of their prince and bishop and in the fever of wild and precarious liberty, they seemed insensible of the loss of this inestimable privilege The emperor Lewis of Bavaria revived the example of the great Otho. After some negotiation with the magistrates, the Roman people was assembled[72] in the square before St. Peter's the pope of Avignon John the Twenty second was deposed the choice of his successor was ratified by their consent and applause They freely voted for a new law, that their bishop should never be absent more than three months in the year and two days journey from the city and that, if he neglected to return on the third summons the public servant should be degraded and dismissed [74] But Lewis forgot his own debility and the prejudices of the times beyond the precincts of a German camp his useless phantom was rejected the Romans despised their own workmanship the antipope implored the mercy of his lawful sovereign [75] and the exclusive right of the cardinals was more firmly established by this unseasonable attack

Had the election been always held in the Vatican the rights of the senate and people would not have been violated with impunity But the Romans forgot and were forgotten in the absence of the successors of Gregory the Seventh, who did not keep as a divine precept their ordinary residence in the city and diocese. The care of that diocese was less important than the government of the universal church nor could the popes delight in a city in which their authority was always opposed and their person was often endangered From the persecution of the emperors and the wars of Italy they escaped beyond the Alps into the hospitable bosom of France from the tumults of Rome they prudently withdrew to live and die in the more tranquil stations of Anagni Perugia Viterbo, and the adjacent cities When the flock was offended or impoverished by the absence of the shepherd they were recalled by a stern admonition, that St Peter had fixed his chair not in an obscure village but in the capital of the world by a ferocious menace that the Romans would march in arms to destroy the place and people that should dare to afford them a retreat. They returned with timorous obedience and were saluted with the account of a heavy debt of all the losses which their desertion had occasioned the hire of lodgings the sale of provisions and the various expenses of servants and strangers who attended the court [6] After a short interval of peace and perhaps of authority they were again banished by new tumults and again summoned by the imperious or respectful invitation of the senate In these occasional retreats the exiles and fugitives of the Vatican were seldom long or far distant from the metropolis but in the beginning of the fourteenth century the apostolic throne was transported as it might seem for ever from the Tiber to the Rhône and the cause of the transmigration may be deduced from the furious contest between Boniface the Eighth and the kin of France.[77] The spiritual arms of excommunication and interdict were repulsed by the union of the three estates, and the privileges of the Gallican church but the pope was not prepared against the carnal weapons which Philip the Fair had courage to employ As the pope resided at Anagni without the suspicion of danger his place and person were assaulted by three hundred horse who had been secretly levied by William of Nogaret, a French minister and Sciarra Colonna of a noble but hostile family of Rome The cardinals fled the inhabitants of Anagni were seduced from their allegiance and gratitude but the dauntless Boniface unarmed and alone seated himself in his chair and awaited like the conscript fathers of old the swords of the Gauls. Nogaret, a foreign adversary was content to execute the orders of his master by the domestic enmity of Colonna, he was insulted with words and blows and during a confinement of three days his life was threatened by the hardships which they inflicted on the obstinacy which they provoked Their strange delay gave time and courage to the adherents of the church who rescued him from sacrilegious violence but his imperious soul was wounded in a vital part and Boniface expired at Rome in a frenzy of rage and revenge His memory is stained with the glaring vices of avarice and pride nor has the courage of a martyr promoted this ecclesiastical champion to the honours of a saint a magnanimous sinner (says the chronicles of the times) who entered like a fox reigned like a lion and died like a dog He was succeeded by Benedict the Eleventh, the mildest of mankind Yet he excommunicated the impious emissaries of Philip and devoted the city and people of Anagni by a tremendous curse whose effects are still visible to the eyes of superstition [8]

After his decease the tedious and equal suspense of the conclave was fixed by the dexterity of the French faction A specious offer was made and accepted that, in the term of forty days, they would elect one of the three candidates who should be named by their opponents. The archbishop of Bordeaux a furious enemy of his king and country was the first on the list but his ambition was known and his conscience obeyed the calls of fortune and the commands of a benefactor who had been informed by a swift messenger that the choice of a pope was now in his hands. The terms were regulated in a private interview and with such speed and secrecy was the business transacted that the unanimous conclave applauded the elevation of Clement the Fifth [79] The cardinals of both parties were soon astonished by a summons to attend him beyond the Alps from whence as they soon discovered they must never hope to return He was engaged by promise and affection to prefer the residence of France and after dragging his court through Poitou and Gascony and devouring by his expense the cities and convents on the road he finally reposed at Avignon [80] which flourished above seventy years[81] the seat of the Roman pontiff and the metropolis of Christendom. By land by sea by the Rhône the position of Avignon was on all sides accessible the southern provinces of France do not yield to Italy itself new palaces arose for the accommodation of the pope and cardinals and the arts of luxury were soon attracted by the treasures of the church They were already possessed of the adjacent territory the Venaissin county [82] a populous and fertile spot and the sovereignty of Avignon was afterwards purchased from the youth and distress of Jane, the first queen of Naples, and countess of Provence, for the inadequate price of fourscore thousand florins [83] Under the shadow of the French monarchy amidst an obedient people the popes enjoyed an honourable and tranquil state to which they long had been strangers but Italy deplored their absence and Rome in solitude and poverty might repent of the ungovernable freedom which had driven from the Vatican the successor of St. Peter Her repentance was tardy and fruitless after the death of the old members the sacred college was filled with French cardinals,[84] who beheld Rome and Italy with abhorrence and contempt and perpetuated a series of national and even provincial popes, attached by the most indissoluble ties to their native country

merce, and their mechanic labours were gradually refined into the arts of elegance and genius But the position of Rome was less favourable, the territory less fruitful the character of the inhabitants was debased by indolence and elated by pride and they fondly conceived that the tribute of subjects must for ever nourish the metropolis of the church and empire This prejudice was encouraged in some degree by the resort of pilgrims to the shrines of the apostles and the last legacy of the popes, the institution of the HOLY YEAR,[85] was not less beneficial to the people than to the clergy Since the loss of Palestine the gift of plenary indulgences, which had been applied to the crusades remained without an object and the most valuable treasure of the church was sequestered above eight years from public circulation A new channel was opened by the diligence of Boniface the Eighth who reconciled the vices of ambition and avarice and the pope had sufficient learning to recollect and revive the secular games which were celebrated in Rome at the conclusion of every century To sound without danger the depth of popular credulity, a sermon was seasonably pronounced a report was artfully scattered some aged witnesses were produced and on the first of January of the year thirteen hundred the church of St Peter was crowded with the faithful who demanded the customary indulgence of the holy time The pontiff who watched and irritated their devout impatience was soon persuaded by ancient testimony of the justice of their claim and he proclaimed a plenary absolution to all Catholics who in the course of that year and at every similar period should respectfully visit the apostolic churches of St Peter and St Paul. The welcome sound was propagated through Christendom and at first from the nearest provinces of Italy and at length from the remote kingdoms of Hungary and Britain, the highways were thronged with a swarm of pilgrims who sought to expiate their sins in a journey however costly or laborious which was exempt from the perils of military service All exceptions of rank or sex of age or infirmity, were forgotten in the common transport and in the streets and churches many persons were trampled to death by the eagerness of devotion The calculation of their numbers could not be easy nor accurate, and they have probably been magnified by a dexterous clergy well apprised of the contagion of example yet we are assured by a judicious historian who assisted at the ceremony that Rome was never replenished with less than two hundred thousand strangers, and another spectator has fixed at two millions the total concourse of the year A trifling oblation from each individual would accumulate a royal treasure and two priests stood night and day with rakes in their hands, to collect without counting, the heaps of gold and silver that were poured on the altar of St. Paul [86] It was fortunately a season of peace and plenty and if forage was scarce, if inns and lodgings were extravagantly dear, an inexhaustible supply of bread and wine, of meat and fish was provided by the policy of Boniface and the venal hospitality of the Romans From a city without trade or industry all casual riches will speedily evaporate but the avarice and envy of the next generation solicited Clement the Sixth[87] to anticipate the distant period of the century The gracious pontiff complied with their wishes afforded Rome this poor consolation for his loss and justified the change by the name and practice of the Mosaic Jubilee [88] His summons was obeyed and the number, zeal and liberality of the pilgrims did not yield to the primitive festival But they encountered the triple scourge of war pestilence, and famine many wives and virgins were violated in the castles of Italy and many strangers were pillaged or murdered by the savage Romans no longer moderated by the presence of their bishop [89] To the impatience of the popes we may ascribe the successive reduction to fifty, thirty three and twenty five years although the second of these terms is commensurate with the life of Christ The profusion of indulgences, the revolt of the Protestants and the decline of superstition, have much diminished the value of the jubilee, yet even the nineteenth and last festival was a year of pleasure and profit to the Romans and a philosophic smile will not disturb the triumph of the priest or the happiness of the people [90]

In the beginning of the eleventh century Italy was exposed to the feudal tyranny alike oppressive to the sovereign and the people The rights of human nature were vindicated by her numerous republics, who soon extended their liberty and dominion from the city to the adjacent country The sword of the nobles was broken their slaves were enfranchised their castles were demolished they assumed the habits of society and obedience their ambition was confined to municipal honours and in the proudest aristocracy of Venice or Genoa each patrician was subject to the laws [91] But the feeble and disorderly government of Rome was unequal to the task of curbing her rebellious sons, who scorned the authority of the magistrate within and without the walls It was no longer a civil contention between the nobles and plebeians for the government of the state the barons asserted in arms their personal independence their palaces and castles were fortified against a siege and their private quarrels were maintained by the numbers of their vassals and retainers In origin and affection they were aliens to their country [92] and a genuine Roman could such have been produced might have renounced these haughty strangers who disdained the appellation of citizens and proudly styled themselves the princes of Rome [93] After a dark series of revolutions all records of pedigree were lost the distinction of surnames was abolished the blood of the nations was mingled in a thousand channels and the Goths and Lombards, the Greeks and Franks the Germans and Normans, had obtained the fairest possessions by royal bounty or the prerogative of valour These examples might be readily presumed but the elevation of a Hebrew race to the rank of senators and consuls is an event without a parallel in the long captivity of these miserable exiles.[94] In the time of Leo the Ninth a wealthy and learned Jew was converted to Christianity and honoured at his baptism with the name of his godfather the reigning pope The zeal and courage of Peter the son of Leo were signalised in the cause of Gregory the Seventh who intrusted his faithful adherents with the government of Hadrian's mole the tower of Crescentius, or as it is now called the castle of St. Angelo Both the father and the son were the parents of a numerous progeny their riches, the fruits of usury were shared with the noblest families of the city and so extensive was their alliance, that the grandson of the proselyte was exalted by the weight of his kindred to the throne of St. Peter A majority of the clergy and people supported his cause he reigned several years in the Vatican and it is only the eloquence of St. Bernard and the final triumph of Innocent the Second that has branded Anacletus with the epithet of antipope After his defeat and death the posterity of Leo is no longer conspicuous and none will be found of the modern nobles ambitious of descending from a Jewish stock It is not my design to enumerate the Roman families which have failed at different periods or those which are continued in different degrees of splendour to the present time [95] The old consular line of the Frangipani discover their name in the generous act of breaking, or dividing bread in a time of famine and such benevolence is more truly glorious than to have enclosed with their allies the Corsi a spacious quarter of the city in the chains of their fortifications the Savelli, as it should seem a Sabine race have maintained their original dignity the obsolete surname of the Capizucchi is inscribed on the coins of the first senators the Conti preserve the honour without the estate of the counts of Signia and the Annibaldi must have been very ignorant or very modest if they had not descended from the Carthaginian hero [96]

But among perhaps above the peers and princes of the city I distinguish the rival houses of COLONNA and URSINI, whose private story is an essential part of the annals of modern Rome. I The name and arms of Colonna[97] have been the theme of much doubtful etymology nor have the orators and antiquarians overlooked either Trajan's pillar or the columns of Hercules or the pillar of Christ's flagellation or the luminous column that guided the Israelites in the desert. Their first historical appearance in the year eleven hundred and four attests the power and antiquity while it explains the simple meaning of the name By the usurpation of Cavæ the Colonna provoked the arms of Paschal the Second but they lawfully held in the Campagna of Rome the hereditary fiefs of Zagarola and Colonna and the latter of these towns was probably adorned with some lofty pillar the relic of a villa or temple [98] They likewise possessed one moiety of the neighbouring city of Tusculum a strong presumption of their descent from the counts of Tusculum who in the tenth century were the tyrants of the apostolic see According to their own and the public opinion the primitive and remote source was derived from the banks of the Rhine [99] and the sovereigns of Germany were not ashamed of a real or fabulous affinity with a noble race which in the revolutions of seven hundred years has been often illustrated by merit and always by fortune [100] About the end of the thirteenth century the most powerful branch was composed of an uncle and six brothers all conspicuous in arms or in the honours of the church Of these Peter was elected senator of Rome introduced to the Capitol in a triumphant car and hailed in some vain acclamations with the title of Cæsar while John and Stephen were declared marquis of Ancona and count of Romagna by Nicholas the Fourth a patron so partial to their family that he has been delineated in satirical portraits imprisoned as it were in a hollow pillar [101] After his decease their haughty behaviour provoked the displeasure of the most implacable of mankind The two cardinals, the uncle and the nephew, denied the election of Boniface the Eighth, and the Colonna were oppressed for a moment by his temporal and spiritual arms [102] He proclaimed a crusade against his personal enemies, their estates were confiscated, their fortresses on either side of the Tiber were besieged by the troops of St Peter and those of the rival nobles, and after the ruin of Palestrina or Præneste their principal seat the ground was marked with a ploughshare, the emblem of perpetual desolation Degraded banished proscribed the six brothers in disguise and danger wandered over Europe without renouncing the hope of deliverance and revenge In this double hope the French court was their surest asylum they prompted and directed the enterprise of Philip and I should praise their magnanimity had they respected the misfortune and courage of the captive tyrant. His civil acts were annulled by the Roman people who restored the honours and possessions of the Colonna and some estimate may be formed of their wealth by their losses, of their losses by the damages of one hundred thousand gold florins which were granted them against the accomplices and heirs of the deceased pope All the spiritual censures and disqualifications were abolished[103] by his prudent successors and the fortune of the house was more firmly established by this transient hurricane The boldness of Sciarra Colonna was signalised in the captivity of Boniface and long afterwards in the coronation of Lewis of Bavaria, and by the gratitude of the emperor the pillar in their arms was encircled with a royal crown But the first of the family in fame and merit was the elder Stephen whom Petrarch loved and esteemed as a hero superior to his own times and not unworthy of ancient Rome Persecution and exile displayed to the nations his abilities in peace and war in his distress he was an object, not of pity but of reverence the aspect of danger provoked him to avow his name and country and when he was asked, Where is now your fortress? he laid his hand on his heart and answered, Here He supported with the same virtue the return of prosperity, and, till the ruin of his declining age the ancestors the character and the children of Stephen Colonna exalted his dignity in the Roman republic and at the court of Avignon

II The Ursini migrated from Spoleto [104] the sons of Ursus, as they are styled in the twelfth century, from some eminent person who is only known as the father of their race But they were soon distinguished among the nobles of Rome by the number and bravery of their kinsmen the strength of their towers, the honours of the senate and sacred college, and the elevation of two popes, Celestin the Third and Nicholas the Third, of their name and lineage.[105] Their riches may be accused as an early abuse of nepotism the estates of St Peter were alienated in their favour by the liberal Celestin,[106] and Nicholas was ambitious for their sake to solicit the alliance of monarchs, to found new kingdoms in Lombardy and Tuscany, and to invest them with the perpetual office of senators of Rome All that has been observed of the greatness of the Colonna will likewise redound to the glory of the Ursini their constant and equal antagonists in the long hereditary feud which distracted above two hundred and fifty years the ecclesiastical state The jealousy of pre eminence and power was the true ground of their quarrel but as a specious badge of distinction, the Colonna embraced the name of Ghibelines and the party of the empire the Ursini espoused the title of Guelphs and the cause of the church The eagle and the keys were displayed in their adverse banners and the two factions of Italy most furiously raged when the origin and nature of the dispute were long since forgotten [107] After the retreat of the popes to Avignon they disputed in arms the vacant republic and the mischiefs of discord were perpetuated by the wretched compromise of electing each year two rival senators. By their private hostilities the city and country were desolated and the fluctuating balance inclined with their alternate success But none of either family had fallen by the sword till the most renowned champion of the Ursini was surprised and slain by the younger Stephen Colonna [108] His triumph is stained with the reproach of violating the truce their defeat was basely avenged by the assassination before the church door of an innocent boy and his two servants Yet the victorious Colonna with an annual colleague, was declared senator of Rome during the term of five years And the muse of Petrarch inspired a wish a hope a prediction that the generous youth the son of his venerable hero would restore Rome and Italy to their pristine glory, that his justice would extirpate the wolves and lions the serpents and bears who laboured to subvert the eternal basis of the marble COLUMN [109]

CHAPTER LXX

Character and Coronation of Petrarch Restoration of the Freedom and Government of Rome by the Tribune Rienzi His Virtues and Vices, his Expulsion and Death Return of the Popes from Avignon Great Schism of the West Reunion of the Latin Church Last Struggles of Roman Liberty Statutes of Rome Final Settlement of the Ecclesiastical State

In the apprehension of modern times Petrarch[1] is the Italian songster of Laura and love. In the harmony of his Tuscan rhymes Italy applauds, or rather adores the father of her lyric poetry and his verse or at least his name, is repeated by the enthusiasm or affectation of amorous sensibility Whatever may be the private taste of a stranger his slight and superficial knowledge should humbly acquiesce in the judgment of a learned nation yet I may hope or presume that the Italians do not compare the tedious uniformity of sonnets and elegies with the sublime compositions of their epic muse the original wildness of Dante the regular beauties of Tasso and the boundless variety of the incomparable Ariosto The merits of the lover I am still less qualified to appreciate nor am I deeply interested in a metaphysical passion for a nymph so shadowy that her existence has been questioned [2] for a matron so prolific,[3] that she was delivered of eleven legitimate children [4] while her amorous swain sighed and sung at the fountain of Vaucluse [5] But in the eyes of Petrarch and those of his graver contemporaries his love was a sin and Italian verse a frivolous amusement. His Latin works of philosophy poetry and eloquence established his serious reputation which was soon diffused from Avignon over France and Italy his friends and disciples were multiplied in every city and if the ponderous volume of his writings[6] be now abandoned to a long repose our gratitude must applaud the man who by precept and example revived the spirit and study of the Augustan age. From his earliest youth Petrarch aspired to the poetic crown The academical honours of the three faculties had introduced a royal degree of master or doctor in the art of poetry [7] and the title of poet laureate, which custom, rather than vanity perpetuates in the English court [8] was first invented by the Cæsars of Germany In the musical games of antiquity a prize was bestowed on the victor [9] the belief that Virgil and Horace had been crowned in the Capitol inflamed the emulation of a Latin bard [10] and the laurel was endeared to the lover by a verbal resemblance with the name of his mistress.[11] The value of either object was enhanced by the difficulties of the pursuit and if the virtue or prudence of Laura was inexorable [12] he enjoyed and might boast of enjoying the nymph of poetry His vanity was not of the most delicate kind since he applauds the success of his own labours his name was popular his friends were active the open or secret opposition of envy or prejudice was surmounted by the dexterity of patient merit In the thirty-sixth year of his age he was solicited to accept the object of his wishes and on the same day in the solitude of Vaucluse he received a similar and solemn invitation from the senate of Rome and the university of Paris The learning of a theological school and the ignorance of a lawless city were alike unqualified to bestow the ideal though immortal wreath which genius may obtain from the free applause of the public and of posterity but *the candidate dismissed this troublesome re*flection and after some moments of complacency and suspense preferred the summons of the metropolis of the world

The ceremony of his coronation[13] was performed in the Capitol by his friend and patron the supreme magistrate of the republic. Twelve patrician youths were arrayed in scarlet six representatives of the most illustrious families in green robes with garlands of flowers accompanied the procession in the midst of the princes and nobles the senator count of Anguillara a kinsman of the Colonna assumed his throne and at the voice of a herald Petrarch arose After discoursing on a text of Virgil and thrice repeating his vows for the prosperity of Rome he knelt before the throne and received from the senator a laurel crown with a more precious declaration This is the reward of merit. The people shouted Long life to the Capitol and the poet! A sonnet in praise of Rome was accepted as the effusion of genius and gratitude and after the whole procession had visited the Vatican the profane wreath was suspended before the shrine of St Peter In the act or diploma[14] which was presented to Petrarch the title and prerogatives of poet laureate are revived in the Capitol after the lapse of thirteen hundred years, and he receives the perpetual privilege of wearing at his choice a crown of laurel ivy, or myrtle, of assuming the poetic habit, and of teaching, disputing interpreting and composing, in all places whatsoever, and on all subjects of literature The grant was ratified by the authority of the senate and people and the character of citizen was the recompense of his affection for the Roman name They did him honour but they did him justice In the familiar society of Cicero and Livy he had imbibed the ideas of an ancient patriot and his ardent fancy kindled every idea to a sentiment and every sentiment to a passion The aspect of the seven hills and their majestic ruins confirmed these lively impressions and he loved a country by whose liberal spirit he had been crowned and adopted The poverty and debasement of Rome excited the indignation and pity of her grateful son he dissembled the faults of his fellow citizens applauded with partial fondness the last of their heroes and matrons and in the remembrance of the past in the hope of the future, was pleased to forget the miseries of the present time Rome was still the lawful mistress of the world, the pope and the emperor her bishop and general had abdicated their station by an inglorious retreat to the Rhône and the Danube, but if she could resume her virtue the republic might again vindicate her liberty and dominion Amidst the indulgence of enthusiasm and eloquence [15] Petrarch, Italy and Europe were astonished by a revolution which realised for a moment his most splendid visions The rise and fall of the tribune Rienzi will occupy the following page [16] the subject is interesting, the materials are rich, and the glance of a patriot bard[17] will sometimes vivify the copious, but simple narrative of the Florentine [18] and more especially of the Roman [19] historian

In a quarter of the city which was inhabited only by mechanics and Jews the marriage of an innkeeper and a washerwoman produced the future deliverer of Rome [20] From such parents Nicholas Rienzi Gabrini could inherit neither dignity nor fortune and the gift of a liberal education, which they painfully bestowed, was the cause of his glory and untimely end The study of history and eloquence the writings of Cicero, Seneca, Livy Cæsar and Valerius Maximus elevated above his equals and contemporaries the genius of the young plebeian he perused with indefatigable diligence the manuscripts and marbles of antiquity, loved to dispense his knowledge in familiar langugage and was often provoked to exclaim ' Where are now these Romans? their virtue, their justice, their power? why was I not born in those happy times? [21] When the republic addressed to the throne of Avignon an embassy of the three orders, the spirit and eloquence of Rienzi recommended him to a place among the thirteen deputies of the commons The orator had the honour of haranguing Pope Clement the Sixth and the satisfaction of conversing with Petrarch a congenial mind but his aspiring hopes were chilled by disgrace and poverty, and the patriot was reduced to a single garment and the charity of the hospital From this misery he was relieved by the sense of merit or the smile of favour, and the employment of apostolic notary afforded him a daily stipend of five gold florins, a more honourable and extensive connection, and the right of contrasting both in words and actions, his own integrity with the vices of the state The eloquence of Rienzi was prompt and persuasive the multitude is always prone to envy and censure he was stimulated by the loss of a brother and the impunity of the assassins, nor was it possible to excuse or exaggerate the public calamities The blessings of peace and justice, for which civil society has been instituted were banished from Rome the jealous citizens, who might have endured every personal or pecuniary injury, were most deeply wounded in the dishonour of their wives and daughters,[22] they were equally oppressed by the arrogance of the nobles and the corruption of the magistrates, and the abuse of arms or of laws was the only circumstance that distinguished the lions from the dogs and serpents of the Capitol These allegorical emblems were variously repeated in the pictures which Rienzi exhibited in the streets and churches and while the spectators gazed with curious wonder the bold and ready orator unfolded the meaning applied the satire inflamed their passions and announced a distant hope of comfort and deliverance The privileges of Rome her eternal sovereignty over her princes and provinces was the theme of his public and private discourse and a monument of servitude became in his hands a title and incentive of liberty The decree of the senate, which granted the most ample prerogatives to the emperor Vespasian had been inscribed on a copper plate still extant in the choir of the church of St John Lateran [23] A numerous assembly of nobles and plebeians was invited to this political lecture, and a convenient theatre was erected for their reception. The notary appeared in a magnificent and mysterious habit, explained the inscription by a version and commentary [14] and descanted with eloquence and zeal on the ancient glories of the senate and people, from whom all legal authority was derived. The supine ignorance of the nobles was incapable of discerning the serious tendency of such representations they might sometimes chastise with words and blows the plebeian reformer but he was often suffered in the Colonna palace to amuse the company with his threats and predictions and the modern Brutus [15] was concealed under the mask of folly and the character of a buffoon. While they indulged their contempt, the restoration of the good estate his favourite expression was entertained among the people as a desirable a possible and at length as an approaching event and while all had the disposition to applaud some had the courage to assist, their promised deliverer

A prophecy or rather a summons, affixed on the church door of St. George was the first public evidence of his designs—a nocturnal assembly of a hundred citizens on Mount Aventine the first step to their execution. After an oath of secrecy and aid he represented to the conspirators the importance and facility of their enterprise that the nobles, without union or resources, were strong only in the fear of their imaginary strength that all power as well as right, was in the hands of the people that the revenues of the apostolical chamber might relieve the public distress and that the pope himself would approve their victory over the common enemies of government and freedom. After securing a faithful band to protect this first declaration, he proclaimed through the city by sound of trumpet, that on the evening of the following day all persons should assemble without arms before the church of St. Angelo to provide for the re-establishment of the good estate. The whole night was employed in the celebration of thirty masses of the Holy Ghost and in the morning Rienzi, bareheaded but in complete armour issued from the church encompassed by the hundred conspirators. The pope's vicar the simple bishop of Orvieto who had been persuaded to sustain a part in this singular ceremony marched on his right hand, and three great standards were borne aloft as the emblems of their design. In the first, the banner of liberty Rome was seated on two lions with a palm in one hand and a globe in the other St. Paul with a drawn sword was delineated in the banner of justice and in the third St. Peter held the keys of concord and peace Rienzi was encouraged by the presence and applause of an innumerable crowd who understood little and hoped much and the procession slowly rolled forwards from the castle of St. Angelo to the Capitol His triumph was disturbed by some secret emotions which he laboured to suppress he ascended without opposition and with seeming confidence, the citadel of the republic harangued the people from the balcony, and received the most flattering confirmation of his acts and laws The nobles, as if destitute of arms and counsels, beheld in silent consternation this strange revolution and the moment had been prudently chosen when the most formidable Stephen Colonna was absent from the city On the first rumour he returned to his palace affected to despise this plebeian tumult, and declared to the messenger of Rienzi that at his leisure he would cast the madman from the windows of the Capitol The great bell instantly rang an alarm and so rapid was the tide so urgent was the danger that Colonna escaped with precipitation to the suburb of St. Laurence from thence, after a moment's refreshment, he continued the same speedy career till he reached in safety his castle of Palestrina lamenting his own imprudence which had not trampled the spark of this mighty conflagration. A general and peremptory order was issued from the Capitol to all the nobles that they should peaceably retire to their estates they obeyed and their departure secured the tranquillity of the free and obedient citizens of Rome.

But such voluntary obedience evaporates with the first transports of zeal and Rienzi felt the importance of justifying his usurpation by a regular form and a legal title At his own choice the Roman people would have displayed their attachment and authority by lavishing on his head the names of senator or consul of king or emperor he preferred the ancient and modest appellation of tribune the protection of the commons was the essence of that sacred office and they were ignorant that it had never been invested with any share in the legislative or executive powers of the republic. In this character and with the consent of the Romans, the tribune enacted the most salutary laws for the restoration and maintenance of the good estate By the first he fulfils the wish of honesty and inexperience that no civil suit should be protracted beyond the term of fifteen days The danger of frequent perjury might justify the pronouncing against a false accuser the same pen-

In a quarter of the city which was inhabited only by mechanics and Jews the marriage of an innkeeper and a washerwoman produced the future deliverer of Rome[20] From such parents Nicholas Rienzi Gabrini could inherit neither dignity nor fortune and the gift of a liberal education which they painfully bestowed was the cause of his glory and untimely end The study of history and eloquence the writings of Cicero Seneca, Livy Cæsar, and Valerius Maximus, elevated above his equals and contemporaries the genius of the young plebeian he perused with indefatigable diligence the manuscripts and marbles of antiquity, loved to dispense his knowledge in familiar language and was often provoked to exclaim, Where are now these Romans? their virtue, their justice, their power? why was I not born in those happy times?[21] When the republic addressed to the throne of Avignon an embassy of the three orders, the spirit and eloquence of Rienzi recommended him to a place among the thirteen deputies of the commons The orator had the honour of haranguing Pope Clement the Sixth and the satisfaction of conversing with Petrarch a congenial mind but his aspiring hopes were chilled by disgrace and poverty, and the patriot was reduced to a single garment and the charity of the hospital From this misery he was relieved by the sense of merit or the smile of favour, and the employment of apostolic notary afforded him a daily stipend of five gold florins, a more honourable and extensive connection, and the right of contrasting both in words and actions, his own integrity with the vices of the state The eloquence of Rienzi was prompt and persuasive the multitude is always prone to envy and censure he was stimulated by the loss of a brother and the impunity of the assassins, nor was it possible to excuse or exaggerate the public calamities The blessings of peace and justice, for which civil society has been instituted were banished from Rome the jealous citizens who might have endured every personal or pecuniary injury, were most deeply wounded in the dishonour of their wives and daughters[22] they were equally oppressed by the arrogance of the nobles and the corruption of the magistrates and the abuse of arms or of laws was the only circumstance that distinguished the lions from the dogs and serpents of the Capitol These allegorical emblems were variously repeated in the pictures which Rienzi exhibited in the streets and churches and while the spectators gazed with curious wonder the bold and ready orator unfolded the meaning applied the satire inflamed their passions and announced a distant hope of comfort and deliverance The privileges of Rome her eternal sovereignty over her princes and provinces was the theme of his public and private discourse and a monument of servitude became in his hands a title and incentive of liberty The decree of the senate, which granted the most ample prerogatives to the emperor Vespasian had been inscribed on a copper plate still extant in the choir of the church of St John Lateran[23] A numerous assembly of nobles and plebeians was invited to

Martin Ursini who among his various acts of violence and rapine had pillaged a shipwrecked vessel at the mouth of the Tiber [28] His name, the purple of two cardinals his uncles a recent marriage, and a mortal disease were disregarded by the inflexible tribune who had chosen his victim. The public officers dragged him from his palace and nuptial bed his trial was short and satisfactory the bell of the Capitol convened the people stripped of his mantle on his knees, with his hands bound behind his back, he heard the sentence of death, and after a brief confession Ursini was led away to the gallows. After such an example, none who were conscious of guilt could hope for impunity and the flight of the wicked the licentious and the idle, soon purified the city and territory of Rome. In this time (says the historian) the woods began to rejoice that they were no longer infested with robbers the oxen began to plough the pilgrims visited the sanctuaries the roads and inns were replenished with travellers trade, plenty and good faith were restored in the markets and a purse of gold might be exposed without danger in the midst of the high way As soon as the life and property of the subject are secure the labours and rewards of industry spontaneously revive Rome was still the metropolis of the Christian world and the fame and fortunes of the tribune were diffused in every country by the strangers who had enjoyed the blessings of his government

The deliverance of his country inspired Rienzi with a vast and perhaps visionary idea of uniting Italy in a great federative republic, of which Rome should be the ancient and lawful head and the free cities and princes the members and associates His pen was not less eloquent than his tongue, and his numerous epistles were delivered to swift and trusty messengers On foot with a white wand in their hand, they traversed the forests and mountains enjoyed in the most hostile states, the sacred security of ambassadors and reported in the style of flattery or truth, that the highways along their passage were lined with kneeling multitudes, who implored Heaven for the success of their undertaking Could passion have listened to reason, could private interest have yielded to the public welfare, the supreme tribunal and confederate union of the Italian republic might have healed their intestine discord and closed the Alps against the barbarians of the North. But the propitious season had elapsed and if Venice Florence Sienna Perugia, and many inferior cities offered their lives and fortunes to the good estate the tyrants of Lombardy and Tuscany must despise or hate the plebeian author of a free constitution From them however and from every part of Italy, the tribune received the most friendly and respectful answers they were followed by the ambassadors of the princes and republics, and in this foreign conflux, on all the occasions of pleasure or business the low born notary could assume the familiar or majestic courtesy of a sovereign [29] The most glorious circumstance of his reign was an appeal to his justice from Lewis king of Hungary who complained that his brother and her husband had been perfidiously strangled by Jane queen of Naples [30] her guilt or innocence was pleaded in a solemn trial at Rome, but after hearing the advocates,[31] the tribune adjourned this weighty and invidious cause, which was soon determined by the sword of the Hungarian. Beyond the Alps more especially at Avignon the revolution was the theme of curiosity wonder and applause. Petrarch had been the private friend perhaps the secret counsellor of Rienzi his writings breathe the most ardent spirit of patriotism and joy and all respect for the pope, all gratitude for the Colonna was lost in the superior duties of a Roman citizen. The poet laureate of the Capitol maintains the act applauds the hero, and mingles with some apprehension and advice the most lofty hopes of the permanent and rising greatness of the republic.[32]

While Petrarch indulged these prophetic visions, the Roman hero was fast declining from the meridian of fame and power and the people who gazed with astonishment on the ascending meteor began to mark the irregularity of its course and the vicissitudes of light and obscurity More eloquent than judicious more enterprising than resolute the faculties of Rienzi were not balanced by cool and commanding reason he magnified in a tenfold proportion the objects of hope and fear and prudence which could not have erected did not presume to fortify his throne. In the blaze of prosperity his virtues were insensibly tinctured with the adjacent vices justice with cruelty liberality with profusion and the desire of fame with puerile and ostentatious vanity He might have learned that the ancient tribunes so strong and sacred in the public opinion were not distinguished in style habit, or appearance from an ordinary plebeian [33] and that as often as they visited the city on foot, a single viator or beadle attended the exercise of their office The Gracchi would have frowned or smiled could

alty which his evidence would have inflicted the disorders of the times might compel the legislator to punish every homicide with death and every injury with equal retaliation. But the execution of justice was hopeless till he had previously abolished the tyranny of the nobles. It was formally provided that none, except the supreme magistrate, should possess or command the gates, bridges, or towers of the state; that no private garrisons should be introduced into the towns or castles of the Roman territory; that none should bear arms or presume to fortify their houses in the city or country; that the barons should be responsible for the safety of the highways and the free passage of provisions; and that the protection of malefactors and robbers should be expiated by a fine of a thousand marks of silver. But these regulations would have been impotent and nugatory had not the licentious nobles been awed by the sword of the civil power. A sudden alarm from the bell of the Capitol could still summon to the standard above twenty thousand volunteers: the support of the tribune and the laws required a more regular and permanent force. In each harbour of the coast a vessel was stationed for the assurance of commerce; a standing militia of three hundred and sixty horse and thirteen hundred foot was levied, clothed, and paid in the thirteen quarters of the city; and the spirit of a commonwealth may be traced in the grateful allowance of one hundred florins, or pounds, to the heirs of every soldier who lost his life in the service of his country. For the maintenance of the public defence, for the establishment of granaries, for the relief of widows, orphans, and indigent convents, Rienzi applied, without fear of sacrilege, the revenues of the apostolic chamber: the three branches of hearth money, the salt duty, and the customs were each of the annual produce of one hundred thousand florins;[28] and scandalous were the abuses, if in four or five months the amount of the salt duty could be trebled by his judicious economy. After thus restoring the forces and finances of the republic, the tribune recalled the nobles from their solitary independence, required their personal appearance in the Capitol, and imposed an oath of allegiance to the new government, and of submission to the laws of the good estate. Apprehensive for their safety, but still more apprehensive of the danger of a refusal, the princes and barons returned to their houses at Rome in the garb of simple and peaceful citizens: the Colonna and Ursini, the Savelli and Frangipani, were confounded before the tribunal of a plebeian, of the vile buffoon whom they had so often derided, and their disgrace was aggravated by the indignation which they vainly struggled to disguise. The same oath was successively pronounced by the several orders of society, the clergy and gentlemen, the judges and notaries, the merchants and artisans, and the gradual descent was marked by the increase of sincerity and zeal. They swore to live and die with the republic and the church, whose interest was artfully united by the nominal association of the bishop of Orvieto, the pope's vicar, to the office of tribune. It was the boast of Rienzi that he had delivered the throne and patrimony of St. Peter from a rebellious aristocracy; and Clement the Sixth, who rejoiced in its fall, affected to believe the professions, to applaud the merits, and to confirm the title of his trusty servant. The speech, perhaps the mind, of the tribune was inspired with a lively regard for the purity of the faith: he insinuated his claim to a supernatural mission from the Holy Ghost; enforced by a heavy forfeiture the annual duty of confession and communion; and strictly guarded the spiritual as well as temporal welfare of his faithful people.[27]

Never perhaps has the energy and effect of a single mind been more remarkably felt than in the sudden, though transient, reformation of Rome by the tribune Rienzi. A den of robbers was converted to the discipline of a camp or convent: patient to hear, swift to redress, inexorable to punish, his tribunal was always accessible to the poor and stranger; nor could birth or dignity, or the immunities of the church, protect the offender or his accomplices. The privileged houses, the private sanctuaries in Rome, on which no officer of justice would presume to trespass, were abolished; and he applied the timber and iron of their barricades in the fortifications of the Capitol. The venerable father of the Colonna was exposed in his own palace to the double shame of being desirous and of being unable to protect a criminal. A mule, with a jar of oil, had been stolen near Capranica; and the lord of the Ursini family was condemned to restore the damage and to discharge a fine of four hundred florins for his negligence in guarding the highways. Nor were the persons of the barons more inviolate than their lands or houses; and, either from accident or design, the same impartial rigour was exercised against the heads of the adverse factions. Peter Agapet Colonna, who had himself been senator of Rome, was arrested in the street for injury or debt; and justice was appeased by the tardy execution of majesty Rienzi degenerated into the vices, of a king

A simple citizen describes with pity or perhaps with pleasure the humiliation of the barons of Rome. Bareheaded their hands crossed on their breast, they stood with downcast looks in the presence of the tribune and they trembled, good God how they trembled! [11] As long as the yoke of Rienzi was that of justice and their country their conscience forced them to esteem the man whom pride and interest provoked them to hate his extravagant conduct soon fortified their hatred by contempt and they conceived the hope of subverting a power which was no longer so deeply rooted in the public confidence. The old animosity of the Colonna and Ursini was suspended for a moment by their common disgrace they associated their wishes, and perhaps their designs an assassin was seized and tortured he accused the nobles and as soon as Rienzi deserved the fate he adopted the suspicions and maxims, of a tyrant. On the same day under various pretences he invited to the Capitol his principal enemies, among whom were five members of the Ursini and three of the Colonna name But instead of a council or a banquet, they found themselves prisoners under the sword of despotism or justice and the consciousness of innocence or guilt might inspire them with equal apprehensions of danger At the sound of the great bell the people assembled they were arraigned for a conspiracy against the tribune s life and though some might sympathise in their distress, not a hand nor a voice was raised to rescue the first of the nobility from their impending doom. Their apparent boldness was prompted by despair they passed in separate chambers a sleepless and painful night and the venerable hero Stephen Colonna, striking against the door of his prison repeatedly urged his guards to deliver him by a speedy death from such ignominious servitude In the morning they understood their sentence from the visit of a confessor and the tolling of the bell The great hall of the Capitol had been decorated for the bloody scene with red and white hangings the countenance of the tribune was dark and severe the swords of the executioners were unsheathed and the barons were interrupted in their dying speeches by the sound of trumpets But in this decisive moment Rienzi was not less anxious or apprehensive than his captives he dreaded the splendour of their names their surviving kinsmen the inconstancy of the people the reproaches of the world and after rashly offering a mortal injury he vainly presumed that if he could forgive he might himself be forgiven His elaborate oration was that of a Christian and a suppliant and as the humble minister of the commons he entreated his masters to pardon these noble criminals, for whose repentance and future service he pledged his faith and authority If you are spared said the tribune by the mercy of the Romans, will you not promise to support the good estate with your lives and fortunes? Astonished by this marvelous clemency the barons bowed their heads and while they devoutly repeated the oath of allegiance, might whisper a secret and more sincere assurance of revenge A priest, in the name of the people pronounced their absolution they received the communion with the tribune assisted at the banquet followed the procession and after every spiritual and temporal sign of reconciliation were dismissed in safety to their respective homes, with the new honours and titles of generals consuls, and patricians.[12]

During some weeks they were checked by the memory of their danger rather than of their deliverance till the most powerful of the Ursini escaping with the Colonna from the city erected at Marino the standard of rebellion. The fortifications of the castle were hastily restored the vassals attended their lord the outlaws armed against the magistrate the flocks and herds, the harvests and vineyards from Marino to the gates of Rome were swept away or destroyed and the people arraigned Rienzi as the author of the calamities which his government had taught them to forget. In the camp Rienzi appeared to less advantage than in the rostrum and he neglected the progress of the rebel barons till their numbers were strong and their castles impregnable From the pages of Livy he had not imbibed the art, or even the courage of a general an army of twenty thousand Romans returned without honour or effect from the attack of Marino and his vengeance was amused by painting his enemies their heads downwards and drowning two dogs (at least they should have been bears) as the representatives of the Ursini The belief of his incapacity encouraged their operations they were invited by their secret adherents and the barons attempted with four thousand foot and sixteen hundred horse to enter Rome by force or surprise The city was prepared for their reception the alarm bell rung all night the gates were strictly guarded or insolently open and after some hesitation they sounded a retreat. The two first divisions had passed along the walls, but the

they have read the sonorous titles and epithets of their successor— NICHOLAS SEVERE AND MERCIFUL, DELIVERER OF ROME, DEFENDER OF ITALY[34] FRIEND OF MANKIND, AND OF LIBERTY, PEACE AND JUSTICE, TRIBUNE AUGUST his theatrical pageants had prepared the revolution but Rienzi abused in luxury and pride the political maxim of speaking to the eyes as well as the understanding, of the multitude From nature he had received the gift of a handsome person,[35] till it was swelled and disfigured by intemperance and his propensity to laughter was corrected in the magistrate by the affectation of gravity and sternness He was clothed, at least on public occasions in a parti coloured robe of velvet or satin, lined with fur, and embroidered with gold the rod of justice which he carried in his hand was a sceptre of polished steel crowned with a globe and cross of gold and enclosing a small fragment of the true and holy wood In his civil and religious processions through the city he rode on a white steed the symbol of royalty the great banner of the republic a sun with a circle of stars, a dove with an olive branch was displayed over his head a shower of gold and silver was scattered among the populace, fifty guards with halberds encompassed his person a troop of horse preceded his march and their tymbals and trumpets were of massy silver

The ambition of the honours of chivalry[36] betrayed the meanness of his birth and degraded the importance of his office and the equestrian tribune was not less odious to the nobles, whom he adopted than to the plebeians whom he deserted All that yet remained of treasure, or luxury or art was exhausted on that solemn day Rienzi led the procession from the Capitol to the Lateran the tediousness of the way was relieved with decorations and games the ecclesiastical civil and military orders marched under their various banners, the Roman ladies attended his wife and the ambassadors of Italy might loudly applaud or secretly deride the novelty of the pomp In the evening when they had reached the church and palace of Constantine he thanked and dismissed the numerous assembly with an invitation to the festival of the ensuing day From the hands of a venerable knight he received the order of the Holy Ghost the purification of the bath was a previous ceremony but in no step of his life did Rienzi excite such scandal and censure as by the profane use of the porphyry vase in which Constantine (a foolish legend) had been healed of his leprosy by Pope Sylvester[37] With equal presumption the tribune watched or reposed within the consecrated precincts of the baptistery and the failure of his statebed was interpreted as an omen of his approaching downfall At the hour of worship he showed himself to the returning crowds in a majestic attitude, with a robe of purple his sword and gilt spurs but the holy rites were soon interrupted by his levity and insolence Rising from his throne, and advancing towards the congregation, he proclaimed in a loud voice, We summon to our tribunal Pope Clement and command him to reside in his diocese of Rome we also summon the sacred college of cardinals[38] We again summon the two pretenders Charles of Bohemia and Lewis of Bavaria who style themselves emperors we likewise summon all the electors of Germany to inform us on what pretence they have usurped the inalienable right of the Roman people the ancient and lawful sovereigns of the empire'[39] Unsheathing his maiden sword he thrice brandished it to the three parts of the world, and thrice repeated the extravagant declaration 'And this too is mine!' The pope's vicar the bishop of Orvieto attempted to check this career of folly, but his feeble protest was silenced by martial music and instead of withdrawing from the assembly he consented to dine with his brother tribune at a table which had hitherto been reserved for the supreme pontiff A banquet, such as the Cæsars had given was prepared for the Romans The apartments, porticoes and courts of the Lateran were spread with innumerable tables for either sex and every condition a stream of wine flowed from the nostrils of Constantine's brazen horse, no complaint except of the scarcity of water, could be heard, and the licentiousness of the multitude was curbed by discipline and fear A subsequent day was appointed for the coronation of Rienzi[40] seven crowns of different leaves or metals were successively placed on his head by the most eminent of the Roman clergy they represented the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost and he still professed to imitate the example of the ancient tribunes These extraordinary spectacles might deceive or flatter the people, and their own vanity was gratified in the vanity of their leader But in his private life he soon deviated from the strict rule of frugality and abstinence and the plebeians who were awed by the splendour of the nobles were provoked by the luxury of their equal His wife his son his uncle (a barber in name and profession) exposed the contrast of vulgar manners and princely expense and without acquiring the

the historian, by these rapacious wolves. But when their pride and avarice had exhausted the patience of the Romans a confraternity of the Virgin Mary protected or avenged the republic the bell of the Capitol was again tolled the nobles in arms trembled in the presence of an unarmed multitude and of the two senators, Colonna escaped from the window of the palace and Ursini was stoned at the foot of the altar The dangerous office of tribune was successively occupied by two plebeians Cerroni and Baroncelli. The mildness of Cerroni was unequal to the times, and after a faint struggle he retired with a fair reputation and a decent fortune to the comforts of rural life. Devoid of eloquence or genius, Baroncelli was distinguished by a resolute spirit he spoke the language of a patriot, and trod in the footsteps of tyrants his suspicion was a sentence of death and his own death was the reward of his cruelties Amidst the public misfortunes the faults of Rienzi were forgotten, and the Romans sighed for the peace and prosperity of the good estate [illegible]

After an exile of seven years the first deliverer was again restored to his country In the disguise of a monk or a pilgrim he escaped from the castle of St. Angelo implored the friendship of the king of Hungary at Naples tempted the ambition of every bold adventurer mingled at Rome with the pilgrims of the jubilee lay concealed among the hermits of the Apennine and wandered through the cities of Italy Germany and Bohemia His person was invisible his name was yet formidable and the anxiety of the court of Avignon supposes and even magnifies his personal merit. The emperor Charles the Fourth gave audience to a stranger who frankly revealed himself as the tribune of the republic, and astonished an assembly of ambassadors and princes by the eloquence of a patriot and the visions of a prophet the downfall of tyranny and the kingdom of the Holy Ghost [illegible] Whatever had been his hopes Rienzi found himself a captive but he supported a character of independence and dignity and obeyed as his own choice the irresistible summons of the supreme pontiff The zeal of Petrarch which had been cooled by the unworthy conduct, was rekindled by the sufferings and the presence of his friend and he boldly complains of the times in which the saviour of Rome was delivered by her emperor into the hands of her bishop Rienzi was transported slowly but in safe custody from Prague to Avignon his entrance into the city was that of a malefactor in his prison he was chained by the leg, and four cardinals were named to inquire into the crimes of heresy and rebellion But his trial and condemnation would have involved some questions which it was more prudent to leave under the veil of mystery the temporal supremacy of the popes, the duty of residence the civil and ecclesiastical privileges of the clergy and people of Rome. The reigning pontiff well deserved the appellation of Clement the strange vicissitudes and magnanimous spirit of the captive excited his pity and esteem and Petrarch believes that he respected in the hero the name and sacred character of a poet.[illegible] Rienzi was indulged with an easy confinement and the use of books and in the assiduous study of Livy and the Bible he sought the cause and the consolation of his misfortunes.

The succeeding pontificate of Innocent the Sixth opened a new prospect of his deliverance and restoration and the court of Avignon was persuaded that the successful rebel could alone appease and reform the anarchy of the metropolis. After a solemn profession of fidelity the Roman tribune was sent into Italy with the title of senator but the death of Baroncelli appeared to supersede the use of his mission and the legate Cardinal Albornoz [illegible] a consummate statesman allowed him with reluctance and without aid to undertake the perilous experiment. His first reception was equal to his wishes the day of his entrance was a public festival and his eloquence and authority revived the laws of the good estate But this momentary sunshine was soon clouded by his own vices and those of the people in the Capitol he might often regret the prison of Avignon and after a second administration of four months Rienzi was massacred in a tumult which had been fomented by the Roman barons In the society of the Germans and Bohemians he is said to have contracted the habits of intemperance and cruelty adversity had chilled his enthusiasm without fortifying his reason or virtue and that youthful hope that lively assurance which is the pledge of success was now succeeded by the cold impotence of distrust and despair The tribune had reigned with absolute dominion by the choice and in the hearts of the Romans the senator was the servile minister of a foreign court and while he was suspected by the people he was abandoned by the prince The legate Albornoz who seemed desirous of his ruin inflexibly refused all supplies of men and money a faithful subject could no longer presume to touch the revenues of the apostolical chamber and the first idea of a tax was the signal of clamour and sedition Even his justice was taint prospect of a free entrance tempted the head strong valour of the nobles in the rear and after a successful skirmish, they were overthrown and massacred without quarter by the crowds of the Roman people Stephen Colonna the younger, the noble spirit to whom Petrarch ascribed the restoration of Italy, was preceded or accompanied in death by his son John a gallant youth, by his brother Peter, who might regret the ease and honours of the church by a nephew of legitimate birth and by two bastards of the Colonna race and the number of seven, the seven crowns as Rienzi styled them, of the Holy Ghost was completed by the agony of the deplorable parent, of the veteran chief who had survived the hope and fortune of his house The vision and prophecies of St Martin and Pope Boniface had been used by the tribune to animate his troops [43] he displayed at least in the pursuit the spirit of a hero but he forgot the maxims of the ancient Romans who abhorred the triumphs of civil war The conqueror ascended the Capitol, deposited his crown and sceptre on the altar, and boasted with some truth, that he had cut off an ear which neither pope nor emperor had been able to amputate [44] His base and implacable revenge denied the honours of burial and the bodies of the Colonna which he threatened to expose with those of the vilest malefactors were secretly interred by the holy virgins of their name and family [45] The people sympathised in their grief repented of their own fury and detested the indecent joy of Rienzi who visited the spot where these illustrious victims had fallen It was on that fatal spot that he conferred on his son the honour of knighthood and the ceremony was accomplished by a slight blow from each of the horsemen of the guard, and by a ridiculous and inhuman ablution from a pool of water which was yet polluted with patrician blood [46]

A short delay would have saved the Colonna the delay of a single month, which elapsed between the triumph and the exile of Rienzi In the pride of victory he forfeited what yet remained of his civil virtues without acquiring the fame of military prowess A free and vigorous opposition was formed in the city and when the tribune proposed in the public council[47] to impose a new tax, and to regulate the government of Perugia thirty nine members voted against his measures repelled the injurious charge of treachery and corruption and urged him to prove by their forcible exclusion that if the populace adhered to his cause it was already disclaimed by the most respectable citizens The pope and the sacred college had never been dazzled by his specious professions they were justly offended by the insolence of his conduct a cardinal legate was sent to Italy and after some fruitless treaty, and two personal interviews he fulminated a bull of excommunication in which the tribune is degraded from his office and branded with the guilt of rebellion sacrilege and heresy [48] The surviving barons of Rome were now humbled to a sense of allegiance their interest and revenge engaged them in the service of the church but as the fate of the Colonna was before their eyes they abandoned to a private adventurer the peril and glory of the revolution John Pepin, count of Minorbino [49] in the kingdom of Naples, had been condemned for his crimes or his riches to perpetual imprisonment and Petrarch, by soliciting his release indirectly contributed to the ruin of his friend At the head of one hundred and fifty soldiers the count of Minorbino introduced himself into Rome barricaded the quarter of the Colonna and found the enterprise as easy as it had seemed impossible From the first alarm the bell of the Capitol incessantly tolled, but instead of repairing to the well known sound, the people were silent and inactive and the pusillanimous Rienzi deploring their ingratitude with sighs and tears, abdicated the government and palace of the republic

Without drawing his sword Count Pepin restored the aristocracy and the church three senators were chosen and the legate assuming the first rank accepted his two colleagues from the rival families of Colonna and Ursini The acts of the tribune were abolished his head was proscribed yet such was the terror of his name, that the barons hesitated three days before they would trust themselves in the city and Rienzi was left above a month in the castle of St Angelo from whence he peaceably withdrew after labouring without effect to revive the affection and courage of the Romans The vision of freedom and empire had vanished their fallen spirit would have acquiesced in servitude had it been smoothed by tranquillity and order and it was scarcely observed that the new senators derived their authority from the Apostolic See that four cardinals were appointed to reform with dictatorial power the state of the republic Rome was again agitated by the bloody feuds of the barons who detested each other and despised the commons their hostile fortresses, both in town and country again rose and were again demolished and the peaceful citizens a flock of sheep were devoured says the Floren

their lawful sovereign eternal fame, the prosperity of Rome, and the peace of Italy would be the recompense of the pope who should dare to embrace this generous resolution Of the five whom Petrarch exhorted the three first John the Twenty second Benedict the Twelfth and Clement the Sixth were importuned or amused by the boldness of the orator but the memorable change which had been attempted by Urban the Fifth was finally accomplished by Gregory the Eleventh. The execution of their design was opposed by weighty and almost insuperable obstacles A king of France who has deserved the epithet of wise was unwilling to release them from a local dependence the cardinals for the most part his subjects were attached to the language manners, and climate of Avignon to their stately palaces above all to the wines of Burgundy In their eyes Italy was foreign or hostile and they reluctantly embarked at Marseilles as if they had been sold or banished into the land of the Saracens Urban the Fifth resided three years in the Vatican with safety and honour his sanctity was protected by a guard of two thousand horse and the king of Cyprus, the queen of Naples, and the emperors of the East and West, devoutly saluted their common father in the chair of St. Peter But the joy of Petrarch and the Italians was soon turned into grief and indignation. Some reasons of public or private moment his own impatience or the prayers of the cardinals recalled Urban to France and the approaching election was saved from the tyrannic patriotism of the Romans. The powers of heaven were interested in their cause Bridget of Sweden a saint and pilgrim disapproved the return, and foretold the death, of Urban the Fifth the migration of Gregory the Eleventh was encouraged by St. Catherine of Sienna, the spouse of Christ and ambassadress of the Florentines and the popes themselves, the great masters of human credulity appear to have listened to these visionary females [59] Yet those celestial admonitions were supported by some arguments of temporal policy The residence of Avignon had been invaded by hostile violence at the head of thirty thousand robbers a hero had extorted ransom and absolution from the vicar of Christ and the sacred college and the maxim of the French warriors, to spare the people and plunder the church was a new heresy of the most dangerous import.[60] While the pope was driven from Avignon he was strenuously invited to Rome. The senate and people acknowledged him as their lawful sovereign, and laid at his feet the keys of the gates, the bridges, and the fortresses [61] of the quarter at least beyond the Tiber But this loyal offer was accompanied by a declaration that they could no longer suffer the scandal and calamity of his absence and that his obstinacy would finally provoke them to revive and assert the primitive right of election The abbot of Mount Cassin had been consulted whether he would accept the triple crown[62] from the clergy and people I am a citizen of Rome [63] replied that venerable ecclesiastic, and my first law is the voice of my country [64]

If superstition will interpret an untimely death [65] if the merit of counsels be judged from the event the heavens may seem to frown on a measure of such apparent reason and propriety Gregory the Eleventh did not survive above fourteen months his return to the Vatican and his decease was followed by the great schism of the West, which distracted the Latin church above forty years. The sacred college was then composed of twenty two cardinals six of these had remained at Avignon eleven Frenchmen one Spaniard and four Italians entered the conclave in the usual form. Their choice was not yet limited to the purple and their unanimous votes acquiesced in the archbishop of Bari a subject of Naples conspicuous for his zeal and learning who ascended the throne of St. Peter under the name of Urban the Sixth. The epistle of the sacred college affirms his free and regular election which had been inspired as usual by the Holy Ghost he was adored invested and crowned with the customary rites his temporal authority was obeyed at Rome and Avignon and his ecclesiastical supremacy was acknowledged in the Latin world During several weeks the cardinals attended their new master with the fairest professions of attach*ment and loyalty till the summer heats per*mitted a decent escape from the city But as soon as they were united at Anagni and Fundi in a place of security they cast aside the mask, accused their own falsehood and hypocrisy excommunicated the apostate the antichrist of Rome and proceeded to a new election of Robert of Geneva, Clement the Seventh whom they announced to the nations as the true and rightful vicar of Christ. Their first choice, an involuntary and illegal act, was annulled by the fear of death and the menaces of the Romans and their complaint is justified by the strong evidence of probability and fact The twelve French cardinals above two-thirds of the votes were masters of the election and whatever might be their provincial jealousies, it cannot

ed with the guilt or reproach of selfish cruelty the most virtuous citizen of Rome was sacrificed to his jealousy and in the execution of a public robber, from whose purse he had been assisted the magistrate too much forgot, or too much remembered, the obligations of the debtor [54] A civil war exhausted his treasures and the patience of the city the Colonna maintained their hostile station at Palestrina and his mercenaries soon despised a leader whose ignorance and fear were envious of all subordinate merit In the death as in the life, of Rienzi the hero and the coward were strangely mingled When the Capitol was invested by a furious multitude, when he was basely deserted by his civil and military servants the intrepid senator waving the banner of liberty presented himself on the balcony, addressed his eloquence to the various passions of the Romans and laboured to persuade them that in the same cause himself and the republic must either stand or fall. His oration was interrupted by a volley of imprecations and stones and after an arrow had transpierced his hand he sunk into abject despair and fled weeping to the inner chambers, from whence he was let down by a sheet before the windows of the prison Destitute of aid or hope he was besieged till the evening the doors of the Capitol were destroyed with axes and fire and while the senator attempted to escape in a plebeian habit he was discovered and dragged to the platform of the palace the fatal scene of his judgments and executions A whole hour without voice or motion he stood amidst the multitude half naked and half dead their rage was hushed into curiosity and wonder the last feelings of reverence and compassion yet struggled in his favour and they might have prevailed if a bold assassin had not plunged a dagger in his breast. He fell senseless with the first stroke the impotent revenge of his enemies inflicted a thousand wounds and the senator's body was abandoned to the dogs, to the Jews, and to the flames Posterity will compare the virtues and failings of this extraordinary man but in a long period of anarchy and servitude, the name of Rienzi has often been celebrated as the deliverer of his country, and the last of the Roman patriots [55]

The first and most generous wish of Petrarch was the restoration of a free republic but after the exile and death of his plebeian hero he turned his eyes from the tribune to the king of the Romans The Capitol was yet stained with the blood of Rienzi when Charles the Fourth descended from the Alps to obtain the Italian and Imperial crowns In his passage through Milan he received the visit, and repaid the flattery, of the poet laureat, accepted a medal of Augustus, and promised without a smile to imitate the founder of the Roman monarchy A false application of the names and maxims of antiquity was the source of the hopes and disappointments of Petrarch yet he could not overlook the difference of times and characters the immeasurable distance between the first Cæsars and a Bohemian prince, who by the favour of the clergy had been elected the titular head of the German aristocracy Instead of restoring to Rome her glory and her provinces he had bound himself by a secret treaty with the pope to evacuate the city on the day of his coronation and his shameful retreat was pursued by the reproaches of the patriot bard [56]

After the loss of liberty and empire his third and more humble wish was to reconcile the shepherd with his flock to recall the Roman bishop to his ancient and peculiar diocese In the fervour of youth with the authority of age, Petrarch addressed his exhortations to five successive popes and his eloquence was always inspired by the enthusiasm of sentiment and the freedom of language [57] The son of a citizen of Florence invariably preferred the country of his birth to that of his education and Italy in his eyes was the queen and garden of the world Amidst her domestic factions she was doubtless superior to France both in art and science in wealth and politeness but the difference could scarcely support the epithet of barbarous which he promiscuously bestows on the countries beyond the Alps Avignon the mystic Babylon the sink of vice and corruption was the object of his hatred and contempt but he forgets that her scandalous vices were not the growth of the soil and that in every residence they would adhere to the power and luxury of the papal court He confesses that the successor of St Peter is the bishop of the universal church yet it was not on the banks of the Rhône but of the Tiber that the apostle had fixed his everlasting throne and while every city in the Christian world was blessed with a bishop the metropolis alone was desolate and forlorn Since the removal of the Holy See the sacred buildings of the Lateran and the Vatican their altars and their saints were left in a state of poverty and decay and Rome was often painted under the image of a disconsolate matron as if the wandering husband could be reclaimed by the homely portrait of the age and infirmities of his weeping spouse [58] But the cloud which hung over the seven hills would be dispelled by the presence of

cate at the same time, after qualifying the cardinals of the adverse factions to join in a legitimate election and that the nations should subtract[21] their obedience if either of the competitors preferred his own interest to that of the public. At each vacancy these physicians of the church deprecated the mischiefs of a hasty choice but the policy of the conclave and the ambition of its members were deaf to reason and entreaties and whatsoever promises were made, the pope could never be bound by the oaths of the cardinal. During fifteen years the pacific designs of the university were eluded by the arts of the rival pontiffs the scruples or passions of their adherents, and the vicissitudes of French factions, that ruled the insanity of Charles the Sixth. At length a vigorous resolution was embraced and a solemn embassy of the titular patriarch of Alexandria, two archbishops, five bishops, five abbots three knights, and twenty doctors, was sent to the courts of Avignon and Rome to require in the name of the church and king the abdication of the two pretenders, of Peter de Luna, who styled himself Benedict the Thirteenth, and of Angelo Corrario who assumed the name of Gregory the Twelfth. For the ancient honour of Rome and the success of their commission the ambassadors solicited a conference with the magistrates of the city whom they gratified by a positive declaration that the most Christian king did not entertain a wish of transporting the holy see from the Vatican which he considered as the genuine and proper seat of the successor of St. Peter In the name of the senate and people an eloquent Roman asserted their desire to co-operate in the union of the church, deplored the temporal and spiritual calamities of the long schism, and requested the protection of France against the arms of the king of Naples. The answers of Benedict and Gregory were alike edifying and alike deceitful and in evading the demand of their abdication the two rivals were animated by a common spirit. They agreed on the necessity of a previous interview but the time the place and the manner could never be ascertained by mutual consent. If the one advances, says a servant of Gregory the other retreats the one appears an animal fearful of the land the other a creature apprehensive of the water And thus, for a short remnant of life and power will these aged priests endanger the peace and salvation of the Christian world [22]

The Christian world was at length provoked by their obstinacy and fraud they were deserted by their cardinals, who embraced each other as friends and colleagues and their revolt was supported by a numerous assembly of prelates and ambassadors With equal justice the council of Pisa deposed the popes of Rome and Avignon the conclave was unanimous in the choice of Alexander the Fifth and his vacant seat was soon filled by a similar election of John the Twenty third the most profligate of mankind But instead of extinguishing the schism, the rashness of the French and Italians had given a third pretender to the chair of St. Peter Such new claims of the synod and conclave were disputed three kings, of Germany Hungary and Naples, adhered to the cause of Gregory the Twelfth and Benedict the Thirteenth himself a Spaniard was acknowledged by the devotion and patriotism of that powerful nation The rash proceedings of Pisa were corrected by the council of Constance the emperor Sigismond acted a conspicuous part as the advocate or protector of the Catholic church and the number and weight of civil and ecclesiastical members might seem to constitute the states-general of Europe Of the three popes, John the Twenty third was the first victim he fled and was brought back a prisoner the most scandalous charges were suppressed the vicar of Christ was only accused of piracy murder rape, sodomy and incest and after subscribing his own condemnation he expiated in prison the imprudence of trusting his person to a free city beyond the Alps Gregory the Twelfth whose obedience was reduced to the narrow precincts of Rimini descended with more honour from the throne and his ambassador convened the session in which he renounced the title and authority of lawful pope To vanquish the obstinacy of Benedict the Thirteenth or his adherents, the emperor in person undertook a journey from Constance to Perpignan The kings of Castile Arragon Navarre and Scotland obtained an equal and honourable treaty with the concurrence of the Spaniards Benedict was deposed by the council but the harmless old man was left in a solitary castle to excommunicate twice each day the rebel kingdoms which had deserted his cause. After thus eradicating the remains of the schism the synod of Constance proceeded with slow and cautious steps to elect the sovereign of Rome and the head of the church On this momentous occasion the college of twenty three cardinals was fortified with thirty deputies six of whom were chosen in each of the five great nations of Christendom —the Italian, the German, the French the fairly be presumed that they would have sacrificed their right and interest to a foreign candidate who would never restore them to their native country In the various, and often inconsistent narratives,[66] the shades of popular violence are more darkly or faintly coloured but the licentiousness of the seditious Romans was inflamed by a sense of their privileges and the danger of a second emigration The conclave was intimidated by the shouts, and encompassed by the arms of thirty thousand rebels, the bells of the Capitol and St Peter's rang an alarm 'Death, or an Italian pope!' was the universal cry the same threat was repeated by the twelve bannerets or chiefs of the quarters in the form of charitable advice Some preparations were made for burning the obstinate cardinals, and had they chosen a Transalpine subject, it is probable that they would never have departed alive from the Vatican The same constraint imposed the necessity of dissembling in the eyes of Rome and of the world, the pride and cruelty of Urban presented a more inevitable danger and they soon discovered the features of the tyrant who could walk in his garden and recite his breviary while he heard from an adjacent chamber six cardinals groaning on the rack His inflexible zeal which loudly censured their luxury and vice, would have attached them to the stations and duties of their parishes at Rome and had he not fatally delayed a new promotion the French cardinals would have been reduced to a helpless minority in the sacred college For these reasons, and in the hope of repassing the Alps, they rashly violated the peace and unity of the church and the merits of their double choice are yet agitated in the Catholic schools [67] The vanity rather than the interest of the nation determined the court and clergy of France [68] The states of Savoy Sicily, Cyprus Arragon, Castile, Navarre and Scotland were inclined by their example and authority to the obedience of Clement the Seventh and after his decease of Benedict the Thirteenth. Rome and the principal states of Italy Germany Portugal England,[69] the Low Countries and the kingdoms of the North adhered to the prior election of Urban the Sixth, who was succeeded by Boniface the Ninth, Innocent the Seventh, and Gregory the Twelfth.

From the banks of the Tiber and the Rhône the hostile pontiffs encountered each other with the pen and the sword the civil and ecclesiastical order of society was disturbed and the Romans had their full share of the mischiefs of which they may be arraigned as the primary authors [70] They had vainly flattered themselves with the hope of restoring the seat of the ecclesiastical monarchy and of relieving their poverty with the tributes and offerings of the nations but the separation of France and Spain diverted the stream of lucrative devotion nor could the loss be compensated by the two jubilees which were crowded into the space of ten years By the avocations of the schism, by foreign arms, and popular tumults Urban the Sixth and his three successors were often compelled to interrupt their residence in the Vatican The Colonna and Ursini still exercised their deadly feuds the bannerets of Rome asserted and abused the privileges of a republic the vicars of Christ who had levied a military force chastised their rebellion with the gibbet the sword and the dagger and in a friendly conference eleven deputies of the people were perfidiously murdered and cast into the street Since the invasion of Robert the Norman the Romans had pursued their domestic quarrels without the dangerous interposition of a stranger But in the disorders of the schism an aspiring neighbour, Ladislaus king of Naples, alternately supported and betrayed the pope and the people, by the former he was declared gonfalonier or general, of the church while the latter submitted to his choice the nomination of their magistrates. Besieging Rome by land and water he thrice entered the gates as a barbarian conqueror profaned the altars violated the virgins pillaged the merchants performed his devotions at St Peter's, and left a garrison in the castle of St. Angelo His arms were sometimes unfortunate, and to a delay of three days he was indebted for his life and crown but Ladislaus triumphed in his turn and it was only his premature death that could save the metropolis and the ecclesiastical state from the ambitious conqueror who had assumed the title or at least the powers of King of Rome [1]

I have not undertaken the ecclesiastical history of the schism but Rome the object of these last chapters is deeply interested in the disputed succession of her sovereigns The first counsels for the peace and union of Christendom arose from the university of Paris from the faculty of the Sorbonne whose doctors were esteemed at least in the Gallican church as the most consummate masters of theological science.[2] Prudently waiving all invidious inquiry into the origin and merits of the dispute they proposed as a healing measure that the two pretenders of Rome and Avignon should abdi

ritory were intrusted to the three conservators who were changed four times in each year the militia of the thirteen regions assembled under the banners of their respective chiefs, or caporioni and the first of these was distinguished by the name and dignity of the prior The popular legislature consisted of the secret and the common councils of the Romans. The former was composed of the magistrates and their immediate predecessors, with some fiscal and legal officers, and three classes of thirteen twenty six, and forty counsellors amounting in the whole to about one hundred and twenty persons In the common council all male citizens had a right to vote and the value of their privilege was enhanced by the care with which any foreigners were prevented from usurping the title and character of Romans. The tumult of a democracy was checked by wise and jealous precautions except the magistrates, none could propose a question none were permitted to speak, except from an open pulpit or tribunal all disorderly acclamations were suppressed the sense of the majority was decided by a secret ballot and their decrees were promulgated in the venerable name of the Roman senate and people. It would not be easy to assign a period in which this theory of government has been reduced to accurate and constant practice, since the establishment of order has been gradually connected with the decay of liberty But in the year one thousand five hundred and eighty the ancient statutes were collected methodised in three books, and adapted to present use under the pontificate, and with the approbation of Gregory the Thirteenth [83] this civil and criminal code is the modern law of the city and, if the popular assemblies have been abolished, a foreign senator with the three conservators, still resides in the palace of the Capitol.[84] The policy of the Cæsars has been repeated by the popes and the bishop of Rome affected to maintain the form of a republic, while he reigned with the absolute powers of a temporal as well as spiritual monarch

It is an obvious truth that the times must be suited to extraordinary characters and that the genius of Cromwell or Retz might now expire in obscurity The political enthusiasm of Rienzi had exalted him to a throne the same enthusiasm, in the next century conducted his imitator to the gallows. The birth of Stephen Porcaro was noble, his reputation spotless his tongue was armed with eloquence, his mind was enlightened with learning and he aspired beyond the aim of vulgar ambition to free his country and immortalise his name. The dominion of priests is most odious to a liberal spirit every scruple was removed by the recent knowledge of the fable and forgery of Constantine s donation Petrarch was now the oracle of the Italians and as often as Porcaro revolved the ode which describes the patriot and hero of Rome he applied to himself the visions of the prophetic bard. His first trial of the popular feelings was at the funeral of Eugenius the Fourth in an elaborate speech he called the Romans to liberty and arms and they listened with apparent pleasure till Porcaro was interrupted and answered by a grave advocate who pleaded for the church and state. By every law the seditious orator was guilty of treason but the benevolence of the new pontiff who viewed his character with pity and esteem, attempted by an honourable office to convert the patriot into a friend. The inflexible Roman returned from Anagni with an increase of reputation and zeal and on the first opportunity, the games of the place Navona he tried to inflame the casual dispute of some boys and mechanics into a general rising of the people. Yet the humane Nicholas was still averse to accept the forfeit of his life and the traitor was removed from the scene of temptation to Bologna with a liberal allowance for his support, and the easy obligation of presenting himself each day before the governor of the city But Porcaro had learned from the younger Brutus that with tyrants no faith or gratitude should be observed the exile disclaimed against the arbitrary sentence a party and a conspiracy was gradually formed his nephew a daring youth, assembled a band of volunteers and on the appointed evening a feast was prepared at his house for the friends of the republic. Their leader who had escaped from Bologna appeared among them in a robe of purple and gold his voice his countenance his gestures bespoke the man who had devoted his life or death to the glorious cause In a studied oration he expatiated on the motives and the means of their enterprise the name and liberties of Rome the sloth and pride of their ecclesiastical tyrants the active or passive consent of their fellow-citizens three hundred soldiers and four hundred exiles, long exercised in arms or in wrongs the license of revenge to edge their swords and a million of ducats to reward their victory It would be easy (he said) on the next day the festival of the Epiphany to seize the pope and his cardinals before the doors or at the altar of St. Peter's to lead them in chains under the walls of St. Angelo to extort by the threat

Spanish and the English[76] the interference of strangers was softened by their generous preference of an Italian and a Roman and the hereditary, as well as personal merit of Otho Colonna recommended him to the conclave Rome accepted with joy and obedience the noblest of her sons, the ecclesiastical state was defended by his powerful family and the elevation of Martin the Fifth is the era of the restoration and establishment of the popes in the Vatican [6]

The royal prerogative of coining money, which had been exercised near three hundred years by the senate was first resumed by Martin the Fifth and his image and superscription introduce the series of the papal medals Of his two immediate successors, Eugenius the Fourth was the last pope expelled by the tumults of the Roman people[78] and Nicholas the Fifth the last who was importuned by the presence of a Roman emperor [9] I The conflict of Eugenius with the fathers of Basil and the weight or apprehension of a new excise emboldened and provoked the Romans to usurp the temporal government of the city They rose in arms elected seven governors of the republic and a constable of the Capitol imprisoned the pope s nephew, besieged his person in the palace and shot volleys of arrows into his bark as he escaped down the Tiber in the habit of a monk But he still possessed in the castle of St. Angelo a faithful garrison and a train of artillery their batteries incessantly thundered on the city and a bullet more dexterously pointed broke down the barricade of the bridge and scattered with a single shot the heroes of the republic Their constancy was exhausted by a rebellion of five months Under the tyranny of the Ghibeline nobles the wisest patriots regretted the dominion of the church and their repentance was unanimous and effectual The troops of St Peter again occupied the Capitol the magistrates departed to their homes the most guilty were executed or exiled and the legate at the head of two thousand foot and four thousand horse was saluted as the father of the city The synods of Ferrara and Florence the fear or resentment of Eugenius prolonged his absence he was received by a submissive people but the pontiff understood from the acclamations of his triumphal entry that to secure their loyalty and his own repose he must grant without delay the abolition of the odious excise II Rome was restored adorned and enlightened by the peaceful reign of Nicholas the Fifth In the midst of these laudable occupations the pope was alarmed by the approach of Frederic the Third of Austria, though his fears could not be justified by the character or the power of the Imperial candidate After drawing his military force to the metropolis, and imposing the best security of oaths[80] and treaties Nicholas received with a smiling countenance the faithful advocate and vassal of the church So tame were the times so feeble was the Austrian that the pomp of his coronation was accomplished with order and harmony but the superfluous honour was so disgraceful to an independent nation that his successors have excused themselves from the toilsome pilgrimage to the Vatican and rest their Imperial title on the choice of the electors of Germany

A citizen has remarked with pride and pleasure that the king of the Romans, after passing with a slight salute the cardinals and prelates who met him at the gate distinguished the dress and person of the senator of Rome and in this last farewell the pageants of the empire and the republic were clasped in a friendly embrace [81] According to the laws of Rome[82] her first magistrate was required to be a doctor of laws an alien of a place at least forty miles from the city with whose inhabitants he must not be connected in the third canonical degree of blood or alliance The election was annual a severe scrutiny was instituted into the conduct of the departing senator nor could he be recalled to the same office till after the expiration of two years A liberal salary of three thousand florins was assigned for his expense and reward and his public appearance represented the majesty of the republic His robes were of gold brocade or crimson velvet or in the summer season of a lighter silk he bore in his hand an ivory sceptre the sound of trumpets announced his approach and his solemn steps were preceded at least by four lictors or attendants whose red wands were enveloped with bands or streamers of the golden colour or livery of the city His oath in the Capitol proclaims his right and duty to observe and assert the laws to control the proud to protect the poor and to exercise justice and mercy within the extent of his jurisdiction In these useful functions he was assisted by three learned strangers the two collaterals and the judge of criminal appeals their frequent trials of robberies rapes and murders are attested by the laws and the weakness of these laws connives at the licentiousness of private feuds and armed associations for mutual defence But the senator was confined to the administration of justice the Capitol the treasury and the government of the city and its ter

But Porcaro had learned from the younger Brutus that with tyrants no faith or gratitude should be observed: the exile disclaimed against the arbitrary sentence; a party and a conspiracy was gradually formed; his nephew, a daring youth, assembled a band of volunteers; and on the appointed evening a feast was prepared at his house for the friends of the republic. Their leader, who had escaped from Bologna, appeared among them in a robe of purple and gold; his voice, his countenance, his gestures, bespoke the man who had devoted his life or death to the glorious cause. In a studied oration he expatiated on the motives and the means of their enterprise: the name and liberties of Rome; the sloth and pride of their ecclesiastical tyrants; the active or passive consent of their fellow citizens; three hundred soldiers and four hundred exiles, long exercised in arms or in wrongs; the license of revenge to edge their swords, and a million of ducats to reward their victory. It would be easy (he said) on the next day, the festival of the Epiphany, to seize the pope and his cardinals before the doors or at the altar of St. Peter's; to lead them in chains under the walls of St. Angelo; to extort by the threat

Spanish and the English [75] the interference of strangers was softened by their generous preference of an Italian and a Roman and the hereditary, as well as personal merit of Otho Colonna recommended him to the conclave Rome accepted with joy and obedience the noblest of her sons the ecclesiastical state was defended by his powerful family and the elevation of Martin the Fifth is the era of the restoration and establishment of the popes in the Vatican [76]

The royal prerogative of coining money which had been exercised near three hundred years by the senate, was first resumed by Martin the Fifth [77] and his image and superscription introduce the series of the papal medals Of his two immediate successors Eugenius the Fourth was the last pope expelled by the tumults of the Roman people [8] and Nicholas the Fifth, the last who was importuned by the presence of a Roman emperor [9] I The conflict of Eugenius with the fathers of Basil and the weight or apprehension of a new excise emboldened and provoked the Romans to usurp the temporal government of the city They rose in arms, elected seven governors of the republic and a constable of the Capitol imprisoned the pope s nephew besieged his person in the palace and shot volleys of arrows into his bark as he escaped down the Tiber in the habit of a monk But he still possessed in the castle of St Angelo a faithful garrison and a train of artillery their batteries incessantly thundered on the city and a bullet more dexterously pointed broke down the barricade of the bridge and scattered with a single shot the heroes of the republic Their constancy was exhausted by a rebellion of five months Under the tyranny of the Ghibeline nobles the wisest patriots regretted the dominion of the church and their repentance was unanimous and effectual The troops of St Peter again occupied the Capitol the magistrates departed to their homes the most guilty were executed or exiled and the legate at the head of two thousand foot and four thousand horse was saluted as the father of the city The synods of Ferrara and Florence the fear or resentment of Eugenius prolonged his absence he was received by a submissive people but the pontiff understood from the acclamations of his triumphal entry that to secure their loyalty and his own repose he must grant without delay the abolition of the odious excise II Rome was restored adorned and enlightened by the peaceful reign of Nicholas the Fifth In the midst of these laudable occupations the pope was alarmed by the approach of Frederic the Third of Austria, though his fears could not be justified by the character or the power of the Imperial candidate After drawing his military force to the metropolis, and imposing the best security of oaths [80] and treaties Nicholas received with a smiling countenance the faithful advocate and vassal of the church So tame were the times so feeble was the Austrian that the pomp of his coronation was accomplished with order and harmony but the superfluous honour was so disgraceful to an independent nation, that his successors have excused themselves from the toilsome pilgrimage to the Vatican and rest their Imperial title on the choice of the electors of Germany

A citizen has remarked with pride and pleasure that the king of the Romans after passing with a slight salute the cardinals and prelates who met him at the gate distinguished the dress and person of the senator of Rome and in this last farewell the pageants of the empire and the republic were clasped in a friendly embrace [81] According to the laws of Rome [82] her first magistrate was required to be a doctor of laws an alien, of a place at least forty miles from the city, with whose inhabitants he must not be connected in the third canonical degree of blood or alliance The election was annual a severe scrutiny was instituted into the conduct of the departing senator nor could he be recalled to the same office till after the expiration of two years A liberal salary of three thousand florins was assigned for his expense and reward and his public appearance represented the majesty of the republic His robes were of gold brocade or crimson velvet or in the summer season of a lighter silk he bore in his hand an ivory sceptre the sound of trumpets announced his approach and his solemn steps were preceded at least by four lictors or attendants whose red wands were enveloped with bands or streamers of the golden colour or livery of the city His oath in the Capitol proclaims his right and duty to observe and assert the laws to control the proud to protect the poor and to exercise justice and mercy within the extent of his jurisdiction In these useful functions he was assisted by three learned strangers the two collaterals and the judge of criminal appeals their frequent trials of robberies rapes and murders are attested by the laws and the weakness of these laws connives at the licentiousness of private feuds and armed associations for mutual defence But the senator was confined to the administration of justice the Capitol the treasury and the government of the city and its ter

teenth to the opening of the eighteenth century The Vatican was swayed and protected by the religious policy of the Catholic king his preju dice and interest disposed him in every dispute to support the prince against the people and instead of the encouragement the aid and the asylum which they obtained from the adjacent states, the friends of liberty or the enemies of law were enclosed on all sides within the iron circle of despotism. The long habits of obedience and education subdued the turbulent spirit of the nobles and commons of Rome. The barons forgot the arms and factions of their ancestors, and insensibly became the servants of luxury and government. Instead of maintaining a crowd of tenants and followers the produce of their estates was consumed in the private ex penses which multiply the pleasures and di minish the power of the lord.[92] The Colonna and Ursini vied with each other in the decora tion of their palaces and chapels and their an tique splendour was rivalled or surpassed by the sudden opulence of the papal families In Rome the voice of freedom and discord is no longer heard and, instead of the foaming torrent, a smooth and stagnant lake reflects the image of idleness and servitude.

A Christian a philosopher [93] and a patriot, will be equally scandalised by the temporal kingdom of the clergy and the local majesty of Rome, the remembrance of her consuls and tri umphs, may seem to embitter the sense and ag gravate the shame of her slavery If we calmly weigh the merits and defects of the ecclesiastical government, it may be praised in its present state as a mild decent, and tranquil system, ex empt from the dangers of a minority the sallies of youth, the expenses of luxury and the calami ties of war But these advantages are overbal anced by a frequent, perhaps a septennial elec tion of a sovereign who is seldom a native of the country the reign of a young statesman of three score in the decline of his life and abilities, without hope to accomplish, and without chil dren to inherit, the labours of his transitory reign. The successful candidate is drawn from the church, and even the convent—from the mode of education and life the most adverse to reason humanity and freedom In the tram mels of servile faith he has learned to believe because it is absurd to revere all that is con temptible, and to despise whatever might de serve the esteem of a rational being to punish error as a crime to reward mortification and celibacy as the first of virtues to place the saints of the calendar[94] above the heroes of Rome and the sages of Athens and to consider the missal or the crucifix, as more useful instru ments than the plough or the loom. In the office of nuncio or the rank of cardinal he may ac quire some knowledge of the world but the primitive stain will adhere to his mind and manners from study and experience he may suspect the mystery of his profession but the sacerdotal artist will imbibe some portion of the bigotry which he inculcates. The genius of Six tus the Fifth[95] burst from the gloom of a Fran ciscan cloister In a reign of five years he exter minated the outlaws and banditti abolished the profane sanctuaries of Rome,[96] formed a naval and military force restored and emulated the monuments of antiquity and after a liberal use and large increase of the revenue left five millions of crowns in the castle of St. Angelo. But his justice was sullied with cruelty his ac tivity was prompted by the ambition of con quest after his decease the abuses revived the treasure was dissipated he entailed on posterity thirty five new taxes and the venality of offices and after his death his statue was demolished by an ungrateful or an injured people.[97] The wild and original character of Sixtus the Fifth stands alone in the series of the pontiffs the maxims and effects of their temporal govern ment may be collected from the positive and comparative view of the arts and philosophy the agriculture and trade, the wealth and population of the ecclesiastical state For myself it is my wish to depart in charity with all mankind nor am I willing in these last moments to offend even the pope and clergy of Rome.[98]

of their instant death, a surrender of the castle to ascend the vacant Capitol, to ring the alarm bell, and to restore in a popular assembly the ancient republic of Rome While he triumphed he was already betrayed The senator with a strong guard invested the house the nephew of Porcaro cut his way through the crowd, but the unfortunate Stephen was drawn from a chest, lamenting that his enemies had anticipated by three hours the execution of his design After such manifest and repeated guilt even the mercy of Nicholas was silent Porcaro and nine of his accomplices were hanged without the benefit of the sacraments and, amidst the fears and invectives of the papal court, the Romans pitied and almost applauded these martyrs of their country [85] But their applause was mute their pity ineffectual, their liberty for ever extinct, and, if they have since risen in a vacancy of the throne or a scarcity of bread, such accidental tumults may be found in the bosom of the most abject servitude

But the independence of the nobles which was fomented by discord survived the freedom of the commons, which must be founded in union A privilege of rapine and oppression was long maintained by the barons of Rome their houses were a fortress and a sanctuary and the ferocious train of banditti and criminals, whom they protected from the law, repaid the hospitality with the service of their swords and daggers The private interest of the pontiffs, or their nephews sometimes involved them in these domestic feuds Under the reign of Sixtus the Fourth, Rome was distracted by the battles and sieges of the rival houses after the conflagration of his palace the protonotary Colonna was tortured and beheaded and Savelli his captive friend was murdered on the spot for refusing to join in the acclamations of the victorious Ursini [86] But the popes no longer trembled in the Vatican they had strength to command if they had resolution to claim, the obedience of their subjects and the strangers who observed these partial disorders admired the easy taxes and wise administration of the ecclesiastical state [87]

The spiritual thunders of the Vatican depend on the force of opinion and if that opinion be supplanted by reason or passion, the sound may idly waste itself in the air and the helpless priest is exposed to the brutal violence of a noble or a plebeian adversary But after their return from Avignon the keys of St. Peter were guarded by the sword of St Paul Rome was commanded by an impregnable citadel the use of cannon is a powerful engine against p ular seditions a regular force of cavalry and fantry was enlisted under the banners of pope his ample revenues supplied the resou of war and, from the extent of his domain could bring down on a rebellious city an a of hostile neighbours and loyal subjects.[88] S the union of the duchies of Ferrara and Urb the ecclesiastical state extends from the M terranean to the Adriatic, and from the confi of Naples to the banks of the Po and as earl the sixteenth century the greater part of t spacious and fruitful country acknowledged lawful claims and temporal sovereignty of Roman pontiffs Their claims were readily duced from the genuine or fabulous donati of the darker ages the successive steps of th final settlement would engage us too far in transactions of Italy and even of Europe crimes of Alexander the Sixth, the martial op ations of Julius the Second and the liberal p icy of Leo the Tenth a theme which has b adorned by the pens of the noblest historians the times [89] In the first period of their conque till the expedition of Charles the Eighth, popes might successfully wrestle with the ad cent princes and states whose military force w equal or inferior to their own But as soon as t monarchs of France Germany and Spain co tended with gigantic arms for the dominion Italy they supplied with art the deficiency strength and concealed in a labyrinth of wa and treaties their aspiring views and the i mortal hope of chasing the barbarians beyo the Alps. The nice balance of the Vatican w often subverted by the soldiers of the North a West, who were united under the standard Charles the Fifth the feeble and fluctua policy of Clement the Seventh exposed his pe son and dominions to the conqueror and Ro was abandoned seven months to a lawless arm more cruel and rapacious than the Goths a Vandals [90] After this severe lesson the pop contracted their ambition which was almo satisfied resumed the character of a commo parent, and abstained from all offensive hostil ties except in a hasty quarrel when the vicar Christ and the Turkish sultan were armed a the same time against the kingdom of Naples. The French and Germans at length withdre from the field of battle Milan Naples Sicily Sardinia and the sea-coast of Tuscany wer firmly possessed by the Spaniards and it be came their interest to maintain the peace an dependence of Italy which continued almos without disturbance from the middle of the six ulchres of Augustus and Hadrian could not totally be lost but the former was only visible as a mound of earth and the latter the castle of St Angelo had acquired the name and appearance of a modern fortress. With the addition of some separate and nameless columns, such were the remains of the ancient city for the marks of a more recent structure might be detected in the walls, which formed a circumference of ten miles, included three hundred and seventy nine turrets, and opened into the country by thirteen gates.

This melancholy picture was drawn above nine hundred years after the fall of the Western empire and even of the Gothic kingdom of Italy A long period of distress and anarchy in which empire and arts, and riches had migrated from the banks of the Tiber was incapable of restoring or adorning the city and as all that is human must retrograde if it do not advance every successive age must have hastened the ruin of the work of antiquity To measure the progress of decay and to ascertain at each era the state of each edifice would be an endless and a useless labour and I shall content myself with two observations which will introduce a short inquiry into the general causes and effects. 1 Two hundred years before the eloquent complaint of Poggius, an anonymous writer composed a description of Rome [6] His ignorance may repeat the same objects under strange and fabulous names. Yet this barbarous topographer had eyes and ears he could observe the visible remains he could listen to the tradition of the people and he distinctly enumerates seven theatres eleven baths twelve arches, and eighteen palaces of which many had disappeared before the time of Poggius It is apparent that many stately monuments of antiquity survived till a late period [7] and that the principles of destruction acted with vigorous and increasing energy in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries 2 The same reflection must be applied to the last three ages and we should vainly seek the Septizonium of Severus,[8] which is celebrated by Petrarch and the antiquarians of the sixteenth century While the Roman edifices were still entire, the first blows, however weighty and impetuous were resisted by the solidity of the mass and the harmony of the parts but the slightest touch would precipitate the fragments of arches and columns that already nodded to their fall

After a diligent inquiry I can discern four principal causes of the ruin of Rome which continued to operate in a period of more than a thousand years. I The injuries of time and nature II The hostile attacks of the barbarians and Christians. III The use and abuse of the materials. And IV The domestic quarrels of the Romans.

I The art of man is able to construct monuments far more permanent than the narrow span of his own existence yet these monuments like himself are perishable and frail and in the boundless annals of time his life and his labours must equally be measured as a fleeting moment. Of a simple and solid edifice it is not easy however to circumscribe the duration As the wonders of ancient days, the pyramids[9] attracted the curiosity of the ancients a hundred generations, the leaves of autumn [10] have dropped into the grave and after the fall of the Pharaohs and Ptolemies, the Cæsars and caliphs, the same pyramids stand erect and unshaken above the floods of the Nile. A complex figure of various and minute parts is more accessible to injury and decay and the silent lapse of time is often accelerated by hurricanes and earthquakes, by fires and inundations The air and earth have doubtless been shaken and the lofty turrets of Rome have tottered from their foundations but the seven hills do not appear to be placed on the great cavities of the globe nor has the city in any age, been exposed to the convulsions of nature, which, in the climate of Antioch Lisbon, or Lima, have crumbled in a few moments the works of ages into dust. Fire is the most powerful agent of life and death the rapid mischief may be kindled and propagated by the industry or negligence of mankind and every period of the Roman annals is marked by the repetition of similar calamities. A memorable conflagration the guilt or misfortune of Nero's reign continued though with unequal fury either six or nine days [11] Innumerable buildings crowded in close and crooked streets supplied perpetual fuel for the flames and when they ceased four only of the fourteen regions were left entire three were totally destroyed and seven were deformed by the relics of smoking and lacerated edifices [12] In the full meridian of empire the metropolis arose with fresh beauty from her ashes yet the memory of the old deplored their irreparable losses, the arts of Greece the trophies of victory the monuments of primitive or fabulous antiquity In the days of distress and anarchy every wound is mortal every fall irretrievable nor can the damage be restored either by the public care of government, or the activity of private interest. In the last days of Pope Eugenius the Fourth, two of his servants the learned Poggius[1] and a friend, ascended the Capitoline hill reposed themselves among the ruins of columns and temples, and viewed from that commanding spot the wide and various prospect of desolation The place and the object gave ample scope for moralising on the vicissitudes of fortune, which spares neither man nor the proudest of his works which buries empires and cities in a common grave and it was agreed that in proportion to her former greatness the fall of Rome was the more awful and deplorable Her primeval state such as she might appear in a remote age when Evander entertained the stranger of Troy,[2] has been delineated by the fancy of Virgil This Tarpeian rock was then a savage and solitary thicket in the time of the poet it was crowned with the golden roofs of a temple the temple is overthrown, the gold has been pillaged, the wheel of fortune has accomplished her revolution and the sacred ground is again disfigured with thorns and brambles The hill of the Capitol on which we sit, was formerly the head of the Roman empire the citadel of the earth the terror of kings illustrated by the footsteps of so many triumphs, enriched with the spoils and tributes of so many nations This spectacle of the world how is it fallen! how changed! how defaced! the path of victory is obliterated by vines and the benches of the senators are concealed by a dunghill Cast your eyes on the Palatine hill and seek among the shapeless and enormous fragments the marble theatre the obelisks the colossal statues the porticoes of Nero s palace survey the other hills of the city the vacant space is interrupted only by ruins and gardens The forum of the Roman people where they assembled to enact their laws and elect their magistrates is now enclosed for the cultivation of pot herbs or thrown open for the reception of swine and buffaloes The public and private edifices that were founded for eternity lie prostrate naked and broken like the limbs of a mighty giant and the ruin is the more visible from the stupendous relics that have survived the injuries of time and fortune [4]

These relics are minutely described by Poggius one of the first who raised his eyes from the monuments of legendary to those of classic superstition [5] 1 Besides a bridge an arch a sepulchre, and the pyramid of Cestius he could discern, of the age of the republic a double row of vaults in the salt office of the Capitol which were inscribed with the name and munificence of Catulus 2 Eleven temples were visible in some degree, from the perfect form of the Pantheon to the three arches and a marble column of the temple of Peace, which Vespasian erected after the civil wars and the Jewish triumph. 3 Of the number, which he rashly defines of seven thermæ or public baths none were sufficiently entire to represent the use and distribution of the several baths but those of Diocletian and Antoninus Caracalla still retained the titles of the founders and astonished the curious spectator who in observing their solidity and extent the variety of marbles the size and multitude of the columns compared the labour and expense with the use and importance Of the baths of Constantine of Alexander, of Domitian or rather of Titus some vestige might yet be found 4 The triumphal arches of Titus Severus, and Constantine were entire both the structure and the inscriptions a falling fragment was honoured with the name of Trajan and two arches then extant in the Flaminian way have been ascribed to the base memory of Faustina and Gallienus. 5 After the wonder of the Coliseum Poggius might have overlooked a small amphitheatre of brick, most probably for the use of the prætorian camp the theatres of Marcellus and Pompey were occupied in a great measure by public and private buildings and in the Circus Agonalis and Maximus little more than the situation and the form could be investigated 6 The columns of Trajan and Antonine were still erect but the Egyptian obelisks were broken or buried A people of gods and heroes the workmanship of art was reduced to one equestrian figure of gilt brass and to five marble statues of which the most conspicuous were the two horses of Phidias and Praxiteles. 7 The two mausoleums or sep-

A memorable conflagration the guilt or misfortune of Nero s reign continued, though with unequal fury either six or nine days [11] Innumerable buildings, crowded in close and crooked streets supplied perpetual fuel for the flames and when they ceased four only of the fourteen regions were left entire three were totally destroyed and seven were deformed by the relics of smoking and lacerated edifices [12] In the full meridian of empire the metropolis arose with fresh beauty from her ashes yet the memory of the old deplored their irreparable losses the arts of Greece the trophies of victory the *mon*uments of primitive or fabulous antiquity In the days of distress and anarchy every wound is mortal every fall irretrievable nor can the damage be restored either by the public care of government or the activity of private interest. Yet two causes may be alleged which render the calamity of fire more destructive to a flourishing than a decayed city 1 The more combustible materials of brick timber, and metals, are first melted or consumed but the flames may play without injury or effect on the naked walls and massy arches that have been despoiled of their ornaments 2 It is among the common and plebeian habitations that a mischievous spark is most easily blown to a conflagration, but as soon as they are devoured the greater edifices which have resisted or escaped are left as so many islands in a state of solitude and safety From her situation, Rome is exposed to the danger of frequent inundations Without excepting the Tiber, the rivers that descend from either side of the Apennine have a short and irregular course, a shallow stream in the summer heats, an impetuous torrent when it is swelled in the spring or winter by the fall of rain and the melting of the snows When the current is repelled from the sea by adverse winds, when the ordinary bed is inadequate to the weight of waters they rise above the banks and overspread without limits or control the plains and cities of the adjacent country Soon after the triumph of the first Punic war the Tiber was increased by unusual rains and the inundation, surpassing all former measure of time and place, destroyed all the buildings that were situate below the hills of Rome According to the variety of ground the same mischief was produced by different means and the edifices were either swept away by the sudden impulse or dissolved and undermined by the long continuance, of the flood [13] Under the reign of Augustus the same calamity was renewed the lawless river overturned the palaces and temples on its banks,[14] and, after the labours of the emperor in cleansing and widening the bed that was encumbered with ruins [15] the vigilance of his successors was exercised by similar dangers and designs The project of diverting into new channels the Tiber itself or some of the dependent streams, was long opposed by superstition and local interests [16] nor did the use compensate the toil and cost of the tardy and imperfect execution The servitude of rivers is the noblest and most important victory which man has obtained over the licentiousness of nature,[17] and if such were the ravages of the Tiber under a firm and active government what could oppose, or who can enumerate the injuries of the city after the fall of the Western empire? A remedy was at length produced by the evil itself the accumulation of rubbish and the earth that has been washed down from the hills is supposed to have elevated the plain of Rome fourteen or fifteen feet, perhaps, above the ancient level,[18] and the modern city is less accessible to the attacks of the river [19]

II The crowd of writers of every nation who impute the destruction of the Roman monuments to the Goths and the Christians, have neglected to inquire how far they were animated by a hostile principle, and how far they possessed the means and the leisure to satiate their enmity In the preceding volumes of this History I have described the triumph of barbarism and religion, and I can only resume in a few words their real or imaginary connection with the ruin of ancient Rome Our fancy may create or adopt a pleasing romance that the Goths and Vandals sallied from Scandinavia, ardent to avenge the flight of Odin [20] to break the chains and to chastise the oppressors, of mankind that they wished to burn the records of classic literature and to found their national architecture on the broken members of the Tuscan and Corinthian orders But in simple truth, the northern conquerors were neither sufficiently savage nor sufficiently refined to entertain such aspiring ideas of destruction and revenge The shepherds of Scythia and Germany had been educated in the armies of the empire whose discipline they acquired and whose weakness they invaded with the familiar use of the Latin tongue they had learned to reverence the name and titles of Rome and, though incapable of emulating they were more inclined to admire than to abolish the arts and studies of a brighter period In the transient possession of a rich and unresisting capital the soldiers of Alaric and Genseric were stimulated by the passions of a victorious army amidst the wanton indulgence of lust or cruelty, portable wealth was the object of their search nor could they derive either pride or pleasure from the unprofitable reflection that they had battered to the ground the works of the consuls and Cæsars Their moments were indeed precious the Goths evacuated Rome on the sixth [21] the Vandals on the fifteenth day [22] and though it be far more difficult to build than to destroy, their hasty assault would have made a slight impression on the solid piles of antiquity We may remember that both Alaric and Genseric affected to spare the buildings of the city that they subsisted in strength and beauty under the auspicious government of Theodoric [23] and that the momentary resentment of Totila[24] was disarmed by his own temper and the advice of his friends and enemies From these innocent barbarians the reproach may be transferred to the Catholics of Rome The statues altars and houses of the demons were an abomination in their eyes and in the absolute command of the city they might labour with zeal and perse verance to erase the idolatry of their ancestors. The demolition of the temples in the East[25] af fords to them an example of conduct, and to us an argument of belief and it is probable that a portion of guilt or merit may be imputed with justice to the Roman proselytes. Yet their ab horrence was confined to the monuments of heathen superstition and the civil structures that were dedicated to the business or pleasure of society might be preserved without injury or scandal The change of religion was accom plished, not by a popular tumult, but by the 'crees of the emperors, of the senate and of :re. Of the Christian hierarchy the bishops of .ome were commonly the most prudent and ast fanatic nor can any positive charge be pposed to the meritorious act of saving and onverting the majestic structure of the Pan heon.[26]

III. The value of any object that supplies the wants or pleasures of mankind is compounded of its substance and its form, of the materials and the manufacture. Its price must depend on the number of persons by whom it may be ac quired and used on the extent of the market and consequently on the ease or difficulty of remote exportation, according to the nature of the commodity its local situation and the tem porary circumstances of the world The bar barian conquerors of Rome usurped in a mo ment the toil and treasure of successive ages but, except the luxuries of immediate consump tion, they must view without desire all that could not be removed from the city in the Gothic waggons or the fleet of the Vandals[27] Gold and silver were the first objects of their avarice as in every country and in the smallest compass, they represent the most ample com mand of the industry and possessions of man kind. A vase or a statue of these precious metals might tempt the vanity of some barbarian chief but the grosser multitude, regardless of the form, was tenacious only of the substance and the melted ingots might be readily divided and stamped into the current coin of the empire The less active or less fortunate robbers were reduced to the baser plunder of brass, lead iron, and copper whatever had escaped the Goths and Vandals was pillaged by the Greek tyrants and the emperor Constans, in his ra pacious visit, stripped the bronze tiles from the roof of the Pantheon[28] The edifices of Rome might be considered as a vast and various mine the first labour of extracting the materials was already performed the metals were puri fied and cast the marbles were hewn and pol ished and after foreign and domestic rapine had been satiated the remains of the city could a purchaser have been found, were still venal The monuments of antiquity had been left naked of their precious ornaments but the Romans would demolish with their own hands the arches and walls, if the hope of profit could surpass the cost of the labour and exportation If Charlemagne had fixed in Italy the seat of the Western empire, his genius would have as pired to restore rather than to violate the works of the Cæsars but policy confined the French monarch to the forests of Germany his taste could be gratified only by destruction and the new palace of Aix la Chapelle was decorated with the marbles of Ravenna[29] and Rome.[30] Five hundred years after Charlemagne a king of Sicily Robert, the wisest and most liberal sovereign of the age was supplied with the same materials by the easy navigation of the Tiber and the sea and Petrarch sighs in indignant complaint, that the ancient capital of the world should adorn from her own bowels the slothful luxury of Naples.[31] But these examples of plun der or purchase were rare in the darker ages and the Romans, alone and unenvied, might have applied to their private or public use the remaining structures of antiquity if in their present form and situation they had not been useless in a great measure to the city and its inhabitants The walls still described the old circumference but the city had descended from the seven hills into the Campus Martius and some of the noblest monuments which had braved the injuries of time were left in a desert far remote from the habitations of mankind. The palaces of the senators were no longer adapted to the manners or fortunes of their in digent successors the use of baths[32] and porti coes was forgotten in the sixth century the games of the theatre amphitheatre and circus had been interrupted some temples were de voted to the prevailing worship but the Chris tian churches preferred the holy figure of the cross and fashion or reason had distributed after a peculiar model the cells and offices of the cloister Under the ecclesiastical reign the number of these pious foundations was enor mously multiplied and the city was crowded with forty monasteries of men twenty of wo men and sixty chapters and colleges of canons and priests [33] who aggravated instead of relieving the depopulation of the tenth century But if the forms of ancient architecture were disregarded by a people insensible of their use and beauty, the plentiful materials were applied to every call of necessity or superstition till the fairest columns of the Ionic and Corinthian orders the richest marbles of Paros and Numidia, were degraded perhaps to the support of a convent or a stable The daily havoc which is perpetrated by the Turks in the cities of Greece and Asia may afford a melancholy example and in the gradual destruction of the monuments of Rome Sixtus the Fifth may alone be excused for employing the stones of the Septizonium in the glorious edifice of St Peter's [34] A fragment a ruin howsoever mangled or profaned may be viewed with pleasure and regret but the greater part of the marble was deprived of substance as well as of place and proportion it was burnt to lime for the purpose of cement Since the arrival of Poggius the temple of Concord[35] and many capital structures had vanished from his eyes and an epigram of the same age expresses a just and pious fear that the continuance of this practice would finally annihilate all the monuments of antiquity [36] The smallness of their numbers was the sole check on the demands and depredations of the Romans The imagination of Petrarch might create the presence of a mighty people [37] and I hesitate to believe that even in the fourteenth century, they could be reduced to a contemptible list of thirty three thousand inhabitants From that period to the reign of Leo the Tenth, if they multiplied to the amount of eighty five thousand [38] the increase of citizens was in some degree pernicious to the ancient city

IV I have reserved for the last the most potent and forcible cause of destruction the domestic hostilities of the Romans themselves Under the dominion of the Greek and French emperors the peace of the city was disturbed by accidental though frequent seditions it is from the decline of the latter from the beginning of the tenth century that we may date the licentiousness of private war which violated with impunity the laws of the Code and the Gospel without respecting the majesty of the absent sovereign or the presence and person of the vicar of Christ In a dark period of five hundred years Rome was perpetually afflicted by the sanguinary quarrels of the nobles and the people the Guelphs and Ghibelines the Colonna and Ursini and if much has escaped the knowledge, and much is unworthy of the notice, of history I have exposed in the two preceding chapters the causes and effects of the public disorders At such a time when every quarrel was decided by the sword and none could trust their lives or properties to the impotence of law the powerful citizens were armed for safety or offence against the domestic enemies whom they feared or hated Except Venice alone, the same dangers and designs were common to all the free republics of Italy and the nobles usurped the prerogative of fortifying their houses and erecting strong towers[39] that were capable of resisting a sudden attack The cities were filled with these hostile edifices and the example of Lucca, which contained three hundred towers, her law, which confined their height to the measure of four score feet may be extended with suitable latitude to the more opulent and populous states. The first step of the senator Brancaleone in the establishment of peace and justice was to demolish (as we have already seen) one hundred and forty of the towers of Rome and, in the last days of anarchy and discord, as late as the reign of Martin the Fifth forty four still stood in one of the thirteen or fourteen regions of the city To this mischievous purpose the remains of antiquity were most readily adapted the temples and arches afforded a broad and solid basis for the new structures of brick and stone and we can name the modern turrets that were raised on the triumphal monuments of Julius Cæsar Titus and the Antonines [40] With some slight alterations a theatre an amphitheatre a mausoleum was transformed into a strong and spacious citadel I need not repeat that the mole of Hadrian has assumed the title and form of the castle of St Angelo[41] the Septizonium of Severus was capable of standing against a royal army [42] the sepulchre of Metella has sunk under its outworks [43] the theatres of Pompey and Marcellus were occupied by the Savelli and Ursini families [44] and the rough fortress has been gradually softened to the splendour and elegance of an Italian palace. Even the churches were encompassed with arms and bulwarks and the military engines on the roof of St. Peter's were the terror of the Vatican and the scandal of the Christian world Whatever is fortified will be attacked and whatever is attacked may be destroyed Could the Romans have wrested from the popes the castle of St Angelo they had resolved by a public decree to annihilate that monument of servitude Every building of defence was exposed to a siege and in every siege the arts and engines of destruc tion were laboriously employed After the death of Nicholas the Fourth Rome without a sovereign or a senate was abandoned six months to the fury of civil war The houses says a cardinal and poet of the times [45] were crushed by the weight and velocity of enormous stones [46] the walls were perforated by the strokes of the battering ram the towers were involved in fire and smoke and the assailants were stimulated by rapine and revenge The work was consummated by the tyranny of the laws and the factions of Italy alternately exercised a blind and thoughtless vengeance on their adversaries, whose houses and castles they razed to the ground.[47] In comparing the days of foreign with the ages of domestic hostility we must pronounce that the latter have been far more ruinous to the city and our opinion is confirmed by the evidence of Petrarch Behold says the laureate, the relics of Rome, the image of her pristine greatness! neither time nor the barbarian can boast the merit of this stupendous destruction it was perpetrated by her own citizens, by the most illustrious of her sons and your ancestors (he writes to a noble Annibaldi) have done with the battering ram what the Punic hero could not accomplish with the sword. [48] The influence of the two last principles of decay must in some degree be multiplied by each other since the houses and towers which were subverted by civil war required a new and perpetual supply from the monuments of antiquity

These general observations may be separately applied to the amphitheatre of Titus which has obtained the name of the COLISEUM [49] either from its magnitude or from Nero's colossal statue an edifice, had it been left to time and nature, which might perhaps have claimed an eternal duration. The curious antiquaries, who have computed the numbers and seats are disposed to believe that above the upper row of stone steps the amphitheatre was encircled and elevated with several stages of wooden galleries which were repeatedly consumed by fire and restored by the emperors. Whatever was precious, or portable or profane the statues of gods and heroes, and the costly ornaments of sculpture which were cast in brass or overspread with leaves of silver and gold became the first prey of conquest or fanaticism, of the avarice of the barbarians or the Christians In the massy stones of the Coliseum many holes are discerned and the two most probable conjectures represent the various accidents of its decay These stones were connected by solid links of brass or iron nor had the eye of rapine overlooked the value of the baser metals [50] the vacant space was converted into a fair or market the artisans of the Coliseum are mentioned in an ancient survey and the chasms were perforated or enlarged to receive the poles that supported the shops or tents of the mechanic trades.[51] Reduced to its naked majesty the Flavian amphitheatre was contemplated with awe and admiration by the pilgrims of the North and their rude enthusiasm broke forth in a sublime proverbial expression which is recorded in the eighth century in the fragments of the venerable Bede As long as the Coliseum stands, Rome shall stand when the Coliseum falls Rome will fall when Rome falls the world will fall [52] In the modern system of war a situation commanded by three hills would not be chosen for a fortress but the strength of the walls and arches could resist the engines of assault a numerous garrison might be lodged in the enclosure and while one faction occupied the Vatican and the Capitol the other was intrenched in the Lateran and the Coliseum.[53]

The abolition at Rome of the ancient games must be understood with some latitude and the carnival sports of the Testacean mount and the Circus Agonalis,[54] were regulated by the law[55] or custom of the city The senator presided with dignity and pomp to adjudge and distribute the prizes the gold ring or the pallium [56] as it was styled of cloth or silk. A tribute on the Jews supplied the annual expense [57] and the races, on foot on horseback, or in chariots, were ennobled by a tilt and tournament of seventy two of the Roman youth In the year one thousand three hundred and thirty two a bull feast after the fashion of the Moors and Spaniards was celebrated in the Coliseum itself and the living manners are painted in a diary of the times [58] A convenient order of benches was restored and a general proclamation as far as Rimini and Ravenna, invited the nobles to exercise their skill and courage in this perilous adventure. The Roman ladies were marshalled in three squadrons and seated in three balconies which on this day the third of September were lined with scarlet cloth The fair Jacova di Rovere led the matrons from beyond the Tiber a pure and native race who still represent the features and character of antiquity The remainder of the city was divided as usual between the Colonna and Ursini the two factions were proud of the number and beauty of their female bands the charms of Savella Ursini are mentioned with praise and the Co-

lonna regretted the absence of the youngest of their house who had sprained her ankle in the garden of Nero's tower The lots of the champions were drawn by an old and respectable citizen, and they descended into the arena or pit, to encounter the wild bulls, on foot as it should seem, with a single spear Amidst the crowd our annalist has selected the names colours, and devices of twenty of the most conspicuous knights Several of the names are the most illustrious of Rome and the ecclesiastical state Malatesta Polenta della Valle Cafarello, Savelli Capoccio Conti, Annibaldi, Altieri Corsi the colours were adapted to their taste and situation the devices are expressive of hope or despair, and breathe the spirit of gallantry and arms ' I am alone, like the youngest of the Horatii the confidence of an intrepid stranger I live disconsolate ' a weeping widower 'I burn under the ashes a discreet lover I adore Lavinia or Lucretia ' the ambiguous declaration of a modern passion My faith is as pure, ' the motto of a white livery Who is stronger than myself?" of a lion s hide If I am drowned in blood what a pleasant death! ' the wish of ferocious courage The pride or prudence of the Ursini restrained them from the field which was occupied by three of their hereditary rivals whose inscriptions denoted the lofty greatness of the Colonna name Though sad I am strong " ' Strong as I am great ' If I fall ' addressing himself to the spectators, you fall with me '—intimating (says the contemporary writer) that while the other families were the subjects of the Vatican they alone were the supporters of the Capitol The combats of the amphitheatre were dangerous and bloody Every champion successively encountered a wild bull and the victory may be ascribed to the quadrupeds since no more than eleven were left on the field with the loss of nine wounded and eighteen killed on the side of their adversaries Some of the noblest families might mourn, but the pomp of the funerals in the churches of St John Lateran and Sta Maria Maggiore afforded a second holiday to the people Doubtless it was not in such conflicts that the blood of the Romans should have been shed yet in blaming their rashness we are compelled to applaud their gallantry and the noble volunteers who display their magnificence and risk their lives under the balconies of the fair excite a more generous sympathy than the thousands of captives and malefactors who were reluctantly dragged to the scene of slaughter [59]

This use of the amphitheatre was a rare, perhaps a singular, festival the demand for the materials was a daily and continual want, which the citizens could gratify without restraint or remorse In the fourteenth century a scandalous act of concord secured to both factions the privilege of extracting stones from the free and common quarry of the Coliseum [60] and Poggius laments that the greater part of these stones had been burnt to lime by the folly of the Romans [61] To check this abuse, and to prevent the nocturnal crimes that might be perpetrated in the vast and gloomy recess, Eugenius the Fourth surrounded it with a wall and by a charter long extant, granted both the ground and edifice to the monks of an adjacent convent [62] After his death the wall was overthrown in a tumult of the people and had they themselves respected the noblest monument of their fathers they might have justified the resolve that it should never be degraded to private property The inside was damaged, but in the middle of the sixteenth century an era of taste and learning the exterior circumference of one thousand six hundred and twelve feet was still entire and inviolate a triple elevation of fourscore arches which rose to the height of one hundred and eight feet Of the present ruin the nephews of Paul the Third are the guilty agents and every traveller who views the Farnese palace may curse the sacrilege and luxury of these upstart princes [63] A similar reproach is applied to the Barberini and the repetition of injury might be dreaded from every reign till the Coliseum was placed under the safeguard of religion by the most liberal of the pontiffs, Benedict the Fourteenth who consecrated a spot which persecution and fable had stained with the blood of so many Christian martyrs [64]

When Petrarch first gratified his eyes with a view of those monuments whose scattered fragments so far surpass the most eloquent descriptions he was astonished at the supine indifference [65] of the Romans themselves [66] he was humbled rather than elated by the discovery that except his friend Rienzi and one of the Colonna a stranger of the Rhône was more conversant with these antiquities than the nobles and natives of the metropolis [67] The ignorance and credulity of the Romans are elaborately displayed in the old survey of the city which was composed about the beginning of the thirteenth century and without dwelling on the manifold errors of name and place, the legend of the Capitol [68] may provoke a smile of contempt and indignation ' The Capitol '

says the anonymous writer, 'is so named as being the head of the world where the consuls and senators formerly resided for the govern ment of the city and the globe The strong and lofty walls were covered with glass and gold and crowned with a roof of the richest and most curious carving Below the citadel stood a pal ace, of gold for the greatest part, decorated with precious stones, and whose value might be esteemed at one third of the world itself The statues of all the provinces were arranged in order each with a small bell suspended from its neck and such was the contrivance of art magic,[69] that, if the province rebelled against Rome, the statue turned round to that quarter of the heavens, the bell rang the prophet of the Capitol reported the prodigy and the senate was admonished of the impending danger A second example of less importance though of equal absurdity may be drawn from the two marble horses, led by two naked youths which have since been transported from the baths of Constantine to the Quirinal hill The ground less application of the names of Phidias and Praxiteles may perhaps be excused but these Grecian sculptors should not have been re moved above four hundred years from the age of Pericles to that of Tiberius they should not have been transformed into two philosophers or magicians, whose nakedness was the symbol of truth and knowledge who revealed to the emperor his most secret actions and after re fusing all pecuniary recompense solicited the honour of leaving this eternal monument of themselves.[70] Thus awake to the power of magic, the Romans were insensible to the beauties of art no more than five statues were visible to the eyes of Poggius and of the multi tudes which chance or design had buried under the ruins, the resurrection was fortunately de layed till a safer and more enlightened age [71] The Nile, which now adorns the Vatican had been explored by some labourers in digging, a vineyard near the temple or convent of the Minerva but the impatient proprietor who was tormented by some visits of curiosity re stored the unprofitable marble to its former grave [72] The discovery of a statue of Pompey ten feet in length, was the occasion of a lawsuit. It had been found under a partition wall the equitable judge had pronounced that the head should be separated from the body to satisfy the claims of the contiguous owners and the sentence would have been executed if the intercession of a cardinal and the liber ality of a pope, had not rescued the Roman hero from the hands of his barbarous countrymen [73]

But the clouds of barbarism were gradually dispelled and the peaceful authority of Martin the Fifth and his successors restored the orna ments of the city as well as the order of the ec clesiastical state The improvements of Rome since the fifteenth century have not been the spontaneous produce of freedom and industry The first and most natural root of a great city is the labour and populousness of the adjacent country which supplies the materials of sub sistence of manufactures and of foreign trade. But the greater part of the Campagna of Rome is reduced to a dreary and desolate wilderness the overgrown estates of the princes and the clergy are cultivated by the lazy hands of indi gent and hopeless vassals and the scanty har vests are confined or exported for the benefit of a monopoly A second and more artificial cause of the growth of a metropolis is the residence of a monarch the expense of a luxurious court, and the tributes of dependent provinces. Those provinces and tributes had been lost in the fall of the empire and if some streams of the silver of Peru and the gold of Brazil have been at tracted by the Vatican the revenues of the cardinals the fees of office, the oblations of pil grims and clients and the remnant of ecclesi astical taxes, afford a poor and precarious supply which maintains, however the idleness of the court and city The population of Rome far below the measure of the great capitals of Europe does not exceed one hundred and seventy thousand inhabitants [74] and within the spacious enclosure of the walls, the largest por tion of the seven hills is overspread with vine yards and ruins. The beauty and splendour of the modern city may be ascribed to the abuses of the government, to the influence of super stition Each reign (the exceptions are rare) has been marked by the rapid elevation of a new family enriched by the childless pontiff at the expense of the church and country The palaces of these fortunate nephews are the most costly monuments of elegance and servitude the per fect arts of architecture painting and sculp ture have been prostituted in their service and their galleries and gardens are decorated with the most precious works of antiquity which taste or vanity has prompted them to collect. The ecclesiastical revenues were more decently employed by the popes themselves in the pomp of the Catholic worship but it is superfluous to enumerate their pious foundations of altars, chapels and churches, since these lesser stars are eclipsed by the sun of the Vatican, by the dome of St Peter, the most glorious structure that ever has been applied to the use of religion The fame of Julius the Second, Leo the Tenth, and Sixtus the Fifth, is accompanied by the superior merit of Bramante and Fontana, of Raphael and Michael Angelo and the same munificence which had been displayed in palaces and temples was directed with equal zeal to revive and emulate the labours of antiquity Prostrate obelisks were raised from the ground, and erected in the most conspicuous places of the eleven aqueducts of the Cæsars and consuls, three were restored the artificial rivers were conducted over a long series of old or of new arches, to discharge into marble basins a flood of salubrious and refreshing waters and the spectator impatient to ascend the steps of St Peter s, is detained by a column of Egyptian granite which rises between two lofty and perpetual fountains to the height of one hundred and twenty feet The map, the description the monuments of ancient Rome have been elucidated by the diligence of the antiquarian and the student [75] and the footsteps of heroes, the relics, not of superstition, but of empire are devoutly visited by a new race of pilgrims from the remote and once savage countries of the North

Of these pilgrims, and of every reader the attention will be excited by a History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire the greatest, perhaps, and most awful scene in the history of mankind The various causes and progressive effects are connected with many of the events most interesting in human annals the artful policy of the Cæsars who long maintained the name and image of a free republic, the disorders of military despotism the rise, establishment, and sects of Christianity the foundation of Constantinople the division of the monarchy the invasion and settlements of the barbarians of Germany and Scythia the institutions of the civil law, the character and religion of Mohammed, the temporal sovereignty of the popes, the restoration and decay of the Western empire of Charlemagne the crusades of the Latins in the East the conquests of the Saracens and Turks, the ruin of the Greek empire the state and revolutions of Rome in the middle age The historian may applaud the importance and variety of his subject but while he is conscious of his own imperfections he must often accuse the deficiency of his materials It was among the ruins of the Capitol that I first conceived the idea of a work which has amused and exercised near twenty years of my life, and which, however inadequate to my own wishes, I finally deliver to the curiosity and candour of the public

NOTES CHAPTERS XLI—LXXI

Chapter XLI

1 The complete series of the Vandal war is related by Procopius in a regular and elegant narrative (l. i. c. 9–25, l. ii. c. 1–13) and happy would be my lot, could I always tread in the footsteps of such a guide. From the entire and diligent perusal of the Greek text I have a right to pronounce that the Latin and French versions of Grotius and Cousin may not be implicitly trusted yet the President Cousin has been often praised and Hugo Grotius was the first scholar of a learned age.

2 See Ruinart, Hist. Persecut. Vandal. c. xii. p. 589 (ed. Par. 1694). His best evidence is drawn from the Life of St. Fulgentius composed by one of his disciples transcribed in a great measure in the Annals of Baronius, and printed in several great collections (Catalog. Bibliot. Bunavianæ, tom. i. vol. ii. p. 1258).

3 For what quality of the mind or body? For speed, or beauty or valour?—In what language did the Vandals read Homer?—Did he speak German?—The Latins had four versions (Fabric. tom. i. l. ii. c. 3 p. 297) yet in spite of the praises of Seneca (Consol. [ad Polyb.] c. 26) they appear to have been more successful in imitating than in translating the Greek poets. But the name of Achilles might be famous and popular even among the illiterate barbarians.

4 A year—absurd exaggeration! The conquest of Africa may be dated A.D. 533 September 14. It is celebrated by Justinian in the preface to his Institutes which were published November 21 of the same year. Including the voyage and return such a computation might be truly applied to our Indian empire.

5 Ὤρμητο δὲ ὁ Βελισάριος ἐκ Γερμανίας ἣ Θρᾳκῶν καὶ Ἰλλυριῶν μεταξὺ κεῖται (Procop. Vandal. l. i. c. 11 [tom. i. p. 361 ed. Bonn]). Aleman (Not. ad Anecdot. p. 5) an Italian could easily reject the German vanity of Giphanius and Velserus, who wished to claim the hero but his Germania a metropolis of Thrace, I cannot find in any civil or ecclesiastical lists of the provinces and cities.

6 The two first Persian campaigns of Belisarius are fairly and copiously related by his secretary (Pers. l. i. c. 12–18).

7 See the birth and character of Antonina in the Anecdotes c. 1 and the notes of Alemannus p. 3.

8 See the preface of Procopius (Bell. Pers. c. 1). The enemies of archery might quote the reproaches of Diomede (Iliad xi. 385 etc.) and the permittere vulnera ventis of Lucan (viii. 383) yet the Romans could not despise the arrows of the Parthians and in the siege of Troy Pandarus Paris and Teucer pierced those haughty warriors who insulted them as women or children.

9 Νευρὴν μὲν μαζῷ πέλασεν, τόξῳ δὲ σίδηρον (Iliad iv. 123). How concise—how just—how beautiful is the whole picture! I see the attitudes of the archer—I hear the twanging of the bow—

Λίγξε βιός, νευρὴ δὲ μέγ' ἴαχεν, ἆλτο δ' ὀϊστός.

10. The text appears to allow for the largest vessels 50,000 medimni, or 3000 tons (since the medimnus weighed 160 Roman or 120 avoirdupois, pounds). I have given a more rational interpretation, by supposing that the Attic style of Procopius conceals the legal and popular modius a sixth part of the medimnus (Hooper's Ancient Measures p. 152 etc.) A contrary and indeed a stranger mistake has crept into an oration of Dinarchus (contra Demosthenem, in Reiske Orator. Græc. tom. iv P. ii. p. 34). By reducing the number of ships from 500 to 50, and translating μέδιμνοι by mines or pounds Cousin has generously allowed 500 tons for the whole of the Imperial fleet?—Did he never think?

11 I have read of a Greek legislator who inflicted a double penalty on the crimes committed in a state of intoxication but it seems agreed that this was rather a political than a moral law.

12 Or even in three days since they anchored the first evening in the neighbouring isle of Tenedos the second day they sailed to Lesbos, the third to the promontory of Eubœa, and on the fourth they reached Argos (Homer Odyss. iii 130–183. Wood's Essay on Homer p. 40–46). A pirate sailed from the Hellespont to the seaport of Sparta in three days (Xenophon Hellen. l. ii. c. 1).

13 Caucana near Camarina is at least 50 miles (350 or 400 stadia) from Syracuse (Cluver Sicilia Antiqua p. 191).

14. Procopius Gothic. l. i. c. 3. Tibi tollit hinnitum apta quadrigis equa, in the Sicilian pastures of Grosphus (Horat. Carm. ii. 16). Acragas magnanimum quondam generator equorum (Virg. Æneid iii. 704). Thero's horses whose victories are immortalised by Pindar were bred in this country.

15 The Caput Vada of Procopius (where Justinian afterwards founded a city—De Edific. l. vi. c. 6) is the promontory of Ammon in Strabo the Brachodes of Ptolemy the Capaudia of the moderns, a long narrow slip that runs into the sea (Shaw's Travels p. 111).

16 A centurion of Mark Antony expressed though in a more manly strain the same dislike to the sea and to naval combats (Plutarch in the life of Antony).

dome of St Peter, the most glorious structure that ever has been applied to the use of religion The fame of Julius the Second Leo the Tenth, and Sixtus the Fifth is accompanied by the superior merit of Bramante and Fontana of Raphael and Michael Angelo, and the same munificence which had been displayed in palaces and temples was directed with equal zeal to revive and emulate the labours of antiquity Prostrate obelisks were raised from the ground, and erected in the most conspicuous places of the eleven aqueducts of the Cæsars and consuls, three were restored the artificial rivers were conducted over a long series of old or of new arches to discharge into marble basins a flood of salubrious and refreshing waters and the spectator, impatient to ascend the steps of St Peter's is detained by a column of Egyptian granite, which rises between two lofty and perpetual fountains to the height of one hundred and twenty feet The map the description the monuments of ancient Rome have been elucidated by the diligence of the antiquarian and the student [75] and the footsteps of heroes the relics not of superstition but of empire, are devoutly visited by a new race of pilgrims from the remote and once savage countries of the North

Of these pilgrims, and of every reader, the attention will be excited by a History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire the greatest, perhaps, and most awful scene in the history of mankind The various causes and progressive effects are connected with many of the events most interesting in human annals the artful policy of the Cæsars who long maintained the name and image of a free republic, the disorders of military despotism, the rise, establishment, and sects of Christianity the foundation of Constantinople, the division of the monarchy, the invasion and settlements of the barbarians of Germany and Scythia the institutions of the civil law, the character and religion of Mohammed the temporal sovereignty of the popes the restoration and decay of the Western empire of Charlemagne the crusades of the Latins in the East, the conquests of the Saracens and Turks, the ruin of the Greek empire, the state and revolutions of Rome in the middle age The historian may applaud the importance and variety of his subject but while he is conscious of his own imperfections he must often accuse the deficiency of his materials It was among the ruins of the Capitol that I first conceived the idea of a work which has amused and exercised near twenty years of my life, and which however inadequate to my own wishes I finally deliver to the curiosity and candour of the public.

bodies and yellow hair the phenomenon (which is likewise visible in the Andes of Peru, Buffon, tom. iii. p. 504) may naturally be ascribed to the elevation of the ground and the temperature of the air

36 The geographer of Ravenna (l. iii. c. xi. p. 129, 130, 131 Paris, 1688) describes the Mauritania Gaditana (oppos te to Cadiz) ubi gens Vandalorum, a Belisario devicta in Africâ fugit, et nunquam comparuit.

37 A single voice had protested and Genseric dismissed, without a formal answer the Vandals of Germany but those of Africa derided his prudence, and affected to despise the poverty of their forests (Procopius Vandal. l. i. c. 22)

38 From the mouth of the great Elector (in 1687) Tollius describes the secret royalty and rebellious spirit of the Vandals of Brandenburgh, who could muster five or six thousand soldiers who had procured some cannon, etc. (Itinerar Hungar p. 42 apud Dubos Hist de la Monarchie Françoise, tom. i. p 182 183) The veracity not of the elector but of Tollius himself may justly be suspected.

39 Procop us (l. i. c. 22 [tom i. p 400, ed. Bonn]) was in total darkness—οὔτε μνήμη τις οὔτε ὄνομα ἐς ἐμὲ σωζεται. Under the reign of Dagobert (A.D 630) the Sclavonian tribes of the Sorbi and Venedi already bordered on Thuringia (Mascou, Hist. of the Germans xv 3 4, 5)

40 Sallust represents the Moors as a remnant of the army of Heracles (de Bell. Jugurth. c 21 [18]) and Procopius (Vandal. l. ii. c. 10 [tom ii. p 450, ed. Bonn]) as the posterity of the Cananæans who fled from the robber Joshua (λῃστής) He quotes two columns with a Phœnician inscription. I believe in the columns—I doubt the inscription—and reject the pedigree.

41 Virgil (Georgic. iii. 339) and Pomponius Mela (i. 8) describe the wandering life of the African shepherds similar to that of the Arabs and Tartars and Shaw (p 222) is the best commentator on the poet and the geographer

42 The customary gifts were a sceptre a crown or cap a white cloak, a figured tunic and shoes all adorned with gold and silver nor were these precious metals less acceptable in the shape of coin (Procop Vandal. l. i. c. 25)

43 See the African government and warfare of Solomon in Procop us (Vandal. l. ii. c 10 11 12 13, 19, 20) He was recalled and again restored and his last victory dates in the thirteenth year of Justinian (A.D 539) An accident in his childhood had rendered him an eunuch (l. i. c. 11) the other Roman generals were amply furnished with beards πώγωνος ἐμπιπλάμενοι (l ii. c. 8)

44 This natural antipathy of the horse for the camel is affirmed by the ancients (Xenophon. Cyropæd l. vi. [c. 2] p 438 l. vii. [c. 1] p 483 492 edit. Hutchinson Polyæn. Stratagem vii. 6 [§ 6] Plin. Hist. Nat viii. 26 Ælian de Natur Animal. l. iii. c. 7) but it is disproved by daily experience, and derided by the best judges, the Orientals (Voyage d Olearius p 553)

45 Procopius is the first who describes Mount Aurasius (Vandal. l. ii. c. 13 De Ædific. l. vi. c. 7) He may be compared with Leo Africanus (dell Africa parte v in Ramusio tom. i. fol. 77 recto) Marmol (tom. ii. p 430) and Shaw (p 56–59)

46 Isidor Chron p 722 edit Grot Mariana Hist Hispan l. v c. 8 p 173 Yet according to Isidore, the siege of Ceuta and the death of Theudes happened A. Æ. H 586—A.D 548 and the place was defended not by the Vandals but by the Romans.

50 Lilybæum was built by the Carthaginians Olymp xcv 4 and in the first Punic war a strong situation and excellent harbour rendered that place an important object to both nations.

51 Compare the different passages of Procopius (Vandal l. ii. c. 5 Gothic. l. i. c. 3)

52 For the reign and character of Amalasontha see Procopius (Gothic. l. i. c. 2 3 4, and Anecdot. c. 16 with the Notes of Alemannus) Cassiodorus (Var viii. ix. x. and xi 1) and Jornandes (de Rebus Geticis, c 59 and De Successione Regnorum in Muratori tom i. p 241)

53 The marriage of Theodoric with Audefleda, the sister of Clovis may be placed in the year 495 soon after the conquest of Italy (De Buat, Hist. des Peuples, tom. ix. p 213) The nuptials of Eutharic and Amalasontha were celebrated in 515 (Cassiodor in Chron. p 453 [tom 1 p 395 ed. Rotom])

54 At the death of Theodoric his grandson Athalaric is described by Procopius as a boy about eight years old—ὀκτὼ γεγονὼς ἔτη Cassiodorus, with authority and reason adds two years to his age—infantulum adhuc vix decennem

55 The lake, from the neighbouring towns of Etruria was styled either Vulsiniensis (now of Bolsena) or Tarquiniensis. It is surrounded with white rocks and stored with fish and wild fowl. The younger Pliny (Epist. ii. 96 [95]) celebrates two woody islands that floated on its waters if a fable, how credulous the ancients! If a fact how careless the moderns! Yet since Pliny the islands may have been fixed by new and gradual accessions.

56 Yet Procopius discredits his own evidence (Anecdot c 16) by confessing that in his public history he had not spoken the truth See the Epistles from queen Gundelina to the empress Theodora (Var x. 20 21 23 and observe a suspicious word, de illâ personâ etc.) with the elab-

19 The neighbourhood of Carthage the sea, the land and the rivers are changed almost as much as the works of man The isthmus or neck of the city is now confounded with the continent the harbour is a dry plain and the lake or stagnum no more than a morass, with six or seven feet water in the mid channel See D Anville (Géographie Ancienne tom iii p 82) Shaw (Travels, p 77–84) Marmol (Description de l Afrique tom. ii p 465) and Thuanus (lviii 12, tom iii. p 334)

20 From Delphi, the name of Delphicum was given both in Greek and Latin to a tripod and, by an easy analogy the same appellation was extended at Rome Constantinople and Carthage to the royal banqueting room (Procopius Vandal l i. c 21 Ducange Gloss Græc p 277 Δελφικὸν ad Alexiad 412)

21 These orations always express the sense of the times, and sometimes of the actors I have condensed that sense and thrown away declamation

22 The relics of St Augustin were carried by the African bishops to their Sardinian exile (A D 500) and it was believed in the eighth century that Liutprand king of the Lombards transported them (A D 721) from Sardinia to Pavia In the year 1695 the Augustin friars of that city found a brick arch marble coffin silver case silk wrapper, bones blood etc., and perhaps an inscription of Agostino in Gothic letters But this useful discovery has been disputed by reason and jealousy (Baronius Annal A D 725 No 2–9 Tillemont Mém Ecclés. tom xiii p 944. Montfaucon Diarium Ital p 26–30 Muratori Antiq Ital. Medii Ævi. tom v dissert lviii p 9 who had composed a separate treatise before the decree of the bishop of Pavia and pope Benedict XIII)

23 Τὰ τῆς πολιτείας προοίμια is the expression of Procopius (de Edific l vi c 7) Ceuta, which has been defaced by the Portuguese, flourished in nobles and palaces in agriculture and manufactures under the more prosperous reign of the Arabs (l Afrique de Marmol tom ii p 236)

24 See the second and third preambles to the Digest or Pandects promulgated A D 533 December 16 To the titles of Vandalicus and Africanus Justinian or rather Belisarius had acquired a just claim Gothicus was premature, and Francicus false and offensive to a great nation.

25 See the original acts in Baronius (A.D. 535, No 21–54) The emperor applauds his own clemency to the heretics cum sufficiat eis vivere.

26 Dupin (Geograph Sacra Africana, p. lix. ad Optat Milev) observes and bewails this episcopal decay In the more prosperous age of the church, he had noticed 690 bishoprics but however minute were the dioceses it is not probable that they all existed at the same time.

27 The African laws of Justinian are illustrated by his German biographer (Cod l. i tit 27 Novell. 36 37 131 Vit Justinian p 349–377)

28 Mount Papua is placed by D Anville (tom. iii p 92, and Tabul. Imp Rom Occident.) near Hippo Regius and the sea yet this situation ill agrees with the long pursuit beyond Hippo and the words of Procopius (l ii. c. 4 [tom i. p. 427, ed Bonn]) ἐν τοῖς Νουμιδίας ἐσχάτοις

29 Shaw (Travels p 220) most accurately represents the manners of the Bedoweens and Kabyles the last of whom by their language are the remnant of the Moors yet how changed—how civilised are these modern savages!—provisions are plenty among them, and bread is common.

30 By Procopius it is styled a lyre perhaps harp would have been more national The instruments of music are thus distinguished by Venantius Fortunatus —

> Romanusque lyrâ tibi plaudat, Barbarus harpâ

31 Herodotus elegantly describes the strange effects of grief in another royal captive Psammetichus [Psammenitus] of Egypt who wept at the lesser and was silent at the greatest of his calamities (l iii c 14) In the interview of Paulus Æmilius and Perses Belisarius might study his part but it is probable that he never read either Livy or Plutarch and it is certain that his generosity did not need a tutor

32 After the title of imperator had lost the old military sense, and the Roman auspices were abolished by Christianity (see La Bléterie Mém de l Académie tom xxi p 302–332) a triumph might be given with less inconsistency to a private general.

33 If the Ecclesiastes be truly a work of Solomon and not like Prior s poem a pious and moral composition of more recent times in his name, and on the subject of his repentance. The latter is the opinion of the learned and free-spirited Grotius (Opp Theolog tom i p 258) and indeed the Ecclesiastes and Proverbs display a larger compass of thought and experience than seem to belong either to a Jew or a king

34 In the Bélisaire of Marmontel the king and the conqueror of Africa meet sup and converse, without recollecting each other It is surely a fault of that romance that not only the hero but all to whom he had been so conspicuously known appear to have lost their eyes or their memory

35 Shaw p 59 Yet since Procopius (l ii. c. 13 [tom. i. p 466 ed Bonn]) speaks of a people of Mount Atlas as already distinguished by white

branch of the palm tree, whose name, φοῖνιξ is synonymous to red (Aulus Gellius ii. 26)

76 I interpret βανδ Μάριος not as a proper name, but an office, standard bearer from bandum (vexillum) a barbaric word adopted by the Greeks and Romans (Paul Diacon. l. i. c. 20 p 760) Grot. Nomina Gothica, p. 575. (Ducange, Gloss Latin. tom. i. p. 539, 540.)

77 M. D'Anville has given in the Memoirs of the Academy for the year 1756 (tom. xxx p 198–236) a plan of Rome on a smaller scale but far more accurate, than that which he had delineated in 1738 for Rollin's history Experience had improved his knowledge and instead of Rossi's topography he used the new and excellent map of Nolli. Pliny's old measure of xiii must be reduced to viii miles It is easier to alter a text than to remove hills or buildings.

78. In the year 1709 Labat (Voyages en Italie, tom. iii. p 218) reckoned 138 568 Christian souls, bes des 8000 or 10 000 Jews—without souls?—In the year 1763 the numbers exceeded 160,000.

79. The accurate eye of Nardini (Roma Antica, l. i. c. viii. p. 31) could distinguish the tumultuarie opere di Belisario

80. The fissure and leaning in the upper part of the wall, which Procopius observed (Goth. l. i. c. 14 [tom. ii. p 76 ed. Bonn]) is visible to the present hour (Donat. Roma Vetus l. i. c. 17 p 53 54)

81 Lipsius (Opp tom iii. Poliorcet. l. iii.) was ignorant of this clear and conspicuous passage of Procopius (Goth. l. i. c. 21 [p 104, ed. Bonn]) The engine was named ὄναγρος the wild ass a calcitrando (Hen. Steph. Thesaur Linguæ Græc tom. ii. p 1340 1341 tom. iii. p 877) I have seen an ingenious model, contrived and executed by General Melville, which imitates or surpasses the art of antiquity

82 The description of this mausoleum, or mole in Procopius (l. i. c 22 [tom i. p 106 ed. Bonn]) is the first and best. The height above the walls σχεδόν ἐς λίθου βολήν On Nolli's great plan the sides measure 260 English feet.

83 Praxiteles excelled in Fauns and that of Athens was his own masterpiece. Rome now contains above thirty of the same character When the ditch of St. Angelo was cleansed under Urban VIII the workmen found the sleeping Faun of the Barberini palace but a leg a thigh and the right arm had been broken from that beautiful statue (Winckelman Hist. de l Art, tom. ii. p 52 53 tom. iii. p. 265)

84. Procopius has given the best description of the temple of Janus (Goth. l. i. c. 25) a national deity of Latium (Heyne Excurs. v ad l. vii. Æneid) It was once a gate in the primitive city of Romulus and Numa (Nardini, p 13 256 329) Virgil has described the ancient rite like a poet and an antiquarian.

86 For the Roman trumpet and its various notes consult Lipsius de Militiâ Romanâ (Opp tom. iii. l. iv dialog x. p 125–129) A mode of distinguishing the charge by the horse-trumpet of solid brass, and the retreat by the foot trumpet of leather and light wood was recommended by Procopius and adopted by Belisarius (Goth. l. ii. c. 23 [tom. ii. p 241 ed Bonn])

87 Procopius (Goth. l. ii. c. 3 [p 154, ed Bonn]) has forgot to name these aqueducts nor can such a double intersection at such a distance from Rome, be clearly ascertained from the writings of Frontinus Fabretti, and Eschinard de Aquis and de Agro Romano or from the local maps of Lameti and Cingolani, Seven or eight miles from the city (50 stadia) on the road to Albano between the Latin and Appian ways, I discern the remains of an aqueduct (probably the Septimian) a series (630 paces) of arches twenty five feet high (ὑψηλῶς ἄγαν)

88 They made sausages ἀλλᾶντας of mule's flesh unwholesome, if the animals had died of the plague. Otherwise the famous Bologna sausages are said to be made of ass-flesh (Voyages de Labat tom. ii. p 218)

89. The name of the palace the hill, and the adjoining gate were all derived from the senator Pincius Some recent vestiges of temples and churches are now smoothed in the garden of the Minims of the Trinità del Monte (Nardini l. iv c. 7 p 196 Eschinard p 209 210 the old plan of Buffalino and the great plan of Nolli) Belisarius had fixed his station between the Pincian and Salarian gates (Procop Goth l. i. c. 19 [tom. ii. p 97 ed. Bonn])

90. From the mention of the primum et secundum velum it should seem that Belisarius even in a siege represented the emperor and maintained the proud ceremonial of the Byzantine palace.

91 Of this act of sacrilege, Procopius (Goth l. i. c 25 [tom. ii. p 121 ed. Bonn]) is a dry and reluctant witness The narratives of Liberatus (Breviarum, c. 22) and Anastasius (de Vit. Pont. p 39 [ap Murat tom iii. p 130]) are characteristic, but passionate. Hear the execrations of Cardinal Baronius (A D 536 No 123 A.D 538 No 4–20) portentum facinus omni execratione dignum.

92 The old Capena was removed by Aurelian to or near the modern gate of St Sebastian (see Nolli's plan) That memorable spot has been consecrated by the Egerian grove, the memory of Numa triumphal arches, the sepulchres of the Scipios Metelli etc

93 The expression of Procopius has an invidious cast—τύχη ἐκ τοῦ ἀσφαλοῦς τῇ σφίσι ξυμβησομένῃ παραδοκεῖν (Goth l. ii c. 4 [tom. ii. p 160 ed. Bonn]) Yet he is speaking of a woman

94. Anastasius (p 40 [tom iii. p 130 ed. Murat.]) has preserved this epithet of Sanguinarius which might do honour to a tiger

orate Commentary of Buat (tom x p 177-185)

57 For the conquest of Sicily compare the narrative of Procopius with the complaints of Totila (Gothic l i c 5 l iii c 16) The Gothic queen had lately relieved that thankless island (Var ix 10 11)

58 The ancient magnitude and splendour of the five quarters of Syracuse are delineated by Cicero (in Varrem actio ii l iv c 52, 53) Strabo (l vi p 415 [p 270 ed Casaub]) and D Orville Sicula (tom ii p 174-202) The new city restored by Augustus shrunk towards the island

59 Procopius (Vandal l ii c 14 15) so clearly relates the return of Belisarius into Sicily (p 146 edit Hoeschelii [tom i p 481 ed Bonn]) that I am astonished at the strange misapprehension and reproaches of a learned critic (Œuvres de la Mothe le Vayer tom viii p 162 163)

60 The ancient Alba was ruined in the first age of Rome On the same spot, or at least in the neighbourhood successively arose 1 The villa of Pompey, etc 2 A camp of the Prætorian cohorts 3 The modern episcopal city of Albanum or Albano (Procop Goth l ii c 4 Cluver Ital. Antiq tom ii p 914)

61 A Sibylline oracle was ready to pronounce —Africâ captâ mundus cum nato peribit a sentence of portentous ambiguity (Gothic l i c 7), which has been published in unknown characters by Opsopæus an editor of the oracles The Père Maltret has promised a commentary but all his promises have been vain and fruitless

62 In his chronology imitated in some degree from Thucydides, Procopius begins each spring the years of Justinian and of the Gothic war and his first era coincides with the first of April 535 and not 536 according to the Annals of Baronius (Pagi Crit tom ii p 555 who is followed by Muratori and the editors of Sigonius) Yet in some passages we are at a loss to reconcile the dates of Procopius with himself and with the Chronicle of Marcellinus

63 The series of the first Gothic war is represented by Procopius (l i c 5-29 l ii c 1-30 l iii c 1) till the captivity of Vitiges With the aid of Sigonius (Opp tom i de Imp Occident l xvii xviii) and Muratori (Annali d Italia tom. v) I have gleaned some few additional facts

65 Nero (says Tacitus Annal xv 33) Neapolim quasi Græcum urbem delegit One hundred and fifty years afterwards in the time of Septimius Severus the Hellenism of the Neapolitans is praised by Philostratus γένος Ἕλληνες καὶ ἀστοὶ οἱ ὅθεν καὶ τὰς σπουδὰς τῶν λόγων Ἑλληνικοί εἰσι (Icon L i p 763 edit Olear)

66 The otium of Naples is praised by the Roman poets by Virgil Horace Silius Italicus and Statius (Cluver Ital Ant l iv p 1149, 1150) In an elegant epistle (Silv L iii 5 p 94-98 edit. Markland) Statius undertakes the difficult task of drawing his wife from the pleasures of Rome to that calm retreat

67 This measure was taken by Roger I after the conquest of Naples (A D 1139) which he made the capital of his new kingdom (Giannone, Istoria Civile tom ii p 169) That city the third in Christian Europe is now at least twelve miles in circumference (Jul Cæsar Capacci Hist Neapol l i p 47) and contains more inhabitants (350 000) in a given space than any other spot in the known world

68 Not geometrical but common paces or steps of 22 French inches (D Anville, Mesures Itinéraires, p 7, 8) the 2363 do not make an English mile

69 Belisarius was reproved by pope Sylverius for the massacre. He repeopled Naples and imported colonies of African captives into Sicily Calabria and Apulia (Hist Miscell l xvi in Muratori tom i p 106 107)

70 Beneventum was built by Diomede, the nephew of Meleager (Cluver tom ii p. 1195 1196) The Calydonian hunt is a picture of savage life (Ovid Metamorph. l. viii) Thirty or forty heroes were leagued against a hog the brutes (not the hog) quarrelled with a lady for the head

71 The Decennovium is strangely confounded by Cluverius (tom ii p 1007) with the river Ufens. It was in truth a canal of nineteen miles, from Forum Appii to Terracina on which Horace embarked in the night The Decennovium which is mentioned by Lucan Dion Cassius and Cassiodorus has been successively ruined restored and obliterated (D Anville Analyse de l Italie p. 185 etc)

72 A Jew gratified his contempt and hatred for all the Christians by enclosing three bands, each of ten hogs and discriminated by the names of Goths Greeks and Romans Of the first almost all were found dead—almost all of the second were alive—of the third half died and the rest lost their bristles No unsuitable emblem of the event.

73 Bergier (Hist des Grands Chemins des Romains tom i p 221-228 440-444) examines the structure and materials while D Anville (Analyse de l Italie p 200-213) defines the geographical line

74 Of the first recovery of Rome the year (536) is certain from the series of events rather than from the corrupt or interpolated text of Procopius the month (December) is ascertained by Evagrius (l iv c. 19) and the day (the tenth) may be admitted on the slight evidence of Nicephorus Callistus (l xvii c 13) For this accurate chronology we are indebted to the diligence and judgment of Pagi (tom ii p 559 560)

75 A horse of a bay or red colour was styled φάλιον by the Greeks balan by the barbarians and spadix by the Romans Honesti spadices says Virgil (Georgic l iii 81 with the Observations of Martin and Heyne) Σπάδιξ or βάλιον signifies a

76. I interpret βανδαλάριος not as a proper name but an office, standard bearer from bandum (vexillum) a barbaric word adopted by the Greeks and Romans (Paul Diacon. l. i. c. 20, p. 760) Grot. Nomina Gothica, p 575. (Ducange, Gloss Latin. tom. i. p. 539, 540.)

Poliorcet. l. iii.) was ignorant of this clear and conspicuous passage of Procopius (Goth. l. i c. 21 [p 104, ed Bonn]) The engine was named ὄναγρος the wild ass a calcitrando (Hen. Steph. Thesaur Linguæ Græc. tom. ii. p 1340 1341 tom. iii. p 877) I have seen an ingenious model, contrived and executed by General Melville, which imitates or surpasses the art of antiquity

82. The description of this mausoleum, or mole, in Procopius (l. i. c 22 [tom. i. p 106 ed. Bonn]) is the first and best. The height above the walls σχεδόν τι ἐς λίθου βολήν On Nolli's great plan, the sides measure 260 English feet.

83. Praxiteles excelled in Fauns and that of Athens was his own masterpiece. Rome now contains above thirty of the same character When the ditch of St. Angelo was cleansed under Urban VIII the workmen found the sleeping Faun of the Barberini palace but a leg a thigh, and the right arm had been broken from that beautiful statue (Winckelman, Hist. de l Art, tom. ii. p 52 53 tom. iii. p 265)

84. Procopius has given the best description of the temple of Janus (Goth. l. i. c. 25) a national deity of Latium (Heyne Excurs v ad l. vii. Æneid) It was once a gate in the primitive city of Romulus and Numa (Nardini p 13 256 329) Virgil has described the ancient rite like a poet and an antiquarian

86. For the Roman trumpet and its various notes, consult Lipsius de Militiâ Romanâ (Opp. tom. iii. l. iv dialog x p. 125–129) A mode of distinguishing the charge by the horse trumpet of solid brass, and the retreat by the foot trumpet of leather and light wood was recommended by Procopius, and adopted by Belisarius (Goth. l. ii. c. 23 [tom. ii. p 241 ed Bonn])

87. Procopius (Goth. l. ii. c. 3 [p 154 ed. Bonn]) has forgot to name these aqueducts nor can such a double intersection at such a distance from Rome, be clearly ascertained from the writings of Frontinus Fabretti, and Eschinard de Aquis and de Agro Romano or from the local maps of Lameti and Cingolani Seven or eight miles from the city (50 stadia) on the road to Albano between the Latin and Appian ways I discern the remains of an aqueduct (probably the Septimian) a series (630 paces) of arches twenty five feet high (ὑψηλῶ ἐς ἄγαν)

88. They made sausages ἀλλᾶντας of mule's flesh unwholesome, if the animals had died of the plague. Otherwise the famous Bologna sausages are said to be made of ass-flesh (Voyages de Labat tom. ii. p 218)

89. The name of the palace, the hill, and the adjoining gate were all derived from the senator Pincius Some recent vestiges of temples and churches are now smoothed in the garden of the Minims of the Trinità del Monte (Nardini, l. iv c. 7 p 196 Eschinard p 209 210 the old plan of Buffalino and the great plan of Nolli) Belisarius had fixed his station between the Pincian and Salarian gates (Procop Goth l. i. c. 19 [tom. ii. p. 97 ed. Bonn])

90. From the mention of the primum et secundum velum it should seem that Belisarius even in a siege, represented the emperor and maintained the proud ceremonial of the Byzantine palace.

91. Of this act of sacrilege, Procopius (Goth. l. i. c. 25 [tom. ii. p 121 ed Bonn]) is a dry and reluctant witness. The narratives of Liberatus (Breviarium, c. 22) and Anastasius (de Vit. Pont p 39 [ap Murat. tom. iii. p 130]) are characteristic, but passionate. Hear the execrations of Cardinal Baronius (A.D 536 No 123 A.D 538 No 4–20) portentum facinus omni execratione dignum

92. The old Capena was removed by Aurelian to or near the modern gate of St Sebastian (see Nolli's plan) That memorable spot has been consecrated by the Egerian grove the memory of Numa triumphal arches, the sepulchres of the Scipios, Metelli etc

93. The expression of Procopius has an invidious cast—τύχη ἐς τὸ ἀσφαλὲς ... ἀφανῆ τῇ σφίσι ξυμβησομένῃ ... (Goth l. ii c. 4 [tom. ii. p 160 ed. Bonn]) Yet he is speaking of a woman.

94. Anastasius (p 40 [tom iii. p 130 ed. Murat.]) has preserved this epithet of Sanguinarius which might do honour to a tiger

95 This transaction is related in the public history (Goth l ii c 8 [p 180, ed Bonn]) with candour or caution in the Anecdotes (c 7 [c. 1 p 16, ed Bonn]) with malevolence or freedom but Marcellinus or rather his continuator (in Chron) casts a shade of premeditated assassination over the death of Constantine He had performed good service at Rome and Spoleto (Procop Goth l i c 7 16 [tom ii p 81 ed Bonn]) but Alemannus confounds him with a Constantianus comes stabuli

96 They refused to serve after his departure, sold their captives and cattle to the Goths and swore never to fight against them Procopius introduces a curious digression on the manners and adventures of this wandering nation a part of whom finally emigrated to Thule or Scandinavia (Goth l ii c. 14 15)

97 This national reproach of perfidy (Procop Goth l ii c 25 [tom ii p 247 ed Bonn]) offends the ear of La Mothe le Vayer (tom viii p 163-165) who criticises as if he had not read the Greek historian

98 Baronius applauds his treason and justifies the catholic bishops—qui ne sub heretico principe degant omnem lapidem movent—a useful caution The more rational Muratori (Annali d Italia, tom v p 54) hints at the guilt of perjury and blames at least the imprudence of Datius

99 St Datius was more successful against devils than against barbarians He travelled with a numerous retinue and occupied at Corinth a large house (Baronius, A D 538 No 89, A D 539 No 20)

100 Μυριάδες τριάκοντα (compare Procopius Goth l ii c 7 21 [tom ii p 234 ed Bonn]) Yet such population is incredible and the second or third city of Italy need not repine if we only decimate the numbers of the present text Both Milan and Genoa revived in less than thirty years (Paul Diacon de Gestis Langobard l ii c 38 [16 or 22?])

101 Besides Procopius perhaps too Roman see the Chronicles of Marius and Marcellinus Jornandes (in Success Regn in Muratori tom i p 241) and Gregory of Tours (l iii c 32 in tom ii. of the Historians of France) Gregory supposes a defeat of Belisarius who in Aimoin (de Gestis Franc l ii c 23 in tom iii p 59) is slain by the Franks

102 Agathias l i [c 4] p 14 15 [ed Par p 20 21 ed Bonn] Could he have seduced or subdued the Gepidæ or Lombards of Pannonia the Greek historian is confident that he must have been destroyed in Thrace

103 The king pointed his spear—the bull overturned a tree on his head—he expired the same day Such is the story of Agathias but the original historians of France (tom ii. p 202 403, 558 667) impute his death to a fever

104 Without losing myself in a labyrinth of species and names—the aurochs urus bisons bubalus bonasus buffalo etc. (Buffon, Hist Nat tom xi and Supplement, tom iii vi), it is certain that in the sixth century a large wild species of horned cattle was hunted in the great forests of the Vosges in Lorraine, and the Ardennes (Greg Turon tom ii. l. x. c. 10 p 369)

105. In the siege of Auximum, he first laboured to demolish an old aqueduct and then cast into the stream, 1 dead bodies 2 mischievous herbs and 3 quick lime, which is named (says Procop us l ii c 27) τίτανος by the ancients by the moderns ἄσβεστος Yet both words are used as synonymous in Galen Dioscorides and Lucian (Hen Steph. Thesaur Ling Græc. tom iii p 748)

106 The Goths suspected Mathasuenta as an accomplice in the mischief which perhaps was occasioned by accidental lightning

107 In strict philosophy, a limitation of the rights of war seems to imply nonsense and contradiction Grotius himself is lost in an idle distinction between the jus naturæ and the jus gentium, between poison and infection He balances in one scale the passages of Homer (Odyss i 259 etc.) and Florus (l. ii c 20 No 7, ult) and in the other the examples of Solon (Pausanias, l. x. c. 37) and Belisarius See his great work De Jure Belli et Pacis (l. iii c 4 s 15 16 17 and in Barbeyrac s version tom ii p 257, etc) Yet I can understand the benefit and validity of an agreement tacit or express mutually to abstain from certain modes of hostility See the Amphictyonic oath in Æschines de Falsâ Legatione

108 Ravenna was taken not in the year 540, but in the latter end of 539 and Pagi (tom. ii. p. 569) is rectified by Muratori (Annali d Italia tom. v p 62) who proves from an original act on papyrus (Antiquit Italiæ Medii Ævi tom ii dissert. xxxii p 999-1007 Maffei Istoria Diplomat p. 155-160) that before the third of January 540, peace and free correspondence were restored between Ravenna and Faenza

109 He was seized by John the Sanguinary, but an oath or sacrament was pledged for his safety in the Basilica Julii (Hist Miscell l xvi in Muratori, tom i p 107) Anastasius (in Vit Pont. p. 40 [l. iii p 130 ed Murat]) gives a dark but probable account Montfaucon is quoted by Mascou (Hist. of the Germans xii 21) for a votive shield representing the captivity of Vitiges and now in the collection of Signor Landi at Rome

110 Vitiges lived two years at Constantinople and imperatoris in affectû convictus (or conjunctus) rebus excessit humanis His widow Mathasuenta the wife and mother of the patricians the elder and younger Germanus united the streams of Anician and Amali blood (Jornandes c. 60, p 221, in Muratori tom i)

111 Procopius Goth l. iii c 1 [p. 283 ed Bonn] Aimoin a French monk of the eleventh century who had obtained and has disfigured some authentic information of Belisarius mentions in his name 12 000 pueri or slaves—quos propriis alimus stipendiis—besides 18 000 soldiers

112. The diligence of Alemannus could add but little to the four first and most curious chapters of the Anecdotes. Of these strange Anecdotes, a part may be true, because probable and a part true, because improbable. Procopius must have known the former and the latter he could scarcely invent.

113 Procopius insinuates (Anecdot c. 4 [tom. iii. p. 33, ed. Bonn]) that when Belisarius returned to Italy (A D 543) Antonina was sixty years of age A forced but more polite construction, which refers that date to the moment when he was writing (A D 559) would be compatible with the manhood of Photius (Gothic. l. i c. 10) in 536.

114. Compare the Vandalic War (l. i. c 12) with the Anecdotes (c. i. [tom. iii. p 14, ed. Bonn] and Alemannus (p 2 3) This mode of baptismal adoption was revived by Leo the philosopher

115 In November 537 Photius arrested the pope (Liberat Brev c 22 Pagi tom. ii p 562) About the end of 539 Belisarius sent Theodosius—τὸν τῇ οἰκίᾳ τῇ αὐτοῦ ἐφεστῶτα—on an important and lucrative commission to Ravenna (Goth. l. ii. c. 28 [tom. ii. p 261 ed Bonn])

116 Theophanes (Chronograph. p 204 [ed Par tom i. p 373 ed Bonn]) styles him Photinus the son in law of Belisarius and he is copied by the Historia Miscella and Anastasius.

117 The continuator of the Chronicle of Marcellinus gives, in a few decent words, the substance of the Anecdotes Belisarius de Oriente evocatus in offensam periculumque incurrens grave et, invidiæ subjacens rursus remittitur in Italiam (p 54)

Chapter XLII

1 It will be a pleasure, not a task to read Herodotus (l. vii. c. 104, 134) The conversation of Xerxes and Demaratus at Thermopylæ is one of the most interesting and moral scenes in history It was the torture of the royal Spartan to behold, with anguish and remorse, the virtue of his country

2 See this proud inscription in Pliny (Hist. Natur vii. 27) Few men have more exquisitely tasted of glory and disgrace nor could Juvenal (Satir x.) produce a more striking example of the vicissitudes of fortune and the vanity of human wishes

3. Γραικοὺς ... ἐξ ὧν τὰ πρότερα οὐδένα ἐς Ἰταλίαν ... ἥκοντα εἶδον, ὅτι μὴ τραγῳδοὺς καὶ ναύτας λωποδύτας [Goth i. 18 tom ii. p 93 ed. Bonn] This last epithet of Procopius is too nobly translated by pirates naval thieves is the proper word strippers of garments either for injury or insult (Demosthenes contra Canon, in Reiske, Orator Græc. tom ii. p 1264)

4. See the third and fourth books of the Gothic War the writer of the Anecdotes cannot aggravate these abuses.

5. Agathias L v [c 14] p 157 158 [p 306 ed. Bonn]. He confines this weakness of the emperor and the empire to the old age of Justinian but alas! he was never young

6. This mischievous policy which Procopius (Anecdot. c 19 [tom iii. p 113 ed Bonn]) imputes to the emperor is revealed in his epistle to a Scythian prince who was capable of understanding it. Ἀγαν προμηθῆ καὶ ἀγχινούστατον says Agathias (l. v [c. 5] p 170, 171 [p 331 ed. Bonn])

7 Gens Germanâ feritate ferocior says Velleius Paterculus of the Lombards (ii. 106) Langobardos paucitas nobilitat. Plurimis ac valentissimis nationibus cincti non per obsequium, sed prœliis et periclitando tuti sunt (Tacit. de Moribus German c. 40) See likewise Strabo (l. vii. p 446 [p. 290 291 ed Casaub]) The best geographers place them beyond the Elbe, in the bishopric of Magdeburg and the middle march of Brandenburg and their situation will agree with the patriotic remark of the Count de Hertzeberg that most of the barbarian conquerors issued from the same countries which still produce the armies of Prussia

8. The Scandinavian origin of the Goths and Lombards as stated by Paul Warnefrid [l i. c 2] surnamed the Deacon, is attacked by Cluverius (Germania Antiq l. iii. c. 26 p 102 etc.) a native of Prussia, and defended by Grotius (Prolegom. ad Hist. Goth p 38 etc.) the Swedish ambassador

9. Two facts in the narrative of Paul Diaconus (l. i. c. 20) are expressive of national manners 1 Dum ad tabulam luderet—while he played at draughts. 2 Camporum viridantia lina. The cultivation of flax supposes property commerce agriculture and manufactures.

10. I have used without undertaking to reconcile, the facts in Procopius (Goth l. ii. c. 14, l. iii c. 33 34 l. iv c. 18 25), Paul Diaconus (de Gestis Langobard. l. i. c. 1–23 in Muratori Script. Rerum Italicarum tom. i. p 405–419) and Jornandes (de Success. Regnorum p 242) The patient reader may draw some light from Mascou (Hist of the Germans and Annotat xxiii.) and De Buat (Hist des Peuples, etc. tom ix. x. xi)

11 I adopt the appellation of Bulgarians from Ennodius (in Panegyr Theodorici Opp Sirmond tom i. p 1598 1599) Jornandes (de Rebus Geticis c. 5 p 194, et de Regn. Successione p 242) Theophanes (p 185 [tom. i p 338 ed. Bonn]) and the Chronicles of Cassiodorus and Marcellinus. The name of Huns is too vague the tribes of the Cutturgurians and Utturgurians are too minute and too harsh.

12 Procopius (Goth l iv c 19 [tom ii p 556 ed Bonn]) His verbal message (he owns himself an illiterate barbarian) is delivered as an epistle. The style is savage, figurative, and original.

13 This sum is the result of a particular list, in a curious MS fragment of the year 550 found in the library of Milan The obscure geography of the times provokes and exercises the patience of the Count de Buat (tom xi p 69–189) The French minister often loses himself in a wilderness which requires a Saxon and Polish guide

14 Panicum milium See Columella l ii c 9, p 430, edit Gesner Plin Hist Natur xviii 24, 25 The Sarmatians made a pap of millet mingled with mare's milk or blood In the wealth of modern husbandry, our millet feeds poultry, and not heroes See the dictionaries of Bomare and Miller

15 For the name and nation, the situation and manners of the Sclavonians see the original evidence of the sixth century in Procopius (Goth l ii c 26, l iii c 14) and the emperor Mauritius or Maurice (Stratagemat l xi c 5 apud Mascou, Annotat xxxi) The Stratagems of Maurice have been printed only as I understand at the end of Scheffer's edition of Arrian's Tactics at Upsal 1664 (Fabric Bibliot Græc l iv c 8 tom iii p 278) a scarce and hitherto to me an inaccessible book

16 Antes eorum fortissimi Taysis [Tausis] qui rapidus et verticosus in Histri fluenta furens devolvitur (Jornandes c 5 p 194 edit Murator Procopius Goth l iii c 14 et de Ædific l iv c 7) Yet the same Procopius mentions the Goths and Huns as neighbours, γειτονοῦντα, to the Danube (de Ædific l iv c 1)

17 The national title of Anticus, in the laws and inscriptions of Justinian was adopted by his successors, and is justified by the pious Ludewig (in Vit Justinian p 515) It had strangely puzzled the civilians of the middle age

18 Procopius Goth l iv c 15 [tom ii p 592, ed Bonn]

19 An inroad of the Huns is connected by Procopius with a comet perhaps that of 531 (Persic l ii c 4) Agathias (l v [c 11] p 154, 155 [p 300 ed Bonn]) borrows from his predecessor some early facts

20 The cruelties of the Sclavonians are related or magnified by Procopius (Goth l iii c 29 38) For their mild and liberal behaviour to their prisoners we may appeal to the authority somewhat more recent of the emperor Maurice (Stratagem l xi c 5 [p 272 sqq])

21 Topirus was situate near Philippi in Thrace or Macedonia opposite to the isle of Thasos, twelve days journey from Constantinople (Cellarius tom i p 676 840)

22 According to the malevolent testimony of the Anecdotes (c 18 [tom iii p 108 ed Bonn]) these inroads had reduced the provinces south of the Danube to the state of a Scythian wilderness

23 From Caf to Caf which a more rational geography would interpret from Imaus perhaps, to Mount Atlas According to the religious philosophy of the Mahometans the basis of Mount Caf is an emerald, whose reflection produces the azure of the sky The mountain is endowed with a sensitive action in its roots or nerves and their vibration at the command of God is the cause of earthquakes (D Herbelot, p 230, 231)

24. The Siberian iron is the best and most plentiful in the world and in the southern parts above sixty mines are now worked by the industry of the Russians (Strahlenberg, Hist of Siberia p 342, 387 Voyage en Sibérie par l Abbé Chappe d Auteroche p 603–608 edit in 12mo Amsterdam 1770) The Turks offered iron for sale yet the Roman ambassadors with strange obstinacy, persisted in believing that it was all a trick and that their country produced none (Menander in Excerpt Leg p 152 [ed Par p 380, ed Bonn])

25 Of Irgana kon (Abulghazi Khan Hist Généalogique des Tatars P ii c 5 p 71–77 c 15 p 155) The tradition of the Moguls of the 450 years which they passed in the mountains agrees with the Chinese periods of the history of the Huns and Turks (De Guignes tom i part ii p 376) and the twenty generations from their restoration to Zingis

26 The country of the Turks now of the Calmucks is well described in the Genealogical History p 521–562 The curious notes of the French translator are enlarged and digested in the second volume of the English version

27 Visdelou p 141 151 The fact though it strictly belongs to a subordinate and successive tribe may be introduced here

28 Procopius (Persic l i c 12 l ii c 3 Peyssonel Observations sur les Peuples Barbares p 99, 100) defines the distance between Caffa and the old Bosphorus at xvi long Tartar leagues

29 See in a Mémoire of M de Boze (Mém de l Académie des Inscriptions tom vi p 549–565) the ancient kings and medals of the Cimmerian Bosphorus and the gratitude of Athens in the Oration of Demosthenes against Leptines (in Reiske Orator Græc tom i p 466 467)

30 For the origin and revolutions of the first Turkish empire the Chinese details are borrowed from De Guignes (Hist des Huns tom i P ii p 367–462) and Visdelou (Supplément à la Bibliothèque Orient d Herbelot p 82–114) The Greek or Roman hints are gathered in Menander (p 108–164 [p 298 404, ed Bonn]) and Theophylact Simocatta (l vii c 7 8)

31 The river Til or Tula according to the geography of De Guignes (tom i part ii p lviii and 352) is a small though grateful stream of the desert that falls into the Orhon Selinga etc See Bell Journey from Petersburg to Pekin (vol ii p 124), yet his own description of the Keat down which he sailed into the Oby represents the name and attributes of the black river (p 139)

32. Theophylact, l. vii. c. 7 8. And yet his true Avars are invisible even to the eyes of M de Guignes and what can be more illustrious than the false? The right of the fugitive Ogors to that national appellation is confessed by the Turks themselves (Menander p 108)

33. The Alani are still found in the Genealogical History of the Tartars (p. 617) and in D Anville's maps They opposed the march of the generals of Zingis round the Caspian Sea and were overthrown in a great battle (Hist. de Gengiscan, l. iv c. 9 p 447)

34. The embassies and first conquests of the Avars may be read in Menander (Excerpt. Legat. p 99, 100 10 154, 155 [p 282–287 385–388 ed Bonn]) Theophanes (p 196 [tom i. p 359, ed. Bonn]) the Historia Miscella (l xvi. p 109) and Gregory of Tours (l. iv c. 3 29, in the Historians of France, tom. ii. p 214, 217)

35. Theophanes (Chron p 204) and the Hist Miscella (l. xvi. p 110) as understood by De Guignes (tom. i. part ii. p 354) seem to speak of a Turkish embassy to Justinian himself but that of Maniach in the fourth year of his successor Justin, is positively the first that reached Constantinople (Menander p 108)

36 The Russians have found characters rude hieroglyphics on the Irtish and Yenisei on medals, tombs idols, rocks obelisks etc (Strahlenberg Hist of Siberia p 324, 346 406 429) Dr Hyde (de Religione Veterum Persarum p 521 etc.) has given two alphabets of Thibet and of the Eygours I have long harboured a suspicion that all the Scythian, and some perhaps much, of the Indian science, was derived from the Greeks of Bactriana

37 All the details of these Turkish and Roman embassies, so curious in the history of human manners are drawn from the Extracts of Menander p 106–110 15 154 161 164 [295–303 380–385 397 405, ed Bonn]) in which we often regret the want of order and connection.

39. The fame of the new law for the community of women was soon propagated in Syria (Asseman Bibloth. Orient. tom. iii. p 402) and Greece (Procop Pers c l. c. 5)

40. He offered his own wife and sister to the prophet but the prayers of Nushirvan saved his mother and the indignant monarch never forgave the humiliation to which his filial piety had stooped pedes tuos deosculatus (said he to Mazdak) cujus fœtor adhuc nares occupat (Pocock Specimen Hist. Arab p 71)

41 Procopius Persic l. i c. 11 Was not Proclus over wise? Was not the danger imaginary?—The excuse at least, was injurious to a nation not ignorant of letters οὐ γράμμασιν οἱ βαρβάροι τοὺς παῖδας ποιοῦνται ἀλλ' ὅπλων κτῇ Whether any mode of adoption was practised in Persia I much doubt.

42 From Procopius and Agathias Pagi (tom. ii. p 543 626) has proved that Chosroes Nushirvan ascended the throne in the fifth year of Justinian (A.D 531 April 1—A.D 532 April 1) But the true chronology which harmonises with the Greeks and Orientals is ascertained by John Malala (tom. ii. 211 [ed Oxon p 471 ed Bonn]) Cabades or Kobad after a reign of forty three years and two months sickened the 8th and died the 13th of September A.D 531 aged eighty two years According to the Annals of Eutychius Nushirvan reigned forty seven years and six months and his death must consequently be placed in March A.D 579.

43 Procopius Persic. l. i. c. 23 [tom. i. p 118 ed. Bonn] Brisson de Regn Pers p 494. The gate of the palace of Ispahan is or was the fatal scene of disgrace or death (Chardin Voyage en Perse, tom. iv p 312 313)

44. In Persia the prince of the waters is an officer of state The number of wells and subterraneous channels is much diminished and with it the fertility of the soil 400 wells have been recently lost near Tauris, and 42 000 were once reckoned in the province of Khorasan (Chardin tom. iii. p. 99 100 Tavernier tom i. p 416)

45 The character and government of Nushirvan is represented sometimes in the words of D Herbelot (Bibliot. Orient. p 680, etc from Khondemir) Eutychius (Annal. tom ii p 1 9, 180—very rich) Abulpharagius (Dynast vii. p 94 95—very poor) Tarikh Schikard (p 144 150) Texeira (in Stevens l i. c. 35) Asseman (Bibliot. Orient. tom iii p 404 410) and the Abbé Fourmont (Hist de l Acad des Inscriptions, tom. vii. p 325–334) who has translated a spurious or genuine testament of Nushirvan.

46. A thousand years before his birth the judges of Persia had given a solemn opinion—τῷ βασιλεύοντι Περσέων ἐξεῖναι ποιέειν τὸ ἂν βούληται (Herodot l. iii. c. 31) Nor had this constitutional maxim been neglected as a useless and barren theory

47 On the literary state of Persia the Greek versions, philosophers sophists the learning or ignorance of Chosroes Agathias (l. i [c. 28 sq] p 66–71 [p 126 sqq ed Bonn]) displays much information and strong prejudices

48 Asseman. B bliot Orient tom. iv p DCCXLV vi vii

49 The Shah Nameh or Book of Kings is perhaps the original record of history which was translated into Greek by the interpreter Sergius (Agathias l. iv [c 30] p 141 [p 273 ed Bonn]) preserved after the Mahometan conquest and versified in the year 994 by the national poet Ferdoussi. See D Anquetil (Mém de l Académie tom xxxi. p 379) and Sir William Jones (Hist of Nadir Shah p 161)

50 In the fifth century the name of Restom or Rostam, a hero who equalled the strength c

twelve [120?] elephants, was familiar to the Armenians (Moses Chorenensis Hist Armen l ii c. 7 p 96 edit Whiston) In the beginning of the seventh, the Persian romance of Rostam and Isfendiar was applauded at Mecca (Sale s Koran c xxxi p 335) Yet this exposition of ludicrum novæ historiæ is not given by Maracci Refutat Alcoran p 544-548)

51 Procop (Goth l iv c. 10 [tom ii p 505, ed Bonn]) Kobad had a favourite Greek physician Stephen of Edessa (Persic l ii c 26 [tom i p 271 ed Bonn]) The practice was ancient and Herodotus relates the adventures of Democedes of Crotona (l iii c 125-137)

52 See Pagi, tom ii p 626 In one of the treaties an honourable article was inserted for the toleration and burial of the catholics (Menander in Excerpt Legat p 142 [p. 363 sq ed Bonn]) Nushizad a son of Nushirvan was a Christian, a rebel and—a martyr? (D Herbelot p 681)

53 On the Persian language, and its three dialects consult D Anquetil (p 339-343) and Jones (p 153-185) ἀγρία τινὶ γλώττῃ καὶ ἀμουσοτάτῃ is the character which Agathias (l ii [c 28] p 67 [p 126 ed Bonn]) ascribes to an idiom renowned in the East for poetical softness

54 Agathias [l c] specifies the Gorgias Phædo Parmenides, and Timæus Renaudot (Fabricius Biblioth Græc tom xii p 246-261) does not mention this barbaric version of Aristotle

55 Of these fables I have seen three copies in three different languages 1 In Greek, translated by Simeon Seth (A D 1100) from the Arabic and published by Starck at Berlin in 1697 in 12mo 2 In Latin, a version from the Greek, Sapientia Indorum inserted by Père Poussin at the end of his edition of Pachymer (p 547-620 edit Roman) 3 In French from the Turkish dedicated in 1540 to Sultan Soliman Contes et Fables Indiennes de Bidpai et de Lokman par MM Galland et Cardonne Paris 1778, 3 vols in 12mo Mr Warton (History of English Poetry, vol i p 129-131) takes a larger scope

56 See the Historia Shahiludii of Dr Hyde (Syntagm Dissertat tom ii p 61-69)

57 The endless peace (Procopius, Persic l i c 22 [tom i p 114 ed Bonn]) was concluded or ratified in the sixth year and third consulship of Justinian (A D 533 between January 1 and April 1 Pagi tom ii p 550) Marcellinus in his Chronicle uses the style of Medes and Persians

58 Procopius Persic l i c 26 [p 137 ed Bonn]

59 Almondar king of Hira was deposed by Kobad and restored by Nushirvan His mother from her beauty was surnamed Celestial Water an appellation which became hereditary and was extended for a more noble cause (liberality in famine) to the Arab princes of Syria (Pocock Specimen Hist Arab p 69 70)

60 Procopius Persic l ii c 1 [tom i p 154 ed Bonn] We are ignorant of the origin and object of this strata a paved road of ten days journey from Auranitis to Babylonia. (See a Latin note in Delisle s Map Imp Orient) Wesseling and D Anville are silent

61 I have blended in a short speech, the two orations of the Arsacides of Armenia and the Gothic ambassadors Procopius in his public history feels and makes us feel, that Justinian was the true author of the war (Persic l ii c 2 3)

62 The invasion of Syria the ruin of Antioch, etc , are related in a full and regular series by Procopius (Persic l ii c 5-14) Small collateral aid can be drawn from the Orientals yet not they but D Herbelot himself (p 680), should blush when he blames them for making Justinian and Nushirvan contemporaries On the geography of the seat of war D Anville (l Euphrate et le Tigre) is sufficient and satisfactory

63 In the public history of Procopius (Persic l i c 16 18 19, 20 21 24 25 26, 27 28) and with some slight exceptions we may reasonably shut our ears against the malevolent whisper of the Anecdotes (c 2 3 with the Notes as usual of Alemannus)

64 The Lazic war the contest of Rome and Persia on the Phasis is tediously spun through many a page of Procopius (Persic l ii c 15, 17 28 29, 30 Gothic l iv c 7-16) and Agathias (l ii iii and iv p 55-132 141)

65 The Periplus or circumnavigation of the Euxine Sea was described in Latin by Sallust and in Greek by Arrian 1 The former work which no longer exists has been restored by the singular diligence of M de Brosses first president of the parliament of Dijon (Hist de la République Romaine tom ii l iii p 199-298) who ventures to assume the character of the Roman historian His description of the Euxine is ingeniously formed of all the fragments of the original and of all the Greeks and Latins whom Sallust might copy or by whom he might be copied and the merit of the execution atones for the whimsical design 2 The Periplus of Arrian is addressed to the emperor Hadrian (in Geograph Minor Hudson tom i) and contains whatever the governor of Pontus had seen from Trebizond to Dioscurias whatever he had heard from Dioscurias to the Danube and whatever he knew from the Danube to Trebizond

66 Besides the many occasional hints from the poets historians etc of antiquity we may consult the geographical descriptions of Colchis by Strabo (l xi p 760-765 [p 497-501 ed Casaub]) and Pliny (Hist Natur vi 5 19 etc)

67 I shall quote and have used three modern descriptions of Mingrelia and the adjacent countries 1 Of the Père Archangeli Lamberti (Relations de Thevenot part i p 31-52 with a map) who has all the knowledge and prejudices of a missionary 2 Of Chardin (Voyages en Perse tom i p 54, 68-163) his observations are judicious and his own adventures in the country are still more instructive than his observations 3 Of Peys-

nel (Observations sur les Peuples Barbares p 50, 51, 58, 62 64, 65, 71 etc., and a more recent treatise, Sur le Commerce de la Mer Noire tom. ii. p 1–53) he had long resided at Caffa, as consul of France and his erudition is less valuable than his experience.

68 Pliny Hist. Natur l. xxxiii. 15. The gold and silver mines of Colchis attracted the Argonauts (Strab l. i. p 77 [p 45, ed Casaub]) The sagacious Chardin could find no gold in mines, rivers, or elsewhere. Yet a Mingrelian lost his hand and foot for showing some specimens at Constantinople of native gold.

71 Bougainville, Mémoires de l Académie des Inscriptions, tom. xxvi. p 33 on the African voyage of Hanno and the commerce of antiquity

72 A Greek historian, Timosthenes had affirmed in eam ccc nationes dissimilibus linguis descendere and the modest Pliny is content to add et postea a nostris cxxx interpretibus negotia ibi gesta (vi. 5) but the words nunc deserta cover a multitude of past fictions.

73. Buffon (Hist. Nat tom. iii. p 433–437) collects the unanimous suffrage of naturalists and travellers. If, in the time of Herodotus, they were in truth μελάγχροες and οὐλότριχες (and he had observed them with care) this precious fact is an example of the influence of climate on a foreign colony

74. The Mingrelian ambassador arrived at Constantinople with two hundred persons but he ate (sold) them day by day till his retinue was diminished to a secretary and two valets (Tavernier tom. i. p 365) To purchase his mistress a Mingrelian gentleman sold twelve priests and his wife to the Turks (Chardin, tom. i. p 66)

75. Strabo l. xi. p 763 [p. 499 ed Casaub] Lamberti, Relation de la Mingrelie. Yet we must avoid the contrary extreme of Chardin who allows no more than 20 000 inhabitants to supply an annual exportation of 12 000 slaves an absurdity unworthy of that judicious traveller 76 Herodot. l. iii. c. 97 See in l. vii. c. 79 their arms and service in the expedition of Xerxes against Greece.

77 Xenophon who had encountered the Colchians in his retreat (Anabasis l. iv [c. 8] p 320 343 348 edit. Hutchinson and Foster's Dissertation, p lxiii. lviii in Spelman's English version, vol. ii) styles them αὐτόνομοι Before the conquest of Mithridates they are named by Appian ἔθνος ἀρειμανές (de Bell. Mithridatico c. 15 tom. i. p 661 of the last and best edition by John Schweighaeuser Lipsiae, 1785 3 vols large octavo)

78. The conquest of Colchis by Mithridates and Pompey is marked by Appian (de Bell. Mithridat. [l. c]) and Plutarch (in Pompey)

80 In the time of Procopius there were no Roman forts on the Phasis. Pityus and Sebastopolis were evacuated on the rumour of the Persians (Goth. l. iv c. 4) but the latter was afterwards restored by Justinian (de Ædif. l. iii. c. 7 [tom. iii. p 261 ed Bonn])

81 In the time of Pliny Arrian and Ptolemy the Lazi were a particular tribe on the northern skirts of Colchis (Cellarius Geograph Antiq tom. ii. p 222) In the age of Justinian they spread or at least reigned over the whole country At present they have migrated along the coast towards Trebizond and compose a rude seafaring people, with a peculiar language (Chardin p 149 Peyssonel, p. 64)

82 John Malala Chron. tom. ii. p 134–137 [ed. Oxon. p 412–414, ed Bonn] Theophanes, p 144 (tom. i. p 259 ed Bonn] Hist. Miscell. l. xv p 103 The fact is authentic but the date seems too recent In speaking of their Persian alliance the Lazi contemporaries of Justinian employ the most obsolete words—ἐν γράμμασι μνημεῖα, πρόγονοι etc. Could they belong to a connection which had not been dissolved above twenty years?

83 The sole vestige of Petra subsists in the writings of Procopius and Agathias. Most of the towns and castles of Lazica may be found by comparing their names and position with the map of Mingrelia in Lamberti.

84. See the amusing letters of Pietro della Valle the Roman traveller (Viaggi tom ii. 207 209, 213 215 266 286 300 tom iii. p 54, 127) In the years 1618 1619 and 1620 he conversed with Shah Abbas and strongly encouraged a design which might have united Persia and Europe against their common enemy the Turk.

85. See Herodotus (l. i. c. 140) who speaks with diffidence Larcher tom i. p 399–401 Notes sur Herodote) Procopius (Persic l. i. c. 11 [tom. i. p 56 ed Bonn]) and Agathias (l. ii. p 61 62 [ed Par p 113 sq ed Bonn]) This practice agreeable to the Zendavesta (Hyde, de Relig Pers. c. 34, p 414–421) demonstrates that the burial of the Persian kings (Xenophon Cyropæd l. viii. [c. 7] p 658) τί γὰρ ... is a Greek fiction and that their tombs could be no more than cenotaphs.

86 The punishment of flaying alive could not be introduced into Persia by Sapor (Brisson de Regn. Pers. l. ii. p 578) nor could it be copied from the foolish tale of Marsyas the Phrygian piper most foolishly quoted as a precedent by Agathias (l iv p 132 133)

87 In the palace of Constantinople there were thirty silentiaries who are styled hastati ante fores cubiculi της [ἀμφὶ τὸν βασιλέα] σιγῆς ἐπιστάται an honourable title which conferred the rank without imposing the duties of a senator (Cod Theodos l vi tit 23 Gothofred Comment tom ii p 129)

88 On these judicial orations Agathias (l iii p 81–89 l iv p 108–119 [p 155–170 206–230 ed Bonn]) lavishes eighteen or twenty pages of false and florid rhetoric His ignorance or carelessness overlooks the strongest argument against the king of Lazica—his former revolt

89 Procopius represents the practice of the Gothic court of Ravenna (Goth l. i c. 7 [tom ii. p 34 ed Bonn]) and foreign ambassadors have been treated with the same jealousy and rigour in Turkey (Busbequius Epist iii. p 149 242 etc), Russia (Voyage d Olearius) and China (Narrative of M de Lange, in Bell s Travels, vol ii. p 189–311)

92 See Buffon Hist Naturelle tom iii. p 449 This Arab cast of features and complexion which has continued 3400 years (Ludolph Hist et Comment Æthiopic l i. c 4) in the colony of Abyssinia will justify the suspicion that race, as well as climate must have contributed to form the negroes of the adjacent and similar regions

93 The Portuguese missionaries Alvarez (Ramusio tom i. fol 204 rect 274 vers), Bermudez (Purchas s Pilgrims vol ii. l v c. 7 p 1149–1188) Lobo (Relation etc par M le Grand with xv Dissertations Paris 1728) and Tellez (Relations de Thevenot part iv) could only relate of modern Abyssinia what they had seen or invented The erudition of Ludolphus (Hist Æthiopica Francofurt 1681 Commentarius 1691 Appendix 1694) in twenty five languages could add little concerning its ancient history Yet the fame of Caled, or Ellisthæus the conqueror of Yemen, is celebrated in national songs and legends

94 The negotiations of Justinian with the Axumites or Æthiopians are recorded by Procopius (Persic l i c 19 20) and John Malala (tom. ii. p 163–165 193–196 [p 433 434–457 459 ed Bonn]) The historian of Antioch quotes the original narrative of the ambassador Nonnosus of which Photius (Biblioth Cod iii) has preserved a curious extract

95 The trade of the Axumites to the coast of India and Africa and the isle of Ceylon is curiously represented by Cosmas Indicopleustes (Topograph Christian l ii. p 132 138 139 140 l. xi p 338 339)

96 Ludolph Hist et Comment Æthiop l ii c. 3

97 The city of Negra or Nag ran in Yemen is surrounded with palm trees and stands in the high road between Saana, the capital, and Mecca from the former ten from the latter twenty days' journey of a caravan of camels (Abulfeda, Descript Arabiæ, p 52)

98 The martyrdom of St Arethas prince of Negra and his three hundred and forty companions is embellished in the legends of Metaphrastes and Nicephorus Callistus copied by Baronius (A D 522 No 22–66 A D 523 No 16–29), and refuted with obscure diligence by Basnage (Hist des Juifs tom xii. l viii c ii. p 333–348) who investigates the state of the Jews in Arabia and Æthiopia

99 Alvarez (in Ramusio tom i fol 219 vers 221, vers) saw the flourishing state of Axume in the year 1520—luogo molto buono e grande It was ruined in the same century by the Turkish invasion No more than one hundred houses remain but the memory of its past greatness is preserved by the regal coronation (Ludolph Hist et Comment l ii c 11)

100 The revolutions of Yemen in the sixth century must be collected from Procopius (Persic. l. i. c 19 20) Theophanes Byzant (apud Phot cod. lxiv p 80 [p 26 ed Bekk]) St Theophanes (in Chronograph p 144 145 188 189 206 207 [tom i. p 259 260 377 378 ed Bonn] who is full of strange blunders) Pocock (Specimen Hist Arab p 62 65) D Herbelot (Bibliot Orientale p 12 477) and Sale s Preliminary Discourse and Koran (c 105) The revolt of Abrahah is mentioned by Procopius and his fall though clouded with miracles is an historical fact.

Chapter XLIII

1 For the troubles of Africa I neither have nor desire another guide than Procopius whose eye contemplated the image and whose ear collected the reports of the memorable events of his own times In the second book of the Vandalic War he relates the revolt of Stoza (c 14–24) the return of Belisarius (c. 15) the victory of Germanus (c 16 17 18) the second administration of Solomon (c 19 20 21) the government of Sergius (c 22 23) of Areobindus (c. 24) the tyranny and death of

Gontharis (c. 25 26 27 28) nor can I discern any symptoms of flattery or malevolence in his various portraits

2 Yet I must not refuse him the merit of painting in lively colours the murder of Gontharis. One of the assassins uttered a sentiment not unworthy of a Roman patriot If I fail, says Artasires, in the first stroke, kill me on the spot, lest the rack should extort a discovery of my accomplices. (Vand ii. 28 tom. 1 p 529 ed Bonn.]

3. The Moorish wars are occasionally introduced into the narrative of Procopius (Vandal. l. ii c. 19-23 25 27 8 Gothic l. iv c. 17) and Theophanes adds some prosperous and adverse events in the last years of Justinian

4. Now Tibesh in the kingdom of Algiers It is watered by a river the Sujerass which falls into the Mejerda (Bagradas) Tibesh is still remarkable for its walls of large stones (like the Coliseum of Rome) a fountain, and a grove of walnut trees the country is fruitful, and the neighbouring Bereberes are warlike. It appears from an inscription, that under the reign of Hadrian the road from Carthage to Tebeste was constructed by the third legion (Marmol, Description de l Afrique, tom. ii. 442 443 Shaw's Travels, p 64, 65, 66)

5. Procopius Anecdot. c. 18 [tom. iii. p 107 d. Bonn] The series of the African history attests his melancholy truth

6 In the second (c 30) and third books (c. 40) Procopius continues the history of the Gothic war from the fifth to the fifteenth year of Justinian As the events are less interesting than in the former period he allots only half the space to double the time. Jornandes and the Chronicle of Marcellinus afford some collateral hints Sigonius, Pagi, Muratori, Mascou and De Buat are useful, and have been used.

7 Sylverius, bishop of Rome was first transported to Patara in Lycia and at length starved (sub eorum custodiâ inedia confectus) in the isle of Palmaria A D 538 June 20 (Liberat in Breviar c. 22 Anastasius in Sylverio Baronius A D 540 No 2 3 Pagi, in Vit Pont. tom i. p 285 286) Procopius (Anecdot c. 1) accuses only the empress and Antonina.

8 Palmaria a small island, opposite to Terracina and the coast of the Volsci (Cluver Ital. Antiq l. iii. c. 7 p 1014)

9 As the Logothete Alexander and most of his civil and military colleagues were either disgraced or despised the ink of the Anecdotes (c 4, 5 18) is scarcely blacker than that of the Gothic History (l. iii. c. 1 3 4, 9 20, 21 etc.)

10 Procopius (l. iii c 2 8 etc) does ample and willing justice to the merit of Totila The Roman historians, from Sallust and Tacitus were happy to forget the vices of their countrymen in the contemplation of barbaric virtue

11 Procopius l. iii. c. 12 The soul of a hero is deeply impressed on the letter nor can we confound such genuine and original acts with the elaborate and often empty speeches of the Byzantine historians.

12 The avarice of Bessas is not dissembled by Procopius (l. iii c 17, 20) He expiated the loss of Rome by the glorious conquest of Petræa (Goth l. iv c. 12) but the same vices followed him from the Tiber to the Phasis (c. 13) and the historian is equally true to the merits and defects of his character The chastisement which the author of the romance of Belisaire has inflicted on the oppressor of Rome is more agreeable to justice than to history

13 During the long exile and after the death of Vigilius the Roman church was governed at first by the archdeacon and at length (A D 555) by the pope Pelagius, who was not thought guiltless of the sufferings of his predecessor See the original Lives of the popes under the name of Anastasius (Muratori Script Rer Italicarum tom iii. P i. p 130 131) who relates several curious incidents of the sieges of Rome and the wars of Italy

14. Mount Garganus, now Monte St Angelo in the kingdom of Naples, runs three hundred stadia into the Hadriatic Sea (Strab l vi. p 436 [p 284, ed Casaub]) and in the darker ages was illustrated by the apparition miracles and church of St Michael the archangel Horace, a native of Apulia or Lucania had seen the elms and oaks of Garganus labouring and bellowing with the north wind that blew on that lofty coast (Carm. ii. 9 Epist. ii. i. 202)

15. I cannot ascertain this particular camp of Hannibal but the Punic quarters were long and often in the neighbourhood of Arpi (T Liv xxii. 9 12 xxiv 3 etc)

17 The tribuli are small engines with four spikes, one fixed in the ground the three others erect or adverse (Procopius Gothic l. iii. c. 24 [tom ii. p 379 ed. Bonn] Just Lipsius Poliorcet ω l. v c 3) The metaphor was borrowed from the tribuli (land-caltrops) an herb with a prickly fruit common in Italy (Martin ad Virgil. Georgic i. 153 vol ii. p 33)

18 Ruscia the navale Thuriorum was transferred to the distance of sixty stadia to Ruscianum Rossano an archbishopric without suffragans. The republic of Sybaris is now the estate of the Duke of Corigliano (Riedesel Travels into Magna Græcia and Sicily p 166-171)

19. This conspiracy is related by Procopius (Gothic l. iii. c. 31 32) with such freedom and candour that the liberty of the Anecdotes gives him nothing to add.

20. The honours of Belisarius are gladly commemorated by his secretary (Procop Goth l iii c 35 l iv c 21) The title of στρατηγος is ill translated, at least in this instance by præfectus prætorio and to a military character magister militum is more proper and applicable (Ducange, Gloss Græc p 1458 1459)

21 Alemannus (ad Hist Arcanam, p 68 [tom iii p 418, ed Bonn]), Ducange (Familiæ Byzant p 98), and Heineccius (Hist Juris Civilis p 434), all three represent Anastasius as the son of the daughter of Theodora and their opinion firmly reposes on the unambiguous testimony of Procopius (Anecdot c. 4 5—θυγατριδῷ twice repeated) And yet I will remark 1 That in the year 547 Theodora could scarcely have a grandson at the age of puberty 2 That we are totally ignorant of this daughter and her husband and 3 That Theodora concealed her bastards and that her grandson by Justinian would have been heir apparent of the empire

22 The ἁμαρτηματα or sins of the hero in Italy and after his return are manifested ἀπαρακαλύπτως and most probably swelled by the author of the Anecdotes (c 4 5) The designs of Antonina were favoured by the fluctuating jurisprudence of Justinian On the law of marriage and divorce that emperor was trocho versatilior (Heineccius, Element Juris Civil ad Ordinem Pandect P iv No 233)

23 The Romans were still attached to the monuments of their ancestors and according to Procopius (Goth l iv c. 22 [tom ii p 573 ed Bonn]) the galley of Æneas of a single rank of oars 25 feet in breadth 120 in length was preserved entire in the navalia near Monte Testaceo at the foot of the Aventine (Nardini Roma Antica, l vii c 9 p 466 Donatus Roma Antiqua l iv c 13 p 334) But all antiquity is ignorant of this relic.

24. In these seas Procopius searched without success for the isle of Calypso He was shown at Phæacia or Corcyra the petrified ship of Ulysses (Odyss xiii 163) but he found it a recent fabric of many stones dedicated by a merchant to Jupiter Casius (l iv c. 22 [tom ii p 575 ed Bonn]) Eustathius had supposed it to be the fanciful likeness of a rock

25 M D Anville (Mémoires de l Acad tom xxxii p 513-528) illustrates the gulf of Ambracia but he cannot ascertain the situation of Dodona A country in sight of Italy is less known than the wilds of America

26 See the acts of Germanus in the public (Vandal l. ii c 16 17 18 Goth l. iii c. 31 32) and private history (Anecdot c 5) and those of his son Justin in Agathias (l iv p 130 131 [p 250 sq ed Bonn]) Notwithstanding an ambiguous expression of Jornandes fratri suo Aleman nus has proved that he was the son of the emperor s brother

27 Conjuncta Aniciorum gens cum Amalâ stirpe spem adhuc utriusque generis promittit (Jornandes, c 60 p 703) He wrote at Ravenna before the death of Totila.

28 The third book of Procopius is terminated by the death of Germanus (Add l iv c 23 24, 25 26)

29 Procopius relates the whole series of this second Gothic war and the victory of Narses (l. iv c 21 26-35) A splendid scene! Among the six subjects of epic poetry which Tasso revolved in his mind he hesitated between the conquests of Italy by Belisarius and by Narses (Hayley s Works vol. iv p 70)

30 The country of Narses is unknown since he must not be confounded with the Persarmenian. Procopius styles him (Goth l ii c 13 [tom ii. p. 199 ed Bonn]) βασιλικων χρηματων ταμίας Paul Warnefrid (l. ii c 3 p 776) Chartularius Marcellinus adds the name of Cubicularius In an inscription on the Salarian bridge he is entitled Ex consul Ex præpositus Cubiculi Patricius (Mascou Hist of the Germans l xiii. c. 25) The law of Theodosius against eunuchs was obsolete or abolished (Annotation xx), but the foolish prophecy of the Romans subsisted in full vigour (Procop. l iv c 21 [tom ii p 571 ed Bonn])

31 Paul Warnefrid the Lombard records with complacency the succour service and honourable dismission of his countrymen—Romanæ reipublicæ adversum æmulos adjutores fuerunt (l. ii c. l. p 774 edit Grot) I am surprised that Alboin, their martial king, did not lead his subjects in person

32 He was if not an impostor the son of the blind Zames saved by compassion and educated in the Byzantine court by the various motives of policy pride and generosity (Procop Persic. l. i. c 23 [tom i p 115 ed Bonn])

33 In the time of Augustus and in the middle ages the whole waste from Aquileia to Ravenna was covered with woods lakes and morasses Man has subdued nature and the land has been cultivated since the waters are confined and embanked. See the learned researches of Muratori (Antiquitat Italiæ Medii Ævi tom i dissert xxi p 253 254) from Vitruvius Strabo Herodian old charters and local knowledge

34 The Flaminian way as it is corrected from the Itineraries and the best modern maps by D Anville (Analyse de l Italie p 147-162) may be thus stated Rome to Narni 51 Roman miles Terni 57 Spoleto 75 Foligno 88 Nocera 103 Cagli 142 Intercisa 157 Fossombrone, 160, Fano 176 Pesaro 184 RIMINI 208—about 189 English miles He takes no notice of the death of Totila but Wesseling (Itinerar p 614) exchanges for the field of Taginas the unknown appellation of Ptanias eight miles from Nocera

35 Taginæ or rather Tadinæ is mentioned by Pliny [iii 19] but the bishopric of that obscure town a mile from Gualdo in the plain was united in the year 1007 with that of Nocera The signs of antiquity are preserved in the local appellations,

36 The battle was fought in the year of Rome 458 and the consul Decius, by devoting his own life, assured the triumph of his country and his colleague Fabius (T Liv x. 28 29) Procopius ascribes to Camillus the victory of the Busta Gallorum [tom. ii. p 610, ed Bonn] and his error is branded by Cluverius with the national reproach of Græcorum nugamenta.

Maltretus had inadvertently translated sextum a mistake which he afterwards retracts but the mischief was done and Cousin with a train of French and Latin readers, have fallen into the snare.

40. Compare two passages of Procopius (l. iii. c. 26 l. iv c. 34 [tom. ii. p 389 and 633 ed Bonn]) which with some collateral hints from Marcellinus and Jornandes illustrate the state of the expiring senate

41 See, in the example of Prusias as it is delivered in the fragments of Polybius (Excerpt Legat. xcvii. p 927 928) a curious picture of a royal slave.

42. The Δράκων of Procopius (Goth. l. iv c. 35) is evidently the Sarnus The text is accused or altered by the rash violence of Cluverius (l. iv c. 3 p. 1156) but Camillo Pellegrini of Naples (Discorsi sopra la Campania Felice, p 330 331) has proved from old records that as early as the year 822 that river was called the Dracontio or Draconcello

44. Buat (tom. xi. p 2 etc) conveys to his favourite Bavaria this remnant of Goths who by others are buried in the mountains of Uri or restored to their native isle of Gothland (Mascou, Annot. xxi)

45. I leave Scaliger (Animadvers. in Euseb p 59) and Salmasius (Exercitat. Plinian. p 51 52) to quarrel about the origin of Cumæ, the oldest of the Greek colonies in Italy (Strab l. v p 372 [p 243 ed. Casaub] Velleius Paterculus, l. i. c. 4) already vacant in Juvenal's time (Satir iii. [v 2]) and now in ruins.

46 Agathias (l. i. p 21 [c. 10 p 34, ed Bonn]) settles the Sibyl's cave under the wall of Cumæ he agrees with Servius (ad l. vi. Æneid) nor can I perceive why their opinion should be rejected by Heyne the excellent editor of Virgil (tom. ii. p 650 651) In urbe mediâ secreta religio! But Cumæ was not yet built and the lines (l. vi. 96, 97) would become ridiculous if Æneas were actually in a Greek city

47 There is some difficulty in connecting the 35th chapter of the fourth book of the Gothic War of Procopius with the first book of the history of Agathias. We must now relinquish a statesman and soldier to attend the footsteps of a poet and rhetorician (l. i. p 11 l. ii. p 51 edit. Louvre)

48. Among the fabulous exploits of Buccelin, he discomfited and slew Belisarius subdued Italy and Sicily etc. See in the Historians of France, Gregory of Tours (tom. ii. l. iii. c. 32 p. 201) and Aimoin (tom. iii. l. ii. de Gestis Francorum c. 23, p. 59)

49. Agathias notices their superstition in a philosophic tone (l. i p. 18 [c. 28 19 ed. Bonn]) At Zug in Switzerland, idolatry still prevailed in the year 613 St. Columban and St. Gall were the apostles of that rude country and the latter founded an hermitage, which has swelled into an ecclesiastical principality and a populous city the seat of freedom and commerce.

50. See the death of Lothaire in Agathias (l. ii. p 38 [p 70 ed. Bonn]) and Paul Warnefrid, surnamed Diaconus (l. ii. c. 2 p. 775) The Greek makes him rave and tear his flesh. He had plundered churches

51 Père Daniel (Hist de la Milice Françoise, tom. i. p 17–21) has exhibited a fanciful representation of this battle somewhat in the manner of the Chevalier Folard the once famous editor of Polybius who fashioned to his own habits and opinions all the military operations of antiquity

52 Agathias (l ii p 47 [p 87 ed. Bonn]) has produced a Greek epigram of six lines on this victory of Narses, which is favourably compared to the battles of Marathon and Platæa. The chief difference is indeed in their consequences—so trivial in the former instance—so permanent and glorious in the latter

53 The Beroia and Brincas of Theophanes or his transcriber (p 201 [tom. i. p 36, ed Bonn]) must be read or understood Verona and Brixia.

54. Ἔλελ ο γάρ οἶμαι αὐ ς ὑπὸ ἀβελ ερίας τ ς ἀσπίδας τυχὸ αἰ τὰ ῥάνη ἀμφορεως του η αἱ βαρβ τον ἀποδοσθαι (Agathias l ii [c. 11] p 48 [p 88 ed Bonn]) In the first scene of Richard III our English poet has beautifully enlarged on this idea for which however he was not indebted to the Byzantine historian.

55 Maffei has proved (Verona Illustrata P i l. x. p 257 289) against the common opinion that the dukes of Italy were instituted before the con quest of the Lombards by Narses himself In the Pragmatic Sanction (No 23) Justinian restrains the judices militares

56 See Paulus Diaconus l iii. c. 3, p 776 Menander (in Excerpt Legat p 133 [p 345 ed Bonn]) mentions some risings in Italy by the Franks, and Theophanes (p 201 [tom. i p 367, ed Bonn]) hints at some Gothic rebellions

57 The Pragmatic Sanction of Justinian which restores and regulates the civil state of Italy consists of xxvii articles it is dated August 15, A D 554 is addressed to Narses V J Præpositus Sacri Cubiculi, and to Antiochus Præfectus Prætorio Italiæ and has been preserved by Julian Antecessor, and in the Corpus Juris Civilis after the novels and edicts of Justinian, Justin and Tiberius

58 A still greater number was consumed by famine in the southern provinces, without (ἐκτὸς) the Ionian Gulf Acorns were used in the place of bread Procopius had seen a deserted orphan suckled by a she goat [Goth ii c. 17] Seventeen passengers were lodged, murdered and eaten by two women who were detected and slain by the eighteenth etc

59 Quinta regio Piceni est quondam uberrimæ multitudinis ccclx millia Picentium in fidem P R. venere (Plin Hist. Natur iii 18) In the time of Vespasian this ancient population was already diminished

60 Perhaps fifteen or sixteen millions Procopius (Anecdot c 18) computes that Africa lost five millions that Italy was thrice as extensive, and that the depopulation was in a larger proportion But his reckoning is inflamed by passion and clouded with uncertainty

61 In the decay of these military schools, the satire of Procopius (Anecdot c 24 [tom iii p 135, ed Bonn] Aleman p 102 103) is confirmed and illustrated by Agathias (l v p 159 [p 310 ed Bonn]) who cannot be rejected as an hostile witness

62 The distance from Constantinople to Melanthias, Villa Cæsariana (Ammian Marcellin xxxi 11) is variously fixed at 120 or 140 stadia (Suidas tom ii p 522 523 Agathias l. v [c. 14] p 158 [p 308, ed Bonn]) or xviii or xix miles (Itineraria, p 138 230, 323 332 and Wesseling s Observations) The first xii miles as far as Rhegium were paved by Justinian, who built a bridge over a morass or gullet between a lake and the sea (Procop de Ædif l iv c. 8)

63 The Atyras (Pompon Mela l ii c 2 p. 169 edit Voss) At the river s mouth a town or castle of the same name was fortified by Justinian (Procop de Ædif l. iv c. 2, Itinerar p 570 and Wesseling)

64 The Bulgarian war, and the last victory of Belisarius are imperfectly represented in the prolix declamation of Agathias (l. v p 154-174 [p 299 sqq , ed Bonn]) and the dry Chronicle of Theophanes (p 197 198 [tom i p 360 sq ed Bonn])

65 Ἰνδοὺς They could scarcely be real Indians and the Æthiopians sometimes known by that name, were never used by the ancients as guards or followers they were the trifling though costly objects of female and royal luxury (Terent Eunuch act i scene ii [v 88] Sueton. in August. c. 83, with a good note of Casaubon in Caligulâ c. 57)

66 The Sergius (Vandal l ii. c 21, 22, Anecdot c. 5) and Marcellus (Goth l. iii. c. 32) are mentioned by Procopius See Theophanes, p. 197 201 [tom i p 360 367, ed Bonn]

67 Alemannus (p 3) quotes an old Byzantine MS , which has been printed in the Imperium Orientale of Banduri [tom iii p 349, ed Bonn]

68 Of the disgrace and restoration of Belisarius the genuine original record is preserved in the Fragment of John Malala (tom ii. p 234- 43 [p 494 sq , ed Bonn]) and the exact Chronicle of Theophanes (p 194-204 [tom. i. p 368 and Zonaras (tom ii l. xiv [c. 9] p 69) seem to hesitate between the obsolete truth and the growing falsehood

69 The source of this idle fable may be derived from a miscellaneous work of the twelfth century the Chiliads of John Tzetzes a monk (Basil. 1546 ad calcem Lycophront Colon Allobrog 1614, in Corp Poet Græc) He relates the blindness and beggary of Belisarius in ten vulgar or political verses (Chiliad iii No 88, 339-348 in Corp Poet Græc, tom ii p 311)

Ἔκπωμα ξύλινον κρατων ἐβόα τῷ μιλίῳ
Βελισαρίῳ ὀβολὸν δότε τῷ στρατηλάτῃ
Ὃν τύχη μὲν ἐδόξασεν ἀποτυφλοῖ δ ὁ φθόνος

This moral or romantic tale was imported into Italy with the language and manuscripts of Greece repeated before the end of the fifteenth century by Crinitus Pontanus and Volaterranus attacked by Alciat for the honour of the law and defended by Baronius (A D 561 No 2 etc), for the honour of the church Yet Tzetzes himself had read in other chronicles that Belisarius did not lose his sight and that he recovered his fame and fortunes

70 The statue in the villa Borghese at Rome in a sitting posture with an open hand which is vulgarly given to Belisarius may be ascribed with more dignity to Augustus in the act of propitiating Nemesis (Winckelman Hist de l Art tom iii p 266) Ex nocturno visû etiam stipem quotannis die certo emendicabat a populo cavam manum asses porrigentibus præbens (Sueton in August c. 91 with an excellent note of Casaubon)

71 The rubor of Domitian is stigmatised quaintly enough by the pen of Tacitus (in Vit Agricol. c. 45) and has been likewise noticed by the younger Pliny (Panegyr c 48) and Suetonius (in Domitian c. 18 and Casaubon ad locum) Procopius (Anecdot c. 8 [tom iii p 55 ed Bonn]) foolishly believes that only one bust of Domitian had reached the sixth century

72 The studies and science of Justinian are attested by the confession (Anecdot c 8 13) still more than by the praises (Gothic l iii c 31 de Ædific l. i. Proem. c. 7) of Procopius Consult the copious index of Alemannus, and read the Life of Justinian by Ludewig (p 135-142)

73 See in the C. P Christiana of Ducange (l. i. c. 24, No. 1) a chain of original testimonies from Procopius in the sixth to Gyllius in the sixteenth century

74 The first comet is mentioned by John Malala (tom. ii. p. 190, 219 [p 454, 477 ed Bonn]) and Theophanes (p. 154 [tom. i. p 2,8 ed Bonn]) the second by Procopius (Persic. l ii. c. 4) Yet I strongly suspect their identity The paleness of the sun (Vandal. l. ii. c. 14) is applied by Theophanes (p. 158) to a different year

75 Seneca s seventh book of Natural Questions displays in the theory of comets a philosophic mind. Yet should we not too candidly confound a vague prediction, a veniet tempus, etc. with the merit of real discoveries.

76 Astronomers may study Newton and Halley I draw my humble science from the article COMÈTE, in the French Encyclopédie, by M d Alembert

77 Whiston the honest pious, visionary Whiston had fancied for the era of Noah s flood (2242 years before Christ) a prior apparition of the same comet which drowned the earth with its tail.

78 A dissertation of Fréret (Mémoires de l Academie des Inscriptions tom x. p 357-377) affords a happy union of philosophy and erudition The phenomenon in the time of Ogyges was preserved by Varro (apud Augustine, The City of God xxi. 8) who quotes Castor D on of Naples, and Adrastus of Cyzicus—nobiles mathematici. The two subsequent periods are preserved by the Greek mythologists and the spurious books of Sibylline verses.

79 Pliny (Hist. Nat. ii. 23) has transcribed the original memorial of Augustus. Mairan in his most ingenious letters to the P Parennin missionary in China, removes the games and the comet of September from the year 44 to the year 43 before the Christian era but I am not totally subdued by the criticism of the astronomer (Opuscules, p. 275-351)

80 This last comet was visible in the month of December 1680. Bayle, who began his Pensées sur la Comète in January 1681 (Œuvres, tom. iii.) was forced to argue that a supernatural comet would have confirmed the ancients in their idolatry Bernoulli (see his El ge in Fontenelle, tom. v p 99) was forced to allow that the tail, though not the head, was a sign of the wrath of God.

81 Paradise Lost was published in the year 1667 and th famous lines (l. ii 708 etc.) which startled the licenser may allude to the recent comet of 1664, observed by Cassini at Rome in the presence of queen Christina (Fontenelle, in his El ge tom. v p. 338) Had Charles II betrayed any symptoms of curiosity or fear?

83 The earthquakes that shook the Roman world in the reign of Justinian are described or mentioned by Procopius (Goth. l. iv c. 25 [tom. ii p 594 ed Bonn] Anecdot. c. 18) Agathias (l. ii. p 52 53 54 l. v p 145-152 [p 96-101 281-294, ed. Bonn]) John Malala (Chron. tom ii p 140-146 176 177 183 193 220, 229 231 233 234 [p. 419, sq 442 sq 448 456 478 485 sq 488 sq ed. Bonn]) and Theophanes (p 151, 183 189, 191-196 [tom. i p 272 336 347 350 357 ed Bonn])

84 An abrupt height, a perpendicular cape between Aradus and Botrys, named by the Greeks θεων πρόσωπον and ευπρόσωπ or λιθοπρόσωπον by the scrupulous Christians (Polyb l. v [c. 68] p 411 Pompon Mela, l. i c. 12 p 87 cum Isaac Voss. Observat. Maundrell Journey p 32 33 Pocock s Description vol. ii. p 99)

85 Botrys was founded (ann. ante Christ 935-903) by Ithobal king of Tyre (Marsham Canon Chron. p 387 388) Its poor representative the village of Patrone, is now destitute of an harbour

86 The university splendour and ruin of Berytus are celebrated by Heineccius (p 351-356) as an essential part of the history of the Roman law It was overthrown in the twenty fifth year of Justinian A.D 551 July 9 (Theophanes p 192) but Agathias (l. ii. p 51 52 [p 95 sq ed. Bonn]) suspends the earthquake till he has achieved the Italian war

87 I have read with pleasure Mead s short but elegant treatise concerning Pestilential Disorders, the seventh edition London 1722

89 Dr Friend (Hist Medicin in Opp p 416-420 Lond 1733) is satisfied that Procopius must have studied physic, from his knowledge and use of the technical words. Yet many words that are now scientific were common and popular in the Greek idiom

90 See Thucydides l. ii c 47-54 and poetical description of the same plague by Lucretius (l. vi. 1136-1284) I was indebted to Dr Hunter for an elaborate commentary on this part of Thucydides a quarto of 600 pages (Venet 1603 apud Juntas) which was pronounced in St. Mark s library by Fab us Paullinus Utinensis a physician and philosopher

91 Thucydides (c. 51) affirms that the infection could only be once taken but Evagrius, who had family experience of the plague observes that some persons who had escaped the first sunk under the second attack and this repetition is confirmed by Fabius Paullinus (p 588) I observe that on this head physicians are divided and the nature and operation of the disease may not always be similar

92 It was thus that Socrates had been saved by his temperance, in the plague of Athens (Aul Gellius Noct Attic ii 1) Dr Mead accounts for the peculiar salubrity of religious houses by the two advantages of seclusion and abstinence (p 18 19)

93 Mead proves that the plague is contagious, from Thucydides, Lucretius Aristotle, Galen and common experience (p 10–20) and he refutes (Preface, p ii–xiii) the contrary opinion of the French physicians who visited Marseilles in the year 1720 Yet these were the recent and enlightened spectators of a plague which in a few months swept away 50,000 inhabitants (sur la Peste de Marseille Paris 1786) of a city that, in the present hour of prosperity and trade contains no more than 90 000 souls (Necker, sur les Finances, tom. i p 231)

94 The strong assertions of Procopius—ουτε γὰρ ἰατρῷ ουτε ἰδιώτῃ—are overthrown by the subsequent experience of Evagrius.

95 After some figures of rhetoric, the sands of the sea etc Procopius (Anecdot c 18) attempts a more definite account that μυριάδας μυριάδων μυρίας had been exterminated under the reign of the Imperial demon The expression is obscure in grammar and arithmetic and a literal interpretation would produce several millions of millions. Alemannus (p 80) and Cousin (tom iii p 178) translate this passage two hundred millions' but I am ignorant of their motives If we drop the μυριάδας the remaining μυριάδων μυρίας a myriad of myriads, would furnish one hundred millions a number not wholly inadmissible.

Chapter XLIV

1 The civilians of the darker ages have established an absurd and incomprehensible mode of quotation, which is supported by authority and custom In their references to the Code, the Pandects and the Institutes they mention the number, not of the book but only of the law and content themselves with reciting the first words of the title to which it belongs and of these titles there are more than a thousand Ludewig (Vit Justiniani p 268) wishes to shake off this pedantic yoke and I have dared to adopt the simple and rational method of numbering the book, the title and the law

2 Germany, Bohemia, Hungary, Poland and Scotland, have received them as common law or reason in France, Italy, etc, they possess a direct or indirect influence and they were respected in England from Stephen to Edward I our national Justinian (Duck de Usû et Auctoritate Juris Civilis l ii c 1 8–15 Heineccius, Hist Juris Germanici c 3 4, No 55–124 and the legal historians of each country)

3 Francis Hottoman a learned and acute lawyer of the sixteenth century wished to mortify Cujacius and to please the Chancellor de l'Hôpital His Anti Tribonianus (which I have never been able to procure) was published in French in 1609 and his sect was propagated in Germany (Heineccius, Op tom. iii sylloge iii p 171–183)

4 At the head of these guides I shall respectfully place the learned and perspicuous Heineccius a German professor who died at Halle in the year 1741 (see his Eloge in the Nouvelle Bibliothèque Germanique tom ii p 51–64) His ample works have been collected in eight volumes in 4to Geneva 1743–1748 The treatises which I have separately used are 1 Historia Juris Romani et Germanici Lugd Batav 1740 in 8vo 2. Syntagma Antiquitatum Romanum Jurisprudentiam illustrantum 2 vols in 8vo Traject ad Rhenum. 3 Elementa Juris Civilis secundum Ordinem Institutionum, Lugd Bat 1751 in 8vo 4. Elementa J C secundum Ordinem Pandectarum Traject. 1772 in 8vo 2 vols

5 Our original text is a fragment de Origine Juris (Pandect l i tit ii.) of Pomponius a Roman lawyer who lived under the Antonines (Heinecc. tom iii syl iii p 66–126) It has been abridged, and probably corrupted by Tribonian and since restored by Bynkershoek (Opp tom i p 279–304)

6 The constitutional history of the kings of Rome may be studied in the first book of Livy and more copiously in Dionysius Halicarnassensis (l. ii. [c 4–29] p 80–96 119–130 [c 57–70] l iv [c. 15 etc] p 198–220) who sometimes betrays the character of a rhetorician and a Greek

7 This threefold division of the law was applied to the three Roman kings by Justus Lipsius (Opp. tom iv p 279) is adopted by Gravina (Origines Juris Civilis p 28 edit Lips 1737) and is reluctantly admitted by Mascou his German editor

8 The most ancient Code or Digest was styled Jus Papirianum from the first compiler Papirius who flourished somewhat before or after the Regifugium (Pandect l. i tit ii) The best judicial critics even Bynkershoek (tom. i p 284, 285) and Heineccius (Hist J C R l. i c 16 17 and Opp tom iii sylloge iv p 1–8) give credit to this tale of Pomponius without sufficiently adverting to the value and rarity of such a monument of the third century of the illiterate city I much suspect that the Caius Papirius the Pontifex Maximus, who revived the laws of Numa (Dionys Hal. l iii [c. 36] p 171) left only an oral tradition and that the Jus Papirianum of Granius Flaccus (Pandect l. i. tit. xvi. leg. 144) was not a commentary but an original work compiled in the time of Cæsar (Censorin. de Die Natali, c. iii. p. 13. Duker de Latinitate J. C. p. 157)

9. A pompous though feeble attempt to restore the original, is made in the Histoire de la Jurisprudence Romaine of Terrasson p. 22–72. Paris 1750, in folio, a work of more promise than performance.

10. In the year 1444 seven or eight tables of brass were dug up between Cortona and Gubbio. A part of these (for the rest is Etruscan) represents the primitive state of the Pelasgic letters and language, which are ascribed by Herodotus to that district of Italy (l. i. c. 56, 57, 58), though this difficult passage may be explained of a Crestona in Thrace (Notes de Larcher, tom. i. p. 256–261). The savage dialect of the Eugubine Tables has exercised, and may still elude, the divination of criticism; but the root is undoubtedly Latin, of the same age and character as the Saliare Carmen, which, in the time of Horace, none could understand. The Roman idiom, by an infusion of Doric and Æolic Greek, was gradually ripened into the style of the twelve tables, of the Duillian column, of Ennius, of Terence, and of Cicero (Gruter. Inscript. tom. i. p. cxlii. Scipion Maffei, Istoria Diplomatica, p. 241–258. Bibliothèque Italique, tom. iii. p. 30–41, 174–205, tom. xiv. p. 1–52).

11. Compare Livy (l. iii. c. 31–59) with Dionysius Hal carnassensis (l. x. [c. 55] p. 644–xi. [c. 49] p. 691). How concise and animated is the Roman—how prolix and lifeless the Greek! Yet he has admirably judged the masters, and defined the rules, of historical composition.

12. From the historians Heineccius (Hist. J. R. l. i. No. 26) maintains that the twelve tables were of brass—æreas: in the text of Pomponius we read boreas; for which Scaliger has substituted roboreas (Bynkershoek, p. 286). Wood, brass, and ivory might be successively employed.

13. His exile is mentioned by Cicero (Tusculan. Quæstion. v. 36); his statue by Pliny (Hist. Nat. xxxiv. 11). The letter, dream, and prophecy of Heraclitus are alike spurious (Epistolæ Græc. Divers. p. 337).

14. This intricate subject of the Sicilian and Roman money is ably discussed by Dr. Bentley (Dissertation on the Epistles of Phalaris, p. 427–479), whose powers in this controversy were called forth by honour and resentment.

15. The Romans, or their allies, sailed as far as the fair promontory of Africa (Polyb. l. iii. [c. 22] p. 177, edit. Casaubon, in folio). Their voyages to Cumæ, etc., are noticed by Livy and Dionysius.

16. This circumstance would alone prove the antiquity of Charondas, the legislator of Rhegium and Catana, who, by a strange error of Diodorus Siculus (tom. i. l. xii. [c. 11 sq.] p. 485–492), is celebrated long afterwards as the author of the policy of Thurium.

17. Zaleucus, whose existence has been rashly attacked, had the merit and glory of converting a band of outlaws (the Locrians) into the most virtuous and orderly of the Greek republics. (See two Mémoires of the Baron de St. Croix, sur la Législation de la Grande Grèce. Mém. de l'Académie, tom. xlii. p. 276–333.) But the laws of Zaleucus and Charondas, which imposed on Diodorus and Stobæus, are the spurious composition of a Pythagorean sophist, whose fraud has been detected by the critical sagacity of Bentley, p. 335–377.

18. I seize the opportunity of tracing the progress of this national intercourse: 1. Herodotus and Thucydides (A.U.C. 300–350) appear ignorant of the name and existence of Rome (Joseph. contra Apion. tom. ii. l. i. c. 12, p. 444, edit. Havercamp). 2. Theopompus (A.U.C. 400, Plin. iii. 9) mentions the invasion of the Gauls, which is noticed in looser terms by Heraclides Ponticus (Plutarch in Camillus [c. 15], p. 32, edit. H. Stephan.). 3. The real or fabulous embassy of the Romans to Alexander (A.U.C. 430) is attested by Clitarchus (Plin. iii. 9), by Aristus and Asclepiades (Arrian, l. vii. [c. 15] p. 294, 295), and by Memnon of Heraclea (apud Photium, cod. ccxxiv. p. 725 [p. 229, ed. Bekker]), though tacitly denied by Livy. 4. Theophrastus (A.U.C. 440) primus externorum aliqua de Romanis diligentius scripsit (Plin. iii. 9). 5. Lycophron (A.U.C. 480–500) scattered the first seed of a Trojan colony and the fable of the Æneid (Cassandra, 1226–1280):

Γῆς καὶ θαλάσσης σκῆπτρα καὶ μοναρχίαν
Λαβόντες.

A bold prediction before the end of the first Punic war.

19. The tenth table, de modo sepulturæ, was borrowed from Solon (Cicero de Legibus, ii. 23–26): the furtum per lancem et licium conceptum is derived by Heineccius from the manners of Athens (Antiquitat. Rom. tom. ii. p. 167–175). The right of killing a nocturnal thief was declared by Moses, Solon, and the Decemvirs (Exodus xxii. 2. Demosthenes contra Timocratem, tom. i. p. 736, edit. Reiske. Macrob. Saturnalia, l. i. c. 4. Collatio Legum Mosaicarum et Romanarum, tit. vii. No. 1, p. 218, edit. Cannegieter (Lugd. Bat. 1774)).

20. Βραχέως καὶ ἀπερίττως is the praise of Diodorus (tom. i. l. xii. [c. 26] p. 494), which may be fairly translated by the eleganti atque absoluta brevitate verborum of Aulus Gellius (Noct. Attic. xx. 1).

21. Listen to Cicero (de Legibus, ii. 23) and his representative Crassus (de Oratore, i. 43, 44).

22. See Heineccius (Hist. J. R. No. 29–33). I have followed the restoration of the twelve tables by Gravina (Origines J. C. p. 280–307) and Terrasson (Hist. de la Jurisprudence Romaine, p. 94–205).

23. Finis æqui juris (Tacit. Annal. iii. 27). Fons omnis publici et privati juris (T. Liv. iii. 34).

24. De principiis juris, et quibus modis ad hanc multitudinem infinitam ac varietatem legum per-ventum sit altius disseram (Tacit Annal iii 25) This deep disquisition fills only two pages but they are the pages of Tacitus With equal sense but with less energy Livy (iii 34) had complained in hoc immenso aliarum super alias acervatarum legum cumulo etc

25 Suetonius in Vespasiano c 8

26 Cicero ad Familiares viii 8

27 Dionysius with Arbuthnot and most of the moderns (except Eisenschmidt de Ponderibus etc, p 137–140) represent the 100 000 asses by 10 000 Attic drachmæ, or somewhat more than 300 pounds sterling But their calculation can apply only to the later times when the as was diminished to 1 24th of its ancient weight nor can I believe that in the first ages, however destitute of the precious metals a single ounce of silver could have been exchanged for seventy pounds of copper or brass A more simple and rational method is to value the copper itself according to the present rate and after comparing the mint and the market price the Roman and avoirdupois weight the primitive as or Roman pound of copper may be appreciated at one English shilling and the 100 000 asses of the first class amounted to 5000 pounds sterling It will appear from the same reckoning that an ox was sold at Rome for five pounds a sheep for ten shillings and a quarter of wheat for one pound ten shillings (Festus p 330 edit Dacier Plin Hist Natur xviii 4) nor do I see any reason to reject these consequences, which moderate our ideas of the poverty of the first Romans

28 Consult the common writers on the Roman Comitia especially Sigonius and Beaufort Spanheim (de Præstantiâ et Usû Numismatum tom ii dissert x p 192 193) shows on a curious medal the Cista Pontes Septa Diribitor etc

29 Cicero (de Legibus iii 16 17, 18) debates this constitutional question and assigns to his brother Quintus the most unpopular side

30 Præ tumultu recusantium perferre non potuit (Sueton in August c 34) See Propertius l ii eleg 6 [or 7] Heineccius in a separate history has exhausted the whole subject of the Julian and Papian Poppæan laws (Opp tom vii P i p 1–479)

31 Tacit Annal. i 15 Lipsius, Excursus E in Tacitum

32 Non ambigitur senatum jus facere posse is the decision of Ulpian (l xvi ad Edict in Pandect l i tit iii leg 9) Pomponius taxes the comitia of the people as a turba hominum (Pandect l i tit ii leg 9)

33 The jus honorarium of the prætors and other magistrates is strictly defined in the Latin text of the Institutes (l i tit ii No 7) and more loosely explained in the Greek paraphrase of Theophilus (p 33–38 edit Reitz) who drops the important word honorarium

34 Dion Cassius (tom i l xxxvi [c 23] p 100) fixes the perpetual edicts in the year of Rome 686. Their institution however, is ascribed to the year 585 in the Acta Diurna which have been published from the papers of Ludovicus Vives Their authenticity is supported or allowed by Pighius (Annal Roman tom ii p 377 378), Grævius (ad Sueton p 778), Dodwell (Prælection Cambden p 665) and Heineccius but a single word Scutum Cimbricum, detects the forgery (Moyle's Works, vol i p 303)

35 The history of edicts is composed, and the text of the perpetual edict is restored, by the master hand of Heineccius (Opp tom vii P ii. p. 1–564) in whose researches I might safely acquiesce. In the Academy of Inscriptions M Bouchaud has given a series of memoirs to this interesting subject of law and literature

36 His laws are the first in the Code. See Dodwell (Prælect Cambden, p 319–340) who wanders from the subject in confused reading and feeble paradox

37 Totam illam veterem et squalentem silvam legum novis principalium rescriptorum et edictorum securibus truncatis et cæditis (Apologet. c. 4 p 50 edit Havercamp) He proceeds to praise the recent firmness of Severus who repealed the useless or pernicious laws without any regard to their age or authority

38 The constitutional style of Legibus solutus is misinterpreted by the art or ignorance of Dion Cassius (tom i l liii [c 18] p 713) On this occasion *his editor Reimar joins the universal cen*sure which freedom and criticism have pronounced against that slavish historian

39 The word (Lex Regia) was still more recent than the thing The slaves of Commodus or Caracalla would have started at the name of royalty

40 See Gravina (Opp p 501–512) and Beaufort (République Romaine tom i p 255–274) He has made a proper use of two dissertations by John Frederick Gronovius and Noodt both translated with valuable notes by Barbeyrac 2 vols in 12mo 1731

41 Institut l i tit ii No 6 Pandect l i tit. iv leg i Cod Justinian l i tit xvii leg i No 7 In his Antiquities and Elements Heineccius has amply treated de constitutionibus principum which are illustrated by Godefroy (Comment ad. Cod Theodos l i tit i ii iii) and Gravina (p. 87–90)

42 Theophilus in Paraphras Græc. Institut. p 33 34 edit Reitz For his person time, writings, see the Theophilus of J H Mylius Excurs iii p. 1034–1073

43 There is more envy than reason in the complaint of Macrinus (Jul Capitolin c. 13) Nefas esse leges videri Commodi et Caracallæ et hominum imperitorum voluntates Commodus was made a Divus by Severus (Dodwell Prælect. viii. p 324 325) Yet he occurs only twice in the Pandects

44. Of Antoninus Caracalla alone 200 constitutions are extant in the Code and with his father

160 These two princes are quoted fifty times in the Pandects and eight in the Institutes (Terrasson, p 265)

45 Plin. Secund. Epistol. x. 66 Sueton. in Domitian, c. 23.

46 It was a maxim of Constantine, contra jus rescripta non valeant (Cod Theodos. l. i. tit. ii. leg. 1) The emperors reluctantly allow some scrutiny into the law and the fact some delay petition etc. but these insufficient remedies are too much in the discretion and at the peril of the judge.

47 A compound of vermilion and cinnabar which marks the Imperial diplomas from Leo I (A D 470) to the fall of the Greek empire (Bibliothèque Raisonnée de la Diplomatique tom. i. p. 509-514 Lami de Eruditione Apostolorum, tom. ii. p 720-726)

48 Schulting Jurisprudentia Ante Justinianea, p 681-718 Cujacius assigned to Gregory the reigns from Hadrian to Gallienus, and the continuation to his fellow labourer Hermogenes. This general division may be just but they often trespassed on each other's ground.

49 Scævola most probably Q. Cervidius Scævola, the master of Papinian, considers this acceptance of fire and water as the essence of marriage Pandect. l. xxiv tit. 1 leg 66 See Heineccius, Hist. J R. No 317)

50 Cicero (de Officiis, iii. 19) may state an ideal case, but St. Ambrose (de Officiis, iii. 2) appeals to the practice of his own times which he understood as a lawyer and a magistrate (Schulting ad Ulpian. Fragment. tit. xxii. No 28 p. 643 644 [Jurispr Ante-Justin.])

51 The furtum lance licioque conceptum was no longer understood in the time of the Antonines (Aulus Gellius xvi. 10) The Attic derivation of Heineccius (Antiquitat Rom. l. iv tit i. No 13-21) is supported by the evidence of Aristophanes his scholiast and Pollux.

52 In his Oration for Murena (c. 9-13) Cicero turns into ridicule the forms and mysteries of the civilians *which are represented with more can*dour by Aulus Gellius (Noct. Attic. xx. 10) Gravina (Opp p 265 266 267) and Heineccius, Ant quitat. l. iv tit. vi.)

53 The series of the civil lawyers is deduced by Pomponius (de Origine Juris Pandect l. i. tit. ii. [§ 35 sqq]) The moderns have discussed, with learning and criticism this branch of literary history and among these I have chiefly been guided by Gravina (p 41-79) and Heineccius (Hist J R. No 113-351) Cicero more especially in his books de Oratore, de Claris Oratoribus de Legibus and the Clavis Ciceroniana of Ernesti (under the names of Mucius etc.) afford much genuine and pleasing information Horace often alludes to the morning labours of the civilians (Serm. I i. 10 Epist. II i. 103, etc.)

Agricolam laudat juris legumque peritus,
Sub galli cantum consultor ubi ostia pulsat.

Romæ dulce diu fuit et solemne, reclusâ
Mane domo vigilare clienti promere jura

54 Crassus, or rather Cicero himself proposes (de Oratore i. 41 42) an idea of the art or science of jurisprudence, which the eloquent but illiterate Antonius (i. 58) affects to deride. It was partly executed by Servius Sulpicius (in Bruto c. 41) whose praises are elegantly varied in the classic Latinity of the Roman Gravina (p. 60)

55 Perturbatricem autem omnium harum rerum Academiam hanc ab Arcesila et Carneade recentem exoremus ut sileat name si invaserit in hæc, quæ satis scite instructa et composita videntur nimias edet ruinas, quam quidem ego placare cupio submovere non audeo (de Legibus, i. 13) From this passage alone, Bentley (Remarks on Freethinking p 250) might have learned how firmly Cicero believed in the specious doctrines which he has adorned

56 The stoic philosophy was first taught at Rome by Panætius, the friend of the younger Scipio (see his Life in the Mém. de l Académie des Inscriptions, tom x. p 75 89)

57 As he is quoted by Ulpian (leg 40 ad Sa*binum in Pandect.* l. xlvii. tit. ii. leg 21) Yet Trebatius, after he was a leading civilian qui [quod] familiam duxit, became an epicurean (Cicero ad Fam. vii. 5) Perhaps he was not constant or sincere in his new sect

58 See Gravina (p 45-51) and the ineffectual cavils of Mascou Heineccius (Hist. J R No 125) quotes and approves a dissertation of Everard Otto de Stoicâ Jurisconsultorum Philosophiâ

59 We have heard of the Catonian rule, the Aquilian stipulation and the Manilian forms, of 211 maxims, and of 247 definitions (Pandect. l. i. tit. xvi. xvii.)

60 Read Cicero l. i. de Oratore, Topica, pro Murena

61 See Pomponius (de Origine Juris Pandect. l. i. tit. ii. leg 2 No 47) Heineccius (ad Institut. l. i. tit. ii. No 8 l. ii. tit. xxv in Element. et Antiquitat) and Gravina (p 41-45) Yet the monopoly of Augustus a harsh measure, would appear with some softening in contemporary evidence and it was probably veiled by a decree of the senate.

62 I have perused the Diatribe of Gotfridus Mascovius, the learned Mascou de Sectis Jurisconsultorum (Lipsiæ 1728 in 12mo p 276) a learned treatise on a narrow and barren ground

63 See the character of Antistius Labeo in Tacitus (Annal. iii. 75) and in an epistle of Ateius Capito (Aul. Gellius xiii 12) who accuses his rival of libertas nimia et vecors Yet Horace would not have lashed a virtuous and respectable senator and I must adopt the emendation of Bentley who reads Labieno insanior (Serm. I iii. 82) See Mascou de Sectis (c i. p 1-24)

64 Justinian (Institut l. iii. tit. 23 and Theophil. Vers Græc p 677 680) has commemorated this weighty dispute and the verses of Homer that were alleged on either side as legal authorities. It was decided by Paul (leg 33 ad Edict in Pandect l. xviii tit 1 leg 1) since in a simple exchange, the buyer could not be discriminated from the seller

65 This controversy was likewise given for the Proculians to supersede the indecency of a search and to comply with the aphorism of Hippocrates who was attached to the septenary number of two weeks of years or 700 of days (Institut l 1 tit xxii) Plutarch and the Stoics (de Placit Philosoph l. v c 24) assign a more natural reason Fourteen years is the age—περὶ ἣν ὁ σπερματικὸς κρίνεται ἀῤῥὸς See the vestigia of the sects in Mascou c ix p 145–276

66 The series and conclusion of the sects are described by Mascou (c ii–vii p 24–120) and it would be almost ridiculous to praise his equal justice to these obsolete sects

67 At the first summons he flies to the turbot council yet Juvenal (Satir iv 75–80) styles the præfect or bailiff of Rome sanctissimus legum interpres From his science says the old scholiast he was called not a man but a book He derived the singular name of Pegasus from the galley which his father commanded

68 Tacit Annal. xvi 7 Sueton in Nerone, c xxxvii.

69 Mascou de Sectis c viii p 120–144 de Herciscundis a legal term which was applied to these eclectic lawyers herciscere is synonymous to dividere

70 See the Theodosian Code l i. tit iv with Godefroy s Commentary tom 1 p 31–35. This decree might give occasion to Jesuitical disputes like those in the Lettres Provinciales whether a judge was obliged to follow the opinion of Papinian or of a majority against his judgment against his conscience etc. Yet a legislator might give that opinion however false the validity not of truth but of law

71 For the legal labours of Justinian I have studied the Preface to the Institutes the 1st and 2nd and 3rd Prefaces to the Pandects the 1st and 2nd Preface to the Code and the Code itself (l 1 tit xvii de Veteri Jure enucleando) After these original testimonies, I have consulted among the moderns Heineccius (Hist J R No 383–404) Terrasson (Hist de la Jurisprudence Romaine p 295–356) Gravina (Opp p 93–100), and Ludewig, in his Life of Justinian (p 19–123, 318–321 for the Code and Novels p 209–261 for the Digest or Pandects p 262–317)

72 For the character of Tribonian see the testimonies of Procopius (Persic l 1 c 23, 24 [24 25] Anecdot c 13 20 [and Suidas (tom iii p 501 edit Kuster) Ludewig (in Vit Justinian p 175–209) works hard very hard to whitewash—the blackamoor

73 I apply the two passages of Suidas to the same man every circumstance so exactly tallies Yet the lawyers appear ignorant and Fabricius is inclined to separate the two characters (Biblioth. Græc tom. i p 341, ii. p 518, iii. p. 418, xii. p. 346, 353 474)

74 This story is related by Hesychius (de Viris Illustribus) Procopius (Anecdot c. 13 (tom. iii. p. 84 ed Bonn]) and Suidas (tom iii. p 501) Such flattery is incredible!

——Nihil est quod credere de se
Non possit cum laudatur Diis æqua potestas.

Fontenelle (tom. i. p 32–39) has ridiculed the impudence of the modest Virgil. But the same Fontenelle places his king above the divine Augustus and the sage Boileau has not blushed to say, Le destin à ses yeux n oseroit balancer Yet neither Augustus nor Louis XIV were fools

75 Πάνδεκται (general receivers) was a common title of the Greek miscellanies (Plin. Præfat. ad Hist Natur) The Digesta of Scævola Marcellinus, Celsus were already familiar to the civilians but Justinian was in the wrong when he used the two appellations as synonymous Is the word Pandects Greek or Latin—masculine or feminine? The diligent Brenckman will not presume to decide these momentous controversies (Hist Pandect Florentin. p 300–304)

76 Angelus Politianus (l v Epist ult) reckons thirty seven (p 192–200) civilians quoted in the Pandects—a learned and for his times, an extraordinary list The Greek index to the Pandects enumerates thirty nine and forty are produced by the indefatigable Fabricius (Biblioth Græc tom iii p 488–502) Antoninus Augustus [Antonius Augustinus] (de Nominibus Propriis Pandect apud Ludewig p 283) is said to have added fifty four names but they must be vague or secondhand references

77 The Στίχοι of the ancient MSS may be strictly defined as sentences or periods of a complete sense which on the breadth of the parchment rolls or volumes, composed as many lines of unequal length The number of Στίχοι in each book served as a check on the errors of the scribes (Ludewig p 211–215 and his original author Suicer Thesaur Ecclesiast. tom 1 p 1021–1036)

78 An ingenious and learned oration of Schultingius (Jurisprudentia Ante Justinianea p 883–907) justifies the choice of Tribonian against the passionate charges of Francis Hottoman and his sectaries

79 Strip away the crust of Tribonian and allow for the use of technical words and the Latin of the Pandects will be found not unworthy of the silver age It has been vehemently attacked by Laurentius Valla a fastidious grammarian of the fifteenth century and by his apologist Floridus Sabinus It has been defended by Alciat and a nameless advocate (most probably James Capellus) Their various treatises are collected by Duker (Opuscula de Latinitate veterum Jurisconsultorum Lugd. Bat 1721 in 12mo)

erant ibi reposita, hoc decisum est et definitum et in perpetuum finem deducta est quæque lex (Cod. Justinian l. i. tit. xvii. l. g. 3 No 10) A frank confession!

81 The number of these emblemata (a polite name for forgeries) is much reduced by Bynker shock (in the four last books of his Observations) who poorly maintains the right of Justinian and the duty of Tribonian

82 The antinomies or oppo ite laws of the Code and Pandects, are sometimes the cause, and often the excuse, of the glorious uncertainty of the civil law which so often affords what Montaigne calls Questions pour l Ami. See a fine passa_e of Franciscus Balduinus in Justinian (l. ii. p 259 etc., apud Ludewig p 305 306)

83 When Fust, or Faustus sold at Paris his first printed bibles as manuscripts the price of a parchment copy was reduced from four or five hundred to sixty fifty and forty crowns. The public was at first pleased with the cheapness, and at length pro oked by the disco ery of the fraud (Mattaire Annal. Typograph. tom. i. p 12 first edition)

84 This execrable practice prevailed from the eighth and more especially from the twelfth century when it became almost universal (Mont faucon in the Mémoires de l Académie tom. vi. p. 606, etc. Bibliothèque Raisonnée de la D p o-tout que tom. i. p 176)

85 Pomponius (Pandect l i. tit. ii. leg 2 [§ 39]) observes, that of the three founders of the ci il law Mucius, Brutus and Manilius extant volumina, (in) scripta Manilii monumenta that of some old republican lawyers, hæc ersantur eorum scripta inter manus hominum. Eight of the Augustan sages were reduced to a compendium of Cascel lius, scripta non extant sed unus liber etc. [§ 45] of Trebatius minus frequentatur [ib] of Tubero libri parum grati sunt [§ 46] Many quotations in the Pandects are derived from books which Tri bonian ne er saw and in the long period from the seventh to the thirteenth century of Rome the apparent reading of the moderns successiv ly de pends on the knowledge and veracity of their predecessors.

86 All in several instances, repeat the errors of the scribe and the transpositions of some lea es in the Florentine Pandects This fact if it be true is decisi e Yet the Pandects are quoted by Ivo of Chartres (who died in 1117) by Theobald arch bishop of Canterbury and by Vacarius, our first professor in the year 1140 (Selden ad Fletam c. 7 tom. ii. p. 1080-1085) Ha e our British MSS of the Pandects been collated?

87 See the description of this original in Brenck man (Hist. Pandect. Florent. l. i. c. 2 3 p 4-17 and l. ii.) Politian, an enthusiast revered it as the authentic standard of Justinian himself (p 407 408) but this paradox is refuted by the abbrevia tions of the Florentine MS (l. ii. c. 3 p 117-130) It is composed of two quarto volumes, with large margins, on a thin parchment and the Latin char acters betray the hand of a Greek scribe.

88 Brenckman, at the end of his history has inserted two dissertations on the republic of Amal phi, and the Pisan war in the year 1135 etc.

89 The discovery of the Pandects at Amalphi (A.D 1137) is first noticed (in 1501) by Ludovicus Bolognimus (Brenckman l. i c. 11 p 73 74 l. iv c. 2 p 417-425) on the faith of a Pisan chronicle (p 409, 410) wi hout a name or a date. The whole story though unknown to the twelfth century embellished by ignorant ages, and suspected by rig d criticism is not however destitute of much internal probability (l. i. c. 4-8 p. 17-50) The Liber Pandectarum of Pisa was undoubtedly con sulted in the fourteenth century by the great Bar tolus (p 406 407 See l. i. c. 9 p. 50-62)

90. Pisa was taken by the Florentines in the year 1406 and in 1411 the Pandects were transported to the capital. These events are authentic and famous

91 They were new bound in purple deposited in a rich casket and shown to curious travellers by the monks and magistrates bare headed and with lighted tapers (Brenckman, l. i. c. 10 11 12, p. 62-93)

92 After the collations of Politian Bolognimus and Antonius Augustinus and the splendid edi tion of the Pandects by Taurellus (in 1551) Henry Brenckman a Dutchman, undertook a pilgrimage to Florence where he employed several years in the study of a single manuscript His Historia Pandectarum Florentinorum (Utrecht 1722 in 4to) though a monument of industry is a small portion of his original design. [The Pandects were edited by Taurellius not Taurellus and in 1553 The name of the third collator should be Antonius Augustinus]

93 Αὐτὰρ χαλκεῖων ἐκ ἄεθλα ... apud Homerum patrem omnis virtutis (1st Præfat ad Pandect.) A line of Milton or Tasso would sur prise us in an act of parliament. Quæ omnia ob tinere sancimus in omne ævum Of the first Code he says (2nd Præfat.) in æternum val iturum. Man and for ever!

94 Novellæ is a classic adjective but a bar barous substantive (Ludewig p 245) Justinian never collected them himself the nine collations the legal standard of modern tribunals, consists of ninety-eight Novels but the number was increased by the diligence of Julian, Haloander and Contius (Ludewig p 249, 258 Aleman, Not. in Anecdot p 98)

95 Montesquieu Considerations sur la Gran deur et la Decadence des Romains c. 20, tom. iii. p 501 in 4to On this occasion he throws aside the gown and cap of a President à Mortier

96 Procopius Anecdot c. 28 [tom. iii. p 155 ed. Bonn] A similar privilege was granted to the church of Rome (Novel. ix.) For the general repeal of these mischievous indulgences, see Novel. cxi. and Edict. v

97 Lactantius, in his Institutes of Christianity, an elegant and specious work proposes to imitate the title and method of the civilians Quidam pru dentes et arbitri æquitatis Institutiones Civilis Juris compositas ediderunt (Institut Divin l 1 c 1) Such as Ulpian Paul Florentinus Marcian

98 The emperor Justinian calls him suum though he died before the end of the second century His Institutes are quoted by Servius Boethius Priscian, etc and the Epitome by Arrian is still ex tant (See the Prolegomena and notes to the edi tion of Schulting in the Jurisprudentia Ante Jus tinianea Lugd Bat 1717 Heineccius Hist J R No 313 Ludewig in Vit Just p 199)

99 See the Annales Politiques de l Abbé de St Pierre tom 1 p 25 who dates in the year 1735 The most ancient families claim the immemorial possession of arms and fiefs Since the Crusades, some the most truly respectable have been created by the king for merit and services The recent and vulgar crowd is derived from the multitude of venal offices without trust or dignity which con tinually ennoble the wealthy plebeians

100 If the option of a slave was bequeathed to several legatees, they drew lots and the losers were entitled to their share of his value ten pieces of gold for a common servant or maid under ten years if above that age, twenty if they knew a trade thirty notaries or writers fifty midwives or physicians, sixty eunuchs under ten years thirty pieces above fifty if tradesmen seventy (Cod l vi tit xliii leg 3) These legal prices are generally below those of the market

How sacred—or rather how absurd!

104. Pandect l. xlvii. tit ii. leg 14, No 13 leg 38 No 1 Such was the decision of Ulpian and Paul

105 The trina mancipatio is most clearly defined by Ulpian (Fragment x p 591, 592, edit. Schulting), and best illustrated in the Antiquities of Heineccius

106 By Justinian the old law, the jus necis of the Roman father (Institut l iv tit ix [viii.] No. 7), is reported and reprobated Some legal vestiges are left in the Pandects (l xliii tit xxix. leg. 3 No 4) and the Collatio Legum Romanarum et Mosaicarum (tit ii No 3 p 189)

113 The opinion of the lawyers and the discretion of the magistrates had introduced in the time of Tacitus some legal restraints which might support his contrast of the boni mores of the Ger mans to the bonæ leges alibi—that is to say at Rome (de Moribus Germanorum c 19) Ter tullian (ad Nationes l 1 c 15) refutes his own charges and those of his brethren against the heathen jurisprudence.

114. The wise and humane sentence of the civilian Paul (l ii. Sententiarum in Pandect. l. xxv tit iii leg 4) is represented as a mere moral precept by Gerard Noodt (Opp tom i. in Julius Paulus, p 567 588 and Amica Responsio p 591–606) who maintains the opinion of Justus Lipsius (Opp tom ii p 409 ad Belgas cert i epist 85) and as a positive binding law by Bynkershoek (de Jure occidendi Liberos Opp tom i p 318–340 Curæ Secundæ p 391–427) In a learned but angry controversy the two friends deviated into the opposite extremes.

131 In pure Greek, πορνεία is not a common word nor can the proper meaning fornication be strictly applied to matrimonial sin. In a figurative sense how far and to what offences may it be ex tended. Did Christ speak the Rabbinical or Syr ac tongue? Of what original word is πορνεία the translation? How variously is that Greek wo d translated in the vers ons ancient and modern! There are two (Mark x. 11 Luke xvi. 18) to one (Matthew xix 9) that such ground of divorce was not exc pted by Jesus Some critics have presumed to think by an e asi e answer he avoided the giv ing offence either to the school of Sammai or to

132 The principles of the Roman jurisprudence are exposed by Justinian (Institut l i tit x), and the laws and manners of the different nations of antiquity concerning forbidden degrees etc, are copiously explained by Dr Taylor in his Elements of Civil Law (p 108, 314–339) a work of amusing though various reading, but which cannot be praised for philosophical precision

133 When her father Agrippa died (A D 44), Berenice was sixteen years of age (Joseph tom i Antiquit Judaic l xix c 9 p 952 edit Havercamp) She was therefore above fifty years old when Titus (A D 79) invitus invitam invisit This date would not have adorned the tragedy or pastoral of the tender Racine

134 The Ægyptia conjux of Virgil (Æneid viii 688) seems to be numbered among the monsters who warred with Mark Antony against Augustus the senate and the gods of Italy

135 The humble but legal rights of concubines and natural children are stated in the Institutes (l i tit x), the Pandects (l i tit vii), the Code (l v tit xxv), and the Novels (lxxiv lxxxix) The researches of Heineccius and Giannone (ad Legem Juliam et Papiam Poppæam, c iv p 164–175, Opere Posthume, p 108–158) illustrate this interesting and domestic subject

138 The heredium of the first Romans is defined by Varro (de Re Rusticâ l i c ii p 141, c x p 160 161 edit Gesner) and clouded by Pliny s declamation (Hist Natur xviii 2) A just and learned comment is given in the Administration des Terres chez les Romains (p 12–66)

139 The res mancipi is explained from faint and remote lights by Ulpian (Fragment tit xviii [xix] p 618 619) and Bynkershoek (Opp tom i p 306–315) The definition is somewhat arbitrary and as none except myself have assigned a reason I am diffident of my own

140 From this short prescription Hume (Essays, vol i p 423) infers that there could not then be more order and settlement in Italy than now amongst the Tartars By the civilian of his adversary Wallace he is reproached and not without reason for overlooking the conditions (Institut l. ii tit vi)

141 See the Institutes (l i [ii] tit. iv v) and the Pandects (l. vii) Noodt has composed a learned and distinct treatise de Usufructû (Opp tom i p 387–478)

142 The questions de Servitutibus are discussed in the Institutes (l ii tit iii) and Pandects (l. viii) Cicero (pro Murenâ c 9) and Lactantius (Institut. Divin l i c i) affect to laugh at the insignificant doctrine de aquâ pluviâ arcendâ etc. Yet it might be of frequent use among litigious neighbours both in town and country

143 Among the patriarchs the first born enjoyed a mystic and spiritual primogeniture (Genesis xxv 31) In the land of Canaan he was entitled to a double portion of inheritance (Deuteronomy xxi 17 with Le Clerc s judicious Commentary)

144 At Athens the sons were equal but the poor daughters were endowed at the discretion of their brothers See the κληρικοὶ pleadings of Isæus (in the seventh volume of the Greek Orators) illustrated by the version and comment of Sir William Jones a scholar, a lawyer and a man of genius

145 In England the eldest son alone inherits all the land a law says the orthodox Judge Blackstone (Commentaries on the Laws of England vol. ii p 215) unjust only in the opinion of younger brothers It may be of some political use in sharpening their industry

146 Blackstone s Tables (vol ii p 202) represent and compare the decrees of the civil with those of the canon and common law A separate tract of Julius Paulus, de gradibus et affinibus is inserted or abridged in the Pandects (l. xxxviii tit x [leg 10]) In the seventh degrees he computes (No 18) 1024 persons

147 The Voconian law was enacted in the year of Rome 584 The younger Scipio who was then 17 years of age (Freinsheimius Supplement Livian xlvi 44) found an occasion of exercising his generosity to his mother sisters etc (Polybius, tom ii l xxxi p 1453–1464 edit Gronov [xxxii. 12] a domestic witness)

148 Legem Voconiam (Ernesti Clavis Ciceroniana) voce magnâ bonis lateribus (at sixty five years of age) suasissem says old Cato (de Senectute c 5) Aulus Gellius (vii 13 xvii 6) has saved some passages

149 See the law of succession in the Institutes of Caius (l ii tit viii p 130–144 [Schulting Jurispr Ante Justin Lips 1737]) and Justinian (l. iii. tit i–vi with the Greek version of Theophilus, p 515–575 588–600) the Pandects (l xxxviii tit. vi–xvii) the Code (l vi tit lv–lx) and the Novels (cxviii)

150 That succession was the rule testament the exception is proved by Taylor (Elements of Civil Law p 519–527) a learned rambling spirited writer In the second and third books the method of the Institutes is doubtless preposterous and the chancellor Daguesseau (Œuvres tom i p 275) wishes his countryman Domat in the place of Tribonian Yet covenants before successions is not surely the natural order of the civil laws

151 Prior examples of testaments are perhaps fabulous At Athens a childless father only could make a will (Plutarch. in Solon. See Isæus and Jones)

152 The testament of Augustus is specified by Suetonius (in August c. 101 in Neron c. 4) who may be studied as a code of Roman antiquities Plutarch (Opuscul. tom. ii. p 976) is surprised ὅταν δὲ ὁ μὲν ας γραψωσιν ἐ ερους μὲν ἀπολ ἰπωσι κληρονόμους ἐτ ροι δὲ πωλουσ τας ουσιας The language of Ulpian (Fragment tit xx [§ 2] p 627 edit. Schulting) is almost too exclusive—solum in usu est.

153 Justinian (No ell. cxv c. 3 4) enumerates only the public and private crimes for which a son might likewise disinherit his father

154. The substitutions fidei-commissaires of the modern civil law is a feudal idea grafted on the Roman Jurisprudence and bears scarcely any resemblance to the ancient fidei-commissa (Institutions du Droit François tom. i. p 347–383 Denissart Décisions de Jurisprudence tom. iv p 577–604) They were stretched to the fourth degree by an abuse of the clix. Novel a partial perplexed declamatory law

155. D on Cassius (tom. ii. l. lvi [c. 10] p 814, with Reimar s Notes) specifies in Greek money the sum of 25 000 drachms.

156. The revolutions of the Roman laws of inheritance are finely though sometimes fancifully deduced by Montesqu eu (The Spirit of Laws l xxvii)

157 Of the civil jurisprudence of successions testaments codicils legacies and trusts, the principals are ascertained in the Institutes of Caius (l. ii. tit. ii.–viii. p 91–144) Justinian (l. ii. tit x.–xxv) and Theophilus (p 328 514) and the immense detail occupies twelve books (xxviii.–xxxix.) of the Pandects

158 The Institutes of Caius (l. ii. tit. ix. x. p. 144–214) of Justinian (l. iii. tit. xiv–xxx [xiii–xxix.] l. i tit. i–ii.) and of Theophilus (p 616–837) distinguish four sorts of obligations—aut re aut verbis aut literis aut c ns nsu but I confess my self partial to my own division.

159. How much is the cool, rational evidence of Polybius (l. vi. [c. 56] p 693 l. xxxi p 1459 1460) superior to vague indiscriminate applause —omnium maxime et præcipue fidem coluit (A. Gellius xx 1 [tom. ii. p 289 ed Bipont])

160. The Jus Prætorium de Pactis et Transactionibus is a separate and satisfactory treatise of Gerard Noodt (Opp tom i p 483–564) And I will here observe that the universities of Holland and Brandenburg in the beginning of the present century appear to have stu 1 ed the civil law on the most just and liberal p inciples

161 The nice and various subject of contracts by consent is sp ead o er four books (xvii.–xx.) of the Pandects and is one of the parts best deserving of the attent on of an English student.

162 The covenants of rent are defined in the Pandects (l. xix) and the Code (l. iv tit. lxv) The quinquennium, or term of five years appears to have been a custom rather than a law but in France all leases of land were determined in nine years This limitation was removed only in the year 1775 (Encyclopédie Méthodique tom i. de la Jurisprudence p 668 669) and I am sorry to observe that it yet prevails in the beauteous and happy country where I am permitted to reside

163 I might implicitly acquiesce in the sense and learning of the three books of G Noodt de fœnore et usuris (Opp tom. i. p 175–268) The interpretation of the asses or centesimæ usuræ at twelve the unciariæ at one per cent. is maintained by the best critics and civilians Noodt (l. ii. c. 2 p. 207) Gravina (Opp p 205 etc. 210) Heineccius (Antiquitat. ad Institut. l. iii. tit xv) Montesquieu (The Spirit of Laws l. xxii. c. 22 Défense de l Esprit des Loix tom. iii p 478 etc.) and above all John Frederic Gronovius (de Pecunia Veteri l. iii. c. 13 p 213–227 and his three Antexegeses p 455–655) the founder or at least the champion of this probable opin on which is however perplexed with some difficulties.

164. Primo xii Tabulis sancitum est ne quis unciario fœnore amplius exerceret (Tacit Annal. vi 16) Pour peu (says Montesquieu The Spirit of Laws l. xxii c. 22) qu on soit versé dans l histoire de Rome on verra qu une pareille loi ne devoit pas être l ouvrage des décemvirs. Was Tacitus ignorant—or stupid? But the wiser and more virtuous patricians might sacrifice their avarice to their amb tion and might attempt to check the odious practice by such interest as no lender would accept and such penalties as no debtor would incur

165 Justinian has not condescended to give usury a place in his Inst tutes but the necessary rules and restrictions are inserted in the Pandects (l. xxii. tit. i. ii.) and the Code (l. iv tit. xxxii. xxxiii.)

166 The fathers are unanimous (Barbeyrac Morale des Pères p 144, etc) Cyprian Lactantius Basil, Chrysostom (see his frivolous arguments in Noodt l. i. c. 7 p 188) Gregory of Nyssa, Ambrose Jerom Augustin and a host of councils and casuists

167 Cato Seneca, Plutarch, have loudly condemned the practice or abuse of usury According to the etymology of fœnus and τόκος the principal is supposed to generate the interest a breed of barren metal, exclaims Shakspeare—and the stage is the echo of the public voice.

168 Sir William Jones has given an ingenious and rational Essay on the Law of Bailment (London 1781 p 127 in 8vo) He is perhaps the only lawyer equally conversant with the year books of Westminster the Commentaries of Ulpian the Attic pleadings of Isæus, and the sentences of Arabian and Persian cadhis

169. Noodt (Opp tom. i. p 137–172) has composed a separate treatise ad Legem Aquiliam (Pandect l. ix. tit ii)

170 Aulus Gellius (Noct Attic. xx. i [tom. ii. p 284]) borrowed this story from the Commentaries of Q. Labeo on the twelve tables.

171 The narrative of Livy (1 28) is weighty and solemn At tu dictis Albane maneres is a harsh reflection unworthy of Virgil s humanity (Æneid viii 643) Heyne with his usual good taste, observes that the subject was too horrid for the shield of Æneas (tom iii p 229)

172 The age of Draco (Olympiad xxxix 1) is fixed by Sir John Marsham (Canon Chronicus p 593-596) and Corsini (Fasti Attici tom iii p 62) For his laws, see the writers on the government of Athens Sigonius Meursius Potter, etc

173 The seventh, de delictis of the twelve tables is delineated by Gravina (Opp p 292 293, with a commentary, p 214-230) Aulus Gellius (xx 1) and the Collatio Legum Mosaicarum et Romanarum afford much original information

174 Livy mentions two remarkable and flagitious eras of 3000 persons accused and of 190 noble matrons convicted of the crime of poisoning (xl 43, viii 18) Mr Hume discriminates the ages of private and public virtue (Essays, vol i p 22 23) I would rather say that such ebullitions of mischief (as in France in the year 1680) are accidents and prodigies which leave no marks on the manners of a nation

177 Horace talks of the formidine fustis (l ii Epist 1 154) but Cicero (de Republicâ l iv apud Augustine, The City of God ii 9 in Fragment Philosoph tom iii p 393 edit Olivet) affirms that the decemvirs made libels a capital offence cum perpaucas res capite sanxissent—perpaucas!

178 Bynkershoek (Observat Juris Rom l 1 c. 1 in Opp tom 1 p 9 10 11) labours to prove that the creditors divided not the body but the price of the insolvent debtor Yet his interpretation is one perpetual harsh metaphor nor can he surmount the Roman authorities of Quintilian Cæcilius Favonius and Tertullian See Aulus Gellius Noct Attic xx 1 [tom ii p 285]

179 The first speech of Lysias (Reiske Orator Græc tom v p 2-48) is in defence of a husband who had killed the adulterer The rights of husbands and fathers at Rome and Athens are discussed with much learning by Dr Taylor (Lectiones Lysiacæ, c xi in Reiske, tom vi p 301-308)

180 See Casaubon ad Athenæum, l 1 c. 5, p. 19 Percurrent raphanique mugilesque (Catull [xv 18] p 41, 42 edit Vossian) Hunc mugilis intrat (Juvenal Satir x 317) Hunc perminxere calones (Horat l 1 Satir ii 44) Familiæ stuprandum dedit [objecit] fraudi non fuit (Val Maxim l vi c 1, No 13)

181 This law is noticed by Livy (ii. 8) and Plutarch (in the life of Poblicola) and it fully justifies the public opinion on the death of Cæsar which Suetonius could publish under the Imperial government Jure cæsus existimatur (in Julio, c. 76) Read the letters that passed between Cicero and Matius a few months after the ides of March (ad Fam xi 27, 28)

182 Πρῶτοι δὲ Ἀθηναῖοι τόν τε σίδηρον κατέθεντο Thucydid l 1 c 6 The historian who considers this circumstance as the test of civilisation would disdain the barbarism of a European court.

183 He first rated at millies (£800 000) the damages of Sicily (Divinatio in Cæcilium c 5), which he afterwards reduced to quadringenties (£3 0 000 —1 Actio in Verrem, c. 18) and was finally content with tricies (£24 000) Plutarch (in the life of Cicero) has not dissembled the popular suspicion and report

184 Verres lived near thirty years after his trial till the second triumvirate when he was proscribed by the taste of Mark Antony for the sake of his Corinthian plate (Plin Hist. Natur xxxiv 3)

185 Such is the number assigned by Valerius Maximus (l ix c 2 No 1) Florus (iii 21) distinguishes 2000 senators and knights Appian (de Bell Civil l 1 c 95 tom ii p 133 edit Schweighauser) more accurately computes 40 victims of the senatorian rank and 1600 of the equestrian census or order

186 For the penal laws (Leges Corneliæ, Pompeiæ Juliæ, of Sulla Pompey and the Cæsars) see the sentences of Paulus (l iv tit xviii-xxx p 497-528, edit Schulting) the Gregorian Code (Fragment l xix p 705 706 in Schulting) the Collatio Legum Mosaicarum et Romanarum (tit 1-xv) the Theodosian Code (l ix) the Code of Justinian (l ix) the Pandects (xlviii), the Institutes (l iv tit xviii) and the Greek version of Theophilus (p 917-926)

187 It was a guardian who had poisoned his ward The crime was atrocious yet the punishment is reckoned by Suetonius (c 9) among the acts in which Galba showed himself acer vehemens et in delictis coercendis immodicus

188 The abactores or abigeatores who drove one horse or two mares or oxen or five hogs or ten goats were subject to capital punishment. (Paul Sentent Recept l iv tit xviii p 497 498) Hadrian (ad Concil Bæticæ) most severe where the offence was most frequent condemns the criminals ad gladium ludi damnationem (Ulpian de Officio Proconsulis l. viii in Collatione Legum Mosaic. et Rom. tit xi. p 236 [ed. Canegieter 1774])

189. Till the publication of the Julius Paulus of Schulting (l. ii tit. xxvi. p 317–323) it was affirmed and believed that the Julian laws punished adultery with death and the mistake arose from the fraud or error of Tribonian. Yet Lipsius had suspected the truth from the narratives of Tacitus (Annal. ii. 50 iii. 24, iv 42) and even from the practice of Augustus who distinguished the treasonable frailties of his female kindred

190. In cases of adultery Severus confined to the husband the right of public accusation (Cod. Justinian. l. ix tit ix. leg 1) Nor is this privilege unjust—so different are the effects of male or female infidelity

191 Timon [Timæus] (l. i.) and Theopompus (l. xliii. apud Athenæum, l. xii. p 517 [c. 14, tom. iv p 422 ed Schweigh]) describe the luxury and lust of the Etruscans πάνυ δὲ μέν τοι γε χαίρουσι συνόντες οὐ τοῖς παισὶ ἀλλὰ καὶ τοῖς μειρακίοις About the same period (A U C 445) the Roman youth studied in Etruria (liv ix. 36)

192 The Persians had been corrupted in the same school ἀπ' Ἑλλήνων μαθόντες παισὶ μίσγονται (Herodot. l. i. c. 135) A curious dissertation might be formed on the introduction of pæderasty after the time of Homer its progress among the Greeks of Asia and Europe, the vehemence of their passions and the thin device of virtue and friendship which amused the philosophers of Athens But scelera ostendi oportet dum puniuntur abscondi flagitia.

193 The name, the date, and the provisions of this law are equally doubtful (Gravina, Opp p 432 433 Heineccius, Hist Jur Rom No 108 Ernesti, Clav Ciceron. in Indice Legum) But I will observe that the nefanda Venus of the honest German is styled aversa by the more polite Italian.

194 See the oration of Æschines against the catamite Timarchus (in Reiske Orator Græc. tom. iii. p 21–184)

195. A crowd of disgraceful passages will force themselves on the memory of the classic reader I will only remind him of the cool declaration of Ovid —

> Odi concubitus qui non utrumque resolvunt
> Hoc est quod puerum tangar amore minus

196 Ælius Lampridius in Vit. Heliogabal. in Hist. August p 112 Aurelius Victor in Philippo [de Cæsar c 28] Codex Theodos l. ix. tit vii. leg 6 and Godefroy's Commentary tom. iii. p 63 Theodosius abolished the subterraneous brothels of Rome, in which the prostitution of both sexes was acted with impunity

197 See the laws of Constantine and his successors against adultery sodomy etc in the Theodosian (l. ix. tit vii. leg 7 l. xi. tit. xxxvi. leg 1 4) and Justinian Codes (l. ix. tit. ix leg 30 31) These princes speak the language of passion as well as of justice and fraudulently ascribe their own severity to the first Cæsars.

201 The important subject of the public questions and judgments at Rome is explained with much learning and in a classic style by Charles Sigonius (l. iii. de Judiciis in Opp. tom. iii. p. 679–864) and a good abridgment may be found in the République Romaine of Beaufort (tom. ii. l. v p 1–121) Those who wish for more abstruse law may study Noodt (de Jurisdictione et Imperio Libri duo tom. i. p 93–134) Heineccius (ad Pandect. l. i. et ii ad Institut. l. iv tit. xvii. 202 The office both at Rome and in England must be considered as an occasional duty and not a magistracy or profession. But the obligation of a unanimous verdict is peculiar to our laws which condemn the juryman to undergo the torture from whence they have exempted the criminal.

Baduarius is enumerated among the descendants and allies of the house of Justinian. A family of noble Venetians (Casa Badoer) built churches and gave dukes to the republic as early as the ninth century and, if their descent be admitted no kings in Europe can produce a pedigree so ancient and illustrious. 24. The praise bestowed on princes before their elevation is the purest and most weighty Corippus has celebrated Tiberius at the time of the accession of Justin (l. i. 212–222) Yet even a captain of the guards might attract the flattery of an African exile.

25. Evagrius (l. v c. 13) has added the reproach to his ministers. He applies this speech to the ceremony when Tiberius was invested with the rank of Cæsar The loose expression, rather than the positive error of Theophanes etc. has delayed it to his Augustan investiture, immediately before the death of Justin

26 Theophylact Simocatta (l. iii. c. 11 [p 136 ed. Bonn]) declares that he shall give to posterity the speech of Justin as it was pronounced without attempting to correct the imperfections of language or rhetoric. Perhaps the vain sophist would have been incapable of producing such sentiments.

32 The Greek historians afford some faint hints of the wars of Italy (Menander in Excerpt Legat p 124, 126 [p 327 331 ed. Bonn] Theophylact l. iii. c. 4 [p 120 ed. Bonn]) The Latins are more of the labourers were provoked to despatch them selves he nailed their dead bodies to crosses

208 The sole resemblance of a violent and pre mature death has engaged Virgil (Æneid vi 434 439) to confound suicides with infants lovers, and persons unjustly condemned Heyne the best of his editors, is at a loss to deduce the idea or ascer tain the jurisprudence, of the Roman poet.

Chapter XLV

1 See the family of Justin and Justinian in the Familiæ Byzantinæ of Ducange p 89–101 The devout civilians Ludewig (in Vit Justinian p 131) and Heineccius (Hist Juris Roman p 374) have since illustrated the genealogy of *their fa*vourite prince

2 In the story of Justin s elevation I have trans lated into simple and concise prose the eight hun dred verses of the two first books of Corippus De Laudibus Justini Appendix Hist Byzant p 401–416 Rome, 1777 [p 166–187 ed Bonn]

3 It is surprising how Pagi (Critica in Annal Baron tom ii p 639) could be tempted by any chronicles to contradict the plain and decisive text of Corippus (vicina dona l ii 354 vicina dies l iv 1) and to postpone till A D 567 the consulship of Justin

4 Theophan Chronograph p 205 [tom i p 374 ed Bonn] Whenever Cedrenus or Zonaras are mere transcribers it is superfluous to allege their testimony

5 Corippus l. iii 390 The unquestionable sense relates to the Turks the conquerors of the Avars but the word scultor has no apparent mean ing and the sole MS of Corippus from whence the first edition (1581 apud Plantin) was printed is no longer visible The last editor Foggini of Rome has inserted the conjectural emendation of soldan but the proofs of Ducange (Joinville Dis sert xvi p 238–240) for the early use of this title among the Turks and Persians are weak or am biguous And I must incline to the authority of D Herbelot (Bibliothèque Orient p 825) who ascribes the word to the Arabic and Chaldæan tongues and the date to the beginning of the elev enth century when it was bestowed by the khalif of Bagdad on Mahmud prince of Gazna and con queror of India

6 For these characteristic speeches compare the verse of Corippus (l iii 266–401) with the prose of Menander (Excerpt Legation p 102 103 [ed Par p 287 sq ed Bonn] Their diversity proves that they did not copy each other their re semblance that they drew from a common original

7 For the Austrasian war see Menander (Ex cerpt Legat p 110 [c 11 p 303 ed Bonn]) Gregory of Tours (Hist Franc l iv c 29) and Paul the Deacon (de Gest Langobard l ii c 10)

8 Paul Warnefrid the deacon of Friuli de Gest Langobard l. i c 23 24. His pictures of national manners though rudely sketched are more lively and faithful than those of Bede or Gregory of Tours

9 The story is told by an impostor (Theophy lact Simocat l vi c. 10 [p 261 ed Bonn]) but he had art enough to build his fictions on public and notorious facts

10 It appears from Strabo [l vii] Pliny [l viii. c 11] and Ammianus Marcellinus [l xxvii.] that the same practice was common among the Scythian tribes (Muratori Scriptores Rer Italic tom i p 424) The scalps of North America are likewise trophies of valour The skull of Cunimund was preserved above two hundred years among the Lombards and Paul himself was one of the guests to whom Duke Ratchis exhibited this cup on a high festival (l ii c 28)

11 Paul l i c 27 Menander, in Excerpt Le gat p 110, 111 [p 303 304 ed Bonn]

12 Ut hactenus etiam tam apud Bajoariorum gentem, quam et Saxonum sed et alios ejusdem linguæ homines in eorum carminibus cele bretur Paul. l i c 27 He died A D 799 (Mura tori in Præfat tom i p 397) These German songs, some of which might be as old as Tacitus (de Mor ibus Germ c 2) were compiled and transcribed by Charlemagne Barbara et antiquissima car mina quibus veterum regum actus et bella cane bantur scripsit memoriæque mandavit (Eginard, in Vit Carol Magn c 29 p 130 131) The poems which Goldast commends (Animadvers. ad Eginard p 207), appear to be recent and con temptible romances

13 The other nations are rehearsed by Paul (l ii c 6 26) Muratori (Antichità Italiane, tom i dissert i p 4) has discovered the village of the Bavarians three miles from Modena.

14 Gregory the Roman (Dialog l iii c 27 28, apud Baron Annal Eccles A D 579 No 10) sup poses that they likewise adored this she goat I know but of one religion in which the god and the victim are the same

15 The charge of the deacon against Narses (l. ii c 5) may be groundless but the weak apology of the cardinal (Baron Annal Eccles A D 567 No 8–12) is rejected by the best critics—Pagi (tom ii p 639 640) Muratori (Annali d Italia tom v p 160–163) and the last editors Horatius Blancus (Script Rerum Italic tom i p 427 428) and Philip Argelatus (Sigon Opera tom ii p 11 12) The Narses who assisted at the coronation of Justin (Corippus l iii 221) is clearly understood to be a different person

16 The death of Narses is mentioned by Paul l. ii. c 11 Anastas in Vit Johan iii p 43 Ag nellus Liber Pontifical. Raven. [c 3 fin] in Script rum Italicarum, tom. i. part ii. p 1–181 collated from the most ancient MSS and illustrated by the critical notes of Muratori.

53 Montesquieu, The Spirit of Laws l xx iii c. 1 Les loix des Bourguignons sont assez judicieuses celles de Rotharis et des autres princes Lombards le sont encore plus

54 See Leges Rotharis, No 379 p 47 Striga is used as the name of a witch. It is of the purest class c origin (Horat epod. v 20 Petron c 134) and from the words of Petronius (quæ striges comederunt nervos tuos?) it may be inferred that the prejudice was of Italian rather than barbaric extraction

55 Quia incerti sumas de judicio Dei, et multos audivimus per pugnam sine justâ causâ suam causam perdere. Sed propter consuetudinem gentem nostram Langobardorum legem impiam vetare non possumus See p 74, No 65 of the Laws of Liutprand promulgated A D 724

56 Read the history of Paul Warnefrid particularly l. iii. c. 16 Baronius rejects the praise, which appears to contradict the invectives of pope Gregory the Great but Muratori (Annali d Italia tom. v p. 217) presumes to insinuate that the saint may have magnified the faults of Arians and enemies.

57 The passages of the homilies of Gregory which represent the miserable state of the city and country are transcribed in the Annals of Baronius A D 590 No 16 A D 595 No 2 etc. etc

58 The inundation and plague were reported by a deacon whom his bishop Gregory of Tours had despatched to Rome for some relics The ingenious messenger embellished his tale and the river with a great dragon and a train of little serpents (Greg Turon l x. c. 1)

59 Gregory of Rome (Dialog l. ii c 15) relates a memorable prediction of St Benedict Roma à Gentilibus [gentibus] non exterminab tur sed tempestatibus, coruscis turbinibus ac terræ motû [fatigata] in semetipsa marcescet Such a prophecy melts into true history and becomes the evidence of the fact after which it was invented

60 Quia in uno se ore cum Jovis laudibus, Christi laudes non cap unt, et quam grave nefandumque sit episcopis canere quod nec laico religioso con eniat ipse considera (L ix. Ep 4) The writings of Gregory himself attest his innocence of any clas. c taste o literature

61 Bayle (Dictionnaire Critique, tom ii. p. 598 599) in a very good article of Gregoire I has quoted, for the buildings and statues Platina in Gregorio I for the Palatine library John of Salisbury (de Nugis Curialium l. ii c 26) and for Livy Antoninus of Florence the oldest of the thre lived in the twelfth century

62 Gregor l iii Epist 24, Indict 12 etc [l v Ep 30, ed. Bened] From th Epistles of Gregory and the eighth volume of the Annals of Baronius the pious reader may collect the particles of holy iron which were inserted in keys or crosses of gold and distributed in Britain Gaul Spain, Africa, Constantinople, and Egypt The pontifical smith who handled the file must have understood the miracles which it was in his own power to operate or withhold a circumstance which abates the superstition of Gregory at the expense of his veracity

63 Besides the Epistles of Gregory himself which are methodised by Dupin (Bibliothèque Ecclés. tom. v p 103–126) we have three Lives of the pope the two first written in the eighth and ninth centuries (de Triplici Vita St. Greg Preface to the fourth volume of the Benedictine edition) by the deacons Paul (p 1–18) and John (p 19–188) and containing much original though doubtful, evidence the third a long and laboured compilation by the Benedictine editors (p 199–305) The Annals of Baronius are a copious but partial history His papal prejudices are tempered by the good sense of Fleury (Hist. Ecclés tom viii.) and his chronology has been rectified by the criticism of Pagi and Muratori.

64 John the deacon has described them like an eye witness (l iv c. 83 84) and his description is illustrated by Angelo Rocca, a Roman antiquary (St Greg Opera tom. iv p 312–326) who observes that some mosaics of the popes of the seventh century are still preserved in the old churches of Rome (p 321–323) The same walls which represented Gregory s family are now decorated with the martyrdom of St. Andrew the noble contest of Domenichino and Guido.

65 Disciplinis vero liberalibus, hoc est grammaticâ rhetoricâ, dialecticâ ita a puero est institutus ut quamvis eo tempore florerent adhuc Romæ studia literarum, tamen nulli in urbe ipsâ secundus putaretur Paul. Diacon. in Vit. S Gregor c. 2

66 The Benedictines (Vit. Greg L i. 205–208) labour to reduce the monasteries of Gregory within the rule of their own order but as the question is confessed to be doubtful it is clear that these powerful monks are in the wrong See Butler s Lives of the Saints vol. iii. p. 145 a work of merit the sense and learning belong to the author—his prejudices are those of his profession.

67 Monasterium Gregorianum in ejusdem Beati Gregorii ædibus ad clivum Scauri prope ecclesiam SS Johannis et Pauli in honorem St. Andræ (John, in V t. Greg l. i. c. 6 Greg. l. vii. Epist. 13). This house and monastery were situate on the side of the Cælian hill which fronts the Palatine they are now occupied by the Camaldoli San Gregorio triumphs and St. Andrew has retired to a small chapel. Nardini, Roma Antica, l. iii. c. 6 p 100 Descriz one di Roma tom. i. p 442–446

68 The Lord s prayer consists of half a dozen lines the Sacramentarius and Antiphonarius of Gregory fill 880 folio pages (tom. iii. P 1. p 1–880) yet these only constitute a part of the Ordo Romanus which Mabillon has illustrated and Fleury has abridged (Hist. Ecclés. tom. viii. p 139–152)

satisfactory, and especially Paul Warnefrid (l III. c 13–34), who had read the more ancient histories of Secundus and Gregory of Tours Baronius produces some letters of the popes etc and the times are measured by the accurate scale of Pagi and Muratori

33 The papal advocates Zacagni and Fontanini might justly claim the valley or morass of Commachio as a part of the exarchate. But the ambition of including Modena Reggio Parma and Placentia, has darkened a geographical question somewhat doubtful and obscure Even Muratori, as the servant of the house of Este, is not free from partiality and prejudice

36 I have described the state of Italy from the excellent Dissertation of Beretti Giannone (Istoria Civile tom I p 374–387) has followed the learned Camillo Pellegrini in the geography of the kingdom of Naples After the loss of the true Calabria the vanity of the Greeks substituted that name instead of the more ignoble appellation of Bruttium and the change appears to have taken place before the time of Charlemagne (Eginard p 75 [c. 15])

37 Maffei (Verona Illustrata part I p 310–321) and Muratori (Antichità Italiane tom II Dissertazione XXXII XXXIII p 71–365) have asserted the native claims of the Italian idiom the former with enthusiasm the latter with discretion both with learning ingenuity and truth

38 Paul de Gest Langobard l III c 5 6 7

41 Paul l II c. 31 32 l III c 16 The Laws of Rotharis promulgated A D 643 do not contain the smallest vestige of this payment of thirds but they preserve many curious circumstances of the state of Italy and the manners of the Lombards

42 The studs of Dionysius of Syracuse and his frequent victories in the Olympic games had diffused among the Greeks the fame of the Venetian horses but the breed was extinct in the time of Strabo (l v p 325 [p 212 ed Casaub]) Gisulf obtained from his uncle generosarum equarum greges Paul l II. c. 9 The Lombards afterwards introduced caballi silvatici—wild horses Paul. l IV c. 11

43 Tunc (A.D 596) primum bubali in Italiam delati Italiæ populis miracula fuere (Paul Warnefrid l IV c. 11) The buffaloes whose native climate appears to be Africa and India, are unknown to Europe except in Italy where they are numerous and useful The ancients were ignorant of these animals unless Aristotle (History of Animals II. I 499 4) has described them as the wild oxen of Arachosia See Buffon, Hist Naturelle tom XI and Supplement tom VI Hist Générale des Voyages tom I p 7 481 II. 105 III. 291 IV 234, 461 V 193 VI 491, VIII 400, X 666 Pennant's Quadrupedes p 24 Dictionnaire d'Hist. Naturelle par Valmont de Bomare, tom II p 74. Yet I must not conceal the suspicion that Paul by a vulgar error may have applied the name of bubalus to the aurochs or wild bull of ancient Germany

44 Consult the twenty first Dissertation of Muratori

45 Their ignorance is proved by the silence even of those who professedly treat of the arts of hunting and the history of animals. Aristotle (History of Animals IX 36 620 33 ff and the Notes of his last editor M Camus tom II p 314) Pliny (Hist. Natur l X c. 10) Ælian (de Natur Animal l II c 42) and perhaps Homer (Odyss. XXII. 302–306) describe with astonishment a tacit league and common chase between the hawks and the Thracian fowlers

This is the sixteenth law of the emperor Lewis the Pious His father Charlemagne had falconers in his household as well as huntsmen (Mémoires sur l'Ancienne Chevalerie par M de St Palaye, tom III p 175) I observe in the Laws of Rotharis a more early mention of the art of hawking (No 322) and in Gaul in the fifth century it is celebrated by Sidonius Apollinaris among the talents of Avitus (202–207)

48 The epitaph of Droctulf (Paul l. III c 19) may be applied to many of his countrymen —

Terribilis visu facies sed mente benignus
Longaque robusto pectore barba fuit

The portraits of the old Lombards might still be seen in the palace of Monza twelve miles from Milan which had been founded or restored by queen Theudelinda (l IV 22 23) See Muratori, tom I dissertaz XXIII p 300

50 Giannone (Istoria Civile di Napoli tom I p 263) has justly censured the impertinence of Boccaccio (Gio III Novel 2) who without right or truth or pretence has given the pious queen Theudelinda to the arms of a muleteer

10. Ragæ, or Rei is mentioned in the apocryphal book of Tobit as already flourishing 700 years before Christ under the Assyrian empire Under the foreign names of Europus and Arsacia this city 500 stadia to the south of the Caspian gates was successively embellished by the Macedonians and Parthians (Strabo, l xi p 796 [p 524 ed Casaub]) Its grandeur and populousness in the ninth century is exaggerated beyond the bounds of credibility but Rei has been since ruined by wars and the unwholesomeness of the air Chardin, Voyage en Perse tom. i p 279 280 D Herbelot, Biblioth Oriental. p 714.

11 Theophylact l. iii. c 18 [p 153 ed Bonn] The story of the seven Persians is told in the third book of Herodotus and their noble descendants are often mentioned especially in the fragments of Ctesias. Yet the independence of Otanes (Herodot. l. iii. c. 83 84) is hostile to the spirit of despotism, and it may not seem probable that the seven families could survive the revolutions of eleven hundred years They might however be represented by the seven ministers (Brisson de Regno Persico l. i. p 190) and some Persian nobles, like the kings of Pontus (Polyb. l v [c 43] p 540) and Cappadocia (Diodor Sicul. l. xxxi. [c. 19] tom. ii. p 517) might claim their descent from the bold companions of Darius

13 The Orientals suppose that Bahram convened this assembly and proclaimed Chosroes but Theophylact is in this instance more distinct and credible

14. See the words of Theophylact l. iv c. 7 [p 173 ed. Bonn] Β ράμ φίλος s θεο s νικητής ἐ φάνη τυράννων χθρος σ τρ της μεγισ αναρ ης Περ σης ἄρχω δυναμεως etc. In his answer Chosroes styles himself τῃ νκ ἐ χαριζόμ νος μμα α ὁ ονς ηλσων s (the genii) μισθούμενος [p 175] This is genuine Oriental bombast

15. Theophylact (l iv c. 7 [p 173 ed Bonn]) imputes the death of Hormouz to his son by whose command he was beaten to death with clubs I have followed the milder account of Khondemir and Eutychius and shall always be content with the slightest evidence to extenuate the crime of parricide

16 After the battle of Pharsalia the Pompey of Lucan (l viii. 256–455) holds a similar debate. He was himself desirous of seeking the Parthians but his companions abhorred the unnatural alliance and the adverse prejudices might operate as forcibly on Chosroes and his companions who could describe with the same vehemence the contrast of laws religion, and manners between the East and West.

17 In this age there were three warriors of the name of Narses, who have been often confounded (Pagi Critica tom ii. p 640) 1 A Persarmenian the brother of Isaac and Armatius who after a successful action against Belisarius deserted from his Persian sovereign and afterwards served in the Italian war 2 The eunuch who conquered Italy 3 The restorer of Chosroes who is celebrated in the poem of Corippus (l iii. 220–227) as excelsus super omnia vertice agmina habitu modestus morum probitate placens, virtute verendus fulmineus, cautus, vigilans, etc.

18. Experimentis cognitum est barbaros malle Româ petere reges quam habere These experiments are admirably represented in the invitation and expulsion of Vonones (Annal. ii. 1–3) Tiridates (Annal. vi. 32–44) and Meherdates (Annal. xi. 10 xii. 10–14) The eye of Tacitus seems to have transpierced the camp of the Parthians and the walls of the harem

19. Sergius and his companion Bacchus who are said to have suffered in the persecution of Maximian obtained divine honour in France Italy Constantinople and the East Their tomb at Rasaphe was famous for miracles, and that Syrian town acquired the more honourable name of Sergiopolis. Tillemont Mém Ecclés tom. v p. 491–496 Butler's Saints vol x. p 155

20. Evagrius (l. vi c. 21) and Theophylact (l. v c. 13 14 [p 230 sqq ed. Bonn]) have preserved the original letters of Chosroes written in Greek, signed with his own hand and afterwards inscribed on crosses and tables of gold which were deposited in the church of Sergiopolis They had been sent to the bishop of Antioch as primate of Syria.

21 The Greeks only describe her as a Roman by birth a Christian by religion but she is represented as the daughter of the emperor Maurice in the Persian and Turkish romances which celebrate the love of Khosrou for Schirin of Schirin for Ferhad the most beautiful youth of the East. D Herbelot Biblioth. Orient p 789 997 998

22 The whole series of the tyranny of Hormouz the revolt of Bahram and the flight and restoration of Chosroes is related by two contemporary Greeks—more concisely by Evagrius (l. vi. c. 16 17 18 19) and most diffusely by Theophylact Simocatta (l. iii. c. 6–18 l. iv c 1–16 l v c. 1–15) succeeding compilers Zonaras and Cedrenus can only transcribe and abridge. The Christian Arabs Eutychius (Annal tom ii p 200–208) and Abulpharagius (Dynast. p 96–98) appear to have consulted some particular memoirs The great Persian historians of the fifteenth century Mirkhond and Khondemir are only known to me by the imperfect extracts of Schikard (Tarikh p. 150–155) Texeira or rather Stevens (Hist of Persia p 182–186) a Turkish MS translated by the Abbé Fourmont (Hist de l Academie des Inscriptions, tom. vii p 325–334) and D Herbelot (aux mots Hormouz p 457–459 Bahram p 174 Khosrou Parviz p 996) Were I perfectly satisfied

69 I learn from the Abbé Dubos (Réflexions sur la Poésie et la Peinture, tom III p 174 175) that the simplicity of the Ambrosian chant was confined to four modes while the more perfect harmony of the Gregorian comprised the eight modes or fifteen chords of the ancient music. He observes (p 332) that the connoisseurs admire the preface and many passages of the Gregorian office

70 John the deacon (in Vit. Greg I II c 7) expresses the early contempt of the Italians for tramontane singing Alpina scilicet corpora vocum suarum tonitruis altisone perstrepentia, susceptae modulationis dulcedinem proprie non resultant quia bibuli gutturis barbara feritas dum inflexionibus et repercussionibus mitem nititur edere cantilenam naturali quodam fragore, quasi plaustra per gradus confuse sonantia rigidas voces jactat, etc In the time of Charlemagne the Franks though with some reluctance admitted the justice of the reproach Muratori Dissert xxv

71 A French critic (Petrus Gussanvillus Opera tom II p 105–112) has vindicated the right of Gregory to the entire nonsense of the Dialogues Dupin (tom v p 138) does not think that any one will vouch for the truth of all these miracles I should like to know how many of them he believed himself

72 Baronius is unwilling to expatiate on the care of the patrimonies lest he should betray that they consisted not of kingdoms but farms The French writers the Benedictine editor (tom. IV L III p. 272 etc) and Fleury (tom VIII p 29, etc.) are not afraid of entering into these humble, though useful details, and the humanity of Fleury dwells on the social virtues of Gregory

73 I much suspect that this pecuniary fine on the marriages of villains produced the famous and often fabulous right de cuissage de marquette etc. With the consent of her husband a handsome bride might commute the payment in the arms of a young landlord and the mutual favour might afford a precedent of local rather than legal tyranny

74 The temporal reign of Gregory I is ably exposed by Sigonius in the first book de Regno Italiae See his works, tom II p 44–75.

1 Missisqui reposcerent veteres Persarum ac Macedonum terminos seque invasurum possessa Cyro et post Alexandro per vaniloquentiam ac minas jaciebat Tacit Annal VI 31 Such was the language of the Arsacides I have repeatedly marked the lofty claims of the Sassanians

3 The general independence of the Arabs which cannot be admitted without many limitations is blindly asserted in a separate dissertation of the authors of the Universal History vol xx p 196–250 A perpetual miracle is supposed to have guarded the prophecy in favour of the posterity of Ishmael and these learned bigots are not afraid to risk the truth of Christianity on this frail and slippery foundation

4 D Herbelot Biblioth Orient p 477 Pocock Specimen Hist Arabum p 64 65 Father Pagi (Critica tom II p 646) has proved that after ten years peace the Persian war which continued twenty years was renewed A D 571 Mahomet was born A D 569 in the year of the elephant or the defeat of Abrahah (Gagnier Vie de Mahomet tom I p 89 90 98) and this account allows two years for the conquest of Yemen

Did they only cast out a vague reproach—or had the emperor really listened to some obscure teacher of those ancient Gnostics?

44 The church of St Autonomus (whom I have not the honour to know) was 150 stadia from Constantinople (Theophylact l. viii c 9) The port of Eutropius where Maurice and his children were murdered is described by Gyllius (de Bosphoro Thracio l. iii c xi) as one of the two harbours of Chalcedon

45 The inhabitants of Constantinople were generally subject to the νόσοι ἀρθρίτιδες and Theophylact insinuates (l. viii c. 9 [p 332 ed Bonn] that, if it were consistent with the rules of history he could assign the medical cause. Yet such a digression would not have been more impertinent than his inquiry (l. vii. c 16 17) into the annual inundations of the Nile, and all the opinions of the Greek philosophers on that subject.

46 From this generous attempt Corneille has deduced the intricate web of his tragedy of Heraclius which requires more than one representation to be clearly understood (Corneille de Voltaire tom. v p 300) and which after an interval of some years, is said to have puzzled the author himself (Anecdotes Dramatiques tom 1 p 422)

Benignitatem vestræ pietatis ad Imperiale fastigium pervenisse gaudemus Lætentur cœli et exultet terra et de vestris benignis actibus universæ reipublicæ populus nunc usque vehementer afflictus hilarescat etc This base flattery the topic of Protestant invective is justly censured by the philosopher Bayle (Dictionnaire Critique, Grégoire I Not H tom. ii. p 597 598) Cardinal Baronius justifies the pope at the expense of the fallen emperor

49 The images of Phocas were destroyed but even the malice of his enemies would suffer one copy of such a portrait or caricature (Cedrenus p 404 [tom. i. p 708 ed. Bonn]) to escape the flames

50 The family of Maurice is represented by Ducange (Familiæ Byzantinæ p 106 107 108) his eldest son Theodosius had been crowned emperor when he was no more than four years and a half old, and he is always joined with his father in the salutations of Gregory With the Christian daughters Anastasia and Theocteste I am surprised to find the Pagan name of Cleopatra

51 Some of the cruelties of Phocas are marked by Theophylact, l. viii. c 13 14, 15 George of Pisidia, the poet of Heraclius styles him (Bell Abaricum p 46 Rome 1777) τῆς τυραννίδος ὁ δυσκάθεκτος καὶ βιοφθόρος δράκων [v 49] The latter epithet is just—but the corrupter of life was easily vanquished.

52 In the writers and in the copies of those writers there is such hesitation between the names of Priscus and Crispus (Ducange Fam. Byzant. p 111) that I have been tempted to identify the son in law of Phocas with the hero five times victorious over the Avars.

53 According to Theophanes [tom. i. p 459 ed Bonn] κιβώτια and εἰκόνα [τῆς] θεομήτορος Cedrenus adds an ἀχειροποίητον εἰκόνα τοῦ κυρίου which Heraclius bore as a banner in the first Persian expedition [tom i p 719] See George Pisid Acroas i 140. The manufacture seems to have flourished but Foggini the Roman editor (p. 26) is at a loss to determine whether this picture was an original or a copy

54 See the tyranny of Phocas and the elevation of Heraclius in Chron. Paschal p 380–383 [tom. i p 694–701 ed Bonn] Theophanes, p 242–250 [tom i. p 446–459 ed Bonn] Nicephorus, p 3–7 [ed Par 1648] Cedrenus, p. 404–407 [tom. i. p 708–714, ed Bonn] Zonaras tom. ii. l. xiv [c. 14 15] p 80–82

55 Theophylact l. viii. c. 15 [p 346 ed. Bonn] The Life of Maurice was composed about the year 628 (l viii. c. 13) by Theophylact Simocatta, ex præfect a native of Egypt Photius who gives an ample extract of the work (cod. lxv p 81–100 [p 27–33 ed Bekk.]) gently reproves the affectation and allegory of the style. His preface is a dialogue between Philosophy and History they seat themselves under a plane tree, and the latter touches her lyre.

56 Christianis nec pactum esse nec fidem nec fœdus quod si ulla ipsis fides fuisset regem suum non occidissent. Eutych. Annales, tom. ii. p 211 vers Pocock

57 We must now for some ages take our leave of contemporary historians, and descend if it be a descent from the affectation of rhetoric to the rude simplicity of chronicles and abridgments. Those of Theophanes (Chronograph. p 244–279 [tom. i. p 449–516 ed Bonn] and Nicephorus (p 3–16) supply a regular but imperfect series of the Persian war and for any additional facts I quote my special authorities Theophanes a courtier who became a monk was born A.D 748 Nicephorus patriarch of Constantinople, who died A.D 829 was somewhat younger they both suffered in the cause of images. Hankius de Scriptoribus Byzantinis, p 200–246

58 The Persian historians have been themselves deceived but Theophanes (p 244 [tom. i. p 449 ed. Bonn]) accuses Chosroes of the fraud and falsehood and Eutychius believes (Annal. tom. ii. p 211) that the son of Maurice, who was saved from the assassins lived and died a monk on Mount Sinai.

59 Eutychius dates all the losses of the empire under the reign of Phocas an error which saves the honour of Heraclius whom he brings not from

of their authority, I could wish these Oriental materials had been more copious

23 A general idea of the pride and power of the chagan may be taken from Menander (Excerpt Legat p 113 etc. [p 308 sq, ed Bonn]), and Theophylact (l 1 c 3 l vii c 15), whose eight books are much more honourable to the Avar than to the Roman prince The predecessors of Baian had tasted the liberality of Rome and he survived the reign of Maurice (Buat Hist des Peuples Barbares tom xi p 545) The chagan who invaded Italy A D 611 (Muratori Annali tom v p 305) was then juvenili ætate florentem (Paul Warnefrid de Gest Langobard l. iv c 38), the son perhaps or the grandson of Baian

24 Theophylact l i c 5 6

25 Even in the field the chagan delighted in the use of these aromatics He solicited as a gift Ἰνδικὰς καρυκείας and received πεπερι και φύλλον Ἰνδων κασίαν τε καὶ τὸν λεγόμενον κόστον Theophylact l vii c 13 [p 294 ed Bonn] The Europeans of the ruder ages consumed more spices in their meat and drink than is compatible with the delicacy of a modern palate Vie Privée des François tom ii p 162 163

27 Menander (in Excerpt Legat p 126–132 174 175 [p 332–342 424 425 ed Bonn]) describes the perjury of Baian and the surrender of Sirmium We have lost his account of the siege, which is commended by Theophylact l i c 3 Τὸ δ ὅπως Μενάνδρῳ τῷ περιφανει σαφως διηγόρευται [p 38 ed Bonn])

28 See D Anville in the Mémoires de l Acad des Inscriptions tom xxviii p 412–443 The Sclavonic name of Belgrade is mentioned in the tenth century by Constantine Porphyrogenitus the Latin appellation of Alba Græca is used by the Franks in the beginning of the ninth (p 414)

29 Baron Annal Eccles A D 600 No 1 Paul Warnefrid (l iv c 38) relates their irruption into Friuli and (c 39) the captivity of his ancestors about A D 632 The Sclavi traversed the Hadriatic cum multitudine navium and made a descent in the territory of Sipontum (c 47)

31 The arms and alliances of the chagan reached to the neighbourhood of a western sea fifteen months journey from Constantinople The emperor Maurice conversed with some itinerant harpers from that remote country and only seems to have mistaken a trade for a nation Theophylact l vi c. 2 [p 243 sq, ed Bonn]

32 This is one of the most probable and luminous conjectures of the learned Count de Buat (Hist des Peuples Barbares tom xi p 546–568) The Tzechi and Serbi are found together near Mount Caucasus, in Illyricum and on the lower Elbe Even the wildest traditions of the Bohemians etc afford some colour to his hypothesis.

33 See Fredegarius in the Historians of France tom ii p 432 Baian did not conceal his proud insensibility Ὅτι τοιούτους (not τοσούτους according to a foolish emendation) ἐπαφήσω τῃ Ῥωμαιῃ ως εἰ καὶ συμβαίη γε σφισὶ θανατῳ ἁλωναι ἀλλ ἐμοί γε μὴ γένεσθαι συναίσθησιν

36 Theophylact l vii c 3 [p 274, ed. 39 The general detail of the war against the Avars may be traced in the first second sixth seventh and eighth books of the History of the Emperor Maurice by Theophylact Simocatta As he wrote in the reign of Heraclius he had no temptation to flatter but his want of judgment renders him diffuse in trifles and concise in the most interesting facts

40 Maurice himself composed twelve books on the military art which are still extant and have been published (Upsal 1664) by John Scheffer, at the end of the Tactics of Arrian (Fabricius Bibhoth Græca l iv c 8 tom iii p 278) who promises to speak more fully of his work in its proper place

41 See the mutinies under the reign of Maurice in Theophylact l iii c 1–4 l vi c. 7 8 10 l vii c. 1 l viii c 6 etc

42 Theophylact and Theophanes seem ignorant of the conspiracy and avarice of Maurice These charges so unfavourable to the memory of that emperor are first mentioned by the author of the Paschal Chronicle (p 379 380 [ed Par tom 1 p 695 ed Bonn]) from whence Zonaras (tom ii l. xiv [c 13] p 77 78) has transcribed them Cedrenus (p 399 [tom 1 p 700 ed Bonn]) has followed another computation of the ransom

43 In their clamours against Maurice the people of Constantinople branded him with the name of Marcionite or Marcionist a heresy (says Theophylact l viii c 9 [p 331 ed Bonn]) μετὰ τινος μωρας εὐλαβείας εὐήθης τε καὶ καταγέλαστος

ime of peace is renewed in less than twenty or twenty five years

78. He changed his purple for black buskins and dyed them red in the blood of the Persians (George. Pisid. Acroas. iii 118 121 122 See the Notes of Foggini p 35)

79. George of Pisidia (Acroas. ii 10, p 8) has fixed this important point of the Syrian and Cilician gates They are elegantly described by Xenophon who marched through them a thousand years before. A narrow pass of three stadia between steep high rocks (πέτραι ἠλίβατοι) and the Mediterranean was closed at each end by strong gates impregnable to the land (παρελθεῖν οὐκ ἦν βίᾳ) accessible by sea (Anabasis l i [c 4] p 35 36 with Hutchinson's Geographical Dissertation p. vi.) The gates were thirty five parasangs or leagues, from Tarsus (Anabasis l. i [c 4] p 33 34) and eight or ten from Antioch Compare Itinerar Wesseling p 580 581 Schultens Index Geograph. ad calcem Vit Saladin p 9 Voyage en Turquie et en Perse par M. 80. Heraclius might write to a friend in the modest words of Cicero Castra habuimus ea ipsa quæ contra Darium habuerat apud Issum Alexander imperator haud paulo melior quam aut tu aut ego Ad Atticum v 20 Issus a rich and flourishing city in the time of Xenophon was ruined by the prosperity of Alexandria or Scanderoon on the other side of the bay

81 Foggini (Annotat p 31) suspects that the Persians were deceived by the φάλαγξ πεπληγμένη of Ælian (Tactic. c. 48) an intricate spiral motion of the army He observes (p 28) that the military descriptions of George of Pisidia are transcribed in the Tactics of the emperor Leo

82 George of Pisidia an eye witness (Acroas ii 122 etc.) described in three acroaseis or cantos, the first expedition of Heraclius The poem has been lately (1777) published at Rome but such vague and declamatory praise is far from corresponding with the sanguine hopes of Pagi, D Anville etc

83. Theophanes (p 256) carries Heraclius swiftly (κατὰ τάχος) into Armenia. Nicephorus (p 11) though he confounds the two expeditions defines the province of Lazica Eutychius (Annal. tom. ii. p 231) has given the 5000 men with the more probable station of Trebizond

84 From Constantinople to Trebizond, with a fair wind, four or five days from thence to Erzerom five to Erivan, twelve to Tauris ten in all, thirty two Such is the Itinerary of Tavernier (Voyages tom i. p 12-56) who was perfectly conversant with the roads of Asia. Tournefort, who travelled with a pasha spent ten or twelve days between Trebizond and Erzerom (Voyage du Levant, tom. iii lettr xviii.) and Chardin (Voyages, tom i p 249-254) gives the more correct distance of fifty three parasangs each of 5000 paces (what paces?) between Erivan and Tauris.

85. The expedition of Heraclius into Persia is finely illustrated by M D Anville (Mémoires de l Académie des Inscriptions tom. xxviii p. 559-573) He discovers the situation of Gandzaca, Thebarma, Dastagerd etc. with admirable skill and learning but the obscure campaign of 624 he passes over in silence.

86 Et pontem indignatus Araxes.
—Virgil Eneid viii. 728.

The river Araxes is noisy rapid vehement, and with the melting of the snows, irresistible the strongest and most massy bridges are swept away by the current and its indignation is attested by the ruins of many arches near the old town of Zulfa. Voyages de Chardin tom. i. p 252

87 Chardin tom. i. p 255-259. With the Orientals (D Herbelot Biblioth. Orient p 834) he ascribes the foundation of Tauris or Tebris to Zobeide the wife of the famous Khalif Haroun Alrashid but it appears to have been more ancient and the names of Gandzaca Gazaca Gaza are expressive of the royal treasure. The number of 550 000 inhabitants is reduced by Chardin from 1 100 000 the popular estimate.

88 He opened the Gospel and applied or interpreted the first casual passage to the name and situation of Albania. Theophanes, p 258 [tom. i. p 474, ed. Bonn]

89. The heath of Mogan between the Cyrus and the Araxes, is sixty parasangs in length and twenty in breadth (Olearius p 1023 1024) abounding in waters and fruitful pastures (Hist de Nadir Shah translated by Mr Jones from a Persian MS part ii p 2 3) See the encampments of Timur (Hist. par Sherefeddin Ali l. v c. 37, l. vi. c 13) and the coronation of Nadir Shah (Hist. Persanne p 3-13 and the English Life by Mr Jones p 64 65)

90 Thebarma and Ormia, near the lake Spauta are proved to be the same city by D Anville (Mémoires de l Académie tom xxviii p 564, 565) It is honoured as the birthplace of Zoroaster according to the Persians (Schultens Index Geograph. p 48) and their tradition is fortified by M Perron d Anquetil (Mém. de l Acad. des Inscript tom. xxxi. p 375) with some texts from his or their, Zendavesta.

91 I cannot find, and (what is much more) M. D Anville does not attempt to seek, the Salban Tarantum territory of the Huns etc. mentioned by Theophanes (p 260-262) Eutychius (Annal. tom ii p 231 232) an insufficient author names Asphahan and Casbin is most probably the city of Sapor Ispahan is twenty four days' journey from Tauris and Casbin half way between them (Voyages de Tavernier tom i. p 63-82)

92 At ten parasangs from Tarsus the army of the younger Cyrus passed the Sarus, three plethra in breadth. the Pyramus a stadium in breadth, ran five parasangs farther to the east (Xenophon Anabas l. i. p 33 34 [c 4 init])

60 On the conquest of Jerusalem an event so interesting to the church see the Annals of Eutychius (tom ii p 212-223), and the lamentations of the monk Antiochus (apud Baronium Annal Eccles A D 614, No 16-26), whose one hundred and twenty nine homilies are still extant if what no one reads may be said to be extant.

61 The Life of this worthy saint is composed by Leontius a contemporary bishop, and I find in Baronius (Annal Eccles A D 610 No 10 etc) and Fleury (tom viii p 235-242) sufficient extracts of this edifying work

62 The error of Baronius, and many others who have carried the arms of Chosroes to Carthage instead of Chalcedon, is founded on the near resemblance of the Greek words Καλχηδόνα and Καρχηδόνα, in the text of Theophanes etc which have been sometimes confounded by transcribers and sometimes by critics

63 The genuine acts of St Anastasius are published in those of the seventh general council from whence Baronius (Annal Eccles A D 614 620, 627) and Butler (Lives of the Saints vol i p 242-248) have taken their accounts The holy martyr deserted from the Persian to the Roman army, became a monk at Jerusalem and insulted the worship of the Magi which was then established at Cæsarea in Palestine

68 The historians of Mohammed Abulfeda (in Vit Mohammed p 92 93) and Gagnier (Vie de Mohammed tom. ii. p 247) date this embassy in the seventh year of the Hegira which commences A D 628 May 11 Their chronology is erroneous since Chosroes died in the month of February of the same year (Pagi Critica tom. ii p 779) The Count de Boulainvilliers (Vie de Mahomed, p. 327 328) places this embassy about A D 615, soon after the conquest of Palestine. Yet Mohammed would scarcely have ventured so soon on so bold a step

69. See the thirtieth chapter of the Koran entitled the Greeks Our honest and learned translator, Sale (p 330 331), fairly states this conjecture guess, wager of Mohammed but Boulainvilliers (p 329-344) with wicked intentions, labours to establish this evident prophecy of a future event, which must, in his opinion embarrass the Christian polemics

70 Paul Warnefrid, de Gestis Langobardorum, l iv c. 38 42 Muratori Annali d Italia tom. v p 305 etc.

71 The Paschal Chronicle, which sometimes introduces fragments of history into a barren list of names and dates, gives the best account of the treason of the Avars p 389, 390 [tom i p 712 sq, ed Bonn] The number of captives is added by Nicephorus

72 Some original pieces such as the speech or letter of the Roman ambassadors (p 386-388 [ed. Par tom i p 707-709 ed Bonn]), likewise constitute the merit of the Paschal Chronicle, which was composed, perhaps at Alexandria under the reign of Heraclius

73 Nicephorus (p 10 11) who brands this marriage with the names of ἀθέσμον and ἀθέμιτον is happy to observe that of two sons its incestuous fruit, the elder was marked by Providence with a stiff neck the younger with the loss of hearing

74. George of Pisidia (Acroas i 112-125 p 5) who states the opinions, acquits the pusillanimous counsellors of any sinister views Would he have excused the proud and contemptuous admonition of Crispus? Ἐπιθωπτάζων οὐκ ἔχον βασιλεῖ ἔφασκε καταλιμπάνειν βασίλεια καὶ τοῖς πόρρω ἐπιχωριάζειν δυνάμεσιν

75 Εἰς τὰς ἐκ ἄκρου ηρμένας εὐεξίας

Ἀντιστρόφως δὲ etc

George Pisid Acroas i 51 etc p 4. The Orientals are not less fond of remarking this strange vicissitude and I remember some story of Khosrou Parviz not very unlike the ring of Polycrates of Samos

76 Baronius gravely relates this discovery or rather transmutation of barrels not of honey, but of gold (Annal Eccles A D 6 0 No 3 etc) Yet the loan was arbitrary since it was collected by soldiers who were ordered to leave the patriarch of Alexandria no more than one hundred pounds of gold Nicephorus (p 11) two hundred years afterwards speaks with ill humour of this contribution which the church of Constantinople might still feel.

Abar 55 etc. p 49) The metaphor of the Sabbath is used somewhat profanely by these Byzantine Christians.

111 See Baronius (Annal. Eccles. A.D 628 No 1 4) Eutychius (Annal. tom. ii. p. 240–248) Nicephorus (Brev p 15) The seals of the case had never been broken and this preservation of the cross is ascribed (under God) to the devotion of queen Sira.

112 George of Pisidia Acroas iii. de Expedit contra Persas 415 etc [p 21] and Heracliad Acroas i. 65–138 I neglect the meaner parallels of Daniel, Timotheus etc. Chosroes and the chagan were of course compared to Belshazzar Pharaoh the old serpent, etc.

113 Suidas (in Excerpt Hist. Byzant. p 46) gives this number but either the Persian must be read for the Isaurian war or this passage does not belong to the emperor Heraclius.

Chapter XLVII

1 By what means shall I authenticate this previous inquiry which I have studied to circumscribe and compress?—If I persist in supporting each fact or reflection by its proper and special evidence, every line would demand a string of testimonies, and every note would swell to a critical dissertation. But the numberless passages of antiquity which I have seen with my own eyes are compiled, digested and illustrated by Petavius and Le Clerc by Beausobre and Mosheim I shall be content to fortify my narrative by the names and characters of these respectable guides and in the contemplation of a minute or remote object, I am not ashamed to borrow the aid of the strongest glasses —1 The Dogmata Theologica of Petavius are a work of incredible labour and compass the volumes which relate solely to the Incarnation (two folios fifth and sixth, of 837 pages) are divided into sixteen books—the first of history the remainder of controversy and doctrine. The Jesuit's learning is copious and correct his Latinity is pure, his method clear his argument profound and well connected but he is the slave of the fathers the scourge of heretics, and the enemy of truth and candour as often as they are inimical to the Catholic cause 2 The Armenian Le Clerc, who has composed in a quarto volume (Amsterdam 1716) the ecclesiastical history of the two first centuries was free both in his temper and situation his sense is clear but his thoughts are narrow he reduces the reason or folly of ages to the standard of his private judgment and his impartiality is sometimes quickened, and sometimes tainted by his opposition to the fathers See the heretics (Cerinthians, lxxx. Ebionites cui. Carpocratians, cxx Valentinians cxxi. Basilidians cxx ii. Marcionites, cxli. etc.) under their proper dates 3 The Histoire Critique du Manicheisme (Amsterdam 1734, 1739, in two vols in 4to with a posthumous dissertation sur les Nazarènes, Lausanne 1745) of M. de Beausobre, is a treasure of ancient philosophy and theology The learned historian spins with incomparable art the systematic thread of opinion and transforms himself by turns into the person of a saint a sage or an heretic. Yet his refinement is sometimes excessive. he betrays an amiable partiality in favour of the weaker side, and, while he guards against calumny he does not allow sufficient scope for superstition and fanaticism. A copious table of contents will direct the reader to any point that he wishes to examine. 4. Less profound than Petavius, less independent than Le Clerc, less ingenious than Beausobre, the historian Mosheim is full, rational correct, and moderate. In his learned work, De Rebus Christianis ante Constantinum (Helmstadt 1753 in 4to) see the Nazarenes and Ebionites p. 172–179, 328–332 the Gnostics in general p 179 etc Cerinthus p 196–202 Basilides p 352–361 Carpocrates, p 363–367 Valentinus p 371–389 Marcion, p 404–410 the Manichæans p 829–837 etc

2 Καὶ γὰρ πάντες ἡμεῖς τὸν Χριστὸν ἄνθρωπον ἐξ ἀνθρώπων προσδοκῶμεν γενήσεσθαι says the Jew Tryphon (Justin. Dialog p 207 [p 142 ed Jebb]) in the name of his countrymen and the modern Jews the few who divert their thoughts from money to religion, still hold the same language and allege the literal sense of the prophets

3 Chrysostom (Basnage, Hist des Juifs, tom. v c. 9 p 183) and Athanasius (Petav Dogmat Theolog tom. v l. i. c. 2 p 3) are obliged to confess that the divinity of Christ is rarely mentioned by himself or his apostles.

4. The two first chapters of St. Matthew did not exist in the Ebionite copies (Epiphan. Hæres. xxx. 13) and the miraculous conception is one of the last articles which Dr Priestley has curtailed from his scanty creed

5 It is probable enough that the first of the gospels for the use of the Jewish converts was composed in the Hebrew or Syriac idiom the fact is attested by a chain of fathers—Papias Irenæus, Origen Jerom etc It is devoutly believed by the Catholics and admitted by Casaubon, Grotius and Isaac Vossius, among the Protestant critics.

p 49) celebrates with truth the persevering courage of the three campaigns (τρεις περιδρόμους) against the Persians

94. Petavius (Annotationes ad Nicephorum p 62 63 64) discriminates the names and actions of five Persian generals who were successively sent against Heraclius

95 This number of eight myriads is specified by George of Pisidia (Bell Abar 219) The poet (50–88) clearly indicates that the old chagan lived till the reign of Heraclius, and that his son and successor was born of a foreign mother Yet Foggini (Annotat. p 57) has given another interpretation to this passage.

96 A bird a frog a mouse and five arrows had been the present of the Scythian king to Darius (Herodot l iv c 131 132) Substituez une lettre à ces signes (says Rousseau, with much good taste) plus elle sera menaçante moins elle effrayera ce ne sera qu une fanfaronnade dont Darius n eut fait que rire (Emile, tom iii p 146) Yet I much question whether the senate and people of Constantinople laughed at this message of the chagan

97 The Paschal Chronicle (p 392–397 [tom i p 716–726 ed Bonn]) gives a minute and authentic narrative of the siege and deliverance of Constantinople Theophanes (p 264) adds some circumstances and a faint light may be obtained from the smoke of George of Pisidia who has composed a poem (de Bello Abarico p 45–54) to commemorate this auspicious event

98 The power of the Chozars prevailed in the seventh eighth and ninth centuries They were known to the Greeks the Arabs and under the name of Kosa to the Chinese themselves De Guignes Hist. des Huns tom ii part ii p 507–509

99 Epiphania or Eudocia the only daughter of Heraclius and his first wife Eudocia was born at Constantinople on the 7th of July A D 611 baptised the 15th of August and crowned (in the oratory of St Stephen in the palace) the 4th of October of the same year At this time she was about fifteen Eudocia was afterwards sent to her Turkish husband but the news of his death stopped her journey and prevented the consummation (Ducange Familiæ Byzantin p 118)

100 Elmacin (Hist Saracen p 13–16) gives some curious and probable facts but his numbers are rather too high—300 000 Romans assembled at Edessa—500 000 Persians killed at Nineveh The abatement of a cipher is scarcely enough to restore his sanity

102 Niebuhr (Voyage en Arabie, etc., tom. ii p 286) passed over Nineveh without perceiving it. He mistook for a ridge of hills the old rampart of brick or earth It is said to have been 100 feet high flanked with 1500 towers each of the height of 200 feet

103 Rex regia arma fero (says Romulus, in the first consecration) bina postea (continues Livy, i 10) inter tot bella opima parta sunt spolia, adeo rara ejus fortuna decoris If Varro (apud Pomp. Festum p 306 edit Dacier) could justify his liberality in granting the opime spoils even to a common soldier who had slain the king or general of the enemy the honour would have been much more cheap and common

104 In describing this last expedition of Heraclius the facts the places and the dates of Theophanes (p 265–271 [tom i p 487–502, ed. Bonn]) are so accurate and authentic, that he must have followed the original letters of the emperor, of which the Paschal Chronicle has preserved (p. 398–402 [tom i p 727–734 ed Bonn]) a very curious specimen

105 The words of Theophanes are remarkable εἰσῆλθεν Χοσρόης εἰς οἶκον γεωργου μεδαμινου μειναι, μόλις χωρηθεις ἐν τῃ τουτου θυρᾳ ἣν ἰδων ἔσχατον Ηράκλειος ἐθαύμασεν (p 269 [p 496 ed. Bonn]) Young princes who discover a propensity to war should repeatedly transcribe and translate such salutary texts

106 The authentic narrative of the fall of Chosroes is contained in the letter of Heraclius (Chron. Paschal p 398 [tom i p 727 ed Bonn]) and the history of Theophanes (p 271 [tom i p 500, sq., ed Bonn])

107 On the first rumour of the death of Chosroes an Heracliad in two cantos was instantly published at Constantinople by George of Pisida (p 97–105) A priest and a poet might very properly exult in the damnation of the public enemy (ἐμπεσων τῳ Ταρτάρῳ v 56) but such mean revenge is unworthy of a king and a conqueror and I am sorry to find so much black superstition (θεομάχος Χοσρόης ἔπεσεν καὶ ἐκτυματίσθη εἰς τὰ καταχθονια εἰς τὸ πυρ τὸ ἀκατάσβεστον etc.) in the letter of Heraclius [Chron Pasch p 728 sq ed Bonn] he almost applauds the parricide of Siroes as an act of piety and justice

108 The best Oriental accounts of this last period of the Sassanian kings are found in Eutychius (Annal tom ii p 251–256) who dissembles the parricide of Siroes D Herbelot (Bibliotheque Orientale, p 789) and Assemanni (Bibliothec Oriental tom iii p 415–420)

109 The letter of Siroes in the Paschal Chronicle (p 402 [tom i p 735 ed Bonn]) unfortunately ends before he proceeds to business The treaty

reading which is visible in the Latin and Syriac versions, still exists in the reasoning of the Greek as well as of the Latin fathers and this fraud with that of the three witnesses of St John, is admirably detected by Sir Isaac Newton. (See his two letters translated by M de Missy in the Journal Britannique, tom xv p 148-190, 351-390.) I have weighed the arguments and may yield to the authority of the first of philosophers who was deeply skilled in critical and theological studies.

18 For Apollinaris and his sect see Socrates L ii c. 46 L iii c. 16 Sozomen L v c. 18 L vi c. 25 27 Theodoret, L v 3 10, 11 Tillemont Mémoires Ecclésiastiques tom. vii p. 602-638 Not p 789-794, in 4to Venice 1732 The contemporary saints always mention the bishop of Laodicea as a friend and brother The style of the more recent historians is harsh and hostile yet Philostorgius compares him (L viii. c. 11-15) to Basil and Gregory

19. I appeal to the confession of two Oriental prelates Gregory Abulpharagius the Jacobite primate of the East, and Elias the Nestorian metropolitan of Damascus (see Asseman Bibliothec. Oriental. tom ii p 291 tom. iii p 514, etc.) that the Melchites Jacobites Nestorians etc., agree in the doctrine and differ only in the expression Our most learned and rational divines—Basnage, Le Clerc, Beausobre, La Croze Mosheim Jablonski—are inclined to favour this charitable judgment but the zeal of Petavius is loud and angry and the moderation of Dupin is conveyed in a whisper

20. La Croze (Hist. du Christianisme des Indes tom. i. p 24) avows his contempt for the genius and writings of Cyril—De tous les ouvrages des anciens il y en a peu qu on lise avec moins d utilité and Dupin (Bibliothèque Ecclésiastique tom. iv p 42-52) in words of respect, teaches us to despise them.

21 Of Isidore of Pelusium (L i. Epist. 25 p 8) As the letter is not of the most creditable sort Tillemont less sincere than the Bollandists affects a doubt whether this Cyril is the nephew of Theophilus (Mém. Ecclés tom. xiv p 268)

22 A grammarian is named by Socrates (l vii. c. 13) δ ... προ... ἀκροα... ... ἐκ ... Κ ... ριλλου ... ὡς ... περὶ ... ἐν ... διδασ ... ἐκείνου ... δαίρατος

23. See the youth and promotion of Cyril in Socrates (L. vii c. 7) and Renaudot (Hist Patriarch Alexandrin. p 106 108) The Abbé Renaudot drew his materials from the Arabic history of Severus bishop of Hermopolis Magna or Ashmunein in the tenth century who can never be trusted unless our assent is extorted by the internal evidence of facts.

24. The Parabolani of Alexandria were a charitable corporation instituted during the plague of Gallienus to visit the sick and to bury the dead. They gradually enlarged, abused, and sold the privileges of their order Their outrageous conduct during the reign of Cyril provoked the emperor to deprive the patriarch of their nomination and to restrain their number to five or six hundred. But these restraints were transient and ineffectual See the Theodosian Code L xvi. tit ii. [leg 42] and Tillemont Mém. Ecclés. tom xiv p 2,6-2,8 25 For Theon and his daughter Hypatia see Fabricius Bibliothec. tom. viii p 210 211 Her article in the Lexicon of Suidas is curious and original. Hesychius (Meursii Opera tom. vii p. 295 296) observes that she was persecuted διὰ τὴν ὑπερβάλλουσαν σοφίαν and an epigram in the Greek Anthology (l i. c. 76 p 159 edit Brodæi) celebrates her knowledge and eloquence She is honourably mentioned (Epist 10 15 16 33-80 124, 135 153) by her friend and disciple the philosophic bishop Synesius.

26 Ὀστράκοις ἀνεῖλον ... μέληδον διασπάσαντες etc. Oyster-shells were plentifully strewed on the sea beach before the Cæsareum. I may therefore prefer the literal sense without rejecting the metaphorical version of tegulæ tiles, which is used by M de Valois. I am ignorant, and the assassins were probably regardless whether their victim was yet alive.

27 These exploits of St. Cyril are recorded by Socrates (L vii. c. 13 14, 15) and the most reluctant bigotry is compelled to copy an historian who coolly styles the murderers of Hypatia ἄνδρες τὸ φρόνημα ἔνθερμοι. At the mention of that injured name I am pleased to observe a blush even on the cheek of Baronius (A.D 415 No 48)

28 He was deaf to the entreaties of Atticus of Constantinople and of Isidore of Pelusium and yielded only (if we may believe Nicephorus L xiv c. 18) to the personal intercession of the Virgin. Yet in his last years he still muttered that John Chrysostom had been justly condemned (Tillemont Mém Ecclés. tom. xiv p 2,8-282 Baronius, Annal. Eccles. A D 412 No 46-64)

29. See their characters in the history of Socrates (l. vii. c. 25-28) their power and pretensions in the huge compilation of Thomassin (Discipline de l Eglise tom. i p. 80-91)

30 His elevation and conduct are described by Socrates (l vii c. 29 31) and Marcellinus seems to have applied the eloquentiæ satis, sapientiæ parum of Sallust

31 Cod Theodos, l x i tit. v leg 65 with the illustrations of Baronius (A D 428 No 25, etc.), Godefroy (ad locum) and Pagi Critica tom. ii p 208

32 Isidore of Pelusium (L iv Epist. 57) His words are strong and scandalous—τί θαυμάζεις εἰ ... περὶ πρᾶγμα θ... λόγου κρ... φῶ... προσποιοῦντα ... τὸ φιλαρχίας ἐκβακχευόμενοι. Isidore is a saint but he never became a bishop and I half suspect that the pride of Diogenes trampled on the pride of Plato

33 La Croze (Christianisme des Indes, tom. i. p 44-53 Thesaurus Epistolicus La Crozianus, tom. iii. p 276-280) has detected the use of ὁ δεσπότης and κύριος Ἰησοῦς which in the fourth,

But this Hebrew Gospel of St Matthew is most unaccountably lost and we may accuse the dili gence or fidelity of the primitive churches who have preferred the unauthorized version of some nameless Greek Erasmus and his followers, who respect our Greek text as the original gospel deprived themselves of the evidence which declares it to be the work of an apostle See Simon Hist Critique, etc, tom iii c 5-9 p 47-101 and the Prolegomena of Mill and Wetstein to the New Testament

6 The metaphysics of the soul are disengaged by Cicero (Tusculan l. i.) and Maximus of Tyre (Dissertat xvi) from the intricacies of dialogue, which sometimes amuse and often perplex the readers of the Phædrus the Phædo and the Laws of Plato

7 The disciples of Jesus were persuaded that a man might have sinned before he was born (John ix 2), and the Pharisees held the transmigration of virtuous souls (Joseph de Bell. Judaico, l ii c 7 [c. 8 § 14]) and a modern Rabbi is modestly assured that Hermes, Pythagoras Plato etc derived their metaphysics from his illustrious countrymen

8 Four different opinions have been entertained concerning the origin of human souls 1 That they are external and divine. 2 That they were created in a separate state of existence before their union with the body 3 That they have been propagated from the original stock of Adam, who contained in himself the mental as well as the corporeal seed of his posterity 4 That each soul is occasionally created and embodied in the moment of conception —The last of these sentiments appears to have prevailed among the moderns and our spiritual history is grown less sublime without becoming more intelligible

9 Ὅτι ἡ του Σωτηρος ψυχὴ ἡ του Ἀδὰμ ἦν was one of the fifteen heresies imputed to Origen and denied by his apologist (Photius Bibliothec. cod cxvii p 296 [p 92 ed Bekk]) Some of the Rabbis attribute one and the same soul to the persons of Adam David and the Messiah

10 Apostolis adhuc in seculo superstitibus, apud Judæam Christi sanguine recente PHANTASMA domini corpus asserebatur Hieronym advers Lucifer c. 8 The epistle of Ignatius to the Smyrnæans and even the Gospel according to St John, are levelled against the growing error of the Docetes who had obtained too much credit in the world (1 John iv 1-5)

11 About the year 200 of the Christian era Irenæus and Hippolytus refuted the thirty two sects της ψευδωνύμου γνωσεως which had multiplied to fourscore in the time of Epiphanius (Phot Biblioth cod cxx. cxxi cxxii) The five books of Irenæus exist only in barbarous Latin but the original might perhaps be found in some monastery of Greece.

12 The pilgrim Cassian who visited Egypt in the beginning of the fifth century observes and laments the reign of anthropomorphism among the monks who were not conscious that they embraced the system of Epicurus (Cicero de Nat. Deorum, i. 18, 49) Ab universo propemodum genere monarchorum qui per totam provinciam Egypti morabantur pro simplicitatis errore susceptum est ut e contrario memoratum pontificem (Theophilus) velut hæresi gravissimâ depravatum, pars maxima seniorum ab universo fraternitatis corpore decerneret detestandum (Cassian Collation. x 1) As long as St Augustin remained a Manichæan, he was scandalised by the anthropomorphism of the vulgar Catholics

13 Ita est in oratione senex mente confusus eo quod illam ἀνθρωπόμορφον imaginem Deitatis, quam proponere sibi in oratione consueverat aboleri de suo corde sentiret ut in amarissimos fletus, crebrosque singultus repente prorumpens in terram prostratus cum ejulatû validissimo proclamaret Heu me miserum! tulerunt a me Deum meum et quem nunc teneam non habeo vel quem adorem aut interpellam jam nescio Cassian Collat x. 2

14. St John and Cerinthus (A D 80 Cleric. Hist. Eccles p 493) accidentally met in the public bath of Ephesus but the apostle fled from the heretic lest the building should tumble on their heads This foolish story reprobated by Dr Middleton (Miscellaneous Works vol. ii) is related however by Irenæus (iii 3) on the evidence of Polycarp and was probably suited to the time and residence of Cerinthus The obsolete yet probably the true reading of 1 John iv 3—ὃ λύει τὸν Ἰησοῦν —alludes to the double nature of that primitive heretic.

15 The Valentinians embraced a complex and almost incoherent system 1 Both Christ and Jesus were æons though of different degrees the one acting as the rational soul the other as the divine spirit of the Saviour 2 At the time of the passion they both retired and left only a sensitive soul and a human body 3 Even that body was ethereal and perhaps apparent —Such are the laborious conclusions of Mosheim But I much doubt whether the Latin translator understood Irenæus and whether Irenæus and the Valentinians understood themselves

16 The heretics abused the passionate exclamations of My God my God why hast thou forsaken me? Rousseau, who has drawn an eloquent but indecent parallel between Christ and Socrates forgets that not a word of impatience or despair escaped from the mouth of the dying philosopher In the Messiah such sentiments could be only apparent and such ill sounding words are properly explained as the application of a psalm and prophecy

17 This strong expression might be justified by the language of St. Paul (1 Tim iii 16) but we are deceived by our modern Bibles The word ὃ (which) was altered to θεὸς (God) at Constantinople in the beginning of the sixth century the true ading which is visible in the Latin and Syriac rsions, still exists in the reasoning of the Greek well as of the Latin fathers and this fraud with at of the three witnesses of St John is admirably etected by Sir Isaac Newton. 33 La Croze (Christianisme des Indes, tom i. p 44 53 Thesaurus Epistolicus La Crozianus, tom. iii. p 276–280) has detected the use of δεσπότης and κύριος Ἰησοῦς which in the fourth, fifth and sixth centuries discriminates the school of Diodorus of Tarsus and his Nestorian disciples

34 Θεοτόκος—Deipara as in zoology we familiarly speak of oviparous and viviparous animals It is not easy to fix the invention of this word which La Croze (Christianisme des Indes tom i p 16) ascribes to Eusebius of Cæsarea and the Arians The orthodox testimonies are produced by Cyril and Petavius (Dogmat Theolog tom v l v c 15 p 254 etc) but the veracity of the saint is questionable and the epithet of θεοτόκος so easily slides from the margin to the text of a Catholic MS

35 Basnage in the Histoire de l Eglise a work of controversy (tom i p 505) justifies the mother by the blood of God (Acts xx 28 with Mill s various readings) But the Greek MSS are far from unanimous and the primitive style of the blood of Christ is preserved in the Syriac version even in those copies which were used by the Christians of St Thomas on the coast of Malabar (La Croze Christianisme des Indes tom i p 347) The jealousy of the Nestorians and Monophysites has guarded the purity of their text

36 The pagans of Egypt already laughed at the new Cybele of the Christians (Isidor l i Epist 54) a letter was forged in the name of Hypatia to ridicule the theology of her assassin (Synodicon c 216, in iv tom Concil p 484) In the article of NESTORIUS Bayle has scattered some loose philosophy on the worship of the Virgin Mary

37 The ἀντίδοσις of the Greeks a mutual loan or transfer of the idioms or properties of each nature to the other—of infinity to man passibility to God etc Twelve rules on this nicest of subjects compose the Theological Grammar of Petavius (Dogmata Theolog tom v l iv c 14 15 p 209 etc)

38 See Ducange, C P Christiana l i p 30 etc

39 Concil tom iii p 943 They have never been directly approved by the church (Tillemont Mém Eccles tom xiv p 368–372) I almost pity the agony of rage and sophistry with which Petavius seems to be agitated in the sixth book of his Dogmata Theologica

40 Such as the rational Basnage (ad tom i Variar Lection Canisii in Præfat c 2 p 11–23) and La Croze the universal scholar (Christianisme des Indes tom i p 16–20 De l Ethiopie p 26 27 Thesaur Epist p 176 etc 283 285) His free sentence is confirmed by that of his friends Jablonski (Thesaur Epist tom i p 193–201) and Mosheim (idem p 304 Nestorium crimine caruisse est et mea sententia) and three more respectable judges will not easily be found Asseman a learned and modest slave can hardly discern (Bibliothec Orient tom iv p 190–224) the guilt and error of the Nestorians

41 The origin and progress of the Nestorian controversy till the synod of Ephesus may be found in Socrates (l vii c 32) Evagrius (l i c 1 2) Liberatus (Brev c 1–4) the original Acts (Concil tom iii p 551–991, edit Venice 1728) the Annals of Baronius and Pagi, and the faithful collections of Tillemont (Mém Eccles tom xiv p 283–377)

42 The Christians of the four first centuries were ignorant of the death and burial of Mary The tradition of Ephesus is affirmed by the synod (ἔνθα ὁ θεολόγος Ἰωάννης καὶ ἡ θεοτόκος παρθένος ἡ ἁγία Μαρία—Concil tom iii p 1102) yet it has been superseded by the claim of Jerusalem and her empty sepulchre as it was shown to the pilgrims, produced the fable of her resurrection and assumption in which the Greek and Latin churches have piously acquiesced See Baronius (Annal Eccles A D 48 No 6 etc) and Tillemont (Mém Eccles tom i p 467–477)

44 Civil or ecclesiastical business detained the bishops at Antioch till the 18th of May Ephesus was at the distance of thirty days journey and ten days more may be fairly allowed for accidents and repose The march of Xenophon over the same ground enumerates above 260 parasangs or leagues and this measure might be illustrated from ancient and modern itineraries if I knew how to compare the speed of an army a synod and a caravan. John of Antioch is reluctantly acquitted by Tillemont himself (Mém Eccles tom xiv p 386–389)

45 Μεμφόμενον μὴ κατὰ τὸ δέον τὰ ἐν Ἐφέσῳ συντεθῆναι ὑπομνήματα πανουργίᾳ δὲ καί τινι ἀθεσμῳ καινοτομίᾳ Κυρίλλου τεχναζοντος Evagrius l i c 7 The same imputation was urged by Count Irenæus (tom iii p 1249) and the orthodox critics do not find it an easy task to defend the purity of the Greek or Latin copies of the Acts

46 Ὁ δὲ ἐπ ὀλέθρῳ τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν τεχθεὶς καὶ τραφεὶς After the coalition of John and Cyril these invectives were mutually forgotten The style of declamation must never be confounded with the genuine sense which respectable enemies entertain of each other s merit (Concil tom iii p 1244)

47 See the Acts of the Synod of Ephesus in the original Greek and a Latin version almost contemporary (Concil tom iii p 991–1339 with the Synodicon adversus Tragœdiam Irenæi tom iv p 235–497) the Ecclesiastical Histories of Socrates (l vii c 34) and Evagrius (l i c 3 4 5), and the Breviary of Liberatus (in Concil tom vi p 419–459 c 5 6) and the Mémoires Eccles of Tillemont (tom xiv p 377–487)

52 Αἰτ ε … δεηθέντος ἐπι ῥάτῃ κατὰ τὸ οἰκ τον … ἐν … μοναστήριον Evagrius, l. i. c. 7 The original letters in the Synodicon (c 15 24, 25 26) justify the appearance of a voluntary resignation which is asserted by Ebed Jesu, a Nestorian writer apud Asseman. Biblioth. Oriental. tom. iii. p. 299, 302

53 See the Imperial letters in the Acts of the Synod of Ephesus (Concil. tom. iii p 1730–1735) The odious name of Simonians which was affixed to the disciples of this τερα … διδασκαλίας was designed ὡς ἂν … προβληθέντες … ὀνειδεσι … ἁμαρτημάτων καὶ μη … ας … ὑπάρχειν Yet these were Christians! who differed only in names and in shadows.

54 The metaphor of islands is applied by the grave civilians (Pandect. l. xlviii. tit 22 leg 7 (§ 5)) to those happy spots which are discriminated by water and verdure from the Libyan sands. Three of these under the common name of Oasis, or Alvahat 1 The temple of Jupiter Ammon 2 The middle Oasis, three days journey to the west of Lycopolis 3 The southern where Nestorius was banished in the first climate and only three days journey from the confines of Nubia. See a learned Note of Michaelis (ad Descript. Ægypt. Abulfedæ p. 21–34)

55 The invitation of Nestorius to the synod of Chalcedon is related by Zacharias, bishop of Melitene (Evagrius l. ii c. 2 Asseman Biblioth. Orient. tom. ii. p. 55) and the famous Xenaias or Philoxenus, bishop of Hierapolis (Asseman. Biblioth. Orient tom. ii. p 40, etc.) denied by Evagrius and Asseman and stoutly maintained by La Croze (Thesaur Epistol. tom iii p 181 etc.) The fact is not improbable yet it was the interest of the Monophysites to spread the invidious report and Eutychius (tom. ii p. 12) affirms that Nestorius died after an exile of seven years and consequently ten years before the synod of Chalcedon.

56 Consult D Anville (Mémoire sur l Egypt, p 191) Pocock (Description of the East, vol. i. p 76) Abulfeda (Descript Egypt p 14) and his commentator Michaelis (Not p 78–83) and the Nubian Geographer (p 42) who mentions in the twelfth century the ruins and the sugar-canes of Akmim.

57 Eutychius (Annal. tom. ii. p 12) and Gregory Bar Hebræus, or Abulpharagius (Asseman. tom ii. p 316) represent the credulity of the tenth and thirteenth centuries.

58. We are obliged to Evagrius (l i. c. 7) for some extracts from the letters of Nestorius but the lively picture of his sufferings is treated with insult by the hard and stupid fanatic.

59 Dixi Cyrillum dum viveret, auctoritate suâ effecisse, ne Eutychianismus et Monophysitarum error in nervum erumperet idque verum puto aliquo … honesto modo παλινῳδίαν cecinerat. The learned but cautious Jablonski did not always speak the whole truth. Cum Cyrillo lenius omnino egi quam si tecum aut cum aliis rei hujus probe gnaris et æquis rerum æstimatoribus sermones privatos conferrum (Thesaur Epistol La Crozian tom. i. p 197 198) an excellent key to his dissertations on the Nestorian controversy!

60. Ἡ ἁγία σύνοδος εἶπεν ἆρον … αὐτὸν Εὐσέβιον οὗτος … οὗτος εἰς δύο … ὡς ἐμερίσθη … λέγει δύο ἀνάθεμα At the request of Dioscorus, those who were not able to roar (βοῆσαι) stretched out their hands. At Chalcedon the Orientals disclaimed these exclamations but the Egyptians more consistently declared ταῦτα καὶ τότε εἴπομεν … ν … λέγομεν (Concil tom iv p 1012)

61 Ἔλεγε δὲ (Eusebius, bishop of Dorylæum) τὸν Φλαβιανὸν … ἀναιρεθῆναι πρὸς Διοσκόρου ὠθούμενόν … καὶ λακτιζόμενον and this testimony of Evagrius (l. ii. c. 2) is amplified by the historian Zonaras (tom. ii. l. xiii. [c. 23] p 44) who affirms that Dioscorus kicked like a wild ass But the language of Liberatus (Brev c. 12 in Concil tom vi. p 438) is more cautious and the Acts of Chalcedon which lavish the names of homicide Cain etc. do not justify so pointed a charge The monk Barsumas is more particularly accused—ἔσφαξε τὸν μακάριον Φλαβιανόν αὐτὸς ἔστηκε … ἔλεγε σφάξον (Concil tom iv p 1413)

rius (l 1 c. 9–12, and l 11 c 1, 2 3 4) and Liberatus (Brev c 11, 12 13, 14) Once more, and almost for the last time I appeal to the diligence of Tillemont (Mém Eccles tom xv p 479–719) The annals of Baronius and Pagi will accompany me much further on my long and laborious journey

Ειρηνη πάντεσσιν ἐπίσκοπος εἶπεν ἐπελθων
Πως δύναται πασιν ἣν μόνος ενδον ἔχει

I am ignorant whether the patriarch who seems to have been a jealous lover, is the Cimon of a preceding epigram whose πεὸς ἑστηκὸς was viewed with envy and wonder by Priapus himself

64. Those who reverence the infallibility of synods may try to ascertain their sense The leading bishops were attended by partial or careless scribes who dispersed their copies round the world Our Greek MSS are sullied with the false and proscribed reading of ἐκ των φυσέων (Concil tom iii p 1460) the authentic translation of Pope Leo I does not seem to have been executed and the old Latin versions materially differ from the present Vulgate which was revised (A D 550) by Rusticus a Roman priest from the best MSS of the Ακοιμητοι at Constantinople (Ducange C P Christiana l iv p 151) a famous monastery of Latins Greeks and Syrians See Concil tom iv p 1959–2049, and Pagi Critica tom ii. p 326 etc

66 Ἐβόησαν ἢ ὁ ὅρος κρατείτω ἢ ἀπερχόμεθα οἱ ἀντιλεγοντες φανεροὶ γίνωνται οἱ ἀντιλέγοντες Νεστοριανοί εἰσιν οἱ ἀντιλεγοντες εἰς Ρωμην ἀπέλθωσιν (Concil. tom iv p 1449) Evagrius and Liberatus present only the placid face of the synod and discreetly slide over these embers suppositos cineri doloso

67 See in the Appendix to the Acts of Chalcedon the confirmation of the synod by Marcian (Concil. tom iv p 1,81, 1783) his letters to the monks of Alexandria (p 1791) of Mount Sinai (p 1793) of Jerusalem and Palestine (p 1798) his laws against the Eutychians (p 1809, 1811 1831) the correspondence of Leo with the provincial synods on the revolution of Alexandria (p 1835–1930)

68 Photius (or rather Eulogius of Alexandria) confesses in a fine passage the specious colour of this double charge against pope Leo and his synod of Chalcedon (Biblioth cod ccxxv p 768 [p 243 ed Bekk]) He waged a double war against the enemies of the church and wounded either foe with the darts of his adversary—καταλλήλοις βέλεσι τους ἀντιπάλους ἐτίτρωσκε Against Nestorius he seemed to introduce the σύγχυσις of the Monophysites against Eutyches he appeared to countenance the υποστασέων διάφορα of the Nestorians The apologist claims a charitable interpretation for the saints if the same had been extended to the heretics the sound of the controversy would have been lost in the air

69 Αἴλουρος from his nocturnal expeditions. In darkness and disguise he crept round the cells of the monastery and whispered the revelation to his slumbering brethren (Theodor Lector l. i [c. 8])

70 Φόνους τε τολμηθηναι μυρίους [καὶ] αἱμάτων πλήθει πολυνθηναι μὴ μόνον την γην ἀλλὰ καὶ αὐτὸ τὸν ἀέρα Such is the hyperbolic language of the Henoticon

71 See the Chronicle of Victor Tunnunensis in the Lectiones Antiquæ of Canisius republished by Basnage tom 1 p 326

72 The Henoticon is transcribed by Evagrius (l iii c 13 [14]), and translated by Liberatus (Brev c 18) Pagi (Critica, tom. ii p 411) and Asseman (Biblioth Orient tom 1 p 343) are satisfied that it is free from heresy but Petavius (Dogmat Theolog tom v l. i c 13, p 40) most unaccountably affirms Chalcedonensem ascivit. An adversary would prove that he had never read the Henoticon

73 See Renaudot (Hist. Patriarch Alex. p 123 131 145 195 247) They were reconciled by the care of Mark I (A D 799–819) he promoted their chiefs to the bishoprics of Athribis and Talba (perhaps Tava see D Anville p 82) and supplied the sacraments which had failed for want of an episcopal ordination

74. De his quos baptizavit quos ordinavit Acacius majorum traditione confectam et veram præcipue religiosæ solicitudini congruam præbemus sine difficultate medicinam (Galasius in Epist 1 ad Euphemium Concil tom v p 286) The offer of a medicine proves the disease and numbers must have perished before the arrival of the Roman physician Tillemont himself (Mém Ecclés tom xvi p 372 642 etc) is shocked at the proud uncharitable temper of the popes they are now glad says he to invoke St Flavian of Antioch St Elias of Jerusalem etc to whom they refused communion whilst upon earth But Cardinal Baronius is firm and hard as the rock of St Peter

75 Their names were erased from the diptych of the church ex venerabili diptycho in quo piæ memoriæ transitum ad cœlum habentium episcoporum vocabula continentur (Concil tom iv p 1846) This ecclesiastical record was therefore equivalent to the book of life

76 Petavius (Dogmat. Theolog tom. v l. v c. 2 3 4, p. 217–225) and Tillemont (Mém Ecclés. tom. xiv p 713 etc. 799) represent the history and doctrine of the Trisagion. In the twelve centuries between Isaiah and St. Proclus a boy who was taken up into heaven before the bishop and people of Constantinople, the song was considerably improved The boy heard the angels sing Holy God! Holy strong! Holy immortal!

77 Peter Gnapheus the fuller (a trade which he had exercised in his monastery) patriarch of Antioch. His tedious story is discussed in the Annals of Pagi (A.D 477 490) and a dissertation of M de Valois at the end of his Evagrius.

78 The troubles under the reign of Anastasius must be gathered from the Chronicles of Victor, Marcellinus and Theophanes. As the last was not published in the time of Baronius, his critic Pagi is more copious as well as more correct.

79 The general history from the council of Chalcedon to the death of Anastasius may be found in the Breviary of Liberatus (c. 14–19) the second and third books of Evagrius the abstract of the two books of Theodore the Reader the Acts of the Synods and the Epistles of the Popes (Concil. tom v) The series is continued with some disorder in the fifteenth and sixteenth tomes of the Mémoires Ecclésiastiques of Tillemont. And here I must take leave for ever of that incomparable guide, whose bigotry is overbalanced by the merits of erudition, diligence, veracity and scrupulous minuteness. He was prevented by death from completing as he designed the sixth century of the church and empire

80 The strain of the Anecdotes of Procopius (c. 11 13 18 27 28) with the learned remarks of Alemannus is confirmed rather than contradicted, by the Acts of the Councils, the fourth book of Evagrius, and the complaints of the African Facundus, in his twelfth book—de tribus capitulis cum videri doctus appetit importune spontaneis quæstionibus ecclesiam turbat. See Procop de Bell Goth l. iii. c. 35 (tom. ii. p 429, ed. Bonn)

81 Procop de Ædificiis, l. i. c 6 7 etc. passim.

82 Ὡς δὴ ἀθηναι ἀφίλαι ... Procop de Bell. Goth l. iii. c 32 (tom ii. p 409 ed. Bonn) In the Life of St Eutychius (apud Aleman ad Procop Arcan. c. 18 (tom iii. p 439, ed. Bonn)) the same character is given with a design to praise Justinian

83 For these wise and moderate sentiments Procopius (de Bell. Goth l. i c. 3) is scourged in the preface of Alemannus who ranks him among the political Christians—sed longe verius hæresium omnium sentinas prorsusque Atheos—abominable Atheists, who preached the imitation of God's mercy to man (ad Hist Arcan. c. 13)

84 This alternative, a precious circumstance, is preserved by John Malala (tom. ii. p 63 edit. Venet. 1733 [p. 449, ed Bonn]), who deserves more credit as he draws towards his end After numbering the heretics, Nestorians Eutychians, etc. ne expectent says Justinian, ut digni venià judicentur jubemus enim ut convicti et aperti hæretici justæ et idoneæ animadversioni subjiciantur Baronius copies and applauds this edict of the Code (A.D 527 No 39 40)

85 See the character and principles of the Montanists in Mosheim de Rebus Christ. ante Constantinum p. 410–424.

86 Theophan Chron. p 153 (tom. i. p. 2,6 ed. Bonn] John the Monophysite bishop of Asia is a more authentic witness of this transaction in which he was himself employed by the emperor (Asseman. Bib Orient tom. ii. p 85)

87 Compare Procopius (Hist. Arcan c. 28 (tom. iii. p 156 ed. Bonn] and Aleman's Notes) with Theophanes (Chron. p 190 [tom. i. p 340, ed. Bonn]) The council of Nice has intrusted the patriarch or rather the astronomers, of Alexandria, with the annual proclamation of Easter and we still read or rather we do not read many of the Paschal epistles of St Cyril. Since the reign of Monophysitism in Egypt, the Catholics were perplexed by such a foolish prejudice as that which so long opposed among the Protestants, the reception of the Gregorian style

88 For the religion and history of the Samaritans, consult Basnage Histoire des Juifs, a learned and impartial work.

89 Sichem Neapolis Naplous the ancient and modern seat of the Samaritans, is situate in a valley between the barren Ebal, the mountain of cursing to the north and the fruitful Garizim or mountain of cursing to the south, ten or eleven hours' travel from Jerusalem See Maundrell, Journey from Aleppo etc. p 59–63

90 Procop Anecdot. c. 11 [p 75 ed Bonn] Theophan Chron p 122 [vol. i. p 274, ed Bonn] John Malala, Chron. tom. ii. p 62 [p 447 ed. Bonn] I remember an observation, half philosophical, half superstitious, that the province which had been ruined by the bigotry of Justinian was the same through which the Mohammedans penetrated into the empire

91 The expression of Procopius is remarkable. οὐ γὰρ οἱ ἐδόκει φόνος ἀνθρώπων ἴσως, ἢν μὴ τῆς αὐτῷ δόξης ἰ τελευτῶ τες τύχοιεν ὄντες Anecdot. c. 13 [p 84 ed. Bonn]

92 See the Chronicle of Victor p 328 and the original evidence of the laws of Justinian During the first years of his reign Baronius himself is in extreme good humour with the emperor who courted the popes till he got them into his power

93 Procopius Anecdot. c. 13 Evagrius, l iv c. 10 If the ecclesiastical never read the secret historian their common suspicion proves at least the general hatred

94 On the subject of the three chapters the original acts of the fifth general council of Constantinople supply much useless though authentic knowledge (Concil tom vi p 1-419) The Greek Evagrius is less copious and correct (l iv c 38) than the three zealous Africans Facundus (in his twelve books de tribus capitulis which are most correctly published by Sirmond) Liberatus (in his Breviarium c 22 23 24) and Victor Tunu nensis in his Chronicle (in tom i Antiq Lect Canisii p 330-334) The Liber Pontificali or Anastasius (in Vigilio Pelagio, etc), is original Italian evidence The modern reader will derive some information from Dupin (Biblioth Ecclés tom v p 189-207) and Basnage (Hist de l Eglise tom i p 519-541) yet the latter is too firmly re solved to depreciate the authority and character of the popes

95 Origen had indeed too great a propensity to imitate the πλάνη and δυσσέβεια of the old philos ophers (Justinian, ad Mennam in Concil tom vi p 356) His moderate opinions were too repug nant to the zeal of the church and he was found guilty of the heresy of reason

96 Basnage (Præfat p 11-14, ad tom i Antiq Lect Canis) has fairly weighed the guilt and in nocence of Theodore of Mopsuestia If he com posed 10 000 volumes as many errors would be a charitable allowance In all the subsequent cata logues of heresiarchs he alone, without his two brethren is included and it is the duty of Asseman (Biblioth Orient tom iv p 203-207) to justify the sentence

97 See the complaints of Liberatus and Victor and the exhortations of pope Pelagius to the con queror and exarch of Italy Schisma per po- testates publicas opprimatur etc (Concil tom vi p 467 etc) An army was detained to suppress the sedition of an Illyrian city See Procopius (de Bell Goth l iv c 25 [tom iii p 594 ed Bonn]) ὧνπερ ἕνεκα σφίσιν αὐτοῖς οἱ Χριστιανοὶ διαμάχονται He seems to promise an ecclesiastical history It would have been curious and impartial

98 The bishops of the patriarchate of Aquileia were reconciled by pope Honorius A D 638 (Mu ratori Annali d Italia, tom v p 376) but they again relapsed and the schism was not finally ex tinguished till 698 Fourteen years before the church of Spain had overlooked the fifth general council with contemptuous silence (xiii Concil Toletan in Concil tom vii p 487-494)

99 Nicetius bishop of Trèves (Concil tom vi p 511-513) he himself like most of the Gallican prelates (Gregor Epist l vii Ep 5 in Concil tom vi p 1007) was separated from the com munion of the four patriarchs by his refusal to con demn the three chapters Baronius almost pro- nounces the damnation of Justinian (A D 565 No 6)

100 After relating the last heresy of Justinian (l iv c 39 40 41) and the edict of his successor (l v c 3 [4]), the remainder of the history of Evagrius is filled with civil instead of ecclesiastical events

101 This extraordinary and perhaps inconsis tent doctrine of the Nestorians had been observe by La Croze (Christianisme des Indes tom i, p 19 20) and is more fully exposed by Abulphar agius (Biblioth Orient tom ii p 292 Hist Dy nast p 91 vers Latin Pocock) and Assema himself (tom iv p 218) They seem ignorant th they might allege the positive authority of th ecthesis Ὁ μιαρὸς Νεστόριος καίπερ διαιρῶν τὴν θεῖα τοῦ Κυρίου ἐνανθρώπησιν καὶ δύο εἰσάγων υἱοὺς (th common reproach of the Monophysites) δύο θελήμ ατα τούτων εἰπεῖν οὐκ ἐτόλμησε τοὐναντίον δὲ ταυτ βουλίαν τῶν δύο προσώπων ἐδόξασε (Concil. tom vii p 205)

102 See the orthodox faith in Petavius (Dog mata Theolog tom. v l ix c 6-10 p. 433 44) all the depths of this controversy are sounded i the Greek dialogue between Maximus and Pyrrhu (ad calcem tom viii Annal Baron p 755-79) which relates a real conference, and produced short lived conversion

103 Impiissimam ecthesim scelerosum ty pum (Concil tom vii p 366) diabolicæ opera tionis genimina (fors germina or else the Gree γεννήματα in the original—Concil p 363 364) an the expressions of the eighteenth anathema Th epistle of pope Martin to Amandus a Gallica bishop stigmatises the Monothelites and the heresy with equal virulence (p 392)

104 The sufferings of Martin and Maximus ar described with pathetic simplicity in their origina letters and acts (Concil tom vii p 63-78 Baron Annal Eccles A D 656, No 2 et annos subse quent) Yet the chastisement of their disobe dience ἐξόρια and σώματος αἰκισμὸς had been pre viously announced in the Type of Constans (Con cil tom vii p 240)

105 Eutychius (Annal tom ii p 348) mos erroneously supposes that the 124 bishops of the Roman synod transported themselves to Con stantinople and by adding them to the 16 Greeks thus composes the sixth council of 29 fathers

106 The Monothelite Constans was hated by all διὰ τοι ταῦτα (says Theophanes Chron p 9 [ed Par tom i p 538 ed Bonn]) ἐμισήθη σφόδρα παρὰ πάντων When the Monothelite mon failed in his miracle the people shouted ὁ λαο ἀν βόησε (Concil tom vii p 1032) But this was natural and transient emotion and I much fea that the latter is an anticipation of orthodoxy i the good people of Constantinople

lonari parte Britanniæ et Hiberniæ quæ ab An glorum et Brittonum necnon Scotorum et Pic torum gentibus colebantur (Eddius in Vit St Wilfrid c. 31 apud Pagi, Critica tom iii p 88) Theodore (magnæ insulæ Britanniæ archiepiscopus et philosophus) was long expected at Rome (Concil. tom vii p 714) but he contented him self with holding (A.D 680) his provincial synod of Hatfield, in which he received the decrees of pope Martin and the first Lateran council against the Monothelites (Concil. tom vii p 597 etc) The-odore a monk of Tarsus in Cilicia, had been named to the primacy of Britain by pope Vitalian (A D 668 see Baronius and Pagi) whose esteem for his learning and piety was tainted by some distrust of his national character—ne quid contrarium veri tati fidei, Græcorum more in ecclesiam cui præ esset introduceret. The Cilician was sent from Rome to Canterbury under the tuition of an Afri can guide (Bedæ Hist. Eccles. Anglorum l. iv c 1) He adhered to the Roman doctrine and the same creed of the incarnation has been uniformly transmitted from Theodore to the modern pri mates, whose sound understanding is perhaps sel dom engaged with that abstruse mystery

109. This name unknown till the tenth cen tury appears to be of Syriac origin It was in-vented by the Jacobites and eagerly adopted by the Nestorians and Mahometans but it was ac cepted without shame by the Catholics and is frequently used in the Annals of Eutychius (Asse man. Bibl oth. Orient tom ii. p 507 etc tom iii p 355 Renaudot, Hist. Patriarch Alexandrin. p 119) Ημ s δοῦλοι τ Βασιλέως was the accla mation of the fathers of Constantinople (Concil. tom. vii. p 765)

110 The Syriac, which the natives revere as the primitive language was divided into three dia lects 1 The Aramæan as it was refined at Edessa and the cities of Mesopotamia 2 The Palestine which was used in Jerusalem Damascus and the rest of Syria 3. The Nabathæan, the rustic idiom of the mountains of Assyria and the villages of Irak (Gregor Abulpharag Hist Dynast p 11) On the Syriac, see Ebed Jesu (Asseman. tom. iii. p 326 etc.) whose prejudice alone could prefer it to the Arabic

111 I shall not enrich my ignorance with the spoils of Simon, Walton, Mill Wetstein Asse mannus, Ludolphus, La Croze whom I have con sulted with some care It appears 1 That of all the versions which are celebrated by the fathers it is doubtful whether any are now extant in their pristine integrity 2 That the Syriac has the best claim, and that the consent of the Oriental sects is a proof that it is more ancient than their schism

112 In the account of the Monophysites and Nestorians I am deeply indebted to the Bibliotheca Orientalis Clementino-Vaticana of Joseph Simon Assemannus That learned Maronite was de spatched in the year 1715 by pope Clement XI to visit the monasteries of Egypt and Syria in search of MSS His four folio volumes published at Rome 1719-1728 contain a part only though perhaps the most valuable of his extensive project. As a native and as a scholar he possessed the Syriac literature and though a dependent of Rome, he wishes to be moderate and candid

113 See the Arabic canons of Nice in the translation of Abraham Ecchelensis, No 37 38, 39, 40. Concil. tom. ii p 335 336 edit Venet These vulgar titles Nicena and Arabic are both apocryphal. The council of Nice enacted no more than twenty canons (Theodoret Hist. Eccles l. i c. 8) and the remainder seventy or eighty were col lected from the synods of the Greek church. The Syriac edition of Maruthas is no longer extant (Asseman. Biblioth. Oriental. tom. i p 195, tom iii. p 74) and the Arabic version is marked with many recent interpolations. Yet this Code contains many curious relics of ecclesiastical disci pline and since it is equally revered by all the Eastern communions it was probably finished be fore the schism of the Nestorians and Jacobites (Fabric. Biblioth. Græc. tom. xi. p 363-367)

114. Theodore the Reader (l. ii c. 5 49, ad calcem Hist. Eccles.) has noticed this Persian school of Edessa Its ancient splendour and the two eras of its downfall (A.D 431 and 489) are clearly discussed by Assemanni (Bibl oth Orient. tom. ii. p 402 iii. p 376 378 iv p 70 924)

115 A dissertation on the state of the Nestorians has swelled in the hands of Assemanni to a folio volume of 950 pages and his learned researches are digested in the most lucid order Besides this fourth volume of the Bibliotheca Orientalis the ex tracts in the three preceding tomes (tom. i. p 203 ii. p 321-463 iii. 64-70 378-395, etc. 403-408 580-589) may be usefully consulted

116 See the Topographia Christiana of Cosmas, surnamed Indicopleustes or the Indian navigator l. iii. p 178 179 l. xi. p 337 The entire work of which some curious extracts may be found in Photius (cod. xxxvi p 9, 10 ed t. Hoeschel) Thevenot (in the 1st part of his Relation des Voyages etc.) and Fabricius (Biblioth. Græc. l. iii. c. 25 tom ii. p 603 617) has been published by Father Montfaucon at Paris 1707 in the Nova Collectio Patrum (tom ii. p 113-346) It was the design of the author to confute the impious heresy of those who maintained that the earth is a globe and not a flat oblong table as it is represented in the Scriptures (l. ii. p 138 [125 sq]) But the non sense of the monk is mingled with the practical knowledge of the traveller who performed his voyage A D 522 and published his book at Alex andria A.D 547 (l. ii. p 140 141 Montfaucon Præfat c 1) The Nestorianism of Cosmas un known to his learned editor was detected by La Croze (Christianisme des Indes tom i p 40-55) and is confirmed by Assemanni (Biblioth Orient. tom. iv p 605, 606)

in a monstrous fable, of which some features have been borrowed from the Lama of Thibet (Hist Généalogique des Tatares P ii p 42 Hist de Gengiscan p 31 etc), and were ignorantly transferred by the Portuguese to the emperor of Abyssinia (Ludolph Hist Æthiop Comment l. ii. c. 1) Yet it is probable that in the eleventh and twelfth centuries Nestorian Christianity was professed in the horde of the Keraites (D'Herbelot p 256 915 959 Assemanni, tom iv p 468-504)

118 The Christianity of China between the seventh and the thirteenth century, is invincibly proved by the consent of Chinese Arabian Syriac, and Latin evidence (Assemanni Biblioth Orient tom iv p 502-552 Mém de l'Academie des Inscript tom xxx p 802-819) The inscription of Siganfu, which describes the fortunes of the Nestorian church from the first mission A D 636 to the current year 781 is accused of forgery by La Croze Voltaire, etc who become the dupes of their own cunning while they are afraid of a Jesuitical fraud

120 The division of the patriarchate may be traced in the Bibliotheca Orient of Assemanni, tom i p 523-549, tom ii p 457, etc tom iii p 603 621-623 tom iv p 164-169 423, 622-629 etc

121 The pompous language of Rome, on the submission of a Nestorian patriarch is elegantly represented in the seventh book of Fra Paolo, Babylon Nineveh Arbela and the trophies of Alexander Tauris and Ecbatana the Tigris and Indus

122 The Indian missionary St Thomas, an apostle a Manichæan or an Armenian merchant (La Croze, Christianisme des Indes tom. i. p 57-70), was famous however as early as the time of Jerom (ad Marcellam Epist. 148 [Ep 59 p 328 ed Vallars]) Marco Polo was informed on the spot that he suffered martyrdom in the city of Maabar or Meliapour a league only from Madras (D Anville Eclaircissimens sur l Inde p 125) where the Portuguese founded an episcopal church under the name of St. Thomé and where the saint performed an annual miracle till he was silenced by the profane neighbourhood of the English (La Croze tom ii p 7-16)

123 Neither the author of the Saxon Chronicle (A.D 883) nor William of Malmesbury (de Gestis Regum Angliæ l. ii c. 4 p 44) were capable in the twelfth century of inventing this extraordinary fact they are incapable of explaining the motives and measures of Alfred and their hasty notice serves only to provoke our curiosity William of Malmesbury feels the difficulties of the enterprise quod quivis in hoc sæculo miretur and I almost suspect that the English ambassadors collected their cargo and legend in Egypt. The royal author has not enriched his Orosius (see Barrington's Miscellanies) with an Indian as well as a Scandinavian voyage

124. Concerning the Christians of St. Thomas, see Assemann Biblioth Orient tom iv p 391-407 435-451 Geddes's Church History of Malabar and above all La Croze Histoire du Christianisme des Indes in two vols 12mo, La Haye, 1758—a learned and agreeable work. They have drawn from the same source the Portuguese and Italian narratives and the prejudices of the Jesuits are sufficiently corrected by those of the Protestants.

125 Οἷον εἰπεῖν γελᾶλϑῆς is the expression of Theodore in his Treatise of the Incarnation, p 245 247 as he is quoted by La Croze (Hist. du Christianisme d Ethiopie et d Arménie, p 35), who exclaims perhaps too hastily, Quel pitoyable raisonnement! Renaudot has touched (Hist. Patriarch Alex p 127-138) the Oriental accounts of Severus and his authentic creed may be found in the epistle of John the Jacobite patriarch of Antioch in the tenth century to his brother Mennas of Alexandria (Asseman Biblioth Orient. tom. ii. p 132-141)

126 Epist Archimandritarum et Monachorum Syriæ Secundæ ad Papam Hormisdam Concil. tom v p 598-602. The courage of St Sabas, ut leo animosus will justify the suspicion that the arms of these monks were not always spiritual or defensive (Baronius A D 513 No 7, etc.)

127 Assemanni (Biblioth Orient tom. ii. p. 10-46) and La Croze (Christianisme d Ethiopie, p 36-40) will supply the history of Xenaias or Philoxenus bishop of Mabug or Hierapolis in Syria He was a perfect master of the Syriac language and the author or editor of a version of the New Testament

128 The names and titles of fifty four bishops who were exiled by Justin are preserved in the Chronicle of Dionysius (apud Asseman tom ii p. 54) Severus was personally summoned to Constantinople—for his trial says Liberatus (Brev c. 19)—that his tongue might be cut out says Evagrius (l iv c 4) The prudent patriarch did not stay to examine the difference This ecclesiastical revolution is fixed by Pagi to the month of September of the year 518 (Critica tom ii p 506)

129 The obscure history of James or Jacobus Baradæus or Zanzalus, may be gathered from Eutychius (Annal tom ii p 144 147) Renaudot (Hist Patriarch Alex p 133) and Assemannus (Biblioth Orient tom i p 424 tom ii p 62-69, 324-332 414 tom iii p 385-388) He seems to be unknown to the Greeks The Jacobites themselves had rather deduce their name and pedigree from St James the apostle

130 The account of his person and writings is perhaps the most curious article in the Bibliotheca of Assemannus (tom. ii p 244-321 under the name of Gregorius Bar Hebræus) La Croze (Christianisme d Ethiopie p 53-63) ridicules the preju-educt of the Spaniards against the Jewish blood which secretly defiles their church and state.

131 This excessive abstinence is censured by La Croze (p 352) and even by the Syrian Asseman nus (tom. i. p 226 tom. ii p 304, 305)

132. The state of the Monophysites is excellently illustrated in a dissertation at the beginning of the second volume of Assemannus which contains 142 pages The Syriac Chronicle of Gregory Bar He braeus, or Abulpharagius (Biblioth. Orient tom. ii. p. 321 463) pursues the double series of the Nestorian Catholics and the Maphrians of the Jacobites.

133 The synonymous use of the two words may be proved from Eutychius (Annal. tom. ii. p 191 63 332) and many similar passages which may be found in the methodical table of Pocock. He was not actuated by any prejudice against the Maronites of the tenth century and we may believe a Melchite, whose testimony is confirmed by the Jacobites and Latins

135 Theophanes (Chron. p 295, 296 300 302 306 (tom i. p 542 sq. 552 555, 561 ed Bonn)) and Cedrenus (p 437 440 (ed. Par tom i p 765 sqq ed. Bonn)) relate the exploits of the Mardaites the name (Mard, in Syriac rebellavit) is explained by La Roque (Voyage de la Syrie, tom. ii. p 53) the dates are fixed by Pagi (A D 676 No 4 14 A.D 68 No 3 4) and even the obscure story of the patriarch John Maron (Asseman. Bibl*ioth. Orient.* tom. i p 496–520) illustrates from the year 686 to 707 the troubles of Mount Libanus.

136. In the last century twenty large cedars still remained (Voyage de La Roque, tom. i. p 68–76) at present they are reduced to four or five (Volney tom. i. p 264) These trees, so famous in Scripture, were guarded by excommunication the wood was sparingly borrowed for small crosses etc. an an*nual mass* was chanted under their shade and they were endowed by the Syrians with a sensitive power of erecting their branches to repel the snow to which Mount Libanus is less faithful than it is painted by Tacitus *inter ardores opacum fidum*que nivibus—a daring metaphor (Hist. v 6)

137 The evidence of William of Tyre (Hist. in Gestis Dei per Francos l. xxii. c. 8 p 1022 [fol. Hanov 1611]) is copied or confirmed by Jacques de Vitra (Hist. Hierosolym l. ii. c 77 p 1093 1094) But this unnatural league expired with the power of the Franks and Abulpharagius (who died in 1286) considers the Maronites as a sect of Monothelites (Biblioth Orient. tom. ii. p 292)

138 I find a description and history of the Maronites in the Voyage de la Syrie et du Mont Liban par La Roque (2 vols. in 12 mo Amsterdam 1723 Particularly tom. i. p 42–47 174–184, tom. ii p 10–120) In the ancient part he copies the prejudices of Nairon and the other Maronites of Rome which Assemannus is afraid to renounce and ashamed to support. Jablonski (Institut Hist. Christ tom iii. p. 186) Niebuhr (Voyage de l'Arabie, etc. tom. ii. p 346 370–381) and, above all, the judicious Volney (Voyage en Egypte et en Syrie tom. ii p 8–31 Paris 1787), may be consulted

139 The religion of the Armenians is briefly described by La Croze (Hist du Christ. de l Ethiopie et de l Arménie, p 269–402) He refers to the great Armenian History of Galanus (3 vols. in fol. Rome 1650–1661) and commends the state of Armenia in the third volume of the Nouveaux Mémoires des Missions du Levant. The work of a Jesuit must have sterling merit when it is praised by La Croze.

140 The schism of the Armenians is placed eighty four years after the council of Chalcedon (Pagi, Critica ad A.D 535) It was consummated at the end of seventeen years and it is from the year of Christ 552 that we date the era of the Armenians (l Art de vérifier les Dates p xxxv)

141 The sentiments and success of Julian of Halicarnassus may be seen in Liberatus (Brev c. 19) Renaudot (Hist. Patriarch Alex. p. 132 303) and Assemannus (Biblioth. Orient. tom. ii. Dissertat. de Monophysitis p viii p 286)

142 See a remarkable fact of the twelfth century in the History of Nicetas Choniates (p 258) Yet three hundred years before, Photius (Epistol. ii. p 49, edit. Montacut) had gloried in the conversion of the Armenians—λατρεύει σήμερον ὀρθοδόξως [τὸ Ἀρμενίων ἔθνος]

143 The travelling Armenians are in the way of every traveller and their mother church is on the high road between Constantinople and Ispahan for their present state see Fabricius (Lux Evangelii etc. c. xxxviii. p 40–51) Olearius (l. iv c. 40) Chardin (vol. ii. p 232) Tournefort (lettre xx.) and above all, Tavernier (tom. i. p. 28–37, 510–518) that rambling jeweller who had read nothing but had seen so much and so well.

144. The history of the Alexandrian patriarchs, from Dioscorus to Benjamin is taken from Renaudot (p 114–164) and the second tome of the Annals of Eutychius

145 Liberat. Brev c. 20 23 Victor Chron. p. 329 330 Procop Anecdot c. 26 27

146 Eulogius who had been a monk of Antioch was more conspicuous for subtlety than eloquence. He proves that the enemies of the faith the Gaianites and Theodosians ought not to be reconciled that the same proposition may be orthodox in the mouth of St. Cyril heretical in that of Severus that the opposite assertions of St Leo are equally true etc His writings are no longer extant except in the Extracts of Photius, who had perused them with care and satisfaction, cod. ccviii ccxxv ccxxvi. ccxxvii. ccxxx cclxxx.

610, No 9 A D 620 No 8) Pagi (Critica tom ii p 763) and Fabricius (l v c 11, tom vii p 454) have made some critical observations

148 This number is taken from the curious Re cherches sur les Egyptiens et les Chinois (tom ii p 192 193) and appears more probable than the 600 000 ancient or 15,000 modern Copts of Ge melli Carreri Cyril Lucar, the Protestant patri arch of Constantinople laments that those heretics were ten times more numerous than his orthodox Greeks ingeniously applying the πολλαί κεν δεκάδες δευοίατο οἰνοχόοιο of Homer (Iliad ii 128) the most perfect expression of contempt (Fabric. Lux Evangelii 740)

149 The history of the Copts their religion, manners etc., may be found in the Abbé Renau dot s motley work, neither a translation nor an original the Chronicon Orientale of Peter a Ja cobite in the two versions of Abraham Ecchel lensis Paris 1651 and John Simon Asseman Venet 1729 These annals descend no lower than the thirteenth century The more recent accounts must be searched for in the travellers into Egypt and the Nouveaux Mémoires des Missions du Levant In the last century Joseph Abudacnus a native of Cairo published at Oxford in thirty pages a slight Historia Jacobitarum 147, post 150

150 About the year 737 See Renaudot, Hist Patriarch Alex p 221, 222, Elmacin, Hist Sar acen p 99

151 Ludolph Hist Æthiopic et Comment l i c 8 Renaudot Hist Patriarch Alex p 480 etc This opinion, introduced into Egypt and Europe by the artifice of the Copts the pride of the Abys sinians the fear and ignorance of the Turks and Arabs has not even the semblance of truth The rains of Æthiopia do not, in the increase of the Nile consult the will of the monarch If the river approaches at Napata within three days journey of the Red Sea (see D Anville s Maps) a canal that should divert its course would demand, and most probably surpass the power of the Cæsars

152 The Abyssinians, who still preserve the features and olive complexion of the Arabs afford a proof that two thousand years are not sufficient to change the colour of the human race The Nu bians an African race are pure negroes as black as those of Senegal or Congo with flat noses thick lips and woolly hair (Buffon Hist Naturelle tom v p 117 143 144 166 219 edit in 12mo Paris 1769) The ancients beheld without much atten tion, the extraordinary phenomenon which has exercised the philosophers and theologians of mod ern times

154 The Christianity of the Nubians A D 1153 is attested by the sheriff al Edrisi falsely described under the name of the Nubian geographer (p 18), who represents them as a nation of Jacobites The rays of historical light that twinkle in the history of Renaudot (p 178 220–224 281–286 405 434 451, 464), are all previous to this era See the mod ern state in the Lettres Edifiantes (Recueil iv) and Busching (tom ix p 152–159 par Berenger)

155 The abuna is improperly dignified by the Latins with the title of patriarch The Abyssinians acknowledge only the four patriarchs, and their chief is no more than a metropolitan or national primate (Ludolph Hist Æthiopic. et Comment. l iii c. 7) The seven bishops of Renaudot (p. 511) who existed A D 1131 are unknown to the historian.

156 I know not why Assemannus (Biblioth. Orient tom ii p 384) should call in question these probable missions of Theodora into Nubia and Æthiopia The slight notices of Abyssinia till the year 1500 are supplied by Renaudot (p 336–341, 381, 382, 405 443 etc 450 456 463 475 480 511 525 559–564) from the Coptic writers. The mind of Ludolphus was a perfect blank

157 Ludolph Hist Æthiop l iv c. 5 The most necessary arts are now exercised by the Jews and the foreign trade is in the hands of the Armenians. What Gregory principally admired and envied was the industry of Europe—artes et opificia.

158 John Bermudez whose relation printed at Lisbon 1569 was translated into English by Pur chas (Pilgrims l vii c 7 p 1149 etc.) and from thence into French by La Croze (Christianisme d Ethiopie p 92–265) The piece is curious but the author may be suspected of deceiving Abys sinia Rome and Portugal His title to the rank of patriarch is dark and doubtful (Ludolph Com ment No 101 p 473)

159 Religio Romana nec precibus patrum nec miraculis ab ipsis editis suffulciebatur is the uncontradicted assurance of the devout emperor Susneus to his patriarch Mendez (Ludolph Com ment No 126, p 529) and such assurances should be preciously kept as an antidote against any marvellous legends

160 I am aware how tender is the question of circumcision Yet I will affirm 1 That the Ethi opians have a physical reason for the circumcision of males and even of females (Recherches Philo sophiques sur les Américains tom ii.) 2 That it was practised in Æthiopia long before the intro duction of Judaism or Christianity (Herodot l. ii. c 104 Marsham Canon Chron p 72 73) In fantes circumcidunt ob consuetudinem non ob Judaismum says Gregory the Abyssinian priest (apud Fabric Lux Christiana p 720) Yet in the heat of dispute the Portuguese were sometimes branded with the name of uncircumcised (La Croze, p 80 Ludolph Hist and Comment l iii, c 1)

161 The three Protestant historians, Ludolphus (Hist Æthiopica Francofurt 1681 Commen tarius 1691 Relatio Nova etc 1693 in folio) Geddes (Church History of Æthiopia London, 1696 in 8vo) and La Croze (Hist du Chris tianisme d Ethiopie et d Arménie La Haye 1739 in 12mo) have drawn their principal materials from the Jesuits especially from the General His tory of Tellez published in Portuguese at Coimbra, 166a We might be surprised at their frankness but their most flagitious vice the spirit of persecution, was in their eyes the most meritorious virtue Ludolphus possessed some though a slight, advantage from the Æthiopic language, and the personal conversation of Gregory a free-spirited Abyssinian priest whom he invited from Rome to the court of Saxe-Gotha. See the Theologia Æthiopica of Gregory in Fabricius Lux Evangelii p 716–734.

Chapter XLIX

1 The learned Selden has given the history of transubstantiation in a comprehensive and pithy sentence This opinion is only rhetoric turned into logic. (His Works vol. iii. p 2073 in his Table-Talk)

2. Nec intelligunt homines ineptissimi, quòd si ... ure simulacra et moveri possent, [ultro] adora ... a hominem fuissent à quo sunt expolita. (Divin Instit. l. ii. c. 2) Lactantius is the last, as well as the most eloquent, of the Latin apologists Their ... llery of idols attacks not only the object but the ... m and matter

3. See Irenæus, Ep phanius and Augustin (Basnage, Hist. des Eglises Réformées, tom. ii p 1313) his Gnostic practice has a singular affinity with the private worship of Alexander Severus (Lampridius c. 29 Lardner Heathen Testimonies vol. ... p 34)

4. See this History vol. i p 294, 353 and 465 sq

5 Οὐ γὰρ τὸ Θεῖο ἀπλοῦν ὑπάρχον καὶ ἄληπτ ... ορφ ... τισι αἱ σχήμασιν ἀπεικάζομεν ... ἢ κηρῷ καὶ ... λοις τῇ ὑπερούσιο ... αἱ προανάρχον οὐσίαν ... μεν δεῖν (Concilium Nicenum ii in Collect. Labb tom. iii. p 1025 edit. Venet.) Il seroit peut-être à propos de ne point souffrir d'images de la Trinité ou de la Divinité les défenseurs les plus zélés des images ayant condamné celles-ci, et le concile de Trente ne parlant que des images de Jesus-Christ et des Saints (Dupin Biblioth. Ecclés. tom. vi. p 154)

6 This general history of images is drawn from the twenty-second book of the Hist. des Eglises Réformées of Basnage tom ii p 1310–1337 He was a Protestant but of a manly spirit and on this head the Protestants are so notoriously in the right that they can venture to be impartial See the perplexity of poor Friar Pagi Critica, tom i p 42

7 After removing some rubbish of miracle and inconsistency it may be allowed that as late as the year 300, Paneas in Palestine was decorated with a bronze statue representing a grave personage wrapped in a cloak, with a grateful or suppliant female kneeling before him, and that an inscription—τῷ Σωτῆρι τῷ εὐεργέτῃ—was perhaps inscribed on the pedestal By the Christians this group was foolishly explained of their founder and the poor woman whom he had cured of the bloody flux (Euseb vii. 18 Philostorg vii 3 etc) M de Beausobre more reasonably conjectures the philosopher Apollonius or the emperor Vespasian in the latter supposition the female is a city a province or perhaps the queen Berenice (Bibliothèque Germanique tom. xiii p 1–92)

8 Euseb Hist Ecclés. l. i. c. 13 The learned Assemannus has brought up the collateral aid of three Syrians St Ephrem Josua Stylites and James bishop of Sarug but I do not find any notice of the Syriac original or the archives of Edessa (Biblioth Orient tom. i. p 318 420 554) their vague belief is probably derived from the Greeks.

9. The evidence for these epistles is stated and rejected by the candid Lardner (Heathen Testimonies vol i p 297–309) Among the herd of bigots who are forcibly driven from this convenient but untenable post I am ashamed—with the Grabes Caves Tillemonts etc. to discover Mr Addison an English gentleman (His Works, vol. i. p 528 Baskerville's edition) but his superficial tract on the Christian religion owes its credit to his name his style, and the interested applause of our clergy

10 From the silence of James of Sarug (Asseman. Biblioth. Orient. p 289, 318) and the testimony of Evagrius (Hist Ecclés. l. iv c. 27) I conclude that this fable was invented between the years 521 and 594, most probably after the siege of Edessa in 540 (Asseman tom. i p 416 Procopius de Bell Persic l. ii. [c. 12 tom i p 208 sq ed. Bonn]) It is the sword and buckler of Gregory II (in Epist. i. ad Leon Isaur Concil. tom. viii p 656 657) of John Damascenus (Opera tom. i. p 281 edit Lequien [De Fide Orthod l. iv c. 16]) and of the second Nicene Council (Actio v p 1030) The most perfect edition may be found in Cedrenus (Compend. p 175–178 [ed Par tom. i. p 308–314, ed Bonn])

11 Ἀχειροποίητος See Ducange in Gloss Græc. et Lat The subject is treated with equal learning and bigotry by the Jesuit Gretser (Syntagma de Imaginibus non Manû factis ad calcem Codini de Officiis p 289–310) the ass or rather the fox of Ingoldstadt (see the Scaligerana) with equal reason and wit by the Protestant Beausobre, in the ironical controversy which he has spread through many volumes of the Bibliothèque Germanique (tom. xviii p 1–50 xx. p 27–68 xxv p 1–36 xxvii. p 85–118 xxviii. p 1–33 xxxi. p 111–148 xxxii p 75–107 xxxiv p 67–96)

12 Theophylact. Simocatta (l ii. c 3 p 34 [ed. Par p 70 ed Bonn] l. iii c 1 p 63 [p 114, ed Bonn]) celebrates the θεανδρικὸν ἐκμαγεῖον which he styles ἀχειροποίητον yet it was no more than a copy, since he adds, ἀρχέτυπον γὰρ ἐκεῖνο (of Edessa) θρησκεύουσι Ῥωμαῖοί τι ἄρρητον See Pagi tom ii A D 586 No 11

13 See in the genuine or supposed works of John Damascenus two passages on the Virgin and St Luke which have not been noticed by Gretser nor consequently by Beausobre (Opera Joh Damascen tom 1 p 618 631 [Adv Constantinum Cabal c 6 Epist ad Theophilum Imp c 4])

14 Your scandalous figures stand quite out from the canvas they are as bad as a group of statues! It was thus that the ignorance and bigotry of a Greek priest applauded the pictures of Titian, which he had ordered and refused to accept

15 By Cedrenus, Zonaras, Glycas and Manasses the origin of the Iconoclasts is imputed to the caliph Yezid and two Jews who promised the empire to Leo and the reproaches of these hostile sectaries are turned into an absurd conspiracy for restoring the purity of the Christian worship (see Spanheim Hist Imag c 2)

16 See Elmacin (Hist Saracen p 267) Abul pharagius (Dynast p 201) and Abulfeda (Annal Moslem p 264) and the criticisms of Pagi (tom iii A D 944) The prudent Franciscan refuses to determine whether the image of Edessa now reposes at Rome or Genoa but its repose is inglorious, and this ancient object of worship is no longer famous or fashionable

17 Ἀρμενίοις καὶ Ἀλαμανοῖς ἐπ' ἴσης ἡ τῶν ἁγίων εἰκόνων προσκύνησις ἀπηγόρευται (Nicetas l ii p 258 [ed Par p 527 ed Bonn]) The Armenian churches are still content with the Cross (Missions du Levant, tom iii p 148) but surely the superstitious Greek is unjust to the superstition of the Germans of the twelfth century

18 Our original but not impartial monuments of the Iconoclasts must be drawn from the Acts of the Councils, tom viii and ix Collect Labbé edit Venet and the historical writings of Theophanes Nicephorus Manasses Cedrenus Zonaras etc Of the modern Catholics Baronius Pagi Natalis Alexander (Hist Eccles Seculum viii and ix) and Maimbourg (Hist des Iconoclastes) have treated the subject with learning passion and credulity The Protestant labours of Frederick Spanheim (Historia Imaginum restituta) and James Basnage (Hist des Eglises Réformées tom ii l xxiii p 1339–1385) are cast into the Iconoclast scale With this mutual aid and opposite tendency it is easy for us to poise the balance with philosophic indifference

19 Some flowers of rhetoric are Σύνοδον παράνομον καὶ ἄθεον and the bishops τοῖς ματαιόφροσιν By Damascenus it is styled ἄκυρος καὶ ἀδεκτος (Opera tom 1 p 623 [Adv Constant Cabal c 16]) Spanheim's Apology for the Synod of Constantinople (p 171 etc) is worked up with truth and ingenuity from such materials as he could find in the Nicene Acts (p 1046 etc.) The witty John of Damascus converts ἐπισκόπους into ἐπισκότους makes them κοιλιοδούλους slaves of their belly, etc. Opera tom 1 p 306

20 He is accused of proscribing the title of saint styling the Virgin, Mother of Christ comparing her after her delivery to an empty purse of Arianism, Nestorianism etc In his defence, Spanheim (c iv p 207) is somewhat embarrassed between the interest of a Protestant and the duty of an orthodox divine

21 The holy confessor Theophanes approves the principle of their rebellion θείῳ κινούμενοι ζήλῳ (p 339) Gregory II (in Epist 1 ad imp Leon. Concil. Tom viii. p 661, 664) applauds the zeal of the Byzantine women who killed the Imperial officers

22 John or Mansur was a noble Christian of Damascus who held a considerable office in the service of the caliph His zeal in the cause of images exposed him to the resentment and treachery of the Greek emperor and on the suspicion of a treasonable correspondence he was deprived of his right hand, which was miraculously restored by the Virgin After this deliverance he resigned his office distributed his wealth and buried himself in the monastery of St Sabas between Jerusalem and the Dead Sea The legend is famous but his learned editor Father Lequien has unluckily proved that St John Damascenus was already a monk before the Iconoclast dispute (Opera, tom i. Vit St Joan Damascen p 10–13 et Notas ad loc)

23 After sending Leo to the devil he introduces his heir—τὸ μιαρὸν αὐτοῦ γέννημα καὶ τῆς κακίας αὐτοῦ κληρονόμος ἐν διπλῷ γενόμενος (Opera Damascen tom 1 p 625 [Adv Constant Cabal. c. 20]) If the authenticity of this piece be suspicious, we are sure that in other works no longer extant Damascenus bestowed on Constantine the titles of νέον Μωαμεθ Χριστομάχον μισάγιον (tom i. p. 306)

24. In the narrative of this persecution from Theophanes and Cedrenus Spanheim (p 235–238) is happy to compare the Draco of Leo with the dragoons (Dracones) of Louis XIV and highly solaces himself with this controversial pun

25 Πρόγραμμα γὰρ ἐξέπεμψε κατὰ πᾶσαν ἐπαρχίαν τὴν ὑπὸ τὴν χεῖρα αὐτοῦ πάντας ὑπογράψαι καὶ ὀμνύναι τοῦ ἀθετῆσαι τὴν προσκύνησιν τῶν σεπτῶν εἰκόνων (Damascen Op tom 1 p 625 [Adv Constant. Cabal c 21]) This oath and subscription I do not remember to have seen in any modern compilation

26 Καὶ τὴν Ῥώμην σὺν πάσῃ [τῇ] Ἰταλίᾳ τῆς βασιλείας αὐτοῦ ἀπέστησε says Theophanes (Chronograph p 343 [tom 1 p 630 ed Bonn]) For this Gregory is styled by Cedrenus ἀνὴρ ἀποστολικὸς (p 450) Zonaras specifies the thunder ἀναθέματι συνοδικῷ (tom ii l xv [c 4] p 104 105) It may be observed that the Greeks are apt to confound the times and actions of two Gregories

Sigonius, de Regno Italiæ, l III. Opera tom II. p 169. Yet such is the change of Italy that Sigonius is corrected by the editor of Milan Philippus Argelatus, a Bolognese, and subject of the pope.

28. Quod si Christiani olim non deposuerunt Neronem aut Julianum id fuit quia deerant vires temporales Christianis (honest Bellarmine, de Rom. Pont. l. v c. 7) Cardinal Perron adds a distinction more honourable to the first Christians, but not more satisfactory to modern princes—the treason of heretics and apostates who break their oath, belie their coin, and renounce their allegiance to Christ and his vicar (Perroniana, p. 89)

29. Take, as a specimen the cautious Basnage (Hist. de l Eglise, p 1350, 1351) and the vehement Spanheim (Hist. Imaginum) who with a hundred ore, tread in the footsteps of the centuriators of Magdeburg

30. See Launoy (Opera, tom. v pars II. Epist. I. 7 p 456–474) Natalis Alexander (Hist. Nov Testamenti, secul. VIII. dissert I. p 92–96) Pagi Critica, tom. III. p 215 216) and Giannone (Istoria Civile di Napoli, tom. I. p 317–320) a disciple of the Gallican school. In the field of controversy I always pity the moderate party who stand on the open middle ground exposed to the fire of both sides

31 They appeal to Paul Warnefrid or Diaconus (de Gestis Langobard. l. VI. c. 49, p 506, 507 in Script Ital. Muratori tom. I. pars I.) and the nominal Anastasius (de Vit Pont. in Muratori, tom. III. pars. I. Gregorius II., p 154, Gregorius III., p 158 Zacharias p 161 Stephanus III., p. 165 Paulus p 172 Stephanus IV p. 174, Hadrianus p 179 Leo III p 195) Yet I may remark that the true Anastasius (Hist Eccles. p 134, edit. Reg) and the Historia Miscella (l. XXI, p. 151 in tom. I. Script. Ital.) both of the ninth century translate and approve the Greek text of Theophanes.

32 With some minute difference the most learned critics, Lucas Holstenius Schelestrate, Ciampini, Bianchini, Muratori (Prolegomena ad tom. III. pars. I) are agreed that the Liber Pontificalis was composed and continued by the apostolical librarians and notaries of the eighth and ninth centuries and that the last and smallest part is the work of Anastasius whose name it bears. The style is barbarous, the narrative partial, the details are trifling yet it must be read as a curious and authentic record of the times The epistles of the popes are dispersed in the volumes of Councils.

33 The two epistles of Gregory II have been preserved in the Acts of the Nicene Council (tom. VIII. p. 651–674) They are without a date which is variously fixed—by Baronius in the year 726 by Muratori (Annali d'Italia tom. VI. p 120) in 729, and by Pagi in 730 Such is the force of prejudice, that some papists ha e praised the good sense and moderation of these letters

34. Εἴκοσι ἐς αρα σ δὲ α ὑποχωρήσει ὁ Ἀρχιερεὺς Ῥώμης εἰς τὴν χώραν Καμπανίας αἱ ὕπαγε δίωξον το ς ά μους (Epist I. p 664) This proximity of the Lombards is hard of digestion Camillo Pellegrini (Dissert IV de Ducatû Beneventi in the Script Ital tom. V p 172 173) forcibly reckons the twenty fourth stadia not from Rome but from the limits of the Roman duchy to the first fortress, perhaps Sora of the Lombards I rather believe that Gregory with the pedantry of the age employs stadia for miles, without much inquiry into the genuine measure.

35 Ὃν αἱ πᾶσαι βασιλεῖαι τῆς δύσεως ὡς Θεὸν ἐπίγειον ἔχουσι

36 Ἀπὸ τῆς ἐσωτέρου δύσεως τοῦ λεγομένου Σεπτετοῦ (p 665) The Pope appears to have imposed on the ignorance of the Greeks he lived and died in the Lateran and in his time all the kingdoms of the West had embraced Christianity May not this unknown Septitus have some reference to the chief of the Saxon Heptarchy to Ina king of Wessex who in the pontificate of Gregory the Second visited Rome for the purpose not of baptism but of pilgrimage (Pagi A.D 689 No 2 A D 726 No 15)?

37 I shall transcribe the important and decisive passage of the Liber Pontificalis. Respiciens ergo pius vir profanam principis jussionem jam contra Imperatorem quasi contra hostem se armavit, renuens hæresim ejus scribens ubique se cavere Christianos eo quod orta fuisset impietas talis. Igitur permoti omnes Pentapolenses, atque Venetiarum exercitus contra Imperatoris jussionem restiterunt dicentes se nunquam in ejusdem pontificis condescendere necem sed pro ejus magis defensione viriliter decertare (p 156)

38. A census or capitation says Anastasius (p 156) a most cruel tax unknown to the Saracens themselves exclaims the zealous Maimbourg (Hist. des Iconoclastes l. I.) and Theophanes (p. 344 [tom I. p 631 ed Bonn]) who talks of Pharaoh s numbering the male children of Israel This mode of taxation was familiar to the Saracens and most unluckily for the historian, it was imposed a few years afterwards in France by his patron Louis XIV

39 See the Liber Pontificalis of Agnellus (in the Scriptores Rerum Italicarum of Muratori tom. II. pars I.) whose deeper shade of barbarism marks the difference between Rome and Ravenna. Yet we are indebted to him for some curious and domestic facts—the quarters and factions of Ravenna (p 154) the revenge of Justinian II (p 160 161) the defeat of the Greeks (p 170 171) etc.

40 Yet Leo was undoubtedly comprised in the si quis imaginum sacrarum destructor extiterit sit extorris a corpore D N Jesu Christi vel totius ecclesiæ unitate The canonists may decide whether the guilt or the name constitutes the excommunication and the decision is of the last importance of their safety since according to the oracle (Gratian, Caus. XXIII. q 5, c. 47 apud Spanheim Hist. Imag p 112) homicidas non esse qui excommunicatos trucidant.

41 Compescuit tale consilium Pontifex, sperans conversionem principis (Anastas p 156) Sed ne desisterent ab amore et fide R J admonebat (p 157) The popes style Leo and Constantine Copronymus Imperatores et Domini with the strange epithet of Piissimi A famous mosaic of the Lateran (A D 798) represents Christ, who delivers the keys to St Peter and the banner to Constantine V (Muratori Annali d Italia tom vi p 337)

42 I have traced the Roman duchy according to the maps and the maps according to the excellent dissertation of Father Beretti (de Chorographia Italiæ Medii Ævi sect xx p 216–232) Yet I must nicely observe that Viterbo is of Lombard foundation (p 211) and that Terracina was usurped by the Greeks

43 On the extent population etc of the Roman kingdom, the reader may peruse with pleasure the Discours Preliminaire to the République Romaine of M de Beaufort (tom 1.), who will not be accused of too much credulity for the early ages of Rome.

44 Quos (Romanos) nos, Longobardi scilicet Saxones Franci Lotharingi Bajoarii Suevi Burgundiones, tanto dedignamur ut inimicos nostros commoti nil aliud contumeliarum nisi Romane, dicamus hoc solo id est Romanorum nomine, quicquid ignobilitatis quicquid timiditatis quicquid avaritiæ quicquid luxuriæ quicquid mendacii immo quicquid vitiorum est comprehendentes (Liutprand in Legat Script Ital tom ii pars 1 p 481) For the sins of Cato or Tully, Minos might have imposed as a fit penance the daily perusal of this barbarous passage

45 Pipino regi Francorum [et Patricio Romanorum] omnis senatus atque universa populi generalitas a Deo servatæ Romanæ urbis Codex Carolin epist 36 in Script Ital tom iii pars ii p 160 The names of senatus and senator were never totally extinct (Dissert Chorograph p 216 217) but in the middle ages they signified little more than nobiles optimates etc. (Ducange Gloss Latin)

46 See Muratori Antiquit Italiæ Medii Ævi, tom ii Dissertat xxvii p 548 On one of these coins we read Hadrianus Papa (A D 772) on the reverse Vict DDNN with the word CONOB, which the Père Joubert (Science des Médailles tom ii p 42) explains by *CON*stantinopoli *O*fficina B (secunda)

47 See West s Dissertation on the Olympic Games (Pindar vol ii p 32–36 edition in 12mo) and the judicious reflections of Polybius (tom 1. l iv [c. 73] p 466 edit Gronov)

48 The speech of Gregory to the Lombard is finely composed by Sigonius (de Regno Italiæ l. iii Opera tom ii p 173) who imitates the licence and the spirit of Sallust or Livy

49 The Venetian historians John Sagorninus (Chron Venet p 13) and the doge Andrew Dandolo (Scriptores Rer Ital tom xii p 135), have preserved this epistle of Gregory The loss and recovery of Ravenna are mentioned by Paulus Diaconus (de Gest Langobard l vi c. 49 54 in Script Ital tom 1 pars 1 p 506 508) but our chronologists Pagi Muratori etc cannot ascertain the date or circumstances

50 The option will depend on the various readings of the MSS of Anastasius—deceperat or decerpserat (Script Ital tom iii pars 1 p 167)

51 The Codex Carolinus is a collection of the epistles of the popes to Charles Martel (whom they style Subregulus) Pepin and Charlemagne as far as the year 791, when it was formed by the last of these princes His original and authentic MS (Bibliothecæ Cubicularis) is now in the Imperial library of Vienna and has been published by Lambecius and Muratori (Script. Rerum Ital. tom. iii. pars ii p 75 etc)

52 See this most extraordinary letter in the Codex Carolinus epist iii p 92 The enemies of the popes have charged them with fraud and blasphemy yet they surely meant to persuade rather than deceive This introduction of the dead or of immortals was familiar to the ancient orators, though it is executed on this occasion in the rude fashion of the age

53 Except in the divorce of the daughter of Desiderius, whom Charlemagne repudiated sine aliquo crimine Pope Stephen IV had most furiously opposed the alliance of a noble Frank—cum perfidâ horridâ nec dicendâ fœtentissimâ natione Longobardorum—to whom he imputes the first stain of leprosy (Cod Carolin epist 45 p. 178 179) Another reason against the marriage was the existence of a first wife (Muratori Annali d Italia tom vi p 232 233 236 237) But Charlemagne indulged himself in the freedom of polygamy or concubinage

54 See the Annali d Italia of Muratori tom. vi, and the three first Dissertations of his Antiquitates Italiæ Medii Ævi tom 1.

55 Besides the common historians three French critics Launoy (Opera tom. v pars ii l vii epist. 9 p 477–487) Pagi (Critica A D 751 No 1–6 A D 752 No 1–10) and Natalis Alexander (Hist. Novi Testamenti dissertat ii p 96–107) have treated this subject of the deposition of Childeric with learning and attention but with a strong bias to save the independence of the crown Yet they are hard pressed by the texts which they produce of Eginhard Theophanes and the old annals, Laureshamenses Fuldenses Loisielani.

56 Not absolutely for the first time. On a less conspicuous theatre it had been used in the sixth and seventh centuries by the provincial bishops of Britain and Spain The royal unction of Constantinople was borrowed from the Latins in the last age of the empire Constantine Manasses mentions that of Charlemagne as a foreign Jewish incomprehensible ceremony See Selden s Titles of Honour in his Works vol iii part 1 p 234–249 deposed—justè the Carlovingians were established—auctoritate Pontificis Romani. Launoy etc. pretend that these strong words are susceptible of a very soft interpretation. Be it so yet Eginhard understood the world, the court and the Latin language.

57 See Eginhard in Vitâ Caroli Magni c. 1 p. 9 etc. c. iii. p 24 [ed Schminck] Childeric was

58 For the title and powers of patrician of Rome see Ducange (Gloss Latin tom v p 149–151) Pagi (Critica, A D 740 No 6–11) Muratori (Annali d Italia tom. vi. p 308–329) and St. Marc (Abrégé Chronologique de l Italie tom. i. p 3 9–382) Of these the Franciscan Pagi is the most disposed to make the patrician a lieutenant of the church rather than of the empire.

59 The papal ad ocates can soften the symbolic meaning of the banner and the keys but the style of ad regnum dimisimus, or direximus (Codex Carolin. epist i. tom. iii pars ii p 76) seems to allow of no palliation or escape. In the MS of the Vienna library they read instead of regnum rogum prayer or request (see Ducange) and the royalty of Charles Martel is sub erted by this important correction (Catalani, in his Critical Prefaces Annali d Italia, tom. xvii. p 95–99)

60 In the authentic narrative of this reception, the L ber Pontificalis observes—ob iam illi ejus sanctitas dirigens venerabiles [venerandas] cruces id est signa sicut mos est ad exarchum aut patricium suscipiendum eum cum ingenti honore suscipi fecit (tom. iii pars i p 185)

61 Paulus Diaconus who wrote before the empire of Charlemagne describes Rome as his subject city—vestræ ci itates (ad Pompeium Festum) suis addidit sceptris (de Metensis Ecclesiæ Episcopis) Some Carlovingian medals struck at Rome ha e engaged Le Blanc to write an elaborate though partial, dissertation on their authority at Rome, both as patricians and emperors (Amsterdam, 1692 in 4to)

62 Mosheim (Institution Hist Eccles p 263) weighs this donation with fair and deliberate prudence. The original act has ne er been produced but the Liber Pontificalis represents (p 171) and the Codex Carolinus supposes this ample gift Both are contemporary records and the latter is the mo e authentic since it has been preserved not in the Papal but the Imperial, library

63 Between the exorbitant claims and narrow co cessions, of interest and prejudice from which even Muratori (Antiquitat tom i p 63–68) is not exempt, I ha e been guided in the limits of the Exarchate and Pentapolis by the Dissertatio Chorographica Italiæ Medii Æ i tom x p 160–180

64 Spoletini deprecati sunt ut eos in servitio B Petri reciperet et more Romanorum tonsurari faceret (Anastas us p 185) Yet it may be a question whether they ga e their own persons or their country

65 The policy and donations of Charlemagne are carefully examined by St Marc (Abrege tom i. p 390–408) who has well stud ed the Codex Carolinus. I believe with him that they were only verbal The most ancient act of donation that pretends to be extant is that of the emperor Lewis the Pious (S gonius de Regno Italiæ, l. iv Opera tom ii. p 267–270) Its authenticity or at least its integrity are much questioned (Pagi A.D 817 No 7 etc Muratori Annali tom vi. p 432 etc. Dissertat Chorographica p 33 34) but I see no reasonable objection to these princes so freely disposing of what was not their own

66 Charlemagne solicited and obtained from the proprietor Adrian I the mosaics of the palace of Ravenna for the decoration of Aix la Chapelle (Cod Carolin epist 67 p 223)

67 The popes often complain of the usurpations of Leo of Ravenna (Codex Carolin epist 51 52 53 p 200–205) Si corpus St Andreæ germani St Petri hic humasset nequaquam nos Romani pontifices sic subjugassent (Agnellus Liber Pontificalis in Scriptores Rerum Ital. tom ii. pars. i p 107)

68 Piissimo Constantino magno per ejus largitatem S R. Ecclesia elevata et exaltata est et potestatem in his Hesperiæ partibus largiri dignatus est Quia ecce novus Constantinus his temporibus etc (Codex Carolin epist 49 in tom. iii. part. ii p 195) Pagi (Critica A.D 324, No 16) ascribes them to an imposter of the eighth century who borrowed the name of St Isidore his humble title of Peccator was ignorantly but aptly turned into Mercator his merchandise was indeed profitable and a few sheets of paper were sold for much wealth and power

69 Fabricius (Biblioth. Græc tom. vi. p 4–7) has enumerated the several editions of this Act, in Greek and Latin The copy which Laurentius Valla recites and refutes appears to be taken either from the spurious Acts of St Silvester or from Gratian s Decree to which according to him and others it has been surreptitiously tacked

70 In the year 1059 it was believed (was it believed?) by Pope Leo IX. Cardinal Peter Damianus etc. Muratori places (Annali d Italia tom. ix. p 23 24) the fictitious donations of Lewis the Pious the Othos etc de Donatione Constantini See a Dissertation of Natalis Alexander seculum iv diss 25 p 335–350

this animated discourse which was composed by the author A D 1440 six years after the flight of Pope Eugenius IV It is a most vehement party pamphlet Valla justifies and animates the revolt of the Romans, and would even approve the use of a dagger against their sacerdotal tyrant Such a critic might expect the persecution of the clergy yet he made his peace, and is buried in the Lateran (Bayle, Dictionnaire Critique, VALLA Vossius de Historicis Latinis p 580)

73 See Guicciardini a servant of the popes in that long and valuable digression, which has resumed its place in the last edition correctly published from the author's MS and printed in four volumes in quarto under the name of Friburgo, 1775 (Istoria d Italia, tom i p 385–395)

74 The Paladin Astolpho found it in the moon among the things that were lost upon earth (Orlando Furioso xxxiv 80)

Di vari fiori ad un gran monte passa
Ch ebbe già buono odore, or puzza forte
Questo era il dono (se però dir lece)
Che Constantino al buon Silvestro fece

Yet this incomparable poem has been approved by a bull of Leo X

75 See Baronius A D 324 No 117–123 A D 1191 No 51, etc The cardinal wishes to suppose that Rome was offered by Constantine, and refused by Silvester The act of donation he considers strangely enough as a forgery of the Greeks

79 The pope's legates were casual messengers two priests without any special commission and who were disavowed on their return Some vagabond monks were persuaded by the Catholics to represent the Oriental patriarchs This curious anecdote is revealed by Theodore Studites (Epist i 38 in Sirmond Opp tom v p 1319), one of the warmest Iconoclasts of the age

80 Συμφέρει δέ σοι μὴ καταλιπεῖν ἐν τῇ πόλει ταύτῃ πορνεῖον εἰς ὃ μὴ εἰσέλθῃς, ἢ ἵνα ἀρνήσῃ τὸ προσκυνεῖν τὸν κύριον ἡμῶν καὶ θεὸν Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν μετὰ τῆς ἰδίας αὐτοῦ μητρὸς ἐν εἰκόνι These visits could not be innocent, since the Δαίμων πορνείας (the demon of fornication) ἐπολέμει δὲ αὐτὸν … ἐν μιᾷ οὖν ὡς ἐπέκειτο αὐτῷ σφόδρα etc. Actio iv p 901 Actio v p 1031

82 The Libri Carolini (Spanheim p 443–529) composed in the palace or winter quarters of Charlemagne, at Worms A D 790, and sent by Engebert to Pope Adrian I who answered them by a grandis et verbosa epistola (Concil tom viii p 1553) The Carolines propose 120 objections against the Nicene synod, and such words as these are the flowers of their rhetoric—Dementiam priscæ Gentilitatis obsoletum errorem argumenta insanissima et absurdissima derisione dignas nænias etc. etc

83 The assemblies of Charlemagne were political as well as ecclesiastical and the three hundred members (Nat. Alexander, sect viii p 53) who sat and voted at Frankfort must include not only the bishops but the abbots, and even the principal laymen

84 Qui supra sanctissima patres nostri (episcopi et sacerdotes) omnimodis servitium et adorationem imaginum renuentes contempserunt, atque consentientes condemnaverunt (Concil tom ix p. 101 Canon ii Franckfurd) A polemic must be hard hearted indeed who does not pity the efforts of Baronius Pagi Alexander, Maimbourg etc., to elude this unlucky sentence

85 Theophanes (p 343 [tom i p 631, ed. Bonn]) specifies those of Sicily and Calabria, which yielded an annual rent of three talents and a half of gold (perhaps £7000 sterling) Liutprand more pompously enumerates the patrimonies of the Roman church in Greece Judæa Persia, Mesopotamia Babylonia Egypt and Libya which were detained by the injustice of the Greek emperor (Legat ad Nicephorum in Script. Rerum Italicarum tom ii pars i p 481)

86 The great diocese of the Eastern Illyricum with Apulia Calabria and Sicily (Thomassin Discipline de l Eglise tom i p 145) By the confession of the Greeks the patriarch of Constantinople had detached from Rome the metropolitan of Thessalonica Athens Corinth Nicopolis and Patræ (Luc Holsten Geograph Sacra p 22) and his spiritual conquests extended to Naples and Amalfi (Giannone Istoria Civile di Napoli tom i p 517–524 Pagi A D 730 No 11)

88. Fontanini considers the emperors as no more than the advocates of the church (advocatus et defensor S R. E. See Ducange, Gloss. Lat. tom. i. p 97) His antagonist Muratori reduces the popes to be no more than the exarchs of the emperor In the more equitable view of Mosheim (Institut. Hist. 89. His merits and hopes are summed up in an epitaph of thirty-eight verses of which Charlemagne declares himself the author (Concil. tom. iii. p. 520)

Post patrem lacrymans Carolus hæc carmina scripsi.
Tu mihi dulcis amor te modo plango pater
Nomina jungo simul titulis clarissime, nostra
Adrianus Carolus, rex ego tuque pater

The poetry might be supplied by Alcuin but the tears, the most glorious tribute can only belong to Charlemagne

90. Every new pope is admonished— Sancte Pater non videbis annos Petri twenty five years On the whole series the average is about eight years—a short hope for an ambitious cardinal.

91 The assurance of Anastasius (tom. iii. pars i. p 197 198) is supported by the credulity of some French annalists but Eginhard and other writers of the same age, are more natural and sincere. Unus ei oculus paululum est læsus says John the deacon of Naples (Vit. Episcop Napol. in Scriptores Muratori tom. i. pars ii. p 312) Theodolphus a contemporary bishop of Orleans observes with prudence (l iii. carm. 3) —

Reddita sunt? mirum est mirum est auferre nequisse
Est tamen in dubio hinc mirer an inde magis.

92 Twice, at the request of Adrian and Leo he appeared at Rome—longâ tunicâ et chlamyde amictus et calceamentis quoque Romano more formatis Eginhard (c xxiii p 109–113) describes like Suetonius the simplicity of his dress so popular in the nation that when Charles the Bald returned to France in a foreign habit the patriotic dogs barked at the apostate (Gaillard, Vie de Charlemagne tom. iv p 109)

93 See Anastasius (p 199) and Eginhard (c. xxviii. p 124–128) The unction is mentioned by Theophanes (p 399 [tom. i. p 733 ed. Bonn]) the oath by S gonius (from the Ordo Romanus) and the pope s adoration more antiquorum principum, by the Annales Bertiniani (Script. Muratori tom ii. pars ii. p 505)

94. This great event of the translation or restoration of the empire is related and discussed by Natalis Alexander (secul. ix. dissert. i. p 390–397), Pagi (tom. iii. p 418) Muratori (Annali d Italia, tom. vi. p. 339–352) Sigonius (de Regno Italiæ l. iv Opp tom. ii. p 247–251) Spanheim (de fictâ Translatione Imperii) Giannone (tom. i. p 395–405) St Marc (Abrégé Chronologique, tom. i. p 438–450) Gaillard (Hist de Charlemagne, tom ii p 386–446) Almost all these moderns have some religious or national bias

95 By Mably (Observations sur l Histoire de France) Voltaire (Histoire Générale) Robertson (History of Charles V) and Montesquieu (Esprit des Loix, l. xxxi. c. 18) In the year 1782 M Gaillard published his Histoire de Charlemagne (in 4 vols in 12mo) which I have freely and profitably used. The author is a man of sense and humanity, and his work is laboured with industry and elegance. But I have likewise examined the original monuments of the reigns of Pepin and Charlemagne in the fifth volume of the Historians of France.

96 The vision of Weltin composed by a monk eleven years after the death of Charlemagne, shows him in purgatory with a vulture who is perpetually gnawing the guilty member while the rest of his body the emblem of his virtues is sound and perfect (see Gaillard tom ii. p 317–360)

97 The marriage of Eginhard with Imma daughter of Charlemagne, is in my opinion sufficiently refuted by the probrum and suspicio that sullied these fair damsels without excepting his own wife (c. xix. p 98–100 cum Notis Schmincke) The husband must have been too strong for the historian.

98 Besides the massacres and transmigrations the pain of death was pronounced against the following crimes — 1 The refusal of baptism 2 The false pretence of baptism. 3 A relapse to idolatry 4. The murder of a priest or bishop 5 Human sacrifices. 6 Eating meat in Lent. But every crime might be expiated by baptism or penance (Gaillard tom. ii p 241–247) and the Christian Saxons became the friends and equals of the Franks (Struv Corpus Hist Germanicæ p 133)

99 In this action the famous Rutland Rolando Orlando was slain—cum compluribus aliis See the truth in Eginhard (c 9 p 51–56) and the fable in an ingenious Supplement of M Gaillard (tom. iii p 474) The Spaniards are too proud of a victory which history ascribes to the Gascons and romance to the Saracens.

100 Yet Schmidt from the best authorities represents the interior disorders and oppression of his reign (Hist des Allemands tom. ii. p 45–49)

101 Omnis homo ex suâ proprietate leg itimam decimam ad ecclesiam conferat Experimento enim didicimus in anno quo illa valida fames irrepsit

ebullire vacuas annonas à dæmonibus devoratas et voces exprobrationis auditas Such is the decree and assertion of the great Council of Frankfort (Canon xxv tom ix p 105) Both Selden (Hist of Tithes Works, vol iii part ii p 1146) and Montesquieu (The Spirit of Laws, l xxxi c 12) represent Charlemagne as the first legal author of tithes Such obligations have country gentlemen to his memory!

102 Eginhard (c 25 p 119) clearly affirms tentabat et scribere sed parum prospere successit labor præposterus et sero inchoatus The moderns have perverted and corrected this obvious meaning, and the title of M Gaillard s Dissertation (tom iii p 247–260) betrays his partiality

104 M Gaillard (tom iii p 372) fixes the true stature of Charlemagne (see a Dissertation of Marquard Freher ad calcem Eginhard p 220 etc) at five feet nine inches of French about six feet one inch and a fourth English measure The romance writers have increased it to eight feet, and the giant was endowed with matchless strength and appetite at a single stroke of his good sword Joyeuse he cut asunder a horseman and his horse at a single repast he devoured a goose two fowls a quarter of mutton etc

105 See the concise but correct and original, work of D Anville (Etats formés en Europe après la Chute de l Empire Romain en Occident Paris 1771 in 4to) whose map includes the empire of Charlemagne the different parts are illustrated—by Valesius (Notitia Galliarum) for France Beretti (Dissertatio Chorographica) for Italy De Marca (Marca Hispanica) for Spain For the middle geography of Germany I confess myself poor and destitute

106 After a brief relation of his wars and conquests (Vit Carol c 5–14) Eginhard recapitulates in a few words (c 15) the countries subject to his empire Struvius (Corpus Hist German p 118–149) has inserted in his Notes the texts of the old Chronicles

107 Of a charter granted to the monastery of Alaon (A D 845) by Charles the Bald which deduces this royal pedigree I doubt whether some subsequent links of the ninth and tenth centuries are equally firm yet the whole is approved and defended by M Gaillard (tom ii p 60–81 203–206) who affirms that the family of Montesquieu (not of the President de Montesquieu) is descended, in the female line from Clotaire and Clovis—an innocent pretension!

108 The governors or counts of the Spanish march revolted from Charles the Simple about the year 900 and a poor pittance the Rousillon has been recovered in 1642 by the kings of France (Longuerue Description de la France tom i p 220–222) Yet the Rousillon contains 188 900 subjects and annually pays 2 600 000 livres (Necker Administration des Finances, tom i p 278, 279) more people, perhaps and doubtless more money than the march of Charlemagne.

111 Quot prælia in eo gesta! quantum sanguinis effusum sit! Testatur vacua omni habitatione Pannonia, et locus in quo regia Cagani fuit ita desertus ut ne vestigium quidem humanæ habitationis appareat Tota in hoc bello Hunnorum nobilitas periit tota gloria decidit, omnis pecunia et congesti ex longo tempore thesauri direpti sunt Eginhard c 13

112 The junction of the Rhine and Danube was undertaken only for the service of the Pannonian war (Gaillard Vie de Charlemagne, tom ii p 312–315) The canal which would have been only two leagues in length and of which some traces are still extant in Swabia was interrupted by excessive rains military avocations and superstitious fears (Schæpflin Hist de l Académie des Inscriptions tom xviii p 256 Molimina fluviorum, etc jungendorum p 59–62)

113 See Eginhard c 16 and Gaillard tom ii p 361–385 who mentions with a loose reference, the intercourse of Charlemagne and Egbert the emperor's gift of his own sword and the modest answer of his Saxon disciple The anecdote if genuine, would have adorned our English histories.

114 The correspondence is mentioned only in the French annals and the Orientals are ignorant of the caliph s friendship for the Christian dog—a polite appellation, which Harun bestows on the emperor of the Greeks

115 Gaillard tom ii p 361–365 471–476, 492 I have borrowed his judicious remarks on Charlemagne s plan of conquest and the judicious distinction of his enemies of the first and second enceinte (tom ii p 184 509 etc)

116 Thegan the biographer of Lewis relates this coronation and Baronius has honestly transcribed it (A D 813 No 13 etc see Gaillard tom. ii p 506 507 508) howsoever adverse to the claims of the popes For the series of the Carlovingians see the historians of France Italy and Germany Pfeffel Schmidt Velly Muratori and even Voltaire whose pictures are sometimes just, and always pleasing

117 He was the son of Otho the son of Ludolph in whose favour the duchy of Saxony had been instituted A D 858 Ruotgerus the biographer of a St Bruno (Biblioth Bunavianæ Catalog tom iii. vol ii p 679) gives a splendid character of his family Atavorum atavi usque ad hominum memoriam omnes nobilissimi nullus in eorum stirpe ignotus nullus degener facile reperitur (apud Struvium Corp Hist German p 216) Yet Gundling (in Henrico Aucupe) is not satisfied of his descent from Witikind

118 See the treatise of Conringius (de Finibus

Imperii Germanici, Francofurt. 1680 in 4to) he rejects the extravagant and improper scale of the Roman and Carlovingian empires and discusses with moderation the rights of Germany her vassals and her neighbours

119. The power of custom forces me to number Conrad I. and Henry I the Fowler in the list of emperors, a title which was never assumed by those kings of Germany The Italians Muratori for instance, are more scrupulous and correct, and only reckon the princes who have been crowned at Rome.

120 Invidiam tamen suscepti nominis (C. P imperatoribus super hoc indignantibus) magnâ tulit patientiâ, vicitque eorum contumaciam mittendo ad eos crebras legationes, et in epistolis fratres eos appellando Eginhard c. 28 p. 128. Perhaps it was on their account that like Augustus, he affected some reluctance to receive the empire.

121 Theophanes speaks of the coronation and unction of Charles Κάρουλλος (Chronograph p 399 [tom. i. p 733 ed Bonn]) and of his treaty of marriage with Irene (p 402 [p 737 ed Bonn]) which is unknown to the Latins Gaillard relates his transactions with the Greek empire (tom. ii. p 446-468)

122 Gaillard very properly observes that this pageant was a farce suitable to children only but that it was indeed represented in the presence, and for the benefit, of children of a larger growth.

123 Compare in the original texts collected by Pagi (tom. iii A D 812 No 7 A.D 824, No 10, etc.) the contrast of Charlemagne and his son to the former the ambassadors of Michael (who were indeed disavowed) more suo id est linguâ Græcâ laudes dixerunt imperatorem eum et Βασιλέα appellantes to the latter Vocato imperatori Francorum etc.

124. See the epistle in Paralipomena of the anonymous writer of Salerno (Script Ital. tom. ii. pars ii. p. 243-254, c 93 107) whom Baronius (A.D 871 No 51 71) mistook for Erchempert, when he transcribed it in his Annals

125 Ipse enim os non imperatorem id est Βασιλέα sua linguâ, sed ob indignationem Ῥῆγα id est regem nostrâ vocabat (Liutprand in Legat. in Script. Ital. tom ii pars i. p 479) The pope had exhorted Nicephorus emperor of the Greeks to make peace with Otho the august emperor of the Romans—quæ inscriptio secundum Græcos peccatoria [peccatrix] et temeraria imperatorem inquiunt, universalem Romanorum Augustum magnum solum, Nicephorum (b p 486)

126. The origin and progress of the title of cardinal may be found in Thomassin (Discipline de l'Eglise, tom. i p 1261 1298) Muratori (Antiquitat. Italiæ Medii Ævi, tom vi Dissert lxi p 159-182) and Mosheim (Institut Hist Eccles p 345-347) who accurately remarks the forms and changes of the election The cardinal bishops so highly exalted by Peter Damianus are sunk to a level with the rest of the sacred college.

127 Firmiter jurantes nunquam se papam electuros aut ordinaturos præter consensum et electionem Othonis et filii sui (Liutprand L vi. c. 6 p 472) This important concession may either supply or confirm the decree of the clergy and people of Rome so fiercely rejected by Baronius Pagi and Muratori (A D 964) and so well defended and explained by St Marc (Abrégé tom ii. p 808-816 tom iv p 1167-1185) Consult that historical critic and the Annals of Muratori for the election and confirmation of each pope

128 The oppression and vices of the Roman church in the tenth century are strongly painted in the history and legation of Liutprand (see p 440 450, 471-476 479, etc.) and it is whimsical enough to observe Muratori tempering the invectives of Baronius against the popes. But these popes had been chosen not by the cardinals, but by lay patrons

129 The time of Pope Joan (papissa Joanna) is placed somewhat earlier than Theodora or Marozia and the two years of her imaginary reign are forcibly inserted between Leo IV and Benedict III But the contemporary Anastasius indissolubly links the death of Leo and the elevation of Benedict (illico mox, p 247) and the accurate chronology of Pagi Muratori and Leibnitz fixes both events to the year 857

130. The advocates for Pope Joan produce one hundred and fifty witnesses, or rather echoes, of the fourteenth fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. They bear testimony against themselves and the legend, by multiplying the proof that so curious a story must have been repeated by writers of every description to whom it was known. On those of the ninth and tenth centuries the recent event would have flashed with a double force. Would Photius have spared such a reproach? Could Liutprand have missed such scandal? It is scarcely worth while to discuss the various readings of Martinus Polonus Sigebert of Gemblours or even Marianus Scotus but a most palpable forgery is the passage of Pope Joan which has been foisted into some MSS and editions of the Roman Anastasius

131 As false it deserves that name but I would not pronounce it incredible. Suppose a famous French chevalier of our own times to have been born in Italy and educated in the church instead of the army her merit or fortune might have raised her to St Peter's chair her amours would have been natural her delivery in the streets unlucky but not improbable

132 Till the Reformation the tale was repeated and believed without offence and Joan's female statue long occupied her place among the popes in the cathedral of Sienna (Pagi Critica tom. iii. p 624-626) She has been annihilated by two learned Protestants Blondel and Bayle (Dictionnaire Critique Papesse Polonus Blondel) but their brethren were scandalised by this equitable and generous criticism. Spanheim and Lenfant attempt to save this poor engine of controversy and even Mosheim condescends to cherish some doubt and suspicion (p 289)

133 Lateranense palatium prostibulum meretricum Testis omnium gentium præter quam Romanorum, absentia mulierum, quæ sanc torum apostolorum limina orandi gratiâ timent visere cum nonnullas ante dies paucos hunc audierint conjugatas viduas virgines vi oppressisse (Liutprand Hist l vi c. 6 p 471 See the whole affair of John XII p 471–476)

134 A new example of the mischief of equivo cation is the beneficium (Ducange tom 1 p 617 etc), which the pope conferred on the emperor Frederic I since the Latin word may signify either a legal fief or a simple favour an obligation (we want the word bienfait) (See Schmidt Hist des Allemands tom iii p 393–408 Pfeffel Abrégé Chronologique tom. i p 229, 296 317, 324 420, 430 500 505 509 etc)

135 For the history of the emperors in Rome and Italy, see Sigonius de Regno Italiæ Opp tom ii with the Notes of Saxius and the Annals of Muratori who might refer more distinctly to the authors of his great collection

136 See the Dissertation of Le Blanc at the end of his treatise des Monnoyes de France in which he produces some Roman coins of the French emperors

138 Ditmar p 354 apud Schmidt tom iii p 439

139 This bloody feast is described in Leonine verse in the Pantheon of Godfrey of Viterbo (Script Ital tom vii p 436 437) who flourished towards the end of the twelfth century (Fabricius Biblioth Latin med et infimi Ævi tom iii p 69 edit Mansi) but his evidence which imposed on Sigonius is reasonably suspected by Muratori (Annali tom viii p 177)

140 The coronation of the emperor and some original ceremonies of the tenth century are pre served in the Panegyric on Berengarius (Script Ital. tom ii pars i p 405–414) illustrated by the Notes of Hadrian Valesius and Leibnitz Sigonius has related the whole process of the Roman expe dition in good Latin but with some errors of time and fact (l vii p 441–446)

141 In a quarrel at the coronation of Conrad II Muratori takes leave to observe—doveano ben essere allora indisciplinati barbari e bestiali i Tedeschi Annal tom viii p 368

142 After boiling away the flesh The caldrons for that purpose were a necessary piece of travel ling furniture and a German who was using it for his brother promised it to a friend after it should have been employed for himself (Schmidt, tom. iii p 423 424) The same author observes that the whole Saxon line was extinguished in Italy (tom ii p 440)

144 For these titles see Selden (Titles of Hon our, vol iii part i p 488) Ducange (Gloss Latin. tom ii p 140 tom vi p 776) and St. Marc (Abrégé Chronologique tom ii p 719)

145 The Lombards invented and used the carocium a standard planted on a car or waggon drawn by a team of oxen (Ducange tom ii p. 194, 195 Muratori Antiquitat tom. ii diss. xxvi. p. 489–493)

147 Solus imperator faciem suam firmavit ut petram (Burcard de Excidio Mediolani Script. Ital tom vi p 917) This volume of Muratori contains the originals of the history of Frederic the First which must be compared with due regard to the circumstances and prejudices of each German or Lombard writer

148 For the history of Frederic II and the House of Swabia at Naples see Giannone, Istoria Civile tom ii l xiv–xix

149 In the immense labyrinth of the jus publicum of Germany I must either quote one writer or a thousand and I had rather trust to one faithful guide than transcribe on credit a multitude of names and passages That guide is M Pfeffel the author of the best legal and constitutional history that I know of any country (Nouvel Abrégé Chronologique de l Histoire et du Droit Public d Allemagne Paris 1776 2 vols in 4to) His learning and judgment have discerned the most interesting facts his simple brevity comprises them in a nar row space his chronological order distributes them under the proper dates and an elaborate index collects them under their respective heads. To this work in a less perfect state Dr Robertson was gratefully indebted for that masterly sketch which traces even the modern changes of the Ger manic body The Corpus Historiæ Germanicæ of Struvius has been likewise consulted the more usefully as that huge compilation is fortified in every page with the original texts

150 Yet personally Charles IV must not be considered as a barbarian After his education at Paris he recovered the use of the Bohemian his native idiom and the emperor conversed and wrote with equal facility in French Latin Italian and German (Struvius p 615 616) Petrarch always represents him as a polite and learned prince

the expedition of Charles IV is painted in lively and original colours in the curious Mémoires sur la Vie de Petrarque tom. iii p 316–430, by the Abbé de Sade, whose prolixity has never been blamed by any reader of taste and curiosity

152 See the whole ceremony in Struvius p. 629.

153. The republic of Europe with the pope and emperor at its head was never represented with more dignity than in the council of Constance. See Lenfant's History of that assembly

154. Gravina, Origines Juris Civilis, p 108.

155 Six thousand urns have been discovered of the slaves and freedmen of Augustus and Livia So minute was the division of office, that one slave was appointed to weigh the wool which was spun by the empress's maids another for the care of her lapdog etc. (Camere Sepolchrale etc. by Bianchini Extract of his work in the Bibliothèque Italique tom. iv p 175 His Eloge by Fontenelle tom vi p 356) But these servants were of the same rank and possibly not more numerous than those of Pollio or Lentulus. They only prove the general riches of the city

Chapter L

1 As in this and the following chapter I shall display much Arabic learning I must profess my total ignorance of the Oriental tongues and my gratitude to the learned interpreters who have transfused their science into the Latin French and English languages Their collections versions and histories I shall occasionally notice.

2 The geographers of Arabia may be divided into three classes —1 The Greeks and Latins whose progressive knowledge may be traced in Agatharchides (de Mari Rubro in Hudson Geograph. Minor tom. i.) Diodorus Siculus (tom i l. iii. [c. 48–54] p 159–167 L iii [c. 14 sqq] p 211–216 edit. Wesseling) Strabo (l. xvi p 1112–1114 [p 767–769, ed Casaub] from Eratosthenes, p 1122–1132 [776–785 ed. Casaub] from Artemidorus) Dionysius (Periegesis v 927–969) Pliny (Hist. Natur v 12 vi. 32) and Ptolemy (De script. et Tabulæ Urbium in Hudson tom. iii) 2 The Arabic writers who have treated the subject with the zeal of patriotism or devotion the extracts of Pocock (Specimen Hist Arabum p 125–128) from the Geography of the Sherif al Edrissi render us still more dissatisfied with the version or abridgment (p 24–27 44–56 108 etc 119 etc.) which the Maronites have published under the absurd title of Geographia Nubiensis (Paris 1619) but the Latin and French translators Greaves (in Hudson, tom. iii.) and Galland (Voyage de la Palestine par la Roque, p 265–346) have opened to us the Arabia of Abulfeda, the most copious and correct account of the peninsula, which may be enriched, however from the Bibliothèque Orientale of D Herbelot p 120, et alibi passim. 3 The European travellers among whom Shaw (p 438–455) and Niebuhr (Description 1773 Voyages tom. i. 1776) deserve an honourable distinction Busching (Géographie par Berenger tom. viii p 416–510) has compiled with judgment and D Anville's Maps (Orbis Veteribus Notus and 1re Partie de l Asie) should lie before the reader with his Géographie Ancienne tom ii. p 208–231

3 Abulfed Descript. Arabiæ p 1 D Anville, l'Euphrate et le Tigre p 19, 20 It was in this place, the paradise or garden of a satrap that Xenophon and the Greeks first passed the Euphrates (Anabasis, l. i c. 10 [c. 4, § 10] p 29 edit. Wells)

4. Reland has proved with much superfluous learning 1 That our Red Sea (the Arabian Gulf) is no more than a part of the Mare Rubrum the Ἐρυθρὰ θαλάσσα of the ancients which was extended to the indefinite space of the Indian Ocean. 2 That the synonymous words ἐρυθρος αἰθίοψ allude to the colour of the blacks or negroes (Dissert Miscell. tom i. p 59–117)

5 In the thirty days or stations, between Cairo and Mecca there are fifteen destitute of good water See the route of the Hadjees in Shaw's Travels p 477

6 The aromatics especially the thus or frankincense of Arabia occupy the twelfth book of Pliny Our great poet (Paradise Lost l iv) introduces in a simile the spicy odours that are blown by the north-east wind from the Sabæan coast —

——Many a league
Pleas'd with the grateful scent old Ocean smiles

(Plin Hist. Natur xii 42)

7 Agatharchides affirms that lumps of pure gold were found from the size of an olive to that of a nut that iron was twice and silver ten times the value of gold (de Mari Rubro p 60 [Hudson Geogr M tom i.]) These real or imaginary treasures are vanished and no gold mines are at present known in Arabia (Niebuhr Description p 124)

8 Consult, peruse, and study the Specimen Historiæ Arabum of Pocock (Oxon 1650 in 4to) The thirty pages of text and version are extracted from the Dynasties of Gregory Abulpharagius which Pocock afterwards translated (Oxon 1663 in 4to) the three hundred and fifty-eight notes form a classic and original work on the Arabian antiquities

9 Arrian remarks the Ichthyophagi of the coast of Hejaz (Periplus Maris Erythræi, p 12) and beyond Aden (p 15 [Hudson, Geogr M t. i.]) It seems probable that the shores of the Red Sea (in the largest sense) were occupied by these savages

in the time perhaps of Cyrus but I can hardly believe that any cannibals were left among the savages in the reign of Justinian (Procop de Bell Persic l i c 19 [t i p 100 ed Bonn])

10 See the Specimen Historiæ Arabum of Pocock p 2, 5 86 etc The journey of M d'Arvieux, in 1664 to the camp of the emir of Mount Carmel (Voyage de la Palestine Amsterdam, 1718) exhibits a pleasing and original picture of the life of the Bedoweens which may be illustrated from Niebuhr (Description de l Arabie, p 327–344), and Volney (tom i p 343–385), the last and most judicious of our Syrian travellers

11 Read (it is no unpleasing task) the incomparable articles of the Horse and the Camel, in the Natural History of M de Buffon

12 For the Arabian horses see D Arvieux (p 159–173) and Niebuhr (p 142–144) At the end of the thirteenth century the horses of Neged were esteemed sure footed those of Yemen strong and serviceable those of Hejaz most noble The horses of Europe, the tenth and last class were generally despised as having too much body and too little spirit (D Herbelot, Biblioth Orient p 339) their strength was requisite to bear the weight of the knight and his armour

13 Qui carnibus camelorum vesci solent odii tenaces sunt was the opinion of an Arabian physician (Pocock Specimen p 88) Mohammed himself who was fond of milk prefers the cow and does not even mention the camel but the diet of Mecca and Medina was already more luxurious (Gagnier Vie de Mahomet tom iii p 404)

14 Yet Marcian of Heraclea (in Periplo p 16, in tom i Hudson, Minor Geograph) reckons one hundred and sixty four towns in Arabia Felix The size of the towns might be small the faith of the writer might be large

15 It is compared by Abulfeda (in Hudson, tom iii p 54) to Damascus and is still the residence of the Imam of Yemen (Voyages de Niebuhr tom i p 331–342) Saana is twenty four parasangs from Dafar (Abulfeda p 51) and sixty eight from Aden (p 53)

16 Pocock Specimen p 57 Geograph Nubiensis p 52 Mariaba, or Merab six miles in circumference was destroyed by the legions of Augustus (Plin Hist Nat vi 32) and had not revived in the fourteenth century (Abulfed Descript Arab p 58)

17 The name of city Medina was appropriated κατ ἐξοχην to Yatreb (the Iatrippa of the Greeks) the seat of the prophet The distances from Medina are reckoned by Abulfeda in stations or days journey of a caravan (p 15) to Bahrein fifteen to Bassora eighteen to Cufah twenty to Damascus or Palestine twenty to Cairo twenty five to Mecca, ten from Mecca to Saana (p 52) or Aden thirty to Cairo thirty-one days or 412 hours (Shaw s Travels p 477) which according to the estimate of D Anville (Mesures Itinéraires p 99) allows about twenty five English miles for a day s journey From the land of frankincense (Hadramaut, in Yemen between Aden and Cape Fartasch) to Gaza, in Syria, Pliny (Hist Nat xii 32) computes sixty five mansions of camels These measures may assist fancy and elucidate facts

18 Our notions of Mecca must be drawn from the Arabians (D Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, p 368–371 Pocock, Specimen, p 125–128 Abulfeda p 11–40) As no unbeliever is permitted to enter the city our travellers are silent and the short hints of Thevenot (Voyages du Levant, part i 490) are taken from the suspicious mouth of an African renagado Some Persians counted 6000 houses (Chardin tom iv p 167)

21 A nameless doctor (Universal Hist vol xx octavo edition) has formerly demonstrated the truth of Christianity by the independence of the Arabs. A critic, besides the exceptions of fact might dispute the meaning of the text (Gen xvi 12), the extent of the application, and the foundation of the pedigree

22 It was subdued A D 1173 by a brother of the great Saladin who founded a dynasty of Curds or Ayoubites (Guignes Hist des Huns, tom i p 425 D Herbelot p 477)

23 By the lieutenant of Soliman I (A D 1538) and Selim II (1568) See Cantemir s Hist of the Othman Empire p 201 221 The pasha who resided at Saana commanded twenty-one beys but no revenue was ever remitted to the Porte (Marsigli Stato Militare dell Imperio Ottomanno p. 124) and the Turks were expelled about the year 1630 (Niebuhr p 167 168)

24 Of the Roman province under the name of Arabia and the third Palestine the principal cities were Bostra and Petra which dated their era from the year 105 when they were subdued by Palma a lieutenant of Trajan (Dion Cassius l. lxviii [c. 14]) Petra was the capital of the Nabathæans, whose name is derived from the eldest of the sons of Ismael (Gen xxv 12 etc with the Commentaries of Jerom Le Clerc and Calmet) Justinian relinquished a palm country of ten days journey to the south of Ælah (Procop de Bell Persic l. i c 19 [t i p 101 ed Bonn]) and the Romans maintained a centurion and a custom house (Arrian in Periplo Maris Erythræi p 11 in Hudson tom i) at a place (λευκη κωμη Pagus Albus Hawara) in the territory of Medina (D Anville Mémoire sur l Egypte, p 243) These real possessions and some naval inroads of Trajan (Peripl. p 14, 15) are magnified by history and medals into the Roman conquest of Arabia.

Niebuhr (Description de l Arabie, p 302 329-331) affords the mo t recent and au c intelligence of the Turkish empire in a.

Diodorus Siculus (tom ii l. xix [c. 94] p 393 ed t Wesseling) has clearly exposed the om of the Nabathæan Arabs who resisted rms of Antigonus and his son.

Strabo l xvi. p 11 7 1129 [p 781 sq ed ub] Plin Hist Natur vi. 32 Ælius Gallus ed near Medina, and marched near a thou miles into the part of Yemen between Marcb the ocean The non ante devictis Sabææ reg (Od. 1 9) and the intacti Arabum thesauri iii. 24) of Horace attest the virgin purity of bia.

8 See the imperfect history of Yemen in Pock, Specimen p 55-66 of Hira p 66-74 of san, p 75-78 as far as it could be known or served in the time of ignorance.

9. The Σαρακηνικὰ φῦλα, μυριάδες ταῦτα, καὶ τὸ πλεῖστον αὐτῶν ἐρημονόμοι καὶ ἀδέσποτοι are describ- by Menander (Excerpt Legation p 149 [ed. p 375 ed. Bonn]) Procopius (de Bell. Persic c. 17 19 l. ii. c 10) and in the most lively lours by Ammianus Marcellinus (l. xiv c. 4) who d spoken of them as early as the reign of Marcus.

30 The name which, used by Ptolemy and ny in a more confined by Ammianus and Propius in a larger sense has been derived ridic ously from Sarah, the wife of Abraham ob- urely from the village of Saraka (μετὰ τοὺς Ναβαταίους Stephan. de Urbibus [s v Σάρακα]) more laudably from the Arabic words which signify a thievish character or Oriental situation (Hottinger Hist. Oriental. l. i. c. i. p 7 8 Pocock, Specimen p 33-35 Asseman Biblioth Orient. tom iv p 567) Yet the last and most popular of these ety mologies is refuted by Ptolemy (Arabia p 2 18 in Hudson tom iii) who expressly remarks the western and southern position of the Saracens, then an obscure tribe on the borders of Egypt The appellation cannot therefore allude to any national character and since it was imposed by strangers it must be found, not in the Arabic, but in a foreign language.

31 Saraceni ... mulieres aiunt in eos regnare (Expositio totius Mundi, p 3 in Hudson tom. iii.) The reign of Mavia is famous in ecclesiastical story Pocock, Specimen p 69 83

32 Ἐκ τοῦ β ἐλθεῖν μὴ ἐξ λθ ... is the report of Agatharchides (de Mari Rubro p 63 64, in Hudson, tom. i.) Diodorus Siculus (tom i l. iii c. 47 p. 215) and Strabo (l. xvi. p 1124 [p 778 ed Casaub]) But I much suspect that this is one of the popular tales, or extraordinary accidents which the credulity of travellers so often transforms into a fact a custom, and a law

33 Non gloriabantur antiquitus Arabes nisi gladio hospite, et loquentiâ (Sephadius apud Pocock, Specimen p 161 162) This gift of speech they shared only with the Persians and the sententious Arabs would probably have disdained the simple and sublime logic of Demosthenes.

34. I must remind the reader that D Arvieux D Herbelot and Niebuhr represent in the most lively colours the manners and government of the Arabs which are illustrated by many incidental passages in the Life of Mahomet.

35 Observe the first chapter of Job and the long wall of 1500 stadia which Sesostris built from Pelusium to Heliopolis (Diodor Sicul. tom. i. l i. [c. 57] p 67) Under the name of Hycsos the shepherd kings they had formerly subdued Egypt (Marsham Canon. Chron. p 98-163 etc.)

36 Or according to another account 1200 (D Herbelot Bibliothèque Orientale p 75) the two historians who wrote of the Ayam al Arab the battles of the Arabs, lived in the ninth and tenth century The famous war of Dahes and Gabrah was occasioned by two horses, lasted forty years and ended in a proverb (Pocock Specimen p 48)

37 The modern theory and practice of the Arabs in the revenge of murder are described by Niebuhr (Description p 26-31) The harsher features of antiquity may be traced in the Koran c. 2 p 20 c. 17 p. 230 with Sale's Observa tions

38 Procopius (de Bell Persic. l. i. c. 16) places the two holy months about the summer solstice. The Arabians consecrate four months of the year—the first seventh eleventh and twelfth and pretend that in a long series of ages the truce was infringed only four or six times (Sale s Preliminary Discourse p 147-150 and Notes on the ninth chapter of the Koran p 154, etc. Casiri, Biblioth. Hispano-Arabica tom ii p 20, 21)

39 Arrian in the second century remarks (in Periplo Maris Erythræi, p 12 [Hudson Geog M t. i.]) the partial or total difference of the dialects of the Arabs Their language and letters are copiously treated by Pocock (Specimen p 150-154) Casiri (Biblioth Hispano-Arabica tom. i p i 83 292 tom. ii p 25 etc.) and Niebuhr (Description de l Arabie p 72-86) I pass slightly I am not fond of repeating words like a parrot

40 A familiar tale in Voltaire's Zadig (le Chien et le Cheval) is related to prove the natural sagacity of the Arabs (D Herbelot Biblioth Orient p 120 121 Gagnier Vie de Mahomet, tom. i p 37-46) but D'Arvieux or rather La Roque (Voyage de Palestine p 92) denies the boasted superiority of the Bedoweens The one hundred and sixty nine sentences of Ali (translated by Ockley London 1718) afford a just and favourable specimen of Arabian wit

41 Pocock (Specimen p 158-161) and Casiri (Biblioth. Hispano-Arabica tom i. p 48 84 etc 119 tom. ii. p 17 etc) speak of the Arabian poets before Mohammed the seven poems of the Caaba have been published in English by Sir William Jones but his honourable mission to India has

in the time perhaps of Cyrus but I can hardly believe that any cannibals were left among the savages in the reign of Justinian (Procop de Bell Persic I 1 c 19 [t 1 p 100, ed Bonn])

10 See the Specimen Historiæ Arabum of Pocock p 2, 5 86, etc The journey of M d Arvieux, in 1664 to the camp of the emir of Mount Carmel (Voyage de la Palestine Amsterdam, 1718) exhibits a pleasing and original picture of the life of the Bedoweens which may be illustrated from Niebuhr (Description de l Arabie p 327–344), and Volney (tom 1 p 343–385) the last and most judicious of our Syrian travellers

11 Read (it is no unpleasing task) the incomparable articles of the Horse and the Camel in the Natural History of M de Buffon

12 For the Arabian horses see D Arvieux (p 159–173) and Niebuhr (p 142–144) At the end of the thirteenth century the horses of Neged were esteemed sure footed those of Yemen strong and serviceable those of Hejaz most noble The horses of Europe the tenth and last class, were generally despised as having too much body and too little spirit (D Herbelot Biblioth Orient p 339) their strength was requisite to bear the weight of the knight and his armour

13 Qui carnibus camelorum vesci solent odii tenaces sunt was the opinion of an Arabian physician (Pocock Specimen p 88) Mohammed himself who was fond of milk prefers the cow and does not even mention the camel but the diet of Mecca and Medina was already more luxurious (Gagnier Vie de Mahomet tom iii p 404)

14 Yet Marcian of Heraclea (in Periplo p 16 in tom 1 Hudson Minor Geograph) reckons one hundred and sixty four towns in Arabia Felix The size of the towns might be small the faith of the writer might be large

15 It is compared by Abulfeda (in Hudson tom iii p 54) to Damascus and is still the residence of the Imam of Yemen (Voyages de Niebuhr, tom 1 p 331–342) Saana is twenty four parasangs from Dafar (Abulfeda p 51) and sixty eight from Aden (p 53)

16 Pocock Specimen p 57 Geograph Nubiensis, p 52 Mariaba or Merab six miles in circumference was destroyed by the legions of Augustus (Plin Hist Nat vi 32) and had not revived in the fourteenth century (Abulfed Descript Arab p 58)

17 The name of city Medina was appropriated κατ' ἐξοχὴν to Yatreb (the Iatrippa of the Greeks), the seat of the prophet The distances from Medina are reckoned by Abulfeda in stations or days journey of a caravan (p 15) to Bahrein fifteen to Bassora eighteen to Cufah twenty to Damascus or Palestine twenty to Cairo twenty five to Mecca ten from Mecca to Saana (p 52) or Aden thirty to Cairo thirty one days or 412 hours (Shaw s Travels p 477) which according to the estimate of D Anville (Mesures Itinéraires p 99) allows about twenty five English miles for a day s journey From the land of frankincense (Hadramaut, in Yemen, between Aden and Cape Fartasch) to Gaza in Syria Pliny (Hist Nat xii 32) computes sixty five mansions of camels These measures may assist fancy and elucidate facts

18 Our notions of Mecca must be drawn from the Arabians (D Herbelot Bibliothèque Orientale p 368–371 Pocock Specimen p 125–128 Abulfeda, p 11–40) As no unbeliever is permitted to enter the city, our travellers are silent and the short hints of Thevenot (Voyages du Levant part 1 490) are taken from the suspicious mouth of an African renagado Some Persians counted 6000 houses (Chardin tom iv p 167)

20 Mirum dictû ex innumeris populis pars æqua in commerciis aut in latrociniis degit (Plin Hist Nat vi 32) See Sale s Koran, Sûra cvi p. 503 Pocock Specimen p 2 D Herbelot, Biblioth Orient p 361 Prideaux s Life of Mahomet p 5 Gagnier, Vie de Mahomet tom 1 p 72, 120, 126, etc

21 A nameless doctor (Universal Hist vol xx octavo edition) has formerly demonstrated the truth of Christianity by the independence of the Arabs. A critic besides the exceptions of fact might dispute the meaning of the text (Gen xvi 12) the extent of the application and the foundation of the pedigree

22 It was subdued, A D 1173 by a brother of the great Saladin who founded a dynasty of Curds or Ayoubites (Guignes Hist des Huns, tom 1 p 425 D Herbelot p 477)

23 By the lieutenant of Soliman I (A D 1538) and Selim II (1568) See Cantemir s Hist of the Othman Empire p 201 221 The pasha who resided at Saana commanded twenty-one beys but no revenue was ever remitted to the Porte (Marsigli Stato Militare dell Imperio Ottomanno p. 124) and the Turks were expelled about the year 1630 (Niebuhr p 167 168)

24 Of the Roman province under the name of Arabia and the third Palestine the principal cities were Bostra and Petra which dated their era from the year 105 when they were subdued by Palma, a lieutenant of Trajan (Dion Cassius l lxviii [c. 14]) Petra was the capital of the Nabathæans, whose name is derived from the eldest of the sons of Ismael (Gen xxv 12 etc with the Commentaries of Jerom Le Clerc and Calmet) Justinian relinquished a palm country of ten days journey to the south of Ælah (Procop de Bell Persic. l. i. c. 19 [t 1 p 101 ed Bonn]) and the Romans maintained a centurion and a custom house (Arrian in Periplo Maris Erythræi p 11 in Hudson, tom 1) at a place (λευκὴ κώμη Pagus Albus Hawara) in the territory of Medina (D Anville Mémoire sur l Egypte p 243) These real possessions and some naval inroads of Trajan (Peripl. p 14, 15) are curiosity and the last of these writers confounds Sabianism with the primitive religion of the Arabs

58 D Anville (l Euphrate et le Tigre, p. 130–142) will fix the position of these ambiguous Christians Assemannus (Biblioth Oriental. tom. iv p 607–614) may explain their tenets But it is a slippery task to ascertain the creed of an ignorant people, afraid and ashamed to disclose their secret traditions.

59 The Magi were fixed in the province of Bahrein (Gagnier Vie de Mahomet, tom. iii p 114) and mingled with the old Arabians (Pocock, Specimen, p. 146–150)

60 The state of the Jews and Christians in Arabia is described by Pocock from Sharestani etc. (Specimen p 60, 134, etc.) Hottinger (Hist Orient. p. 212–238) D Herbelot (Biblioth. Orient 474 476) Basnage (Hist des Juifs tom vii. p , tom viii. p 280) and Sale (Preliminary Discourse, p 22 etc 33 etc.)

61 In their offerings it was a maxim to defraud God for the profit of the idol—not a more potent but a more irritable patron (Pocock Specimen p. 108 109)

62 Our versions now extant whether Jewish or Christian, appear more recent than the Koran but the existence of a prior translation may be fairly inferred—1 From the perpetual practice of the synagogue of expounding the Hebrew lesson by a paraphrase in the vulgar tongue of the country 2 From the analogy of the Armenian Persian, Æthiopic versions expressly quoted by the fathers of the fifth century who assert that the Scriptures were translated into all the barbaric languages (Walton Prolegomena ad Biblia Polyglot, p 34, 93–97 Simon Hist Critique du V et du N Testament tom i. p 180 181 282–286, 293 305 306 tom iv p 206)

63 In eo conveniunt omnes ut plebeio vilique genere ortum, etc (Hottinger Hist Orient p 136) Yet Theophanes the most ancient of the Greeks, and the father of many a lie confesses that Mohammed was of the race of Ismael ἐκ μιᾶς γενικωτάτης φυλῆς (Chronograph p 277 [ed Par tom. i. p 512 ed. Bonn])

64 Abulfeda (in Vit Mohammed c 1 2) and Gagnier (Vie de Mahomet p 25–97) describe the popular and approved genealogy of the prophet. At Mecca, I would not dispute its authenticity at Lausanne, I will venture to observe—1 That from Ismael to Mohammed a period of 2500 years, they reckon thirty instead of seventy five, generations. 2 That the modern Bedoweens are ignorant of their history and careless of their pedigree (Voyage de D Arvieux p 100 103)

65 The seed of this history or fable is contained in the cv chapter of the Koran and Gagnier (in Præfat. ad Vit Moham. p 18 etc) has translated the historical narrative of Abulfeda, which may be illustrated from D Herbelot (Biblioth. Orientale, p 12) and Pocock (Specimen, p 64) Prideaux (Life of Mahomet p 48) calls it a lie of the coinage of Mohammed but Sale (Koran p. 501–503) who is half a Musulman attacks the inconsistent faith of the Doctor for believing the miracles of the Delphic Apollo Maracci (Alcoran, tom i. part ii. p 14 tom. ii. p 823) ascribes the miracle to the devil and extorts from the Mohammedans the confession that God would not have defended against the Christians the idols of the Caaba.

66 The safest eras of Abulfeda (in Vit. c. i. p 2) of Alexander or the Greeks 882 of Bocht Naser or Nabonassar 1316 equally lead us to the year 569. The old Arabian calendar is too dark and uncertain to support the Benedictines (Art de vérifier les Dates p 15) who from the day of the month and week deduce a new mode of calculation and remove the birth of Mohammed to the year of Christ 570, the 10th of November Yet this date would agree with the year 882 of the Greeks which is assigned by Elmacin (Hist Saracen. p 5) and Abulpharagius (Dynast. p 101 and Errata Pocock s version) While we refine our chronology it is possible that the illiterate prophet was ignorant of his own age.

67 [Mohammed s father died two months before his birth]

68 I copy the honourable testimony of Abu Taleb to his family and nephew Laus Deo qui nos a stirpe Abrahami et semine Ismaelis constituit et nobis regionem sacram dedit et nos judices hominibus statuit Porro Mohammed filius Abdollahi nepotis mei (nepos meus) quo cum [non] ex æquo librabitur e Koraishidis quispiam cui non præponderaturus est bonitate, et excellentiâ et intellectû et gloriâ et acumine etsi opum inops fuerit (et certe opes umbra transiens sunt et depositum quod reddi debet) desiderio Chadijæ filiæ Chowailedi tenetur et illa vicissim ipsius, quicquid autem dotis vice petieritis ego in me suscipiam (Pocock, Specimen e septimâ parte libri Ebn Hamduni [p 171])

69 The private life of Mohammed from his birth to his mission is preserved by Abulfeda (in Vit c 3–7) and the Arabian writers of genuine or apocryphal note, who are alleged by Hottinger (Hist. Orient. p 204–211) Maracci (tom i p 10–14) and Gagnier (Vie de Mahomet tom i p 97–134)

70 Abulfeda in Vit c. 65 66 Gagnier Vie de Mahomet tom iii. p 272–289 the best traditions of the person and conversation of the prophet are derived from Ayesha Ali and Abu Horaira (Gagnier tom ii p 267 Ockley s Hist of the Saracens vol. ii. p 149) surnamed the Father of a Cat who died in the year 59 of the Hegira

71 Those who believe that Mohammed could read or write are incapable of reading what is written with another pen, in the Suras or chapters of the Koran vii xxix. xcvi. These texts and the tradition of the Sonna are admitted, without doubt, by Abulfeda (in Vit c 7) Gagnier (Not. ad Abulfed. p 15) Pocock (Specimen p 151)

deprived us of his own notes far more interesting than the obscure and obsolete text

42 Sale's Preliminary Discourse p 29 30

43 D'Herbelot, Biblioth Orient p 458 Gagnier Vie de Mahomet tom iii p 118 Caab and Hesnus (Pocock, Specimen p 43 46 48) were likewise conspicuous for their liberality and the latter is elegantly praised by an Arabian poet 'Videbis eum cum accesseris exultantem ac si dares illi quod ab illo petis

44. Whatever can now be known of the idolatry of the ancient Arabians may be found in Pocock (Specimen, p 89–136 163 164) His profound erudition is more clearly and concisely interpreted by Sale (Preliminary Discourse, p 14–24) and Assemanni (Biblioth Orient tom iv p 580–590) has added some valuable remarks

45 Ἱερὸν ἁγιώτατον ἵδρυται τιμώμενον ὑπὸ πάντων Ἀράβων περιττότερον (Diodor Sicul tom i l iii [c 43] p 211) The character and position are so correctly apposite that I am surprised how this curious passage should have been read without notice or application Yet this famous temple had been overlooked by Agatharchides (de Mari Rubro p 58 in Hudson tom i), whom Diodorus copies in the rest of the description Was the Sicilian more knowing than the Egyptian? Or was the Caaba built between the years of Rome 650 and 746 the dates of their respective histories? (Dodwell in Dissert ad tom i Hudson p 72 Fabricius Biblioth Græc tom ii p 770)

46 Pocock Specimen, p 60 61 From the death of Mohammed we ascend to 68 from his birth to 129 years before the Christian era The veil or curtain which is now of silk and gold was no more than a piece of Egyptian linen (Abulfeda, in Vit Mohammed c 6 p 14 [ed Gagnier, Oxon 1723])

47 The original plan of the Caaba (which is servilely copied in Sale the Universal History, etc) was a Turkish draught which Reland (de Religione Mohammedicâ p 113–123) has corrected and explained from the best authorities For the description and legend of the Caaba consult Pocock (Specimen p 115–122) the Bibliothèque Orientale of D'Herbelot (Caaba Hagiar Zemzem etc) and Sale (Preliminary Discourse p 114–122)

48 Cosa [Kussai] the fifth ancestor of Mohammed must have usurped the Caaba A D 440 but the story is differently told by Jannabi (Gagnier, Vie de Mahomet tom i p 65–69) and by Abulfeda (in Vit Moham c 6 p 13)

49 In the second century, Maximus of Tyre attributes to the Arabs the worship of a stone—Ἀράβιοι σέβουσι μέν ὅντινα δὲ οὐκ οἶδα τὸ δὲ ἄγαλμα [ὃ] εἶδον λίθος ἦν τετράγωνος (Dissert viii tom i p 142, edit Reiske) and the reproach is furiously re-echoed by the Christians (Clemens Alex in Protreptico p 40 [ed Oxon 1715] Arnobius contra Gentes, l vi p 246 [t i p 196 ed Lugd B 1651]) Yet these stones were no other than the βαιτύλια of Syria and Greece so renowned in sacred and profane antiquity (Euseb Præp Evangel l i p 37 Marsham, Canon Chron p 54–56)

50 The two horrid subjects of Ἀνδροθυσία and Παιδοθυσία are accurately discussed by the learned Sir John Marsham (Canon Chron p 76–78, 301–304) Sanchoniatho derives the Phœnician sacrifices from the example of Chronus but we are ignorant whether Chronus lived before or after Abraham or indeed whether he lived at all

51 Κατ' ἔτος ἕκαστον παῖδα ἔθυον is the reproach of Porphyry but he likewise imputes to the Romans the same barbarous custom which A U C 657 had been finally abolished Dumætha Daumat al Gendal is noticed by Ptolemy (Tabul p 37 Arabia p 9–29) and Abulfeda (p 57) and may be found in D'Anville's maps, in the mid desert between Chaibar and Tadmor

52 Procopius (de Bell Persico l ii c 28), Evagrius (l vi c 21), and Pocock (Specimen p 72 86) attest the human sacrifices of the Arabs in the sixth century The danger and escape of Abdallah is a tradition rather than a fact (Gagnier, Vie de Mahomet tom. i p 82–84)

53 Suillis carnibus abstinent, says Solinus (Polyhistor c 33) who copies Pliny (l viii c 78) in the strange supposition that hogs cannot live in Arabia The Egyptians were actuated by a natural and superstitious horror for that unclean beast (Marsham Canon p 205) The old Arabians likewise practised post coitum the rite of ablution (Herodot. l i c 189) which is sanctified by the Mohammedan law (Reland p 75 etc Chardin or rather the Mollah of Shah Abbas, tom iv p 71, etc)

54. The Mohammedan doctors are not fond of the subject yet they hold circumcision necessary to salvation and even pretend that Mohammed was miraculously born without a foreskin (Pocock, Specimen p 319 320 Sale's Preliminary Discourse, p 106 107)

55 Diodorus Siculus (tom i l ii [c 29 sqq] p 142–145) has cast on their religion the curious but superficial glance of a Greek Their astronomy would be far more valuable they had looked through the telescope of reason since they could doubt whether the sun were in the number of the planets or of the fixed stars

56 Simplicius (who quotes Porphyry) de Cœlo l ii com xlvi p 123 lin 18 apud Marsham Canon Chron p 474 who doubts the fact because it is adverse to his systems The earliest date of the Chaldean observations is the year 2234 before Christ After the conquest of Babylon by Alexander they were communicated at the request of Aristotle to the astronomer Hipparchus. What a moment in the annals of science!

57 Pocock (Specimen p 138–146) Hottinger (Hist Orient p 162–203) Hyde (de Religione Vet Persarum p 124 128 etc) D'Herbelot (Sabi p 725 726) and Sale (Preliminary Discourse p 14, 15) rather excite than gratify our

Sonnites (Sale's Note and Maracci tom ii p 112) In the twelfth century the immaculate conception was condemned by St Bernard as a presumptuous novelty (Fra Paolo Istoria del Concilio di Trento l. ii)

89. See the Koran c. 3 v 53 and c. 4 v 156 of Maracci s edition Deus est præstantissimus dolose agentium (an odd praise) nec crucifixerunt eum sed objecta est eis similitudo an expression that may suit with the system of the Docetes but the commentators believe (Maracci, tom. ii. p 113 115 173 Sale p 42, 43 79) that another man, a friend or an enemy was crucified in the likeness of Jesus a fable which they had read in the gospel of St Barnabas and which had been started as early as the time of Irenæus by some Ebionite heretics (Beausobre Hist. du Manichéisme, tom. ii. p 25 Mosheim de Reb Christ. p 353)

90 This charge is obscurely urged in the Koran (c. 3, p. 45) but neither Mohammed nor his followers are sufficiently versed in languages and criticism to give any weight or colour to their suspicions. Yet the Arians and Nestorians could relate some stories and the illiterate prophet might listen to the bold assertions of the Manichæans. See Beausobre tom. i. p 291–305

91 Among the prophecies of the Old and New Testament which are perverted by the fraud or ignorance of the Musulmans they apply to the prophet the promise of the Paracl te or Comforter which had been already usurped by the Montanists and Manichæans (Beausobre Hist. Critique du Manichéisme tom i. p 263 etc) and the easy change of letters π ϵρικλυτὸς for παρά λη or affords the etymology of the name of Mohammed (Maracci, tom. i. part i. p 15–28)

94 Yet a sect of Arabians was persuaded that it might be equalled or surpassed by a human pen (Pocock, Specimen p 221 etc.) and Maracci (the polemic is too hard for the translator) derides the rhyming affectation of the most applauded passage (tom. i. part ii. p 69–75)

95 Colloquia (whether real or fabulous) in mediâ Arabiâ atque ab Arab bus habita (Lowth de Poesi Hebræorum Prælect xxxii xxxiii xxxiv with his German editor Michaelis, Epimetron iv) Yet Michaelis (p 671–673) has detected many Egyptian images the elephantiasis papyrus Nile, crocodile, etc The language is ambiguously styled Ar bico-Hebræa The resemblance of the s ter dialects was much more visible in their childhood than in their mature age (Michaelis p 682 Schultens in Præfat Job)

97 See more remarkably Koran c. 2 6 12 13, 17 Prideaux (Life of Mahomet, p 18 19) has confounded the impostor Maracci, with a more learned apparatus has shown that the passages which deny his miracles are clear and positive (Alcoran tom i part ii. p 7–12), and those which seem to assert them are ambiguous and insufficient (p 12–22)

98 See the Specimen Hist Arabum the text of Abulpharagius p 17 the notes of Pocock p 187–190 D Herbelot Bibliothèque Orientale p 76 77 Voyages de Chardin, tom iv p 200–203 Maracci (Alcoran tom. i. p 22–64) has most laboriously collected and confuted the miracles and prophecies of Mohammed which according to some writers amount to three thousand

99. The nocturnal journey is circumstan*tially* related by Abulfeda (in Vit Mohammed. c. 19 p 33) who wishes to think it a vision by Prideaux (p 31–40) who aggravates the absurdities and by Gagnier (tom. i. p 252–343) who declares from the zealous Al Jannabi that to deny this journey is to disbelieve the Koran Yet the Koran without naming either heaven or Jerusalem, or Mecca has only dropped a mysterious hint Laus illi qui transtulit servum suum ab oratorio Haram ad oratorium remotissimum (Koran c. 17 v 1 in Maracci tom ii. p 407 for Sale s version is more licentious) A slender basis for the aërial structure of tradition

100 In the prophetic style which uses the present or past for the future Mohammed had said Appropinquavit hora et scissa est luna (Koran c 54, v 1 in Maracci tom ii p 688) This figure of rhetoric has been converted into a fact which is said to be attested by the most respectable eye witnesses (Maracci tom ii p 690) The festival is still celebrated by the Persians (Chardin tom iv p 201) and the legend is tediously spun out by Gagnier (Vie de Mahomet tom i p 183–234) on the faith as it should seem of the credulous Al Jannabi. Yet a Mohammedan doctor has arraigned the credit of the principal witness (apud Pocock Specimen p 187) the best interpreters are content with the simple sense of the Koran (Al Beidawi apud Hottinger Hist. Orient l ii p 302) and the s lence of Abulfeda is worthy of a prince and a philosopher

101 Abulpharagius in Specimen Hist. Arab p 17 and his scepticism is justified in the notes of Pocock, p 190–194 from the purest authorities.

102 The most authentic account of these precepts pilgrimage prayer fasting alms and ablutions is extracted from the Persian and Arabian theologians by Maracci (Prodrom. part iv p 9–24) Reland (in his excellent treatise de Religione Mohammedicâ Utrecht, 1717 p 67–123) and Chardin (Voyages en Perse tom iv p 47–195) Maracci is a partial accuser but the jeweller Chardin had the eyes of a philosopher and Reland a judicious student had travelled over the East in his closet at Utrecht. The fourteenth letter

Reland (de Religione Mohammedicâ p 236), and Sale (Preliminary Discourse p 42) Mr White almost alone denies the ignorance to accuse the imposture of the prophet His arguments are far from satisfactory Two short trading journeys to the fairs of Syria were surely not sufficient to infuse a science so rare among the citizens of Mecca it was not in the cool deliberate act of a treaty that Mohammed would have dropped the mask nor can any conclusion be drawn from the words of disease and delirium The lettered youth before he aspired to the prophetic character must have often exercised in private life the arts of reading and writing and his first converts of his own family would have been the first to detect and upbraid his scandalous hypocrisy (White s Sermons p 203 204, Notes p xxxvi-xxxviii)

72 The Count de Boulainvilliers (Vie de Mahomet p 202-228) leads his Arabian pupil like the Telemachus of Fénelon or the Cyrus of Ramsay His journey to the court of Persia is probably a fiction nor can I trace the origin of his exclamation Les Grecs sont pourtant des hommes The two Syrian journeys are expressed by almost all the Arabian writers both Mohammedans and Christians (Gagnier, ad Abulfed p 10)

73 I am not at leisure to pursue the fables or conjectures which name the strangers accused or suspected by the infidels of Mecca (Koran c 16, p 223, c 35, p 297 with Sale s Remarks Prideaux s Life of Mahomet p 22-27 Gagnier Not ad Abulfed p 11 74 Maracci tom ii p 400) Even Prideaux has observed that the transaction must have been secret, and that the scene lay in the heart of Arabia

74 Abulfeda in Vit c 7 p 15 Gagnier tom i p 133 135 The situation of Mount Hera is remarked by Abulfeda (Geograph Arab p 4) Yet Mohammed had never read of the cave of Egeria ubi nocturnæ Numa constituebat amicæ of the Idæan mount where Minos conversed with Jove etc

75 Koran c 9, p 153 Al Beidawi and the other commentators quoted by Sale adhere to the charge but I do not understand that it is coloured by the most obscure or absurd tradition of the Talmudists

76 Hottinger Hist Orient p 225-228 The Collyridian heresy was carried from Thrace to Arabia by some women and the name was borrowed from the κόλλιρις or cake which they offered to the goddess This example that of Beryllus bishop of Bostra (Euseb Hist Eccles l vi c 33), and several others may excuse the reproach, Arabia hæresewn ferax

77 The three gods in the Koran (c 4 p 81 c. 5 p 92) are obviously directed against our Catholic mystery but the Arabic commentators understand them of the Father the Son and the Virgin Mary an heretical Trinity maintained as it is said by some barbarians at the Council of Nice (Eutych Annal. tom i p 440) But the existence of the Marianites is denied by the candid Beausobre (Hist de Manichéisme tom i. p 532) and he derives the mistake from the word Rouah the Holy Ghost which in some Oriental tongues is of the feminine gender and is figuratively styled the mother of Christ in the gospel of the Nazarenes.

78 This train of thought is philosophically exemplified in the character of Abraham who opposed in Chaldæa the first introduction of idolatry (Koran, c 6 p 106 D Herbelot Biblioth Orient. p 13)

79 See the Koran particularly the second (p. 30) the fifty seventh (p 437) the fifty eighth (p 441) chapters which proclaim the omnipotence of the Creator

80 The most orthodox creeds are translated by Pocock (Specimen, p 274 284-292) Ockley (Hist of the Saracens vol ii. p lxxxii-xcv), Reland (de Religion Moham l i p 7-13) and Chardin (Voyages en Perse tom iv p 4-28) The great truth that God is without similitude is foolishly criticised by Maracci (Alcoran tom i part iii p 87-94) because he made man after his own image

81 Reland, de Relig Moham l. i p 17-47 Sale s Preliminary Discourse p 73-76, Voyages de Chardin tom iv p 28-37 and 37-47 for the Persian addition Ali is the Vicar of God! Yet the precise number of prophets is not an article of faith

82 For the apocryphal books of Adam see Fabricius Codex Pseudepigraphus V T p 27-29, of Seth p 154-157 of Enoch p 160-219 But the book of Enoch is consecrated in some measure, by the quotation of the apostle St Jude and a long legendary fragment is alleged by Syncellus and Scaliger

83 The seven precepts of Noah are explained by Marsham (Canon Chronicus p 154-180) who adopts on this occasion the learning and credulity of Selden

84 The articles of Adam Noah Abraham Moses etc in the Bibliothèque of D Herbelot, are gaily bedecked with the fanciful legends of the Mohammedans who have built on the groundwork of Scripture and the Talmud

85 Koran c 7 p 128 etc c 10 p 173 etc D Herbelot p 647 etc

86 Koran c 3 p 40 c 4 p 80 D Herbelot, p 399 etc

87 See the gospel of St Thomas or of the Infancy in the Codex Apocryphus N T of Fabricius who collects the various testimonies concerning it (p 128-158) It was published in Greek by Cotelier and in Arabic by Sike who thinks our present copy more recent than Mohammed Yet his quotations agree with the original about the speech of Christ in his cradle his living birds of clay etc (Sike c. i p 168 169 c 36 p 198 199, c 46 p 206 Cotelier c 2 p 160 161)

88 It is darkly hinted in the Koran (c 3 p 39), and more clearly explained by the tradition of the

meration are strong and numerous c 2 v 257, c. 16 120, c. 17 54, c. 45 15 c 50 39 c 88 21 etc. with the notes of Maracci and Sale This character alone may generally decide the doubts of the learned, whether a chapter was revealed at Mecca or Medina

116 See the Koran (passim and especially c. 7 p. 123 124, etc), and the tradition of the Arabs (Pocock Specimen p 35-37) The caverns of the tribe of Thamud, fit for men of the ordinary stature, were shown in the midway between Medina and Damascus (Abulfed Arabiæ Descript p. 43 44) and may be probably ascribed to the Troglodytes of the primitive world (Michaelis ad Lowth de Poesi Hebræor p 131-134 Recherches sur les Egyptiens tom ii, p 48 etc)

117 In the time of Job the crime of impiety was punished by the Arabian magistrate (c. 31 v 26 27 28) I blush for a respectable prelate (de Poesi Hebræorum, p 650 651 ed t Michaelis and a letter of a late professor in the university of Oxford p 15-53) who justifies and applauds this patriarchal inquisition.

118. D Herbelot Biblioth. Orient. p 445 He quotes a particular history of the flight of Mohammed.

119. The Hegira was instituted by Omar the second caliph in imitation of the era of the martyrs of the Christians (D Herbelot p 444) and properly commenced sixty-eight days before the flight of Mohammed with the first of Moharren or first day of that Arabian year which coincides with Friday July 16th A.D 622 (Abulfeda Vit. Moham. c. 22 23 p 45 50 and Greaves s edition of Ullug Beg's Epochæ Arabum etc c. 1 p 8 10, etc.)

120 Mohammed s life, from his mission to the Hegira, may be found in Abulfeda (p 14-45) and Gagnier (tom. i p 134-251 342-383) The legend from p. 187-234 is vouched by Al Jannabi and disdained by Abulfeda

121 The triple inauguration of Mohammed is described by Abulfeda (p 30 33 40 86) and Gagnier (tom. i. p 342 etc 349 etc tom. ii. p 23 etc)

122 Prideaux (Life of Mahomet p 44) reviles the wickedness of the impostor who despoiled two poor orphans the sons of a carpenter a reproach which he drew from the Disputatio contra Saracenos, composed in Arabic before the year 1130 but the honest Gagnier (ad Abulfed. p 53) has shown that they were deceived by the word Al Nagjar which signifies in this place not an obscure trade, but a noble tribe of Arabs The desolate state of the ground is described by Abulfeda and his worthy interpreter has proved from Al Bochari, the offer of a price from Al Jannabi, the fair purchase and from Ahmed Ben Joseph the payment of the money by the generous Abubeker On these grounds the prophet must be honourably acquitted.

123 Al Jannabi (apud Gagnier tom. ii. p 246 324) describes the seal and pulpit as two venerable relics of the apostle of God and the portrait of his court is taken from Abulfeda (c. 44 p 85)

124 The eighth and ninth chapters of the Koran are the loudest and most vehement and Maracci (Prodromus part iv p 59-64) has inveighed with more justice than discretion against the double dealing of the impostor

125. The tenth and twentieth chapters of Deuteronomy with the practical comments of Joshua, David etc. are read with more awe than satisfaction by the pious Christians of the present age But the bishops as well as the rabbis of former times have beat the drum-ecclesiastic with pleasure and success (Sale s Preliminary Discourse p 142 143)

126 Abulfeda in Vit. Moham p 156 The private arsenal of the apostle consisted of nine swords three lances seven pikes or half pikes, a quiver and three bows seven cuirasses three shields and two helmets (Gagnier tom iii. p 328-334) with a large white standard a black banner (p 335) twenty horses (p 322) etc. Two of his martial sayings are recorded by tradition (Gagnier tom. ii. p 88 337)

127 The whole subject de jure belli Mohammedanorum is exhausted in a separate dissertation by the learned Reland (Dissertationes Miscellaneæ tom iii. Dissertat. x p 3-53)

128. The doctrine of absolute predestination on which few religions can reproach each other is sternly exposed in the Koran (c. 3 p 52 53 c 4 p 70 etc with the notes of Sale and c. 17 p 413 with those of Maracci) Reland (de Relig Moham p 61-64) and Sale (Prelim. Discourse p 103) represent the opinions of the doctors and our modern travellers the confidence, the fading confidence of the Turks

129 Al Jannabi (apud Gagnier tom. ii p 9) allows him seventy or eighty horse and on two other occasions prior to the battle of Ohud he enlists a body of thirty (p 10) and of 500 (p 66) troopers Yet the Musulmans in the field of Ohud had no more than two horses, according to the better sense of Abulfeda (in Vit Mohamm c. 31 p 65) In the Stony province the camels were numerous but the horse appears to have been less common than in the Happy or the Desert Arabia

130 Bedder Houneene twenty miles from Medina and forty from Mecca is on the high road of the caravan of Egypt and the pilgrims annually commemorate the prophet s victory by illuminations rockets etc Shaw's Travels p 477

of Tournefort (Voyage du Levant tom II p 325–360 in octavo) describes what he had seen of the religion of the Turks

103 Mohammed (Sale's Koran c 9 p 153) reproaches the Christians with taking their priests and monks for their lords, besides God Yet Maracci (Prodromus part III p 69 70) excuses the worship especially of the pope, and quotes from the Koran itself the case of Eblis or Satan who was cast from heaven for refusing to adore Adam

104 Koran c 5 p 94 and Sale's note which refers to the authority of Jallaloddin and Al Beidawi D Herbelot declares the Mohammed condemned la vie religieuse and that the first swarms of fakirs, dervises etc did not appear till after the year 300 of the Hegira (Biblioth Orient p 292, 718)

105 See the double prohibition (Koran, c 2 p 25 c 5 p 94) the one in the style of a legislator, the other in that of a fanatic. The public and private motives of Mohammed are investigated by Prideaux (Life of Mahomet, p 62 64) and Sale (Preliminary Discourse p 124)

106 The jealousy of Maracci (Prodromus part IV p 33) prompts him to enumerate the more liberal alms of the Catholics of Rome Fifteen great hospitals are open to many thousand patients and pilgrims fifteen hundred maidens are annually portioned fifty six charity schools are founded for both sexes one hundred and twenty confraternities relieve the wants of their brethren etc The benevolence of London is still more extensive but I am afraid that much more is to be ascribed to the humanity than to the religion of the people

107 See Herodotus (l II c 123) and our learned countryman Sir John Marsham (Canon Chronicus p 46) The Ἄδης of the same writer (p 254–274) is an elaborate sketch of the infernal regions as they were painted by the fancy of the Egyptians and Greeks of the poets and philosophers of antiquity

108 The Koran (c. 2 p 259 etc of Sale p 32 of Maracci p 97) relates an ingenious miracle, which satisfied the curiosity and confirmed the faith of Abraham

109 The candid Reland has demonstrated that Mohammed damns all unbelievers (de Religione Moham p 128–142) that devils will not be finally saved (p 196–199) that paradise will not solely consist of corporeal delights (p 199–205) and that women's souls are immortal (p 205–209)

110 Al Beidawi apud Sale Koran c 9 p 164. The refusal to pray for an unbelieving kindred is justified according to Mohammed by the duty of a prophet, and the example of Abraham who reprobated his own father as an enemy of God Yet Abraham (he adds c. 9 v 116 Maracci tom. II p 317) fuit sane pius mitis

111 For the day of judgment hell paradise, etc., consult the Koran (c. 2 v 25 c. 56, 78 etc), with Maracci's virulent but learned refutation (in his notes and in the Prodromus part IV p 78, 120 122 etc) D Herbelot (Bibliothèque Orientale p 368 375) Reland (p 47–61) and Sale (p. 76–103) The original ideas of the Magi are darkly and doubtfully explored by their apologist Dr Hyde (Hist Religionis Persarum, c. 33 p 402–412 Oxon 1760) In the article of Mohammed, Bayle has shown how indifferently wit and philosophy supply the absence of genuine information.

112 Before I enter on the history of the prophet, it is incumbent on me to produce my evidence. The Latin French and English versions of the Koran are preceded by historical discourses and the three translators Maracci (tom I p 10–32) Savary (tom I p 1–248), and Sale (Preliminary Discourse p 33–56) had accurately studied the language and character of their author Two professed Lives of Mahomet have been composed by Dr Prideaux (Life of Mahomet, seventh edition, London 1718 in octavo) and the Count de Boulainvilliers (Vie de Mahomet Londres 1730, in octavo) but the adverse wish of finding an impostor or a hero has too often corrupted the learning of the Doctor and the ingenuity of the Count. The article in D Herbelot (Biblioth Orient p. 598–603) is chiefly drawn from Novairi and Mirkond but the best and most authentic of our guides is M. Gagnier a Frenchman by birth and professor at Oxford of the Oriental tongues. In two elaborate works (Ismael Abulfeda de Vita et Rebus gestis Mohammedis etc. Latine vertit, Præfatione et Notis illustravit Johannes Gagnier Oxon 1723 in folio La Vie de Mahomet traduite et compilée de l Alcoran des Traditions Authentiques de la Sonna et des meilleurs Auteurs Arabes, Amsterdam 1748 3 vols in 12mo) he has interpreted illustrated and supplied the Arabic text of Abulfeda and Al Jannabi the first an enlightened prince who reigned at Hamah in Syria A.D. 1310–1332 (see Gagnier Præfat ad Abulfed) the second a credulous doctor who visited Mecca A.D. 1556 (D Herbelot p 397 Gagnier tom III p. 209 210) These are my general vouchers and the inquisitive reader may follow the order of time and the division of chapters Yet I must observe that both Abulfeda and Al Jannabi are modern historians and that they cannot appeal to any writers of the first century of the Hegira

113 After the Greeks Prideaux (p 8) discloses the secret doubts of the wife of Mohammed As if he had been a privy counsellor of the prophet, Boulainvilliers (p 272 etc) unfolds the sublime and patriotic views of Cadijah and the first disciples

114 Vectrus portitor bajulus onus ferens and this plebeian name was transferred by an apt metaphor to the pillars of the state (Gagnier Not ad Abulfed p 19) I endeavour to preserve the Arabian idiom as far as I can feel it myself in a Latin or French translation

toleration are strong and numerous c 2 v 257 c. 16, 120, c. 17 54, c. 45 15 c 50 39 c. 88 21 etc. with the notes of Maracci and Sale This character alone may generally decide the doubts of the learned, whether a chapter was revealed at Mecca or Medina.

116. See the Koran (passim and especially c. 7 p 123 124, etc), and the tradition of the Arabs (Pocock Specimen p 35-37) The ca erns of the tribe of Thamud fit for men of the ordinary stature, were shown in the midway between Me dina and Damascus (Abulfed. 134 In the third chapter of the Koran (p 50–53, with Sale s notes) the prophet alleges some poor excuses for the defeat of Ohud

135 For the detail of the three Koreish wars of Beder of Ohud and of the ditch peruse Abulfeda (p 56–61, 64–69 73–77) Gagnier (tom ii p 23–45 70–96 120–139) with the proper articles of D Herbelot, and the abridgments of Elmacin (Hist Saracen p 6 7) and Abulpharagius (Dynast p 102)

136 The wars of Mohammed against the Jew ish tribes of Kainoka the Nadhirites Koraidha and Chaibar are related by Abulfeda (p 61 71 77, 87 etc) and Gagnier (tom ii p 61–65 107–112 139–148 268–294)

137 Abu Rafe the servant of Mohammed is said to affirm that he himself and seven other men afterwards tried without success to move the same gate from the ground (Abulfeda p 90) Abu Rafe was an eye witness but who will be witness for Abu Rafe?

138 The banishment of the Jews is attested by Elmacin (Hist Saracen p 9) and the great Al Zabari (Gagnier tom ii p 285) Yet Niebuhr (Description de l Arabie p 324) believes that the Jewish religion and Karaite sect are still professed by the tribe of Chaibar and that in the plunder of the caravans the disciples of Moses are the con federates of those of Mohammed

139 The successive steps of the reduction of Mecca are related by Abulfeda (p 84–87, 97–100 102–111) and Gagnier (tom ii p 209–245 309–322 tom iii p 1–58) Elmacin (Hist Saracen p 8 9 10) Abulpharagius (Dynast p 103)

140 After the conquest of Mecca the Moham med of Voltaire imagines and perpetrates the most horrid crimes The poet confesses that he is not supported by the truth of history and can only allege que celui qui fait la guerre à sa patrie au nom Dieu est capable de tout (Œuvres de Vol taire tom xv p 282) The maxim is neither char itable nor philosophic and some reverence is surely due to the fame of heroes and the religion of nations I am informed that a Turkish ambassador at Paris was much scandalised at the representa tion of this tragedy

141 The Mohammedan doctors still dispute whether Mecca was reduced by force or consent (Abulfeda p 107 et Gagnier ad locum) and this verbal controversy is of as much moment as our own about William the Conqueror

142 In excluding the Christians from the pen insula of Arabia, the province of Hejaz or the navigation of the Red Sea Chardin (Voyages en Perse, tom iv p 166) and Reland (Dissertat Miscell tom iii p 51) are more rigid than the Musulmans themselves The Christians are re ceived without scruple into the ports of Mocha and even of Gedda and it is only the city and precincts of Mecca that are inaccessible to the profane (Nie buhr Description de l Arabie p 308 309 Voyage en Arabie tom i p 205 248 etc)

143 Abulfeda p 112–115 Gagnier tom iii p. 67–88 D Herbelot MOHAMMED

144 The siege of Tayef division of the spoil etc are related by Abulfeda (p 117–123) and Gagnier (tom iii p 88–111) It is Al Jannabi who mentions the engines and engineers of the tribe of Daws The fertile spot of Tayef was supposed to be a piece of the land of Syria detached and dropped in the general deluge

145 The last conquests and pilgrimage of Mo hammed are contained in Abulfeda (p 121–133) Gagnier (tom iii p 119–219) Elmacin (p 10 11 [4to ed Lugd Bat 1625]), Abulpharagius (p 103) The ninth of the Hegira was styled the Year of Embassies (Gagnier Not ad Abulfed p 121)

147 For the battle of Muta, and its conse quences see Abulfeda (p 100–102) and Gagnier (tom ii p 327–343) Χάλεδος (says Theophanes) ὃν λέγουσι μάχαιραν τοῦ Θεοῦ [t i p 515 ed Bonn]

148 The expedition of Tabuc is recorded by our ordinary historians Abulfeda (Vit Moham p 123–127) and Gagnier (Vie de Mahomet tom iii p 147–163) but we have the advantage of ap pealing to the original evidence of the Koran (c 9 p 154 165), with Sale s learned and rational notes

149 The Diploma securitatis Ailensibus is attested by Ahmed Ben Joseph and the author Libri Splen dorum (Gagnier Not ad Abulfedam p 125) but Abulfeda himself as well as Elmacin (Hist Sara cen p 11), though he owns Mohammed s regard for the Christians (p 13) only mention peace and tribute In the year 1630 Sionita published at Paris the text and version of Mohammed s patent in favour of the Christians which was admitted and reprobated by the opposite taste of Salmasius and Grotius (Bayle MAHOMET Rem AA) Hot

nger doubts of its authenticity (Hist. Orient p) Renaudot urges the consent of the Moham medans (Hist. Patriarch Alex p 169) but Mosheim (Hist Eccles p. 244) shows the futility of their opinion, and inclines to believe it spurious. Yet Abulpharagius quotes the impostor's treaty with the Nestorian patriarch (Asseman. Biblioth. Orient. tom ii. p 418) but Abulpharagius was primate of the Jacobites

150. The epilepsy or falling sickness of Mohammed, is asserted by Theophanes Zonaras and the rest of the Greeks and is greedily swallowed by the gross bigotry of Hottinger (Hist. Orient. p. 10, 11) Prideaux (Life of Mahomet p 12) and Maracci (tom. ii Alcoran p 762 763) The titles (the wrapped up the covered) of two chapters of the Koran (73 74) can hardly be strained to such an interpretation the silence the ignorance of the Mohammedan commentators is more conclusive than the most peremptory denial and the charitable side is espoused by Ockley (Hist of the Saracens tom i. p 301) Gagnier (ad Abulfedam, p 9 Vie de Mahomet, tom. i. p 118) and Sale (Koran, p 469–474)

151 This poison (more ignominious since it was offered as a test of his prophetic knowledge) is frankly confessed by his zealous votaries Abulfeda (p 92) and Al Jannabi (apud Gagnier tom ii. p 286–288)

152 The Greeks and Latins have invented and propagated the vulgar and ridiculous story that Mohammed's iron tomb is suspended in the air at Mecca (μ ...) Laonicus Chalcocondyles de Rebus Turcicis l. iii. p 66 [ed. Par p 126 ed. Bonn.]) by the action of equal and potent loadstones (Dictionnaire de Bayle MAHOMET Rem. EE. FF) Without any philosophical inquiries it may suffice that 1 The prophet was not buried at Mecca and 2 That his tomb at Medina, which has been visited by millions is placed on the ground (Reland de Relig Moham. l. ii. c. 19 p 209–211 Gagnier Vie de Mahomet tom. iii. p 263–268)

153 Al Jannabi enumerates (Vie de Mahomet tom. iii. p 372–391) the multifarious duties of a pilgrim who visits the tombs of the prophet and his companions and the learned casuist decides that this act of devotion is nearest in obligation and merit to a divine precept The doctors are divided which of Mecca or Medina be the most excellent (p 391–394)

154 The last sickness death and burial of Mohammed are described by Abulfeda and Gagnier (Vit Moham p 133–142 Vie de Mahomet tom. iii. p. 220–27) The most private and interesting circumstances were originally received from Ayesha, Ali the sons of Abbas etc and as they dwelt at Medina and survived the prophet many years they might repeat the pious tale to a second or third generation of pilgrims

155 The Christians, rashly enough have assigned to Mohammed a tame pigeon that seemed to descend from heaven and whisper in his ear As this pretended miracle is urged by Grotius (de Veritate Religionis Christianæ) his Arabic translator the learned Pocock, inquired of him the names of his authors and Grotius confessed that it is unknown to the Mohammedans themselves. Lest it should provoke their indignation and laughter the pious lie is suppressed in the Arabic version but it has maintained an edifying place in the numerous editions of the Latin text (Pocock Specimen Hist Arabum p 186 187 Reland de Religion. Moham. l. ii. c. 39 p. 259–262)

156 Ἐμοὶ δὲ τοῦτό ἐστιν ἐκ παιδὸς ἀρξάμενον φωνή τις γιγνομένη ἣ ὅταν γένηται ἀεὶ ἀποτρέπει με τούτου ὃ ἂν μέλλω πράττειν προτρέπει δὲ οὔποτε (Plato Apology 31)

The familiar examples which Socrates urges in his Dialogue with Theages (Platon. Opera tom i. p 128 129 edit. Hen. Stephan) are beyond the reach of human foresight and the divine inspiration (the Δαιμόνιον) of the philosopher is clearly taught in the Memorabilia of Xenophon The ideas of the most rational Platonists are expressed by Cicero (de Divinat. i 54) and in the fourteenth and fifteenth Dissertations of Maximus of Tyre (p 153–172 edit Davis)

157 In some passage of his voluminous writings Voltaire compares the prophet in his old age to a fakir qui détache la chaine de son cou pour en donner sur les oreilles à ses confrères.

158 Gagnier relates with the same impartial pen this humane law of the prophet, and the murders of Caab and Sophian which he prompted and approved (Vie de Mahomet tom ii. p 69 97 208)

160 Incredibile est quo ardore apud eos in Venerem uterque solvitur sexus (Ammian. Marcellin l. xiv c. 4)

161 Sale (Preliminary Discourse p 133–137) has recapitulated the laws of marriage divorce etc and the curious reader of Selden's Uxor Hebraica will recognise many Jewish ordinances.

162 In a memorable case the Caliph Omar decided that all presumptive evidence was of no avail and that all the four witnesses must have actually seen stylum in pyxide (Abulfedæ Annales Moslemici p 71 vers Reiske [Lip 1754])

163 Sibi robur ad generationem quantum triginta viri habent inesse jactaret ita ut unicâ horâ

posset undecim fœminis satisfacere ut ex Arabum libris refert Stus Petrus Paschasius c. 2 (Maracci Prodromus Alcoran p iv p 55 See likewise Observations de Belon l iii c 10 fol 179 recto) Al Jannabi (Gagnier tom iii p 287) records his own testimony that he surpassed all men in conjugal vigour and Abulfeda mentions the exclamation of Ali, who washed his body after his death 'O propheta certa penis tuus cœlum versus erectus est, in Vit Mohammed p 140

164. I borrow the style of a father of the church ἐναθλεύων Ἡρακλῆς τρισκαιδέκατον ἆθλον (Greg Nazianzen Orat iii p 108 [ed Par 1609])

165 The common and most glorious legend includes in a single night, the fifty victories of Hercules over the virgin daughters of Thestius (Diodor Sicul tom 1 l iv [c 29] p 274 Pausanias l ix [c. 27, § 6] p 763 Statius Silv l 1 eleg iii v 42) But Athenæus allows seven nights (Deipnosophist l xiii [c 4] p 556) and Apollodorus fifty for this arduous achievement of Hercules who was then no more than eighteen years of age (Biblioth l ii c 4 [§ 10] p 111, cum notis Heyne, part 1 p 332)

166 Abulfeda in Vit Moham p 12, 13 16, 17, cum notis Gagnier

167 This outline of the Arabian history is drawn from the Bibliothèque Orientale of D Herbelot (under the names of Aboubecre Omar Othman, Ali etc), from the Annals of Abulfeda Abulpharagius and Elmacin (under the proper years of the Hegira) and especially from Ockley's History of the Saracens (vol 1 p 1 10, 115–122 229 249 363–372 378–391 and almost the whole of the second volume) Yet we should weigh with caution the traditions of the hostile sects a stream which becomes still more muddy as it flows farther from the source. Sir John Chardin has too faithfully copied the fables and errors of the modern Persians (Voyages tom ii p 235–250, etc.)

168 Ockley (at the end of his second volume) has given an English version of 169 sentences which he ascribes with some hesitation to Ali the son of Abu Taleb His preface is coloured by the enthusiasm of a translator yet these sentences delineate a characteristic though dark, picture of human life.

169 Ockley (Hist of the Saracens vol 1 p 5 6) from an Arabian MS represents Ayesha as adverse to the substitution of her father in the place of the apostle This fact so improbable in itself is unnoticed by Abulfeda Al Jannabi and Al Bochari, the last of whom quotes the tradition of Ayesha herself (Vit Mohammed p 136 Vie de Mahomet, tom iii p 236)

170 Particularly by his friend and cousin Abdallah the son of Abbas who died A D 687 with the title of grand doctor of the Moslems In Abulfeda [Ann Moslem.] he recapitulates the important occasions in which Ali had neglected his salutary advice (p 76, vers Reiske) and concludes (p 85), O princeps fidelium, absque controversia tu quidem vere [vir] fortis es, at inops boni consilii et rerum gerendarum parum callens.

171 I suspect that the two seniors (Abulpharagius, p 115 Ockley tom. 1 p 371) may signify not two actual counsellors but his two predecessors, Abubeker and Omar

172 The schism of the Persians is explained by all our travellers of the last century, especially in the second and fourth volumes of their master Chardin Niebuhr, though of inferior merit, has the advantage of writing so late as the year 1764 (Voyages en Arabie, etc. tom ii p 208–233) since the ineffectual attempt of Nadir Shah to change the religion of the nation (see his Persian History translated into French by Sir William Jones tom ii p 5 6 47, 48 144–155)

173 Omar is the name of the devil, his murderer is a saint When the Persians shoot with the bow they frequently cry May this arrow go to the heart of Omar! (Voyages de Chardin tom ii p 239 240 259 etc.)

174. This gradation of merit is distinctly marked in a creed illustrated by Reland (de Relig Mohamm l 1 p 37) and a Sonnite argument inserted by Ockley (Hist of the Saracens tom ii p 230) The practice of cursing the memory of Ali was abolished after forty years by the Ommiades themselves (D Herbelot p 690) and there are few among the Turks who presume to revile him as an infidel (Voyages de Chardin tom. iv p. 46)

175 The plain of Siffin is determined by D Anville (l Euphrate et le Tigre p 29) to be the Campus Barbaricus of Procopius

176 Abulfeda, a moderate Sonnite, relates the different opinions concerning the burial of Ali but adopts the sepulchre of Cufa hodie famâ numeroque religiose frequentantium celebratum. This number is reckoned by Niebuhr to amount annually to 2000 of the dead and 5000 of the living (tom ii p 208 209)

177 All the tyrants of Persia from Adhad el Dowlat (A D 977 D Herbelot, p 58 59 95) to Nadir Shah (A D 1743 Hist de Nadir Shah tom. ii. p 155) have enriched the tomb of Ali with the spoils of the people. The dome is copper with a bright and massy gilding which glitters to the sun at the distance of many a mile

178 The city of Meshed Ali five or six miles from the ruins of Cufa and one hundred and twenty to the south of Bagdad is of the size and form of the modern Jerusalem Meshed Hosein, larger and more populous is at the distance of thirty miles

179 I borrow on this occasion the strong sense and expression of Tacitus (Hist 1 4) Evulgato imperii arcano posse imperatorem [principem] alibi quam Romæ fieri

180 I have abridged the interesting narrative of Ockley (tom. ii p 170–231) It is long and minute but the pathetic almost always consists in the detail of little circumstances.

181 Niebuhr the Dane (Voyages en Arabie etc., tom. ii. p. 208, etc.) is perhaps the only European traveller who has dared to visit Meshed Ali and Meshed Hosein. The two sepulchres are in the hands of the Turks who tolerate and tax the devotion of the Persian heretics The festival of the death of Hosein is amply described by Sir John Chardin a traveller whom I have often praised.

182 The general article of Imam in D Herbelot s Bibliothèque, will indicate the succession, and the lives of the twelve are given under their respective names

183 The name of Antichrist may seem ridiculous, but the Mohammedans have liberally borrowed the fables of every religion (Sale s Preliminary Discourse p 80, 82) In the royal stable of Ispahan two horses were always kept saddled, one for the Mahadi himself the other for his lieutenant, Jesus the son of Mary

184 In the year of the Hegira 200 (A.D 815) see D'Herbelot p 546

185 D Herbelot, p 342 The enemies of the Fatimites disgraced them by a Jewish origin Yet they accurately deduced their genealogy from Jaafar the sixth Imam and the impartial Abulfeda allows (Annal. Moslem p 230) that they were owned by many qui absque controversiâ genuini sunt Alidarum homines propaginum suæ gentis exacte callentes He quotes some lines from the celebrated Scherif or Radhi Egone humilitatem induam in terris hostium? (I suspect him to be an Edrissite of Sicily) cum in Ægypto sit Chalifa de gente Ali, quocum ego communem habeo patrem et vindicem

186 The kings of Persia of the last dynasty are descended from Sheik Sefi a saint of the fourteenth century and through him from Moussa Cassem the son of Hosein the son of Ali (Olearius, p 957 Chardin tom iii. p 288) But I cannot trace the intermediate degrees in any genuine or fabulous pedigree. If they were truly Fatimites, they might draw their origin from the princes of Mazanderan who reigned in the ninth century (D Herbelot, p 96)

187 The present state of the family of Mohammed and Ali is most accurately described by Demetrius Cantemir (Hist of the Othman Empire, p 94) and Niebuhr (Description de l Arabie p 9-10 317 etc) It is much to be lamented that the Danish traveller was unable to purchase the chronicles of Arabia

188 The writers of the Modern Universal History (vols i. and ii) have compiled in 850 folio pages the life of Mohammed and the annals of the caliphs They enjoyed the advantage of reading and sometimes correcting the Arabic text yet notwithstanding their high sounding boasts I cannot find, after the conclusion of my work, that they have afforded me much (if any) additional information The dull mass is not quickened by a spark of philosophy or taste and the compilers indulge the criticism of acrimonious bigotry against Boulainvilliers, Sale Gagnier and all who have treated Mohammed with favour or even justice.

Chapter LI

1 See the description of the city and country of Al Yamanah in Abulfeda, Descript Arabiæ p 60, 61 In the thirteenth century there were some ruins and a few palms but in the present century the same ground is occupied by the visions and arms of a modern prophet whose tenets are imperfectly known (Niebuhr Description de l Arabie, p. 96-302)

2 Their first salutation may be transcribed but cannot be translated It was thus that Moseilama said or sung —

Surge tandem itaque strenue permolenda nam stratus tibi thorus est.

Aut in propatulo tentorio si velis aut in abditiore cubiculo si malis

Aut supinam te humi exporrectam fustigabo si velis, aut si malis manibus pedibusque nixam

Aut si velis ejus (Pri pi) gemino triente aut si malis totus veniam.

Imo totus venito O Apostole Dei, clamabat fœmina. Id ipsum, dicebat

Moseilama, mihi quoque suggessit Deus

10 For the seventh and eighth century we have scarcely any original evidence of the Byzantine historians, except the chronicles of Theophanes (Theophanis Confessoris Chronographia Gr et Lat cum notis Jacobi Goar Paris 1655 in folio), and the Abridgment of Nicephorus (Nicephori Patriarchæ C P Breviarium Historicum, Gr et Lat Paris, 1648, in folio), who both lived in the beginning of the ninth century (see Hanckius de Scriptor Byzant p 200–246) Their contemporary, Photius does not seem to be more opulent After praising the style of Nicephorus he adds Καὶ ὅλως πολλοὺς ἐστὶ τῶν πρὸ αὐτοῦ ἀποκρυπτόμενος τῇδε τῆς ἱστορίας τῇ συγγραφῇ and only complains of his extreme brevity (Phot Biblioth Cod lxvi p 100 [p 33 ed Bekk]) Some additions may be gleaned from the more recent histories of Cedrenus and Zonaras of the twelfth century

11 Tabari, or Al Tabari a native of Taborestan a famous Imam of Bagdad and the Livy of the Arabians finished his general history in the year of the Hegira 302 (A D 914) At the request of his friends he reduced a work of 30 000 sheets to a more reasonable size But his Arabic original is known only by the Persian and Turkish versions The Saracenic history of Ebn Amid or Elmacin is said to be an abridgment of the great Tabari (Ockley s Hist of the Saracens, vol ii preface, p xxxix and list of authors, D Herbelot, p 866 870 1014)

12 Besides the lists of authors framed by Prideaux (Life of Mahomet p 179–189) Ockley (at the end of his second volume) and Petit de la Croix (Hist de Gengiscan p 525–550) we find in the Bibliothèque Orientale Tarikh, a catalogue of two or three hundred histories or chronicles of the East of which not more than three or four are older than Tabari A lively sketch of Oriental literature is given by Reiske (in his Prodidagmata ad Hagji Chalifæ librum memorialem ad calcem Abulfedæ Tabulæ Syriæ Lipsiæ 1766) but his project and the French version of Petit de la Croix (Hist de Timur Bec tom i preface p xlv) have fallen to the ground

13 The particular historians and geographers will be occasionally introduced The four following titles represent the Annals which have guided me in this general narrative —1 Annales Eutychii Patriarchæ Alexandrini ab Eduardo Pocockio Oxon 1656 2 vols in 4to A pompous edition of an indifferent author translated by Pocock to gratify the presbyterian prejudices of his friend Selden 2 Historia Saracenica Georgii Elmacini operâ et studio Thomæ Erpenii in 4to Lugd Batavorum 1625 He is said to have hastily translated a corrupt MS and his version is often deficient in style and sense 3 Historia compendiosa Dynastiarum a Gregorio Abulpharagio, interprete Eduardo Pocockio in 4to Oxon 1663 More useful for the literary than the civil history of the East 4 Abulfedæ Annales Moslemici ad Ann. Hegiræ ccccvi a Jo Jac Reiske in 4to, Lipsiæ 1754 The best of our chronicles both for the original and version yet how far below the name of Abulfeda! We know that he wrote at Hamah in the fourteenth century The three former were Christians of the tenth twelfth and thirteenth centuries the two first natives of Egypt —a Melchite patriarch and a Jacobite scribe

14 M de Guignes (Hist des Huns, tom. i pref. p xix. xx) has characterised with truth and knowledge the two sorts of Arabian historians—the dry annalist and the tumid and flowery orator

15 Bibliotheque Orientale, par M D Herbelot in folio Paris, 1697 For the character of the respectable author consult his friend Thevenot (Voyages du Levant part i. chap 1) His work is an agreeable miscellany which must gratify every taste but I never can digest the alphabetical order and I find him more satisfactory in the Persian than the Arabic history The recent supplement from the papers of MM Visdelou and Galland (in folio La Haye 1779) is of a different cast a medley of tales proverbs and Chinese antiquities.

16 Pocock will explain the chronology (Specimen Hist Arabum p 66–74) and D Anville the geography (l'Euphrate et le Tigre, p 125) of the dynasty of the Almondars. The English scholar understood more Arabic than the mufti of Aleppo (Ockley vol. ii p 34) the French geographer is equally at home in every age and every climate of the world

17 Fecit et Chaled plurima in hoc anno prælia, in quibus vicerunt Muslimi et infideium immensâ multitudine occisâ spolia infinita et innumera sunt nacti (Hist Saracenica p 20) The Christian annalist slides into the national and compendious term of infidels and I often adopt (I hope without scandal) this characteristic mode of expression.

18 A cycle of 120 years at the end of which an intercalary month of 30 days supplied the use of our Bissextile and restored the integrity of the solar year In a great revolution of 1440 years this intercalation was successively removed from the first to the twelfth month but Hyde and Freret are involved in a profound controversy, whether the twelve or only eight of these changes were accomplished before the era of Yezdegerd which is unanimously fixed to the 16th of June A D 632 How laboriously does the curious spirit of Europe explore the darkest and most distant antiquities (Hyde de Religione Persarum c. 14–18 p. 181–211 Freret in the Mém. de l Académie des Inscriptions tom xvi p 233–267)!

19 Nine days after the death of Mahomet (7th June A D 632) we find the era of Yezdegerd (16th June A D 632) and his accession cannot be postponed beyond the end of the first year His predecessors could not therefore resist the arms of the caliph Omar and these unquestionable dates overthrow the thoughtless chronology of Abulpharagius. See Ockley's Hist of the Saracens, vol. i p. 130

20. Cadesia says the Nubian geographer (p 121) is, in margine solitudinis 61 leagues from Bagdad, and two stations from Cufa. Otter (Voyage, tom. i. p 163) reckons 15 leagues and observes that the place is supplied with dates and water

24. Mente vix potest numerove comprehendi quanta spolia nostris cesserint. Abulfeda p 69. Yet I still suspect that the extravagant numbers of Elmacin may be the error not of the text, but of the version. The best translators from the Greek, for instance I find to be very poor arithmeticians.

25. The camphire tree grows in China and Japan, but many hundredweight of those meaner sorts are exchanged for a single pound of the more precious gum of Borneo and Sumatra (Raynal Hist. Philosoph. tom. i. p 362–365 Dictionnaire d Hist. 30. It is in such a style of ignorance and wonder that the Athenian orator describes the Arctic conquests of Alexander who never advanced beyond th shores of the Caspian Αλεξανδρος ἔξω της ἄρ ου αι π οἰκουμενης ὀλιγ δ ιν πάσης μεθειστη ει Æschines contra Ctes phontem tom. iii p 554 edit Græc. O ator R iske This memorable cause was pleaded at Athens Olymp cxii. 3 (before Christ 330) in the autumn (Taylor præfat. p 370, etc.) about a year after the battle of Arbela and Alexander in the pursuit of Darius was marching towards Hyrcania and Bactriana.

31 We are indebted for this curious particular to the Dynasties of Abulpharagius, p 116 but it is needless to prove the identity of Estachar and Persepolis (D Herbelot p 327) and still more needless to copy the drawings and descriptions of Sir John Chardin or Corneille le Bruyn

38 I have endeavoured to harmonise the various narratives of Elmacin (Hist. Saracen p 37) Abulpharagius (Dynast p 116) Abulfeda (Annal. p 74, 79) and D Herbelot (p 485) The end of Yezdegerd was not only unfortunate but obscure.

39. The two daughters of Yezdegerd married Hassan the son of Ali, and Mohammed the son of Abubeker and the first of these was the father of a numerous progeny The daughter of Phirouz became the wife of the caliph Walid and their son Yezid derived his genuine or fabulous descent from the Chosroes of Persia the Cæsars of Rome, and the Chagans of the Turks or Avars (D Herbelot Biblioth Orientale p ,6 487)

40 It was valued at 2000 pieces of gold, and was the prize of Obeidollah, the son of Ziyad a name afterwards infamous by the murder of Hosein (Ockley s History of the Saracens vol. ii. p 142 143) His brother Salem was accompanied by his wife the first Arabian woman (A D 680) who passed the Oxus she borrowed or rather stole the crown and jewels of the princess of the Sogdians (p 231 232)

41 A part of Abulfeda s geography is translated by Greaves, inserted in Hudson s collection of the minor geographers (tom iii) and entitled Descriptio Chorasmiæ et Mawaralnahræ id est, regionum extra fluvium, Oxum p 80 The name of Transoxiana softer in sound equivalent in sense is aptly used by Petit de la Croix (Hist de Gengiscan etc) and some modern Orientalists but they are mistaken in ascribing it to the writers of antiquity

42 The conquests of Catibah are faintly marked by Elmacin (Hist Saracen p 84) D Herbelot (Biblioth Orient Catbah Samarcand Valid) and De Guignes (Hist des Huns tom i p 58, 59)

43 A curious description of Samarcand is inserted in the Bibliotheca Arabico Hispana tom i p 208 etc The librarian Casiri (tom ii 9) relates from credible testimony that paper was first imported from China to Samarcand A H 30 and invented, or rather introduced, at Mecca A H 88 The Escurial library contains paper MSS as old as the fourth or fifth century of the Hegira

44. A separate history of the conquest of Syria has been composed by Al Wakidi cadi of Bagdad who was born A D 748, and died A D 822 he likewise wrote the conquest of Egypt, of Diarbekir etc. Above the meagre and recent chronicles of the Arabians Al Wakidi has the double merit of antiquity and copiousness His tales and traditions afford an artless picture of the men and the times Yet his narrative is too often defective, trifling and improbable Till something better shall be found his learned and spirited interpreter (Ockley in his History of the Saracens vol i p 21–342) will not deserve the petulant animadversion of Reiske (Prodidagmata ad Hagji Chalifæ Tabulas p 236) I am sorry to think that the labours of Ockley were consummated in a jail (see his two prefaces to the first vol A D 1708, to the second 1718 with the list of authors at the end)

45 The instructions etc of the Syrian war are described by Al Wakidi and Ockley tom i p 22–27 etc In the sequel it is necessary to contract and needless to quote their circumstantial narrative My obligations to others shall be noticed

46 Notwithstanding this precept M Pauw (Recherches sur les Egyptiens tom ii p 192 edit Lausanne) represents the Bedoweens as the implacable enemies of the Christian monks For my own part I am more inclined to suspect the avarice of the Arabian robbers and the prejudices of the German philosopher

47 Even in the seventh century the monks were generally laymen they wore their hair long and dishevelled and shaved their heads when they were ordained priests The circular tonsure was sacred and mysterious it was the crown of thorns but it was likewise a royal diadem and every priest was a king etc (Thomassin Discipline de l Eglise tom i p 721–758 especially p 737 738)

48 Huic Arabia est conserta ex alio latere N bathæis contigua opima varietate commerciorum castrisque oppleta validis et castellis quæ ad rep lendos gentium vicinarum excursus solicitudo p vigil veterum per opportunos saltus erexit cautos Ammian Marcellin xiv 8 Reland P estin tom i p 85 86

49 With Gerasa and Philadelphia Ammian praises the fortifications of Bosra [murorum] firm tate cautissimas They deserved the same praise the time of Abulfeda (Tabul Syriæ, p 99), w describes this city the metropolis of Hawran (A ranitis), four days journey from Damascus. T Hebrew etymology I learn from Reland, Palest tom ii p 666

50 The apostle of a desert and an army w obliged to allow this ready succedaneum for wa (Koran c. iii p 66 c v p 83) but the Arabi and Persian casuists have embarrassed his fr permission with many niceties and distinctio (Reland de Relig Mohammed l. i p 82 8 Chardin Voyages en Perse tom. iv)

51 The bells rung! Ockley vol i p 38 Yet much doubt whether this expression can be jus fied by the text of Al Wakidi or the practice of t times Ad Græcos says the learned Ducan (Glossar med et infim Græcitat tom i p. 77 campanarum usus serius transit et etiamnum rar simus est The oldest example which he can find the Byzantine writers is of the year 1040 but t Venetians pretend that they introduced bells Constantinople in the ninth century

55 Voltaire who casts a keen and lively glanc

over the surface of history has been struck with the resemblance of the first Moslems and the heroes of the Iliad—the siege of Troy and that of Damascus (Hist Générale tom 1 p 348)

56. These words are a text of the Koran c. ix. 32 lu. 8 Like our fanatics of the last century the Moslems, on every familiar or important occasion spoke the language of their Scriptures—a style more natural in their mouths than the Hebrew idiom, transplanted into the climate and dialect of ...ain.

7 The name of Werdan is unknown to The ...anes and though it might belong to an Ar...ian chief has very little of a Greek aspect or ...nd. If the Byzantine historians have mangled ... Oriental names the Arabs in this instance, ...wise have taken ample revenge on their ene...s. In transposing the Greek character from ...ht to left, might they not produce from the ...ular appellation of Andrew something like the ...agram Werdan?

58. Vanity prompted the Arabs to believe that ...omas was the son in law of the emperor We ...ow the children of Heraclius by his two wives ...d his august daughter would not have married ... exile at Damascus (see Ducange Fam. Byzan ...n. p. 118 119) Had he been less religious I ...ight only suspect the legitimacy of the damsel.

59. Al Wakidi (Ockley p 101) says with ...oisoned arrows but this savage in ention is so ...repugnant to the practice of the Greeks and Ro...ans, that I must suspect on this occasion the malevolent credulity of the Saracens.

60. Abulfeda allows only seventy days for the siege of Damascus (Annal. Moslem. p 67 vers. Reiske) but Elmacin who mentions this opinion, prolongs the term to six months, and notices the use of balistæ by the Saracens (Hist. Saracen p 25, 32) E*ven this longer period is insufficient to fill* the interval between the battle of Aiznadin (July A.D 633) and the accession of Omar (24th July A.D 634) to whose reign the conquest of Damas*cus* is unanimously ascribed (Al Wakidi, apud Ockley vol. 1 p 115 Abulpharagius Dynast. p 112 vers. Pocock) Perhaps as in the Trojan war the operations were interrupted by excursions and detachments till the last seventy days of the siege

61 It appears from Abulfeda (p 125) and Elmacin (p 32) that this distinction of the two parts of Damascus was long remembered though not always respected by the Mohammedan sovereigns. See likewise Eut*ychius* (Annal tom ii. p 379 380, 383)

62 On the fate of these lovers whom he names Phocyas and Eudocia, Mr Hughes has built the Siege of Damascus one of our most popular tragedies, and which possesses the rare merit of blending nature and history the manners of the times and the feelings of the heart. The foolish delicacy of the players compelled him to soften the guilt of the hero and the despair of the heroine. Instead of a base renegado Phocyas serves the Arabs as an honourable ally instead of prompting their pursuit he flies to the succour of his countrymen and after killing Caled and Derar is himself mortally wounded and expires in the presence of Eudocia who professes her resolution to take the veil at Constantinople. A frigid catastrophe!

63 The towns of Gabala and Laodicea which the Arabs passed still exist in a state of decay (Maundrell p 11 12 Pocock, vol. ii p 13) Had not the Christians been overtaken they must have crossed the Orontes on some bridge in the sixteen miles between Antioch and the sea and might have rejoined the high road of Constantinople at Alexandria. *The Itineraries will represent the di*rections and distances (p 146 148 581 582 edit Wesseling)

64. Dair Abil Kodos After retrenching the last word, the epithet holy I discover the Abila of Lysanias between Damascus and Heliopolis the name (Abil signifies a vineyard) concurs with the situation to justify my conjecture (Reland Palestin. tom. i. p 317 tom. ii. p 525 527)

65. I am bolder than Mr Ockley (vol i. p 164) who dares not insert this figurative expression in the text, though he observes in a marginal note that the Arabians often borrow their similes from that useful and familiar animal. The reindeer may be equally famous in the songs of the Laplanders.

66 We heard the tecbir so the Arabs call
Their shout of onset, when with loud appeal
They challenge heaven, as if demanding conquest.

This word so formidable in their holy wars is a verb active (says Ockley in his index) of the second conjugation from Kabbara which signifies saying Alla Acbar God is most mighty 67 In the Geography of Abulfeda the descrip*tion of Syria* his native country is the most interesting and authentic portion It was published in Arabic and Latin Lipsiæ 1766 in quarto with the learned notes of Kochler and Reiske and some extracts of geography and natural history from Ibn Ol Wardii. Among the modern travels Pocock s Description of the East (of Syria and Mesopotamia vol. ii p 88–209) is a wo k of superior learning and dignity but the author too often confounds what he had seen and what he had read.

68 The praises of Dionysius are just and lively Καὶ η μεν (Syria) πολλ ε αι ὀλβιοι ἀνδρες ἐχουσιν (in Periegesi v 902 in tom. iv Geograph Minor Hudson) In another place he styles the country πολυπ λιν αιαν (v 898) He proceeds to say

v 921 922

This poetical geographer lived in the age of Augustus and his description of the world is illustrated by the Greek commentary of Eustathius who paid the same compliment to Homer and

Dionysius (Fabric Biblioth Græc l iv c 2 tom iii p 21, etc)

69 The topography of the Libanus and Anti Libanus is excellently described by the learning and sense of Reland (Palestin tom i p 311-326)

70 ——Emesæ fastigia celsa renident
Nam diffusa solo latus explicat ac subit auras
Turribus in cœlum nitentibus incola claris
Cor studiis acuit
Denique flammicomo devoti pectora soli
Vitam agitant —Libanus frondosa cacumina turget
Et tamen his celsi certant fastigia templi

These verses of the Latin version of Rufus Avienus [vv 1085 seq] are wanting in the Greek original of Dionysius and since they are likewise unnoticed by Eustathius I must, with Fabricius (Biblioth Latin tom iii p 153 edit Ernesti), and against Salmasius (ad Vopiscum p 366 367 in Hist August) ascribe them to the fancy rather than the MSS of Avienus

71 I am much better satisfied with Maundrell s slight octavo (Journey p 134-139) than with the pompous folio of Dr Pocock (Description of the East, vol ii p 106-113) but every preceding account is eclipsed by the magnificent description and drawings of MM Dawkins and Wood who have transported into England the ruins of Palmyra and Baalbec

72 The Orientals explain the prodigy by a never failing expedient The edifices of Baalbec were constructed by the fairies or the genii (Hist de Timour Bec tom iii l v c 23 p 311 312 Voyage d Otter tom i p 83) With less absurdity but with equal ignorance Abulfeda and Ibn Chaukel ascribe them to the Sabæans or Aadites Non sunt in omni Syria ædificia magnificentiora his (Tabula Syriæ, p 103)

73 I have read somewhere in Tacitus or Grotius Subjectos habent tanquam suos viles tanquam alienos Some Greek officers ravished the wife and murdered the child of their Syrian landlord and Manuel smiled at his undutiful complaint

74 See Reland Palestin tom i p 272 283 tom ii p 773 775 This learned professor was equal to the task of describing the Holy Land since he was alike conversant with Greek and Latin with Hebrew and Arabian literature The Yermuk or Hieromax is noticed by Cellarius (Geograph Antiq tom ii p 392) and D Anville (Géographie Ancienne tom ii p 185) The Arabs and even Abulfeda himself do not seem to recognise the scene of their victory

75 These women were of the tribe of the Hamyarites who derived their origin from the ancient Amalekites Their females were accustomed to ride on horseback and to fight like the Amazons of old (Ockley vol i p 67)

76 We killed of them says Abu Obeidah to the caliph one hundred and fifty thousand and made prisoners of forty thousand (Ockley vol i p 241) As I cannot doubt his veracity, nor believe his computation, I must suspect that the Arabic historians indulged themselves in the practice of composing speeches and letters for their heroes

77 After deploring the sins of the Christians, Theophanes adds (Chronograph p 276 [tom i p. 510, ed Bonn]) ἀνέστη ὁ ἐρημικος [ἐρημικώτατος] Αμαλὴκ τύπτων ἡμας τὸν λαὸν τοῦ Χριστου καὶ γίνεται πρωτη φορα πτωσις του Ρωμαικου στρατου ἡ κατὰ τὸ Γαβιθὰν [Γαβιθα] λέγω (does he mean Aiznadin?) καὶ Ιερμουχὰν καὶ τὴν ἄθεσμον αἱματοχυσιαν His account is brief and obscure but he accuses the numbers of the enemy the adverse wind and the cloud of dust μὴ δυνηθέντες (the Romans) ἀντιπροσωπησαι [ἀντωπησαι] ἐχθροις διὰ τὸν κονιορτον ἡττωνται καὶ ἑαυτοις βάλλοντες εἰς τὰς στενόδους του Ιερμοχθου ποταμου ἐκει απωλοντο ἄρδην (Chronograph p 280 [t i p 518 ed Bonn])

78 See Abulfeda (Annal Moslem p 70 71), who transcribes the poetical complaint of Jabalah himself and some panegyrical strains of an Arabian poet to whom the chief of Gassan sent from Constantinople a gift of five hundred pieces of gold by the hands of the ambassador of Omar

79 In the name of the city the profane prevailed over the sacred Jerusalem was known to the devout Christians (Euseb de Martyr Palest c xi) but the legal and popular appellation of Ælia (the colony of Ælius Hadrianus) has passed from the Romans to the Arabs (Reland Palestin tom. i p 207 tom ii p 835 D Herbelot Bibliothèque Orientale Cods p 269 Ilia p 420) The epithet of Al Cods the Holy is used as the proper name of Jerusalem

80 The singular journey and equipage of Omar are described (besides Ockley vol i p 250) by Murtadi (Merveilles de l Egypte, p 200-02)

81 The Arabs boast of an old prophecy preserved at Jerusalem and describing the name, the religion and the person of Omar the future conqueror By such arts the Jews are said to have soothed the pride of their foreign masters Cyrus and Alexander (Joseph Ant Jud l xi c i [§ 1, 2] 8 [§ 5] p 547 579-582)

82 Τὸ βδέλυγμα της ἐρημωσεως τὸ ῥηθὲν διὰ Δανιὴλ του προφητου ἑστως ἐν τόπῳ ἁγίῳ Theophan Chronograph p 281 [tom i p 520 ed Bonn] This prediction which had already served for Antiochus and the Romans was again refitted for the present occasion by the economy of Sophronius one of the deepest theologians of the Monothelite controversy

83 According to the accurate survey of D Anville (Dissertation sur l ancienne Jerusalem p 42-54) the mosch of Omar enlarged and embellished by succeeding caliphs covered the ground of the ancient temple (παλαιου του μεγάλου ναου δάπεδον says Phocas) a length of 215 a breadth of 172 toises The Nubian geographer declares that this magnificent structure was second only in size and beauty to the great mosch of Cordova (p 113) whose present state Mr Swinburne has so elegantly represented (Travels into Spain p 296–302)

84 Of the many Arabic tarikhs or chronicles of Jerusalem (D Herbelot p 867) Ockley found one among the Pocock MSS of Oxford (vol. i. p 257) which he has used to supply the defective narrative of Al Wakidi.

85 The Persian historian of Timur (tom. iii. l. v c. 21 p 300) describes the castle of Aleppo as founded on a rock one hundred cubits in height a proof, says the French translator that he had never visited the place. It is now in the midst of the city of no strength with a single gate the circuit is about 500 or 600 paces and the ditch half full of stagnant water (Voyages de Tavernier tom. i. p 149 Pocock vol. ii. part i p 150) The fortresses of the East are contemptible to a European eye.

86 The date of the conquest of Antioch by the Arabs is of some importance. By comparing the years of the world in the Chronography of Theophanes with the years of the Hegira in the history of Elmacin we shall determine that it was taken between January 23rd and September 1st of the year of Christ 638 (Pagi Critica in Baron. Annal. tom. ii. p 812 813) Al Wakidi (Ockley vol. i. p 314) assigns that event to Tuesday August 21st an inconsistent date since Easter fell that year on April 5th the 21st of August must have been a Friday (see the Tables of the Art de Vérifier les Dates)

87 His bounteous edict which tempted the grateful city to assume the victory of Pharsalia for a perpetual era is given ἐν Ἀντιοχείᾳ τῇ μητροπόλει ἱερᾷ καὶ ἀσύλῳ καὶ αὐτονόμῳ καὶ ἀρχούσῃ καὶ προκαθημένῃ τῆς ἀνατολῆς John Malala in Chron p 91 edit. Venet. [p. 216 ed. Bonn] We may distinguish his authentic information of domestic facts from his gross ignorance of general history

88 See Ockley (vol i p 308 312) who laughs at the credulity of his author When Heraclius bade farewell to Syria Vale Syria et ultimum vale he prophesied that the Romans should never re-enter the province till the birth of an inauspicious child the future scourge of the empire. Abulfeda p 68. I am perfectly ignorant of the mystic sense, or nonsense of this prediction

89 In the loose and obscure chronology of the times I am guided by an authentic record (in the book of ceremonies of Constantine Porphyrogenitus) which certifies that June 4, A.D 638 the emperor crowned his younger son Heraclius in the presence of his eldest Constantine and in the palace of Constantinople that January 1 A.D 639, the royal procession visited the great church and, on the 4th of the same month the hippodrome.

90 Sixty five years before Christ Syria Pontusque Cn. Pompeii virtutis monumenta sunt (Vell. Patercul. ii 38) rather of his fortune and power he adjudged Syria to be a Roman province and the last of the Seleucides were incapable of drawing a sword in the defence of their patrimony (see the original texts collected by Usher Annal. p 420)

91 Abulfeda, Annal. Moslem p 73 Mohammed could artfully vary the praises of his disciples. Of Omar he was accustomed to say that if a prophet could arise after himself, it would be Omar and that in a general calamity Omar would be accepted by the divine justice (Ockley, vol. i. p. 221)

92 Al Wakidi had likewise written a history of the conquest of Diarbekir or Mesopotamia (Ockley at the end of the second vol) which our interpreters do not appear to have seen. The Chronicle of Dionysius of Telmar the Jacobite patriarch records the taking of Edessa A.D 637 and of Dara A.D 641 (Asseman Biblioth. Orient. tom. ii. p. 103) and the attentive may glean some doubtful information from the Chronography of Theophanes (p 285–287 [t i. p 526 199 ed Bonn]) Most of the towns of Mesopotamia yielded by surrender (Abulpharag p 112)

93 He dreamt that he was at Thessalonica, a harmless and unmeaning vision but his soothsayer or his cowardice understood the sure omen of a defeat concealed in that inauspicious word θὲς ἄλλῳ νίκην Give to another the victory (Theoph p 287 [vol. i. p 529, ed Bonn.] Zonaras, tom. ii. l. xiv [c. 19] p 88)

94 Every passage and every fact that relates to the isle the city and the colossus of Rhodes, are compiled in the laborious treatise of Meursius, who has bestowed the same diligence on the two larger islands of Crete and Cyprus. See, in the third vol. of his works the Rhodus of Meursius (l. i. c. 15 p 715–719) The Byzantine writers Theophanes and Constantine, have ignorantly prolonged the term to 1360 years and ridiculously divide the weight among 30 000 camels.

96 We learn this anecdote from a spirited old woman, who reviled to their faces the caliph and his friend She was encouraged by the silence of Amrou and the liberality of Moawiyah (Abulfeda, Annal Moslem. p 111)

97 Gagnier Vie de Mahomet, tom. ii p 46 etc. who quotes the Abyssinian history or romance of Abdel Balcides Yet the fact of the embassy and ambassador may be allowed.

98 This saying is preserved by Pocock (Not. ad Carmen Tograi, p 184) and justly applauded by Mr Harris (Philosophical Arrangements p 350)

99 For the life and character of Amrou see Ockley (Hist of the Saracens vol. i. p 28 63 94, 328 342 344, and to the end of the volume vol. ii. p 51 55 57 74 110–112 162) and Otter (Mém. de l Académie des Inscriptions tom. xxi p 131, 132) The readers of Tacitus may aptly compare Vespasian and Mucianus with Moawiyah and

Amrou Yet the resemblance is still more in the situation, than in the characters, of the men

100 Al Wakidi had likewise composed a separate history of the conquest of Egypt which Mr Ockley could never procure and his own inquiries (vol i p 344–362) have added very little to the original text of Eutychius (Annal tom ii p 296–323, vers Pocock) the Melchite patriarch of Alexandria who lived three hundred years after the revolution

101 Strabo, an accurate and attentive spectator observes of Heliopolis νυνὶ μὲν οὖν ἐστὶ πανέρημος ἡ πόλις (Geograph l xvii p 1158 [p 805 ed Casaub]) but of Memphis he declares πόλις δ' ἐστὶ μεγάλη τε καὶ εὔανδρος δευτέρα μετ' Ἀλεξάνδρειαν (p 1161 [p 807 ed Casaub]) he notices however, the mixture of inhabitants, and the ruin of the palaces In the proper Egypt, Ammianus enumerates Memphis among the four cities, maximus urbibus quibus provincia nitet (xxii 16) and the name of Memphis appears with distinction in the Roman Itinerary and episcopal lists

102 These rare and curious facts the breadth (2946 feet) and the bridge of the Nile are only to be found in the Danish traveller and the Nubian geographer (p 98)

103 From the month of April the Nile begins imperceptibly to rise the swell becomes strong and visible in the moon after the summer solstice (Plin Hist Nat v 10) and is usually proclaimed at Cairo on St Peter s day (June 29) A register of thirty successive years marks the greatest height of the waters between July 25 and August 18 (Maillet Description de l Egypte, lettre xi p 67 etc Pocock s Description of the East vol i p 200 Shaw's Travels p 383)

104. Murtadi, Merveilles de l Egypte p 243–259 He expatiates on the subject with the zeal and minuteness of a citizen and a bigot and his local traditions have a strong air of truth and accuracy

105 D Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale p 233

106 The position of New and Old Cairo is well known and has been often described Two writers who were intimately acquainted with ancient and modern Egypt have fixed after a learned inquiry the city of Memphis at Gi eh directly opposite the Old Cairo (Sicard Nouveaux Memoires des Missions du Levant tom vi p 5 6 Shaw s Observa*tions and Travels* p 296–304) Yet we may not disregard the authority or the arguments of Pocock (vol i p 25–41) Niebuhr (Voyage, tom i p 77–106) and above all of D Anville (Description de l Egypte p 111 112 130–140) who have removed Memphis towards the village of Mohannah some miles farther to the south In their heat the disputants have forgot that the ample space of a metropolis covers and annihilates the far greater part of the controversy

107 See Herodotus L iii c 27, 28 29 Ælian Hist Var l iv c 8 Suidas in Ὦχος tom ii p 774 Diodor Sicul tom ii L xvii [c. 49] p 197 ed Wesseling Τῶν Περσῶν ἠσεβηκότων εἰς τὰ ἱερά says the last of these historians

108 Mokawkas sent the prophet two Coptic damsels, with two maids and one eunuch an alabaster vase, an ingot of pure gold oil, honey and the finest white linen of Egypt, with a horse, a mule and an ass distinguished by their respective qualifications The embassy of Mohammed was despatched from Medina in the seventh year of the Hegira (A D 628) See Gagnier (Vie de Mahomet tom ii p 255 256 303), from Al Jannabi

109 The præfecture of Egypt, and the conduct of the war, had been trusted by Heraclius to the patriarch Cyrus (Theophan p 280, 281, [t. i. p. 518 519, ed Bonn]) In Spain said James II do you not consult your priests? We do replied the Catholic ambassador, and our affairs succeed accordingly I know not how to relate the plans of Cyrus of paying tribute without impairing the revenue and of converting Omar by his marriage with the emperor s daughter (Nicephor Breviar p 17 18 [ed Par 1648])

110 See the Life of Benjamin in Renaudot (Hist Patriarch Alexandrin p 156–172), who has enriched the conquest of Egypt with some facts from the Arabic text of Severus the Jacobite historian

111 The local description of Alexandria is perfectly ascertained by the master hand of the first of geographers (D Anville Mémoire sur l Egypte, p 52–63) but we may borrow the eyes of the modern travellers more especially of Thevenot (Voyage au Levant part i p 381–395) Pocock (vol. i. p 2–13), and Niebuhr (Voyage en Arabie tom i p 34–43) Of the two modern rivals Savary and Volney, the one may amuse the other will instruct.

112 Both Eutychius (Annal tom ii p 319) and Elmacin (Hist Saracen p 28) concur in fixing the taking of Alexandria to Friday of the new moon of Moharram of the twentieth year of the Hegira (December 22 A D 640) In reckoning backwards fourteen months spent before Alexandria seven months before Babylon etc , Amrou might have invaded Egypt about the end of the year 638 but we are assured that he entered the country the 12th of Bayni 6th of June (Murtardi, Merveilles de l Egypte p 164 Severus apud Renaudot p 162) The Saracen and afterwards Lewis IX of France halted at Pelusium or Damietta during the season of the inundation of the Nile

113 Eutych Annal tom ii p 316 319

114 Notwithstanding some inconsistencies of Theophanes and Cedrenus the accuracy of Pagi (Critica tom ii p 824) has extracted from Nicephorus and the Chronicon Orientale the true date of the death of Heraclius February 11th A D 641 fifty days after the loss of Alexandria A fourth of that time was sufficient to convey the intelligence

115 Many treatises of this lover of labour (φιλόπονος) are still extant but for readers of the present age, the printed and unpublished are nearly in the same predicament. Moses and Aristotle are the chief objects of his verbose commentaries, one of which is dated as early as May 10th, A.D. 617 (Fabric. Biblioth Græc. tom. ix. p. 458-460) A modern (John Le Clerc) who sometimes assumed the same name, was equal to old Philoponus in diligence, and far superior in good sense and real knowledge.

116. Abulpharag Dynast. p 114, vers Pocock. Audi quid factum sit et mirare. It would be endless to enumerate the moderns who have wondered and believed but I may distinguish with honour the rational scepticism of Renaudot (Hist. Alex. Patriarch. p. 170) historia habet aliquid ἄπιστον ut Arabibus familiare est

117 This curious anecdote will be vainly sought in the annals of Eutychius, and the Saracenic history of Elmacin. The silence of Abulfeda Murtadi, and a crowd of Moslems, is less conclusive, from their ignorance of Christian literature.

118. See Reland de Jure Militari Mohammedanorum, in his third volume of Dissertations p. 37 The reason for not burning the religious books of the Jews or Christians is derived from the respect that is due to the name of God

119. Consult the collections of Frensheim (Supplement. Livian. c. 12 43) and Usher (Annal p 469) Livy himself had styled the Alexandrian library elegantiæ regum curæque egregium opus —a liberal encomium for which he is pertly criticised by the narrow stoicism of Seneca (De Tranquillitate Animi, c 9) whose wisdom on this occasion deviates into nonsense.

120. See this History vol. i. p 462

121 Aulus Gellius (Noctes Atticæ vi. 17) Ammianus Marcellinus (xxii. 16) and Orosius (l. vi. c. 15 [p. 421]) They all speak in the past tense and the words of Ammianus are remarkably strong fuerunt Bibliothecæ innumerabiles [inæstimabiles] et loquitur monumentorum veterum concinens fides, etc.

122 Renaudot answers for versions of the Bible, Hexapla, Catenæ Patrum Commentaries, etc. (p 170) Our Alexandrian MS if it came from Egypt, and not from Constantinople or Mount Athos Wetstein Prolegom ad. N T p 8 etc) might possibly be among them.

123 I have often perused with pleasure a chapter of Quintilian (Institut Orator x 1) in which that judicious critic enumerates and appreciates the series of Greek and Latin classics

124. Such as Galen Pliny Aristotle, etc. On this subject Wotton (Reflections on Ancient and Modern Learning p 85-95) argues with solid sense against the lively exotic fancies of Sir William Temple The contempt of the Greeks for barbaric science would scarcely admit the Indian or Æthiopic books into the library of Alexandria nor is it proved that philosophy has sustained any real loss from their exclusion.

125. This curious and authentic intelligence of Murtadi (p 284-289) has not been discovered either by Mr Ockley or by the self sufficient compilers of the Modern Universal History

127 On these obscure canals the reader may try to satisfy himself from D Anville (Mém sur l Egypte p 108-110 124 132) and a learned thesis, maintained and printed at Strasburg in the year 1770 (Jungendorum marium fluviorumque molimina p 39-47 68-70) Even the supine Turks have agitated the old project of joining the two seas (Mémoires du Baron de Tott tom iv)

128 A small volume des Merveilles etc. de l Egypte, composed in the thirteenth century by Murtadi of Cairo and translated from an Arabic MS of Cardinal Mazarin was published by Pierre Vatier Paris, 1666. The antiquities of Egypt are wild and legendary but the writer deserves credit and esteem for his account of the conquest and geography of his native country (see the Correspondence of Amrou and Omar p. 279-289)

129. In a twenty years residence at Cairo the consul Maillet had contemplated that varying scene—the Nile (Lettre ii. particularly p 70 75) the fertility of the land (Lettre ix.) From a college at Cambridge the poetic eye of Gray had seen the same objects with a keener glance —

What wonder in the sultry climes that spread
Where Nile, redundant o er his summer bed
From his broad bosom life and verdure flings,
And broods o er Egypt with his wat ry wings,
If with advent rous oar and ready sail
The dusky people drive before the gale
Or on frail floats to neighbouring cities ride,
That rise and glitter o er the ambient tide.

(Mason s Works and Memoirs of Gray p 199, 200)

130. Murtadi p 164-167 The reader will not easily credit a human sacrifice under the Christian emperors, or a miracle of the successors of Mohammed.

131 Maillet, Description de l Egypte p 22 He mentions this number as the common opinion and adds that the generality of these villages contain two or three thousand persons and that many of them are more populous than our large cities

132 Eutych Annal. tom ii p 308 311 The twenty millions are computed from the following data. one twelfth of mankind above sixty one-third below sixteen the proportion of men to women as seventeen to sixteen (Recherches sur la Population de la France p 71 72) The president Goguet (Origine des Arts etc. tom iii. p 26 etc) bestows twenty seven millions on ancient Egypt because the seventeen hundred companions of Sesostris were born on the same day

133 Elmacin Hist Saracen p 218 and this gross lump is swallowed without scruple by D'Herbelot (Biblioth Orient p 1031) Arbuthnot (Tables of Ancient Coins p 262) and De Guignes (Hist des Huns, tom. iii. p 135) They might allege the not less extravagant liberality of Appian in favour of the Ptolemies (in præfat) of seventy four myriads, 740 000 talents an annual income of 185 or near 300, millions of pounds sterling according as we reckon by the Egyptian or the Alexandrian talent (Bernard de Ponderibus Antiq p 186)

134 See the measurement of D Anville (Mém. sur l Egypte, p 23 etc) After some peevish cavils, M Pauw (Recherches sur les Egyptiens tom i p 118–121) can only enlarge his reckoning to 2250 square leagues

135 Renaudot, Hist Patriarch Alexand p 334 who calls the common reading or version of Elmacin error librarii His own emendation, of 4,300 000 pieces in the ninth century maintains a probable medium between the 3,000 000 which the Arabs acquired by the conquest of Egypt (idem p 168) and the 2 400 000 which the sultan of Constantinople levied in the last century (Pietro della Valle tom i p 352 Thevenot part i p 824) Pauw (Recherches, tom ii p 365–373) gradually raises the revenue of the Pharaohs the Ptolemies, and the Cæsars from six to fifteen millions of German crowns

136 The list of Schultens (Index Geograph ad calcem Vit Saladin p 5) contains 2396 places that of D Anville (Mém sur l'Egypte p 29) from the divan of Cairo enumerates 2696

137 See Maillet (Description de l Egypte, p 28) who seems to argue with candour and judg ment I am much better satisfied with the obser vations than with the reading of the French consul He was ignorant of Greek and Latin literature, and his fancy is too much delighted with the fic tions of the Arabs Their best knowledge is col lected by Abulfeda (Descript Ægypt Arab et Lat à Joh David Michaelis Gottingæ, in 4to 1776) and in two recent voyages into Egypt, we are amused by Savary and instructed by Volney I wish the latter could travel over the globe

139 See the history of Abdallah in Abulfeda (Vit Mohammed, p 109) and Gagnier (Vie de Mahomet tom iii p 45–48)

140 The province and city of Tripoli are de- scribed by Leo Africanus (in Navigatione et Vi aggi di Ramusio tom i Venetia, 1550, fol. 7 verso) and Marmol (Description de l Afrique, tom ii p 562) The first of these writers was a Moor, scholar, and a traveller who composed or trans lated his African geography in a state of captivit at Rome, where he had assumed the name an religion of Pope Leo X. In a similar captivit among the Moors, the Spaniard Marmol, a soldie of Charles V, compiled his Description of Afric translated by D Ablancourt into French (Pari 1667 3 vols in 4to) Marmol had read and seen but he is destitute of the curious and extensiv observation which abounds in the original work c Leo the African

141 Theophanes, who mentions the defeat rather than the death, of Gregory He brands th præfect with the name of Τύραννος he had prob ably assumed the purple (Chronograph. p 28 [tom i p 525 ed Bonn])

142 See in Ockley (Hist of the Saracens, vol ii p 45) the death of Zobeir which was honoure with the tears of Ali against whom he had rebelled His valour at the siege of Babylon if indeed it b the same person is mentioned by Eutychius (An nal. tom ii p 308)

143 Shaw's Travels p 118 119.

144 Mimica emptio says Abulfeda, erat hæc et mira donatio quando-quidem Othman, eju nomine nummos ex ærario prius ablatos ærari præstabat (Annal Moslem p 78) Elmacin (in his cloudy version p 39) seems to report the same job When the Arabs besieged the palace of Oth man it stood high in their catalogue of grievances

145 Επεστρατευσαν Σαρακηνοὶ την Αφρικὴν κα συμβαλοντες τῳ τυράννῳ Γρηγορίῳ τουτον τρέπουσ καὶ τους συν αυτῳ κτείνουσι καὶ στοιχησαντε φόρου μετὰ των Αφρων υπέστρεψαν Theophan Chron graph p 285 edit Paris [vol i p 525, ed. Bonn] His chronology is loose and inaccurate.

146 Theophanes (in Chronograph p 293 [vol. i. p 539]) inserts the vague rumours that might reach Constantinople of the Western conquests of the Arabs and I learn from Paul Warnefrid deacon of Aquileia (de Gestis Langobard l v c 13) that at this time they sent a fleet from Alex andria into the Sicilian and African seas

150 Regio ignobilis et vix quicquam illustre sortita parvis oppidis habitatur parva flumina emittit solo quam viris melior et segnitie gentis obscura Pomponius Mela i 5 iii 10 Mela de serves the more credit since his own Phœnician ancestors had migrated from Tingitana to Spain

(see, in n. 6 a passage of that geographer so cruelly tortured by Salmasius Isaac Vossius, and the most virulent of critics James Gronovius) He lived at the time of the final reduction of that country by the emperor Claudius yet almost thirty years afterwards Pliny (Hist. Nat v 1) complains of his authors too lazy to inquire too proud to confess their ignorance of that wild and remote province.

151 The foolish fashion of this citron wood prevailed at Rome among the men as much as the taste for pearls among the women. A round board or table, four or five feet in diameter sold for the price of an estate (latifundii taxatione) eight ten or twelve thousand pounds sterling (Plin Hist. Natur xiii. 9) I conceive that I must not confound the tree citrus with that of the fruit citrum. But I am not botanist enough to define the former (it is like the wild cypress) by the vulgar or Linnæan name nor will I decide whether the citrum be the orange or the lemon. Salmasius appears to exhaust the subject, but he too often involves himself in the web of his disorderly erudition (Plinian. Exercitat. tom. ii. p 666 etc.)

152. Leo African fol. 16 verso Marmol tom ii. p 28 This province the first scene of the exploits and greatness of the cherifs is often mentioned in the curious history of that dynasty at the end of the third volume of Marmol Description de l Afrique. The third volume of the Recherches Historiques sur les Maures (lately published at Paris) illustrates the history and geography of the kingdoms of Fez and Morocco

153 Otter (p 119) has given the strong tone of fanaticism to this exclamation which Cardonne (p. 37) has softened to a pious wish of preaching the Koran. Yet they had both the same text of Novairi before their eyes

154. The foundation of Cairoan is mentioned by Ockley (Hist. of the Saracens, vol. ii. p 129 130) and the situation mosch, etc. of the city are described by Leo Africanus (fol. 75) Marmol (tom. ii. p 532) and Shaw (p 115)

155. A portentous though frequent mistake has been the confounding from a slight similitude of name the Cyrene of the Greeks and the Cairoan of the Arabs two cities which are separated by an interval of a thousand miles along the sea-coast. The great Thuanus has not escaped this fault, the less excusable as it is connected with a formal and elaborate description of Africa (Historiar l. vii. c. 2 in tom. i. p 240 edit Buckley)

156 Besides the Arabic chronicles of Abulfeda Elmacin, and Abulpharagius under the seventy third year of the Hegira we may consult D Herbelot (Biblioth. Orient p 7) and Ockley (Hist. of the Saracens, vol. ii. p 339-349) The latter has given the last and pathetic dialogue between Abdallah and his mother but he has forgot a physical effect of her grief for his death the return at the age of ninety and fatal consequences of her menses

157 Λεόντιος ἅπαντα τὰ Ῥωμαϊκὰ ἐξοπλίσας πλώϊμα στρατηγόν τε ἐκ αὐτοῖς Ἰωάννην ὄν Πατρίκιον ἔμπειρον των πολεμίων προχειρ σάμενος πρὸς Καρχηδόνα ἀπέστειλε Σαρακηνῶν ἐξ ὑψεν Nicephori Constantinopolitani Breviar p 26 The patriarch of Constantinople, with Theophanes (Chronograph p 309 [vol i p 566 sq ed Bonn]) have slightly mentioned this last attempt for the relief of Africa. Pagi (Critica, tom. iii. p 129, 141) has nicely ascertained the chronology by a strict comparison of the Arabic and Byzantine historians, who often disagree both in time and fact See likewise a note of Otter (p 121)

158 Dove s erano ridotti i nobili Romani e i Gotti and afterwards, i Romani fuggirono e i Gotti lasciarono Carthagine (Leo African fol. 72 recto) I know not from what Arabic writer the African derived his Goths but the fact though new is so interesting and so probable that I will accept it on the slightest authority

159 This commander is styled by Nicephorus Βασιλεὺς Σαρακηνῶν a vague though not improper definition of the caliph Theophanes introduces the strange appellation of Πρωτοσύμβουλος which his interpreter Goar explains by Vizir Azem They may approach the truth in assigning the active part to the minister rather than the prince but they forget that the Ommiades had only a kateb or secretary and that the office of Vizir was not revived or instituted till the 132nd year of the Hegira (D Herbelot, p 912)

160. According to Solinus (c. 27 [§ 11] p 36 edit. Salmas.) the Carthage of Dido stood either 677 or 737 years—a various reading which proceeds from the difference of MSS or editions (Salmas Plin. Exercit. tom. i p 228) The former of these accounts which gives 823 years before Christ, is more consistent with the well weighed testimony of Velleius Paterculus but the latter is preferred by our chronologist (Marsham Canon Chron. p 398) as more agreeable to the Hebrew and Tyrian annals

162. The history of the word Barbar may be classed under four periods. 1 In the time of Homer when the Greeks and Asiatics might probably use a common idiom the imitative sound of Bar bar was applied to the ruder tribes whose pronunciation was most harsh whose grammar was most defective Κᾶρες Βαρβαρόφωνοι (Iliad ii. 867 with the Oxford Scholiast Clarke s Annotation and Henry Stephens s Greek Thesaurus tom. i p 720) 2 From the time, at least of Herodotus it was extended to all the nations who were strangers to the language and manners of the Greeks 3 In the age of Plautus the Romans submitted to the insult (Pompeius Festus l. ii. p 48 edit. Dacier) and freely gave themselves the name of barbarians They insensibly claimed an exemption for Italy and her subject provinces and at length removed the disgraceful appellation to the savage or hostile nations beyond the pale of the empire 4 In every sense it was due to the Moors the familiar word was borrowed from the Latin provincials by the Arabian conquerors and has justly settled as a local denomination (Barbary) along the northern coast of Africa

163 The first book of Leo Africanus and the observations of Dr Shaw (p 220, 223 227, 247, etc) will throw ome light on the roving tribes of Barbary of Arabian or Moorish descent But Shaw had seen these savages with distant terror and Leo, a captive in the Vatican, appears to have lost more of his Arabic than he could acquire of Greek or Roman learning Many of his gross mis takes might be detected in the first period of the Mohammedan history

164 In a conference with a prince of the Greeks, Amrou observed that their religion was different, upon which score it was lawful for brothers to quarrel Ockley s History of the Saracens, vol i. p 328

165 Abulfeda, Annal Moslem p 78 vers Reiske

166 The name of Andalusia is applied by the Arabs not only to the modern province, but to the whole peninsula of Spain (Geograph Nub p 151 D Herbelot Biblioth Orient p 114, 115) The etymology has been most improbably deduced from Vandalusia country of the Vandals (D An ville Etats de l Europe, p 146 147 etc) But the Handalusia of Casiri, which signifies in Arabic, the region of the evening, of the West in a word the Hesperia of the Greeks is perfectly apposite (Biblioth Arabico Hispana tom ii p 327 etc)

167 The fall and resurrection of the Gothic monarchy are related by Mariana (tom i p 238–260 l vi c 19–26 l vii c 1 2) That historian has infused into his noble work (Historiæ de Rebus Hispaniæ, libri xxx Hagæ Comitum 1733 in four volumes in folio with the Continuation of Miniana) the style and spirit of a Roman classic and after the twelfth century his knowledge and judgment may be safely trusted But the Jesuit is not exempt from the prejudices of his order he adopts and adorns like his rival Buchanan the most absurd of the national legends he is too care less of criticism and chronology, and supplies from a lively fancy the chasms of historical evidence These chasms are large and frequent Roderic archbishop of Toledo the father of the Spanish history lived five hundred years after the conquest of the Arabs and the more early accounts are com prised in some meagre lines of the blind chronicles of Isidore of Badajoz (Pacensis) and of Alphonso III king of Leon which I have seen only in the annals of Pagi

168 Le viol (says Voltaire) est aussi difficile à faire qu à prouver Des Evêques se seroient ils ligués pour une fille? (Hist Générale c xxvi) His argument is not logically conclusive.

169 In the story of Cava Mariana (l. vi c. 21, p 241 242) seems to vie with the Lucretia of Livy Like the ancients, he seldom quotes and the oldest testimony of Baronius (Annal. Eccles A D 713 N 19) that of Lucas Tudensis, a Gallician deacon of the thirteenth century only says, Cava quam pr concubinâ utebatur

170 The Orientals Elmacin Abulpharagius Abulfeda pass over the conquest of Spain in si lence, or with a single word The text of Novairi and the other Arabian writers, is represented though with some foreign alloy by M. de Car donne (Hist de l Afrique et de l Espagne sous la Domination des Arabes Paris, 1765, 3 vols. in 12mo tom i p 55–114), and more concisely by M de Guignes (Hist des Huns tom i. p 347–350) The librarian of the Escurial has not satisfied my hopes yet he appears to have searched with diligence his broken materials and the history of the conquest is illustrated by some valuable frag ments of the genuine Razis (who wrote at Corduba, A H 300) of Ben Hazil etc See Biblioth Arabico-Hispana tom ii p 32 105 106, 182 252 319–332 On this occasion the industry of Pagi has been aided by the Arabic learning of his friend the Abbé de Longuerue and to their joint labours I am deeply indebted

171 A mistake of Roderic of Toledo in com paring the lunar years of the Hegira with the Julian years of the Era has determined Baronius, Mariana and the crowd of Spanish historians to place the first invasion in the year 713, and the battle of Xeres in November, 714. This anach ronism of three years has been detected by the more correct industry of modern chronologists, above all of Pagi (Critica tom iii p 169 171–174) who have restored the genuine date of the revolution At the present time an Arabian scholar like Cardonne, who adopts the ancient error (tom. i. p 75) is inexcusably ignorant or careless

172 The Era of Cæsar which in Spain was in legal and popular use till the fourteenth century begins thirty eight years before the birth of Christ. I would refer the origin to the general peace by sea and land which confirmed the power and partition of the Triumvirs (Dion Cassius l xlviii p 547 553 [c 28 and 36] Appian de Bell Civil l v [c 72] p 1034 edit fol) Spain was a province of Cæsar Octavian and Tarragona which raised the first temple to Augustus (Tacit Annal i 78), might borrow from the Orientals this mode of flattery

173 The road the country the old castle of Count Julian and the superstitious belief of the Spaniards of hidden treasures etc are described by Père Labat (Voyages en Espagne et en Italie, tom. i p 207–217) with his usual pleasantry

174 The Nubian Geographer (p 154) explains the topography of the war but it is highly incred ible that the lieutenant of Musa should execute the desperate and useless measure of burning his ships

175 Xeres (the Roman colony of Asta Regia) is only two leagues from Cadiz In the sixteenth century it was a granary of corn and the wine of heres is familiar to the nations of Europe (Lud Nonii Hispania, c. 13 p 54-56 a work of correct and concise knowledge D Anville Etats de l Eu rope, etc. p 154)

176 Id sane infortunii regibus pedem ex acie referentibus sæpe contingit Ben Hazil of Granada, in Biblioth. Arabico-Hispana tom ii. p 327 Some credulous Spaniards believe that king Rod eric, or Rodrigo escaped to a hermit s cell and others, that he was cast alive into a tub full of serpents from whence he exclaimed with a lam entable voice, They devour the part with which I have so grievously sinned. (Don Quixote part ii, ch. 33)

177 The direct road from Corduba to Toledo was measured by Mr Swinburne s mules in 72½ hours but a larger computation must be adopted for the slow and devious marches of an army The Arabs tra ersed the province of La Mancha which the pen of Cervantes has transformed into classic ground to the readers of every nation

178. The antiquities of Toledo Urbs Parva in the Punic wars, Urbs Regia in the sixth century are briefly described by Nonius (Hispania c. 59, p. 181 186) He borrows from Roderic the fatale palatium of Moorish portraits but modestly insinuates that it was no more than a Roman amphi theatre.

179. In the Historia Arabum (c. 9, p. 17 ad calcem Elmacin) Roderic of Toledo describes the emerald tables and inserts the name of Medinat Almeyda, in Arabic words and letters He appears to be conversant with the Mohammedan writers but I cannot agree with M. de Guignes (Hist. des Huns, tom. i. p 350) that he had read and transcribed Novairi because he was dead a hundred years before Novairi composed his history This mistake is founded on a still grosser error M de Guignes confounds the historian Roderic Ximenes archbishop of Toledo in the thirteenth century with Cardinal Ximenes who go erned Spain in the beginning of the sixteenth and was the subject, not the author of historical compositions.

180 Tarik might have inscribed on the last rock the boast of Regnard and his companions in their Lapland journey

Hic tandem stetimus, nobis ubi defuit orbis.

181 Such was the argument of the traitor Oppas, and every chief to whom it was addressed did not answer with the spirit of Pelagius Omnis Hispania dudum sub uno regimine Gothorum omnis exerc tus Hispaniæ in uno congregatus Ismaeli tarum non valuit sustinere impetum. Chron Al phonsi Regis apud Pagi tom iii p 177

182 The revival of the Goth c kingdom in the Asturias is distinctly though concisely noticed by D'Anville (Etats de l Europe, p 159)

183 The honourable relics of the Cantabrian war (Dion Cassius, l. liii. [c. 26] p 720) were planted in this metropolis of Lusitania perhaps of Spain (submittit cui tota suos Hispania fasces) Nonius (Hispania, c. 31 p. 106-110) enumerates the ancient structures, but concludes with a sigh Urbs hæc olim nobilissima ad magnam incolarum infrequentiam delapsa est et præter priscæ clari tatis ruinas nihil ostendit.

184. Both the interpreters of Novairi, De Gui gnes (Hist des Huns tom i p 349) and Cardonne (Hist. de l Afrique et de l Espagne tom. i. p 93 94, 104, 105) lead Musa into the Narbonnese Gaul. But I find no mention of this enterprise either in Roderic of Toledo or the MSS of the Escurial and the invasion of the Saracens is post poned by a French chronicle till the ninth year after the conquest of Spain A.D 721 (Pagi Crit ica tom iii p 177 195 Historians of France tom. iii) I much question whether Musa ever passed the Pyrenees.

185. Four hundred years after Theodemir his territories of Murcia and Carthagena retain in the Nubian geographer Edrisi (p 154, 161) the name of Tadmir (D Anville, Etats de l Europe, p 156 Pagi tom. iii. p 174) In the present decay of Spanish agriculture Mr Swinburne (Travels into Spain p 119) surveyed with pleasure the delicious valley from Murcia to Orihuela four leagues and a half of the finest corn pulse, lucern oranges, etc.

186 See the treaty in Arabic and Latin in the Bibliotheca Arabico-Hispana tom. ii. p 105 106. It is signed the 4th of the month of Regeb A.H. 94, the 5th of April, A.D 713 a date which seems to prolong the resistance of Theodemir and the gov ernment of Musa.

187 From the history of Sandoval, p 87 Fleury (Hist. Ecclés tom. ix. p 261) has given the substance of another treaty concluded A Æ.C. 782 A.D 734, between an Arabian chief and the Goths and Romans, of the territory of Coimbra in Por tugal. The tax of the churches is fixed at twenty five pounds of gold of the monasteries, fifty of the cathedrals one hundred the Christians are judged by their count, but in capital cases he must consult the alcaide. The church doors must be shut and they must respect the name of Moham med I have not the original before me it would confirm or destroy a dark susp cion that the piece has been forged to introduce the immunity of a neighbouring convent

188 This design which is attested by several Arabian historians (Cardonne tom i. p 95 96) may be compared with that of Mithridates to march from the Crimea to Rome or with that of Cæsar to conquer the East and return home by the North and all three are perhaps surpassed by the real and successful enterprise of Hann bal.

189. I much regret our loss or my ignorance of two Arabic wo ks of the eighth century a Life of Musa and a Poem on the exploits of Tarik Of these authentic pieces the former was composed by a grandson of Musa who had escaped from the massacre of his kindred the latter by the Vizir of the first Abdalrahman caliph of Spain who might have conversed with some of the veterans of the conqueror (Biblioth Arabico Hispana, tom ii p 36 139)

190 Biblioth Arab Hispana tom ii p 32, 252 The former of these quotations is taken from a Biographia Hispanica by an Arabian of Valentia (see the copious Extracts of Casiri tom ii p 30–121) and the latter from a general Chronology of the Caliphs and of the African and Spanish Dynasties with a particular History of the kingdom of Granada of which Casiri has given almost an entire version (Biblioth Arabico Hispana tom ii. p 177–319) The author Ebn Khateb a native of Granada, and a contemporary of Novairi and Abulfeda (born A D 1313 died A D 1374) was an historian geographer physician poet, etc (tom ii p 71 72)

192 A copious treatise of husbandry by an Arabian of Seville in the twelfth century is in the Escurial library and Casiri had some thoughts of translating it He gives a list of the authors quoted Arabs as well as Greeks Latins etc but it is much if the Andalusian saw these strangers through the medium of his countryman Columella (Casiri Biblioth Arabico Hispana tom i p 323–338)

193 Biblioth Arabico Hispana tom. ii p 104. Casiri translates the original testimony of the historian Rasis, as it is alleged in the Arabic Biographia Hispanica pars ix But I am most exceedingly surprised at the address Principibus cæterisque Christianis Hispanis suis Castellæ The name of Castellæ was unknown in the eighth century the kingdom was not erected till the year 1022 an hundred years after the time of Rasis (Biblioth tom ii p 330) and the appellation was always expressive not of a tributary province but of a line of castles independent of the Moorish yoke (D Anville Etats de l Europe p 166–170) Had Casiri been a critic, he would have cleared a difficulty perhaps of his own making

194 Cardonne tom i p 337 338 He computes the revenue at 130 000 000 of French livres The entire picture of peace and prosperity relieves the bloody uniformity of the Moorish annals

195 I am happy enough to possess a splendid and interesting work which has only been distributed in presents by the court of Madrid Bibliotheca Arabico Hispana Escurialensis operâ et studio Michaelis Casiri Syro Maronitæ Matriti in folio tomus prior, 1760 tomus posterior 1770 The execution of this work does honour to the Spanish press the MSS to the number of MDCCCLI are judiciously classed by the editor and his copious extracts throw some light on the Mohammedan literature and history of Spain These relics are now secure but the task has been supinely delayed till in the year 1671 a fire consumed the greatest part of the Escurial library rich in the spoils of Granada and Morocco

196 The Harbii as they are styled qui tolerari nequeunt, are, 1 Those who besides God worship the sun moon or idols 2 Atheists. Utrique, quamdiu princeps aliquis inter Mohammedanos superest, oppugnari debent donec religionem amplectantur, nec requies iis concedenda est nec pretium acceptandum pro obtinendâ conscientiæ libertate (Reland Dissertat x. de Jure Militari Mohammedan tom. iii. p 14) a rigid theory!

197 The distinction between a proscribed and a tolerated sect, between the Harbii and the people of the Book the believers in some divine revelation is correctly defined in the conversation of the caliph Al Mamun with the idolaters or Sabæans of Charræ Hottinger Hist Orient p 107 108

198 The Zend or Pazend the Bible of the Ghebers is reckoned by themselves or at least by the Mohammedans among the ten books which Abraham received from heaven and their religion is honourably styled the religion of Abraham (D Herbelot Biblioth Orient p 701 Hyde de Religione veterum Persarum c iii. p 27, 28 etc.) I much fear that we do not possess any pure and free description of the system of Zoroaster Dr Prideaux (Connection vol. i p 300 octavo) adopts the opinion that he had been the slave and scholar of some Jewish prophet in the captivity of Babylon Perhaps the Persians who have been the masters of the Jews would assert the honour—a poor honour—of being their masters

199 The Arabian Nights a faithful and amusing picture of the Oriental world represent in the most odious colours the Magians or worshippers of fire to whom they attribute the annual sacrifice of a Musulman The religion of Zoroaster has not the least affinity with that of the Hindoos yet they are often confounded by the Mohammedans and the sword of Timour was sharpened by this mistake (Hist de Timour Bec par Cherefeddin Ali Yezdi l. v)

200 Vie de Mahomet par Gagnier tom iii. p 114 115

201 Hæ tres sectæ Judæi Christiani et qui inter Persas Magorum institutis addicti sunt κατ' ἐξοχὴν populi libri dicuntur (Reland Dissertat. tom iii. p 15) The caliph Al Mamun confirms this honourable distinction in favour of the three sects with the vague and equivocal religion of the Sabæans under which the ancient polytheists of Charræ were allowed to shelter their idolatrous worship (Hottinger Hist Orient. p 167 168)

202 This singular story is related by D Herbelot (Biblioth Orient p 448 449) on the faith of Khondemir and by Mirchond himself (Hist. priorum Regum Persarum etc p 9 10 not. p. 88 89)

203 Mirchond (Mohammed Emir Khoondah Shah) a native of Herat composed in the Persian language a general history of the East from the creation to the year of the Hegira 875 (A D 1471) In the year 904 (A D 1498) the historian obtained the command of a princely library and his applauded work in seven or twelve parts was abbreviated in three volumes by his son Khondemir,

A. H. 927 (A.D. 1520) The two writers, most accurately distinguished by Petit de la Croix (Hist de Genghizcan, p. 537 538, 544, 545) are loosely confounded by D Herbelot (p 358 410 994, 995) but his numerous extracts under the improper name of Khondemir belong to the father rather than the son. The historian of Genghizcan refers to a MS. of Mirchond, which he received from the hands of his friend D Herbelot himself. A curious fragment (the Taherian and Soffarian Dynasties) has been lately published in Persic and Latin (Vienna 1782 in 4to cum notis Bernard de Jenisch) and the editor allows us to hope for a continuation of Mirchond.

204. Quo testimonio boni se quidpiam praestitisse opinabantur Yet Mirchond must have condemned their zeal, since he approved the legal toleration of the Magi cui (the fire temple) peracto singulis annis censû uti sacra Mohammedis lege cautum, ab omnibus molestiis ac oneribus libero esse licuit.

205. The last Magian of name and power appears to be Mardavige the Dilemite, who in the beginning of the tenth century reigned in the northern provinces of Persia near the Caspian Sea (D Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient. p 355) But his soldiers and successors, the Bowides either professed or embraced the Mohammedan faith and under their dynasty (A.D 933–1020) I should place the fall of the religion of Zoroaster

206 The present state of the Ghebers in Persia is taken from Sir John Chardin, not indeed the most learned, but the most judicious and inquisitive, of our modern travellers (Voyages en Perse, tom. ii. p 109, 179–187 in 4to) His brethren Pietro della Valle, Olearius Thevenot Tavernier, etc. whom I have fruitlessly searched had neither eyes nor attention for this interesting people.

207 The letter of Abdoulrahman governor or tyrant of Africa, to the caliph Aboul Abbas, the first of the Abbassides is dated A H. 132 (Cardonne, Hist. de l Afrique et de l Espagne, tom. i. p. 168)

209. Among the Epistles of the Popes see Leo IX. Epist. 3 Gregor VII l. i. Epist 22 23 l. iii. Epist. 19, 20 21 and the criticisms of Pagi (tom. iv A.D 1053 No 14 A D 1073 No 13) who investigates the name and family of the Moorish prince with whom the proudest of the Roman pontiffs so politely corresponds.

210. Mozarabes, or Mostarabes adscititii as it is interpreted in Latin (Pocock Specimen Hist. Arabum, p 39, 40 Biblioth Arabico-Hispana tom. ii. p 18) The Mozarabic liturgy the ancient ritual of the church of Toledo has been attacked by the popes, and exposed to the doubtful trials of the sword and of fire (Marian Hist. Hispan. tom. i. l. ix. c. 18, p 378) It was or rather it is, in the Latin tongue yet in the eleventh century it was found necessary (A.Æ.C. 1087—A.D. 1039) to transcribe an Arabic version of the canons of the councils of Spain (Biblioth. Arab Hisp tom. i p. 547) for the use of the bishops and clergy in the Moorish kingdoms.

211 About the middle of the tenth century the clergy of Cordova was reproached with this criminal compliance by the intrepid envoy of the emperor Otho I (Vit Johan. Gorz in Secul. Benedict. V No 115 apud Fleury Hist. Ecclés. tom xii. p 91)

212 Pagi Critica, tom. iv A D 1149, No 8 9 He justly observes that, when Seville, etc. were taken by Ferdinand of Castille no Christians, except captives were found in the place and that the Mozarabic churches of Africa and Spain described by James à Vitriaco A.D 1218 (Hist. Hierosol. c. 80 p 1095 in Gest Dei per Francos), are copied from some older book I shall add that the date of the Hegira 677 (A.D 1278) must apply to the copy not the composition of a treatise of jurisprudence, which states the civil rights of the Christians of Cordova (Biblioth. Arab Hisp tom. i. p. 471) and that the Jews were the only dissenters whom Abul Waled king of Granada (A.D 1313) could either discountenance or tolerate (tom. ii. p. 288)

213 Renaudot, Hist Patriarch Alex. p. 288 Leo Africanus would have flattered his Roman masters could he have discovered any latent relics of the Christianity of Africa.

214. Absit (said the Catholic to the Vizir of Bagdad) ut pari loco habeas Nestorianos, quorum præter Arabas nullus alius rex est et Græcos quorum reges amovendo Arabibus bello non desistunt, etc. See in the Collections of Assemannus (Biblioth Orient. tom. iv p 94–101) the state of the Nestorians under the caliphs. That of the Jacobites is more concisely exposed in the Preliminary Dissertation of the second volume of Assemannus

215. Eutych. Annal. tom. ii. p 384, 387 388 Renaudot Hist. Patriarch. Alex. p 205, 206 257 332 A taint of the Monothelite heresy might render the first of these Greek patriarchs less loyal to the emperors and less obnoxious to the Arabs

216. Motadhed who reigned from A.D 892 to 902 The Magians still held their name and rank among the religions of the empire (Assemanni Biblioth Orient. tom iv p 97)

217 Reland explains the general restraints of the Mohammedan policy and jurisprudence (Dissertat tom iii. p 16–20) The oppressive edicts of the caliph Motawakkel (A.D 847–861) which are still in force, are noticed by Eutychius (Annal tom. ii. p 448) and D Herbelot (Biblioth. Orient. p 640) A persecution of the caliph Omar II is related, and most probably magnified, by the Greek Theophanes (Chron. p 334 [vol. i. p 614 ed. Bonn])

218 The martyrs of Cordova (A.D 850 etc.) are commemorated and justified by St. Eulogius who at length fell a victim himself. A synod, convened by the caliph ambiguously censured their rashness The moderate Fleury cannot reconcile their conduct with the discipline of antiquity toutefois l autorité de l église etc. (Fleury, Hist Ecclés tom x p 415-522 particularly p 451, 508 509) Their authentic acts throw a strong though transient light on the Spanish church in the ninth century

219 See the article Eslamiah (as we say Christendom), in the Bibliothèque Orientale (p 325) This chart of the Mohammedan world is suited by the author Ebn Alwardi to the year of the Hegira 385 (A D 995) Since that time the losses in Spain have been overbalanced by the conquests in India, Tartary and the European Turkey

220 The Arabic of the Koran is taught as a dead language in the college of Mecca. By the Danish traveller this ancient idiom is compared to the Latin the vulgar tongue of Hejaz and Yemen to the Italian and the Arabian dialects of Syria, Egypt Africa, etc to the Provençal Spanish, and Portuguese (Niebuhr, Description de l'Arabie, p. 74, etc)

Chapter LII

1 Theophanes places the seven years of the siege of Constantinople in the year of our Christian era 673 (of the Alexandrian 665 Sept 1) and the peace of the Saracens four years afterwards a glaring inconsistency! which Petavius Goar and Pagi (Critica tom iv p 63 64) have struggled to remove Of the Arabians, the Hegira 52 (A D 672 January 8) is assigned by Elmacin [p 56] the year 48 (A D 668 Feb 20) by Abulfeda whose testimony I esteem the most convenient and creditable

2 For this first siege of Constantinople see Nicephorus (Breviar p 21, 22 [ed Par]) Theophanes (Chronograph p 294 [t 1 p 541 ed Bonn]) Cedrenus (Compend p 437 [ed Par tom 1 p 764 ed Bonn]) Zonaras (Hist tom ii l xiv [c 20] p 89) Elmacin (Hist Saracen p 56, 57) Abulfeda (Annal Moslem p 107 108 vers Reiske) D Herbelot (Biblioth Orient Constantinah) Ockley s History of the Saracens, vol. ii. p 127, 128

3 The state and defence of the Dardanelles is exposed in the Memoirs of the Baron de Tott (tom. iii p 39-97) who was sent to fortify them against the Russians From a principal actor I should have expected more accurate details but he seems to write for the amusement rather than the instruction of his reader Perhaps on the approach of the enemy the minister of Constantine was occupied like that of Mustapha in finding two Canary birds who should sing precisely the same note.

4 Demetrius Cantemir's Hist of the Othman Empire, p 105 106 Rycaut's State of the Ottoman Empire p 10 11 Voyages de Thevenot part 1 p 189 The Christians who suppose that the martyr of Abu Ayub is vulgarly confounded with the patriarch Job, betray their own ignorance rather than that of the Turks

5 Theophanes though a Greek deserves credit for these tributes (Chronograph p 295 296 300, 301 [vol 1 p 543 552 ed Bonn]) which are confirmed with some variation by the Arabic History of Abulpharagius (Dynast p 128 vers Pocock)

6 The censure of Theophanes is just and pointed τὴν Ῥωμαικὴν δυναστείαν ἀκρωτηριάσας ... πάνδεινα κακὰ πέπονθεν ἡ Ῥωμανία ὑπὸ τῶν Ἀράβων μέχρι τοῦ νῦν (Chronograph. p 302 303 [vol. i. p 555 556, ed Bonn]) The series of these events may be traced in the Annals of Theophanes and in the Abridgment of the Patriarch Nicephorus, p 22, 24

7 These domestic revolutions are related in a clear and natural style, in the second volume of Ockley's History of the Saracens p 253-370. Besides our printed authors he draws his materials from the Arabic MSS of Oxford which he would have more deeply searched had he been confined to the Bodleian library instead of the city jail a fate how unworthy of the man and of his country!

8 Elmacin who dates the first coinage A H 76 A D 695 five or six years later than the Greek historians has compared the weight of the best or common gold dinar to the drachm or dirhem of Egypt (p 77) which may be equal to two pennies (48 grains) of our Troy weight (Hooper's Enquiry into Ancient Measures, p 24-36) and equivalent to eight shillings of our sterling money From the same Elmacin and the Arabian physicians some dinars as high as two dirhems as low as half a dirhem may be deduced The piece of silver was the dirhem both in value and weight but an old, though fair coin struck at Waset A H 88 and preserved in the Bodleian library wants four grains of the Cairo standard (see the Modern Universal History tom. i p 548 of the French translation)

9 Καὶ ἐκώλυσε γράφεσθαι Ἑλληνιστὶ τοὺς δημοσίους τῶν λογοθεσίων κώδικας ἀλλ Ἀραβίοις αὐτὰ παρασημαίνεσθαι χωρὶς τῶν ψήφων ἐπειδὴ ἀδύνατον τῇ ἐκείνων γλώσσῃ μονάδα ἢ δυάδα ἢ τριάδα ἢ ὀκτὼ ἥμισυ ἢ τρία γράφεσθαι. Theophan Chronograph p 314 [t. 1 p 575, ed Bonn] This defect if it really existed, must have stimulated the ingenuity of the Arabs to invent or borrow

10 According to a new, though probable notion, maintained by M de Villoison (Anecdota Græca tom ii p 152-157) our ciphers are not of Indian or Arabic invention. They were used by the Greek and Latin arithmeticians long before the age of Boethius After the extinction of science in the West they were adopted by the Arabic versions from the original MSS., and restored to the Latins about the eleventh century

11 In the division of the Themes or provinces described by Constantine Porphyrogenitus (de Thematibus, l. i p 9 10 [ed. Par vol. iii. p 24, sqq., ed. Bonn]) the Obsequium a Latin appellation of the army and palace was the fourth in the public order Nice was the metropolis and its jurisdiction extended from the Hellespont over the adjacent parts of Bithynia and Phrygia (see the two maps prefixed by Delisle to the Imperium Orientale of Banduri)

12 The caliph had emptied two baskets of eggs and of figs which he swallowed alternately and the repast was concluded with marrow and sugar In one of his pilgrimages to Mecca, Soliman ate, at a single meal, seventy pomegranates, a kid, six fowls, and a huge quantity of the grapes of Tayef. If the bill of fare be correct, we must admire the appetite rather than the luxury of the sovereign of Asia (Abulfeda Annal. Moslem. p. 126)

13. See the article of Omar Ben Abdalaziz in the Bibliothèque Orientale (p 689, 690) præferens says Elmacin (p 91) religionem suam rebus suis mundanis He was so desirous of being with God, that he would not have anointed his ear (his own saying) to obtain a perfect cure of his last malady The caliph had only one shirt and in an age of luxury his annual expense was no more than two drachms (Abulpharagius, p 131) Haud diu gavisus eo principe fuit orbis Moslemus (Abulfeda, p. 127)

14. Both Nicephorus [p 36] and Theophanes agree that the siege of Constantinople was raised the 15th of August (A D 718) but as the former our best witness affirms that it continued thirteen months [p 35] the latter must be mistaken in supposing that it began on the same day of the preceding year I do not find that Pagi has remarked this inconsistency

16 Our sure and indefatigable guide in the middle ages and Byzantine history Charles du Fresne du Cange, has treated in several places of the Greek fire and his collections leave few gleanings behind See particularly Glossar Med et Infim. Græcitat. p 1275 sub voce Πῦρ θαλάσσιον ὑγρόν Glossar Med. et Infim. Latinitat Ignis Græcus Observations sur Villehardouin p 305, 306 Observations sur Joinville, p 71 72

17 Theophanes styles him ἀρχιτέκτων (p 295 [t. i. p 542 ed Bonn]) Cedrenus (p 437 [tom i. p 765, ed. Bonn]) brings this artist from (the ruins of) Heliopolis in Egypt and chemistry was indeed the peculiar science of the Egyptians

18. The naphtha, the oleum incendiarium of the history of Jerusalem (Gest. Dei per Francos, p 1167) the Oriental fountain of James de Vitry (l. iii c. 84 [p. 1098]) is introduced on slight evidence and strong probability Cinnamus (l. vi. p 165 [c. 10 p. 283 ed Bonn]) calls the Greek fire πῦρ Μηδικὸν and the naphtha is known to abound between the Tigris and the Caspian Sea. According to Pliny (Hist. Natur ii. 109) it was subservient to the revenge of Medea and in either etymology the ἔλαιον Μηδίας or Μηδείας (Procop de Bell. Gothic. l. iv c. 11 [t ii. p 512 ed Bonn]) may fairly signify this liquid bitumen.

19. On the different sorts of oils and bitumens see Dr Watson's (the present Bishop of Llandaff's) Chemical Essays, vol. iii. essay i., a classic book, the best adapted to infuse the taste and knowledge of chemistry The less perfect ideas of the ancients may be found in Strabo (Geograph. l. xvi. p 1078 [p. 743 ed. Casaub]) and Pliny (Hist. Natur ii. 108, 109) Huic (Naphthæ) magna cognatio est ignium transiliuntque protinus in eam undecunque visam. Of our travellers I am best pleased with Otter (tom. i. p 153 158)

20. Anna Comnena has partly drawn aside the curtain. Ἀπὸ τῆς πεύκης καὶ ἄλλων τινῶν τοιούτων δένδρων ἀειθαλῶν συνάγεται δάκρυον ἄκαυστον. Τοῦτο μετὰ θείου τριβόμενον ἐμβάλλεται εἰς αὐλίσκους καλάμων καὶ ἐμφυσᾶται παρὰ τοῦ παίζοντος λάβρῳ καὶ συνεχεῖ πνεύματι (Alexiad l. xiii. p 383) Elsewhere (l. xi p. 336) she mentions the property of burning κατὰ τὸ πρανὲς καὶ ἐφ' ἑκάτερα. Leo in the nineteenth chapter [§ 51] of his Tactics (Opera Meursii tom vi. p 841 edit. Lami Florent. 1745) speaks of the new invention of πῦρ μετὰ βροντῆς καὶ καπνοῦ These are genuine and Imperial testimonies.

22 Histoire de St Louis, p 39 Paris, 1668 p 44 Paris de l'Imprimerie Royale 1761 The former of these editions is precious for the observations of Ducange the latter for the pure and original text of Joinville We must have recourse to that text to discover that the feu Gregeois was shot with a pile or javelin from an engine that acted like a sling

23 The vanity or envy of shaking the established property of Fame, has tempted some moderns to carry gunpowder above the fourteenth (see Sir William Temple, Dutens etc) and the Greek fire above the seventh century (see the Saluste du Président des Brosses tom ii p 381) But their evidence which precedes the vulgar era of the invention is seldom clear or satisfactory, and subsequent writers may be suspected of fraud or credulity In the earliest sieges some combustibles of oil and sulphur have been used and the Greek fire has some affinities with gunpowder both in its nature and effects for the antiquity of the first, a passage of Procopius (de Bell Goth l ii c 11 [t ii p 512 ed Bonn]) for that of the second some facts in the Arabic history of Spain (A D 1249 1312 1332 Biblioth Arab Hisp tom ii p 6 7 8) are the most difficult to elude

24 That extraordinary man Friar Bacon, reveals two of the ingredients saltpetre and sulphur and conceals the third in a sentence of mysterious gibberish as if he dreaded the consequences of his own discovery (Biog Brit vol 1 p 430 new edition)

25 For the invasion of France and the defeat of the Arabs by Charles Martel see the Historia Arabum (c 11, 12 13 14) of Roderic Ximenes archbishop of Toledo who had before him the Christian Chronicle of Isidore Pacensis and the Mohammedan history of Novairi The Moslems are silent or concise in the account of their losses but M Cardonne (tom 1 p 129 130 131) has given a pure and simple account of all that he could collect from Ibn Halikan Hidjazi and an anonymous writer The texts of the chronicles of France and lives of saints are inserted in the Collection of Bouquet (tom iii) and the Annals of Pagi who (tom iii under the proper years) has restored the chronology, which is anticipated six years in the Annals of Baronius The Dictionary of Bayle (Abderame and Munuza) has more merit for lively reflection than original research

26 Eginhart de Vita Caroli Magni c ii p 13–18 edit Schmink Utrecht 1711 Some modern critics accuse the minister of Charlemagne of exaggerating the weakness of the Merovingians but the general outline is just, and the French reader will for ever repeat the beautiful lines of Boileau s Lutrin

27 Mamaccæ on the Oise between Compiègne and Noyon which Eginhart calls preparvi reditus villam (see the notes and the map of ancient France for Dom Bouquet s Collection) Compendium, or Compiègne was a palace of more dignity (Hadrian Valesii Notitia Galliarum p 152) and that laughing philosopher the Abbé Galliani (Dialogues sur le Commerce des Bleds) may truly affirm that it was the residence of the rois très Chrétiens et très chevelûs

28 Even before that colony A U C 630 (Velleius Patercul 1 15) in the time of Polybius (Hist l iii [c 37] p 265 edit Gronov) Narbonne was a Celtic town of the first eminence and one of the most northern places of the known world (D Anville Notice de l Ancienne Gaule p 473)

29 With regard to the sanctuary of St Martin of Tours Roderic Ximenes accuses the Saracens of the deed Turonis civitatem ecclesiam et palatia vastatione et incendio simili diruit et consumpsit The continuator of Fredegarius imputes to them no more than the intention Ad domum beatissimi Martini evertendam destinant At Carolus etc. The French annalist was more jealous of the honour of the saint

30 Yet I sincerely doubt whether the Oxford mosch would have produced a volume of contro versy so elegant and ingenious as the sermon lately preached by Mr White the Arabic pro fessor, at Mr Bampton s lecture His observation on the character and religion of Mohammed ar always adapted to his argument and generall founded in truth and reason He sustains the par of a lively and eloquent advocate, and sometime rises to the merit of an historian and philosophe

31 Gens Austriæ membrorum pre-eminentı valida, et gens Germana corde et corpore præ stantissima quasi in ictû oculi manû ferreâ e pectore arduo Arabes extinxerunt (Roderic. Tol etan c xiv)

32 These numbers are stated by Paul Warne frid the deacon of Aquileia (de Gestis Langobard l vi [c 46] p 921, edit Grot), and Anastasius the librarian of the Roman church (in Vit Gre gorii II [ap Muratori Scrip R I vol iii p 155]) who tells a miraculous story of three consecrate sponges which rendered invulnerable the Frencl soldiers among whom they had been shared. I should seem that in his letters to the pope, Eude usurped the honour of the victory for which he i chastised by the French annalists who with equa falsehood accuse him of inviting the Saracens

33 Narbonne and the rest of Septimania wa recovered by Pepin the son of Charles Martel A D 755 (Pagi Critica tom iii p 300) Thirty seven years afterwards it was pillaged by a sudder inroad of the Arabs who employed the captives ir the construction of the mosch of Cordova (De Guignes Hist des Huns tom 1 p 354)

34 This pastoral letter addressed to Lewis the Germanic the grandson of Charlemagne and most probably composed by the pen of the artful Hincmar is dated in the year 858 and signed by the bishops of the provinces of Rheims and Rouen (Baronius Annal Eccles A D 741 Fleury, Hist Ecclés tom x p 514–516) Yet Baronius himsell and the French critics reject with contempt thi episcopal fiction

35 The steed and the saddle which had carried any of his wives were instantly killed or burnt lest they should be afterwards mounted by a male. Twelve hundred mules or camels were required for his kitchen furniture and the daily consumption amounted to three thousand cakes a hundred sheep besides oxen poultry etc. (Abulpharagius, Hist Dynast p 140)

36 Al Hemar He had been governor of Mesopotamia and the Arabic proverb praises the courage of that warlike breed of asses who never fly from an enemy The surname of Mervan may justify the comparison of Homer (Iliad xi 557 etc) and both will silence the moderns who consider the ass as a stupid and ignoble emblem (D Herbelot Biblioth Orient p 558)

37 Four several places all in Egypt bore the name of Busir or Busiris so famous in Greek fable. The first where Mervan was slain was to the west of the Nile in the province of Fium or Arsinoe, the second in the Delta, in the Sebennytic nome the third near the Pyramids the fourth which was destroyed by Diocletian (see above vol 2 p 314) in the Thebais. I shall here transcribe a note of the learned and orthodox Michaelis Videntur in plu ribus Ægypti superioris urbibus Busiri Copto [Esne] arma sumpsisse Christiani, libertatemque de religione sentiendi defendisse sed succubuisse quo in bello Coptus et Busiris diruta, et circa Esnam magna strages edita Bellum narrant sed causam belli ignorant scriptores Byzantini alioqui Coptum et Busirin non rebellasse dicturi sed causam Christianorum suscepturi (Not 211 p 100) For the geography of the four Busirs see Abulfeda (Descript Ægypt. p 9 vers Michaelis Gottingæ 1776, in 4to) Michaelis (Not. 122–127 p 58–63) and D Anville (Mémoire sur l Egypte, p 85, 147 205)

40 I shall not stop to refute the strange errors and fancies of Sir William Temple (his Works, vol. iii. p. 371–374, octavo edition) and Voltaire (Histoire Générale, c. xxviii. tom ii. p 124, 125, édition de Lausanne) concerning the division of the Saracen empire. The mistakes of Voltaire proceeded from the want of knowledge or reflection but Sir William was deceived by a Spanish impostor who has framed an apocryphal history of the conquest of Spain by the Arabs

41 The geographer D Anville (l Euphrate et le Tigre, p 121–123) and the Orientalist D'Herbelot (Bibliothèque p 167 168) may suffice for the knowledge of Bagdad Our travellers Pietro della Valle (tom i. p 688–698) Tavernier (tom. i. p 230–238) Thevenot (part ii. p 209–212) Otter (tom. i. p 162–168) and Niebuhr (Voyage en Arabie, tom. ii p 239–271) have seen only its decay and the Nubian geographer (p 204) and the travelling Jew Benjamin of Tudela (Itinerarium, p 112–123 à Const. l Empereur apud Elzevir 1633) are the only writers of my acquaintance who have known Bagdad under the reign of the Abbassides

42 The foundations of Bagdad were laid A.H. 145, A D 762 Mostasem the last of the Abbassides was taken and put to death by the Tartars A H. 656, A D 1258, the 20th of February

43 Medinat al Salam Dar al Salem. Urbs pacis or as it is more neatly compounded by the Byzantine writers, Εἰρηνόπολις (Irenopolis) There is some dispute concerning the etymology of Bagdad but the first syllable is allowed to signify a garden in the Persian tongue the garden of Dad a Christian hermit, whose cell had been the only habitation on the spot.

44 Reliquit in ærario sexcenties millies mille stateres et quater et vicies millies mille aureos aureos. Elmacin Hist Saracen p. 126 I have reckoned the gold pieces at eight shillings, and the proportion to the silver as twelve to one. I have used the modern word lottery to express the Missilia of the Roman emperors, which entitled to some prize the person who caught them as they were thrown among the crowd.

47 When Bell of Antermony (Travels, vol i. p 99) accompanied the Russian ambassador to the audience of the unfortunate Shah Hussein of Persia two lions were introduced to denote the power of the king over the fiercest animals.

48 Abulfeda p 237 D Herbelot, p 590. This embassy was received at Bagdad A H. 305, A D 917 In the passage of Abulfeda I have used with some variations the English translation of the learned and amiable Mr Harris of Salisbury (Philological Enquiries p 363 364)

49 Cardonne Histoire de l Afrique et de l Espagne, tom i p 330–336 A just idea of the taste and architecture of the Arabians of Spain may be conceived from the description and plates of the Alhambra of Granada (Swinburne's Travels p 171–188)

50 Cardonne tom i p 329, 330 This confession, the complaints of Solomon of the vanity of this world (read Prior's verbose but eloquent poem) and the happy ten days of the emperor Seghed (Rambler No 204, 205) will be triumphantly quoted by the detractors of human life. Their expectations are commonly immoderate their estimates are seldom impartial. If I may speak of myself (the only person of whom I can speak with certainty) my happy hours have far exceeded and far exceed, the scanty numbers of the caliph of Spain and I shall not scruple to add that many of them are due to the pleasing labour of the present composition

51 The Gulistan (p 239) relates the conversation of Mohammed and a physician (Epistol. Re

52 See their curious architecture in Reaumur (Hist des Insectes tom v Mémoire VIII) These hexagons are closed by a pyramid the angles of the three sides of a similar pyramid such as would accomplish the given end with the smallest quantity possible of materials were determined by a mathematician at 109 degrees 26 minutes for the larger 70 degrees 34 minutes for the smaller The actual measure is 109 degrees 28 minutes 70 degrees 32 minutes Yet this perfect harmony raises the work at the expense of the artist the bees are not masters of transcendent geometry

53 Said Ebn Ahmed cadhi of Toledo who died A H 462 A D 1069, has furnished Abulpharagius (Dynast p 160) with this curious passage as well as with the text of Pocock s Specimen Historiæ Arabum A number of literary anecdotes of philosophers, physicians etc, who have flourished under each caliph form the principal merit of the Dynasties of Abulpharagius

54 These literary anecdotes are borrowed from the Bibliotheca Arabico Hispana (tom II p 38, 71 201 202) Leo Africanus (de Arab Medicis et Philosophis in Fabric Biblioth Græc tom XIII p 259–298 particularly p 274) and Renaudot (Hist Patriarch Alex p 274 275 536 537), besides the chronological remarks of Abulpharagius

55 The Arabic catalogue of the Escurial will give a just idea of the proportion of the classes In the library of Cairo the MSS of astronomy and medicine amounted to 6500 with two fair globes the one of brass the other of silver (Biblioth Arab Hisp tom 1 p 417)

56 As for instance the fifth sixth and seventh books (the eighth is still wanting) of the Conic Sections of Apollonius Pergæus which were printed from the Florence MS 1661 (Fabric Biblioth Græc tom II p 559) Yet the fifth book had been previously restored by the mathematical divination of Viviani (see his Eloge in Fontenelle tom. v p 59 etc)

57 The merit of these Arabic versions is freely discussed by Renaudot (Fabric Biblioth Græc. tom 1 p 812–816) and piously defended by Casiri (Biblioth Arab Hispana tom 1 p 238–240) Most of the versions of Plato Aristotle Hippocrates Galen etc are ascribed to Honain a physician of the Nestorian sect who flourished at Bagdad in the court of the caliphs and died A D 876 He was at the head of a school or manufacture of translations and the works of his sons and disciples were published under his name. 61 Abulfeda (Annal Moslem p 210 211, vers. 69 Dr Watson (Elements of Chemistry vol 1 p 17 etc) allows the original merit of the Arabians.

yet he quotes the modest confession of the famous Geber of the ninth century (D Herbelot p 387) that he had drawn most of his science, perhaps of the transmutat on of metals from the ancient sages. Whatever might be the origin or extent of their knowledge, the arts of chemistry and alchymy appear to have been known in Egypt at least three hundred years before Mohammed (Wotton s Reflections, p 121 133 Pauw Recherches sur les Egyptiens et les Chinois tom 1. p 376–429)

70. Abulpharag us (Dynast. p 26 148) mentions a S riac ers on of Homer's t o poems, by Theophilus, a Christian Maronite of Mount Libanus, who professed astronomy at Roha or Edessa to ards the end of the eighth century H s work would be a literary cur os ty I ha e read somewhere, but I do not believe that Plutarch s Lives were translated nto Turkish for the use of Mohammed the Second.

1 I have perused w th much pleasure Sir William Jones s Latin Commentary on Asiat c Poetry (London, 1774, in octavo) wh ch was composed in the youth of that wonderful linguist. At present, in the matur ty of his taste and judgment, he would perhaps abate of the fervent and even partial praise wh ch he has besto ed on the Orientals.

72. Among the Arabian philosophers Averroes has been accused of despising the religions of the Jews, the Christians and the Mohammedans (see his article in Bayle s D ctionary) Each of these sects would agree that in two instances out of three, his contempt was reasonable.

74. Θεόφιλον δ το κρίν ι ἐὰ ἡ τω δ ω γνώσιν ἄ ἧ ὁ Ρωμαίων γένος θαυμάζ ται ἐκδο ον ποιήσειν ἔθνεσι, etc. Cedrenus p 548 [vol. 1 p 169, ed. Bonn] who relates how manfully the emperor refused a mathematician to the instances and offers of the caliph Almamon This absurd scruple is expressed almost in the same words by the contin uator of Theophanes (Scriptores post Theophanem, p. 1 8 [ed. Par p 190, ed. Bonn])

75. See the reign and character of Harun al Rashid n the B bl othèque Or entale, p 431 433 under his proper title and in the relat ve articles to which M D Herbelot refers That learned collector has shown much taste in stripping the Oriental chron cles of their instructi e and amusing anecdotes.

76. For the s tuat on of Racca the old Nicephorium, consult D An ille (l Euphrate et le Tigre, p 24–27) The Arabian N ghts represent Harun al Rashid as almost stationary in Bagdad. He respected the royal seat of the Abbass des but the vices of the inhab tants had dr en him from the city (Abulfed Annal. p 167)

77 M. d Tournefort in his coasting voyage from Constantinople to Trebizond passed a night at Heracl a or Eregri His eye surveyed the present sta e, his reading collected the ant quit es, of the ci y (Voyage du Levant, tom. iii. lettre xvi. p 23 85) We have a separate history of Heraclea in the fragments of Memnon which are preserved by Photius.

78. The wars of Harun al Rashid aga nst the Roman emp re are related by Theophanes (p 384, 385 391 396 407 408 [tom. I p 705 717 727 748 sq ed Bonn]) Zonaras (tom. ii. l. xv [c. 10–15] p 115 124) Cedrenus (p. 477 478 [tom. ii. p 34 sq ed Bonn]) Eutychius (Annal. tom ii. p 407) Elmacin (Hist. Saracen. p 136 151 152) Abulpharag us (Dynast p 147 151) and Abulfeda (p 156 166–168)

79. The authors from whom I have learned the most of the ancient and modern state of Crete are Belon (Observat ons etc. c. 3–20, Paris, 1555) Tournefort (Voyage du Levant, tom. i. lettre ii. et iii) and Meursius (CRETA in his works, tom iii. p 343 544) Although Crete is styled by Homer πίειρα, by D onysius λιπαρή τε καὶ εὔβοτος I cannot conceive that mountainous island to surpass, or even to equal in fertility the greater part of Spain.

80. The most authentic and circumstantial intell gence is obtained from the four books of the Continuation of Theophanes compiled by the pen or the command of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, w th the Life of his father Bas l the Macedon an (Scriptores post Theophanem, p 1 162 à Francisc. Combefis Paris 1685 [p 4–260, ed. Bonn]) The loss of Crete and S cily is related, l. ii. p 46 52 [ed. Par p 74–83 ed. Bonn] To these we may add the secondary evidence of Joseph Genesius (l. ii. p 21 Venet 1733) George Cedrenus (Compend p 506–508 [p 509 512 ed. Par p 92–99, ed. Bonn]) and John Scyl tzes Curopalata (apud Baron Annal. Eccles. A.D 827 No 24, etc.) But the modern Greeks are such notorious plagiaries, that I should only quote a plurality of names.

81 Renaudot (Hist Patriarch. Alex. p 251–256 268–270) has described the ravages of the Andalusian Arabs in Egypt but has forgot to connect them with the conquest of Crete

83 The splendid and interesting tragedy of Tancrede would adapt itself much better to this epoch than to the date (A.D 1005) which Voltaire himself has chosen But I must gently reproach the poet for infus ng into the Greek subjects the sp rit of modern knights and ancient republicans.

84. The narrat ve or lamentat on of Theodosius is transcribed and illustrated by Pagi (Cr tica, tom. iii p 719, etc.) Constantine Porphyrogen itus (in Vit Basil c. 69, 70, p 190–192 [Theoph. Cont. p 309 sq ed. Bonn]) mentions the loss of Syracuse and the triumph of the demons.

85 The extracts from the Arabic histories of Sicily are given in Abulfeda (Annal. Moslem p 271–273), and in the first volume of Muratori's Scriptores Rerum Italicarum M de Guignes (Hist des Huns, tom 1 p 363 364) has added some important facts

86 One of the most eminent Romans (Gratianus magister militum et Romani palatii superista) was accused of declaring Quia Franci nihil nobis boni faciunt, neque adjutorium præbent sed magis quæ nostra sunt violenter tollunt Quare non advocamus Græcos et cum eis fœdus pacis componentes Francorum regem et gentem de nostro regno et dominatione expellimus? Anastasius in Leone IV p 199 [ap Muratori Script. R I iii p 246]

87 Voltaire (Hist Générale tom ii c 38, p 124) appears to be remarkably struck with the character of Pope Leo IV I have borrowed his general expression but the sight of the forum has furnished me with a more distinct and lively image.

88 De Guignes Hist Générale des Huns, tom. i p 363 364 Cardonne Hist de l Afrique et de l Espagne sous la Domination des Arabes tom ii p 24 25 I observe and cannot reconcile the dif ference of these writers in the succession of the Aglabites

89 Beretti (Chorographia Italiæ Medii Ævi p 106 108) has illustrated Centumcellæ Leopolis Civitas Leonina, and the other places of the Roman duchy

90 The Arabs and the Greeks are alike silent concerning the invasion of Rome by the Africans. The Latin chronicles do not afford much instruc tion (see the Annals of Baronius and Pagi) Our authentic and contemporary guide for the Popes of the ninth century is Anastasius librarian of the Roman church His Life of Leo IV contains twenty four pages (p 175–199 edit Paris) and if a great part consists of superstitious trifles we must blame or commend his hero who was much oftener in a church than in a camp

91 The same number was applied to the follow ing circumstances in the life of Motassem he was the eighth of the Abbassides he reigned eight years eight months and eight days left eight sons eight daughters, eight thousand slaves eight millions of gold

92 Amorium is seldom mentioned by the old geographers and totally forgotten in the Roman Itineraries After the sixth century it became an episcopal see and at length the metropolis of the new Galatia (Carol Scto Paulo Geograph Sacra p 234) The city rose again from its ruins, if we should read Ammuria not Anguria in the text of the Nubian geographer (p 236)

94 Abulpharagius (Dynast. p 167 168) relates one of these singular transactions on the bridge of the river Lamus in Cilicia the limit of the two empires and one day's journey westward of Tarsus (D Anville Géographie Ancienne tom ii p 91) Four thousand four hundred and sixty Moslems, eight hundred women and children one hundred confederates were exchanged for an equal number of Greeks They passed each other in the middle of the bridge and when they reached their respective friends they shouted Allah Acbar and Kyrie Eleison. Many of the prisoners of Amorium were probably among them but in the same year (A.H. 231) the most illustrious of them the forty two martyrs, were beheaded by the caliph's orders.

95 Constantin Porphyrogenitus in Vit. Basil. c. 61, p 186 [p 301, ed Bonn] These Saracens were indeed treated with peculiar severity as pirates and renegadoes

97 M de Guignes, who sometimes leaps and sometimes stumbles in the gulf between Chinese and Mohammedan story thinks he can see that these Turks are the Hoei ke alias the Kao-tche or high waggons that they were divided into fifteen hordes from China and Siberia to the dominions of the caliphs and Samanides etc. (Hist. des Huns, tom iii p 1–33 124–131)

98 He changed the old name of Sumere, or Samara into the fanciful title of Ser menrai that which gives pleasure at first sight (D Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale p 808 D Anville, l Euphrate et le Tigre p 97 98)

99 Take a specimen the death of the caliph Motaz Correptum pedibus pertrahunt et sudibus probe permulcant et spoliatum laceris vestibus in sole collocant præ cujus acerrimo æstu pedes alternos attolebat et demittebat Adstantium aliquis misero colaphos continuo ingerebat quos ille objectis manibus avertere studebat Quo facto traditus tortori fuit totoque triduo cibo potuque prohibitus Suffocatus etc. (Abulfeda p 206) Of the caliph Mohtadi he says cervices ipsi per petuis ictibus contundebant testiculosque pedibus conculcabant (p 208)

100. See under the reigns of Motassem Motawakkel Montasser Mostain Motaz Mohtadi, and Motamed in the Bibliotheque of D'Herbelot, and the now familiar Annals of Elmacin, Abulpharagius and Abulfeda

101 For the sect of the Carmathians consult Elmacin (Hist Saracen p 219, 224, 229, 231 238, 241 243) Abulpharagius (Dynast p 179–182), Abulfeda (Annal Moslem. p 218 219, etc 245, 265 274) and D Herbelot (Bibliothèque Orien tale, p 256–258 635) I find some inconsistencies of theology and chronology which it would not be easy nor of much importance to reconcile 102. Hyde Syntagma Dissertat tom ii. p 57 in Hist. Shahiludii.

103 The dynasties of the Arabian empire may be studied in the Annals of Elmacin Abulpharagius, and Abulfeda under the proper years in the dictionary of D Herbelot under the proper names. The tables of M de Guignes (Hist des Huns, tom. i.) exhibit a general chronology of the East, interspersed with some historical anecdotes but his attachment to national blood has some times confounded the order of time and place

104. The Aglabites and Edrisites are the professed subject of M. de Cardonne (Hist de l Afrique et de l'Espagne sous la Domination des Arabes tom. ii. p 1–63)

105. To escape the reproach of error I must criticise the inaccuracies of M. de Guignes (tom. i. p 359) concerning the Edrisites 1 The dynasty and city of Fez could not be founded in the year of the Hegira 173, since the founder was a posthumous child of a descendant of Ali who fled from Mecca in the year 168 2 This founder Edris the son of Edris, instead of living to the improbable age of 120 years A.H. 313 died A H 214, in the prime of manhood. 3 The dynasty ended A H. 307 twenty three years sooner than it is fixed by the historian of the Huns. See the accurate Annals of Abulfeda p. 158 159, 185 238

106 The dynasties of the Taherites and Soffarides, with the rise of that of the Samanides are described in the original history and Latin version of Mirchond yet the most interesting facts had already been drained by the diligence of M. D Herbelot

107 M de Guignes (Hist des Huns tom iii p 124 154) has exhausted the Toulunides and Ikshidites of Egypt, and thrown some light on the Carmathians and Hamadanites

108. Hic est ultimus chalifah qui multum atque sæpius pro concione peroraret. Fuit etiam ultimus qui otium cum erud tis et facetis hominibus fallere hilariterque agere soleret. Ultimus tandem chalifarum cui sumtus, stipendia reditus et thesauri, culinæ, cæteraque omnis aulica pompa priorum chalifarum ad instar comparata fuerint. Videbimus enim paullo post quem ind gnis et servilibus ludibriis exagitati quam ad humilem fortunam altimumque contemptum abjecti fuerint hi quondam potentissimi totius terrarum Orientalium orbis domini. Abulfed Annal Mosl m p 261 I have given this passage as the manner and tone of Abulfeda, but the cast of Latin eloquence belongs more properly to R iske. The Arabian historian (p 255, 257 261–269, 283 etc.) has supplied me with the most interesting facts of this paragraph.

109 Their master on a similar occasion showed himself of a more indulgent and tolerating spirit. Ahmed Ebn Hanbal the head of one of the four orthodox sects, was born at Bagdad A.H. 164, and died there A.H. 241 He fought and suffered in the dispute concerning the creation of the Koran.

110 The office of vizir was superseded by the emir al Omra Imperator Imperatorum a title first instituted by Radhi and which merged at length in the Bowides and Seljukides vectigalibus et tributis et curiis per omnes regiones præfecit jussitque in omnibus suggestus nominis ejus in concionibus mentionem fieri (Abulpharagius Dynast p 199) It is likewise mentioned by Elmacin (p. 254, 255)

111 Liutprand whose choleric temper was embittered by his uneasy situation suggests the names of reproach and contempt more applicable to Nicephorus than the vain titles of the Greeks Ecce venit stella matutina surgit Eous reverberat obtutu solis radios, pallida Saracenorum mors Nicephorus μ δων

112 Notwithstanding the insinuation of Zonaras, καὶ εἰ μὴ etc (tom. ii. l xvi. [c. 23] p 197) it is an undoubted fact that Crete was completely and finally subdued by Nicephorus Phocas (Pagi Critica tom iii. p 873–875 Meursius, Creta l. iii. c. 7 tom. iii. p 464 465)

113. A Greek Life of St. Nicon the Armenian was found in the Sforza library and translated into Latin by the Jesuit Sirmond for the use of Cardinal Baronius. This contemporary legend casts a ray of light on Crete and Peloponnesus in the tenth century He found the newly recovered island fœdis detestandæ Agarenorum superstitionis vestigiis adhuc plenam ac refertam but the victorious missionary perhaps with some carnal aid, ad baptismum omnes veræque fidei disciplinam pepulit. Ecclesiis per totam insulam ædificatis etc (Annal. Eccles. A.D 961)

114. Elmacin, Hist Saracen p 278 279 Liutprand was disposed to depreciate the Greek power yet he owns that Nicephorus led against Assyria an army of eighty thousand men

115 Ducenta fere millia hominum numerabat urbs (Abulfeda Annal Moslem p 281) of Mopsuestia or Masifa Mampsysta Mansista Mamista as it is corruptly or perhaps more correctly styled in the middle ages (Wesseling Itinerar p 580) Yet I cannot credit this extreme populousness a few years after the testimony of the emperor Leo ὁ γὰρ πολυπληθία στρατ το ι Κιλιξι βαρβάροις ἐστίν (Tactica, c. xviii. [§ 139] in Meursii Oper tom vi. p 817)

116 The text of Leo the Deacon in the corrupt names of Emeta and Myctarsim reveals the cities of Amida and Martyropolis (Miafarekin see Abulfeda Geograph p 245 vers Reiske) Of the former Leo observes, urbs munita et illustris of the latter clara atque consp cua opibusque et pecore, reliquis ejus provinciis urbibus atque oppidis longe præstans.

117 Ut et Ecbatana pergeret Agarenorumque regiam everteret aiunt enim urbium quæ usquam sunt ac toto orbe existunt felicissimam esse auroque ditissimam (Leo Diacon. apud Pagium, tom iv p 34) This splendid description suits only with Bagdad and cannot possibly apply either to Hamadan the true Ecbatana (D Anville, Géog Ancienne tom ii p 237) or Tauris which has been commonly mistaken for that city The name of Ecbatana in the same indefinite sense is transferred by a more classic authority (Cicero pro Lege Manilià, c 4) to the royal seat of Mithridates king of Pontus

Chapter LIII

1 The epithet of Πορφυρογέννητος Porphyrogenitus, born in the purple, is elegantly defined by Claudian —

Ardua privatos nescit fortuna Penates
Et regnum cum luce dedit Cognata potestas
Excepit Tyrio venerabile pignus in ostro

And Ducange in his Greek and Latin Glossaries produces many passages expressive of the same idea

2 A splendid MS of Constantine, de Cæremoniis Aulæ et Ecclesiæ Byzantinæ wandered from Constantinople to Buda Frankfort and Leipsic where it was published in a splendid edition by Leich and Reiske (A D 1751 in folio) with such lavish praise as editors never fail to bestow on the worthy or worthless object of their toil

4 The Tactics of Leo and Constantine are published with the aid of some new MSS in the great edition of the works of Meursius by the learned John Lami (tom vi p 531–920, 1211–1417, Florent 1745) yet the text is still corrupt and mutilated the version is still obscure and faulty The Imperial library of Vienna would afford some valuable materials to a new editor (Fabric Biblioth Græc. tom vi p 369 370)

5 On the subject of the Basilics Fabricius (Biblioth Græc. tom xii p 425–514) and Heineccius (Hist Juris Romani p 396–499) and Giannone (Istoria Civile di Napoli tom i p 450–458) as historical civilians may be usefully consulted Forty one books of this Greek code have been published, with a Latin version by Charles Annibal Fabrottus (Paris 1647) in seven tomes in folio four other books have been since discovered and are inserted in Gerard Meerman s Novus Thesaurus Juris Civ et Canon tom v Of the whole work the sixty books John Leunclavius has printed (Basil 1575) an eclogue or synopsis. The 113 novels or new laws of Leo, may be found in the Corpus Juris Civilis

6 I have used the last and best edition of the Geoponics (by Nicolas Niclas Lipsiæ 1781 2 vols in octavo) I read in the preface that the same emperor restored the long forgotten systems of rhetoric and philosophy and his two books of Hippiatrica or Horse physic were published at Paris 1530 in folio (Fabric Biblioth Græc. tom. vi. p 493–500)

7 Of these fifty three books or titles only two have been preserved and printed—de Legationibus (by Fulvius Ursinus Antwerp 1582 and Daniel Hœschelius, August Vindel 1603) and de Virtutibus et Vitiis (by Henry Valesius or de Valois Paris 1634)

8 The life and writings of Simeon Metaphrastes are described by Hankius (de Scriptoribus Byzant p 418–460) This biographer of the saints indulged himself in a loose paraphrase of the sense or nonsense of more ancient acts His Greek rhetoric is again paraphrased in the Latin version of Surius and scarcely a thread can be now visible of the original texture

9 According to the first book of the Cyropædia professors of tactics a small part of the science of war, were already instituted in Persia by which Greece must be understood A good edition of all the Scriptores Tactici would be a task not unworthy of a scholar His industry might discover some new MSS and his learning might illustrate the military history of the ancients But this scholar should be likewise a soldier and alas! Quintus Icilius is no more

10 After observing that the demerit of the Cappadocians rose in proportion to their rank and riches he inserts a more pointed epigram which is ascribed to Demodocus —

κάτθανε γευσαμένη αἵματος ἰοβόλου

The sting is precisely the same with the French epigram against Fréron Un serpent mordit Jean Fréron—Eh bien? Le serpent en mourut But as the Paris wits are seldom read in the Anthology I should be curious to learn through what channel it was conveyed for their imitation (Constantin Porphyrogen de Themat c ii (tom iii p 21 ed Bonn] Brunck Analect. Græc. tom. ii. p 56 Brodæi Anthologia l. ii p 244)

11 The Legatio Liutprandi Episcopi Cremonensis ad Nicephorum Phocam is inserted in Muratori, Scriptores Rerum Italicarum, tom. ii pars. i.

12 See Constantine de Thematibus, in Banduri, tom. i. p 1–30, who owns that the word is οὐκ ἀρχαῖα. Θέμα is used by Maurice (Stratagem l ii. c. 2) for a legion, from whence the name was easily transferred to its post or province (Ducange Gloss. Græc. tom. i. p 487 488) Some etymologies are attempted for the Opsician, Optimatian Thracesian, themes.

13. Ἄγιος πέλαγος as it is styled by the modern Greeks, from which the corrupt names of Archipelago, l'Archipel, and the Arches have been transformed by geographers and seamen (D Anville, Géographie Ancienne tom. i. p 281 Analyse de la Carte de la Grèce, p 60) The numbers of monks or caloyers in all the islands and the adjacent mountain of Athos (Observations de Belon fol. 32, verso) Monte Santo might justify the epithet of holy ἅγιος a slight alteration from the original αἰγαῖος imposed by the Dorians who in their dialect, gave the figurative name of αἶγες or goats, to the bounding waves (Vossius apud Cellarium, Geograph Antiq tom. i. p 829)

14. According to the Jewish traveller who had visited Europe and Asia, Constantinople was equalled only by Bagdad, the great city of the Ismaelites (Voyage de Benjamin de Tudèle par Baratier tom. i. c. 5 p 46)

15. Ἐσθλαβώθη δὲ πᾶσα ἡ χώρα καὶ γέγονε βάρβαρος says Constantine (Thematibus l. ii. c. 6 p 25 [tom. iii. p 53, ed. Bonn]) in a style as barbarous as the idea, which he confirms as usual, by a foolish epigram. The epitomiser of Strabo likewise observes, καὶ νῦν δὲ πᾶσαν Ἤπειρον καὶ Ἑλλάδα σχεδὸν καὶ Πελοπόννησον καὶ Μακεδονίαν Σκύθαι Σκλάβοι νέμονται (l. vii. p 98 edit. Hudson. p. 1251 edit. Casaub [Almel]) a passage which leads Dodwell a weary dance (Geograph Minor tom. ii. dissert vi. p 170–191) to enumerate the inroads of the Sclavi, and to fix the date (A.D 980) of this petty geographer

17 Constantin. de Administrando Imperio [de Thematibus] l. ii. c. 50 51 52 [tom. iii p 52 ed. Bonn]

18. The rock of Leucate was the southern promontory of his island and diocese. Had he been the exclusive guardian of the Lover's Leap so well known to the readers of Ovid (Epist. Sappho) and the Spectator he might have been the richest prelate of the Greek church

19. Leucatensis mihi jura it episcopus, quotannis ecclesiam suam debere Nicephoro aureos centum persolvere similiter et ceteras plus minusve secundum vires suas. (Liutprand in Legat. p 489 [Murat. Scrip R. I tom. ii.])

20 See Constantine (in Vit. Basil. c. 74, 75 76 p 195, 197 [p. 317–320, ed Bonn] in Script post Theophanem) who allows himself to use many technical or barbarous words barbarous, says he τῇ τῶν πολλῶν ἀμαθίᾳ καλὸν γὰρ ἐπὶ τούτοις κοινολεκτεῖν Ducange labours on some but he was not a weaver

21 The manufactures of Palermo as they are described by Hugo Falcandus (Hist Sicula in proem. in Muratori Script. Rerum Italicarum, tom vii. p 256) are a copy of those of Greece. Without transcribing his declamatory sentences, which I have softened in the text, I shall observe that in this passage the strange word exarentasmata is very properly changed for exanthemata by Carusius, the first editor Falcandus lived about the year 1190.

22. Inde ad interiora Græciæ progressi, Corinthum Thebas Athenas antiquâ nobilitate celebres expugnant et, maximâ ibidem prædâ direptâ opifices etiam qui Sericos pannos texere solent, ob ignominiam Imperatoris illius suique principis gloriam, captivos deducunt. Quos Rogerius in Palermo Siciliæ metropoli collocans, artem texendi suos edocere præcepit et exhinc prædicta ars illa prius à Græcis tantum inter Christianos habita Romanis patere cœpit ingeniis. (Otho Frisingen de Gestis Frederici I l. i. c. 33 in Muratori Script. Ital. tom. vi. p 668) This exception allows the bishop to celebrate Lisbon and Almeria in sericorum pannorum opificio prænobilissimæ (in Chron. apud Muratori, Annali d Italia, tom ix. p 415)

23 Nicetas in Manuel, l. ii. c. 8 p 65 [p 129, 130 ed Bonn] He describes these Greeks as skilled εὐητρίους ὀθόνας ὑφαίνειν ὡς ἱστῷ προσανέχοντας τῶν ἑξαμίτων καὶ χρυσοπάστων στολῶν

24. Hugo Falcandus styles them nobiles officinas. The Arabs had not introduced silk, though they had planted canes and made sugar in the plain of Palermo

25 See the Life of Castruccio Casticani, not by Machiavel but by his more authentic biographer Nicholas Tegrimi. Muratori, who has inserted it in the eleventh volume of his Scriptores, quotes this curious passage in his Italian Antiquities (tom. i. dissert xxv p 378)

26 From the MS statutes, as they are quoted by Muratori in his Italian Antiquities (tom ii. dissert. xxx. p 46–48)

27 The broad silk manufacture was established in England in the year 1620 (Anderson s Chronological Deduct on vol. ii p 4) but it is to the revocation of the Edict of Nantes that we owe the Spitalfields colony

28 Voyage de Benjamin de Tudele tom i. c. 5, p 44 52 The Hebrew text has been translated into French by that marvellous child Baratier who has added a volume of crude learning The errors and fictions of the Jewish rabbi are not a sufficient ground to deny the reality of his travels.

29. See the continuator of Theophanes (l. iv p.

107 [ed Par p 172, ed Bonn]) Cedrenus (p 544 [tom ii p 158 ed Bonn]), and Zonaras (tom ii l xvi [c 2] p 157)

30 Zonaras (tom ii l. xvii [c. 8] p 225) instead of pounds, uses the more classic appellation of talents which, in a literal sense and strict computation, would multiply sixty fold the treasure of Basil

31 For a copious and minute description of the Imperial palace, see the Constantinop Christiana (l ii. c 4 p 113–123) of Ducange the Tillemont of the middle ages Never has laborious Germany produced two antiquarians more laborious and accurate than these two natives of lively France

32 The Byzantine palace surpasses the Capitol, the palace of Pergamus the Rufinian wood (φαιδρὸν ογαλμα) the temple of Hadrian at Cyzicus the Pyramids, the Pharus etc according to an epigram (Antholog Græc l iv p 498 499 Brodæi apud Wechel) ascribed to Julian ex præfect of Egypt Seventy-one of his epigrams some lively are collected in Brunck (Analect. Græc tom ii p 493–510) but this is wanting

34 See the anonymous continuator of Theophanes (p 59 61, 86 [p 94, 98 139 ed Bonn]) whom I have followed in the neat and concise abstract of Le Beau (Hist du Bas Empire tom xiv p 436 438)

35 In aureo triclinio quæ præstantior est pars potentissime degens (the usurper Romanus) cæteras partes (filius) distribuerat (Liutprand Hist l. v c. 9 p 465) For this lax signification of Triclinium (ædificium tria vel plura κλίνη scilicet στέγη complectens) see Ducange (Gloss Græc et Observations sur Joinville p 240) and Reiske (ad Con stantinum de Ceremoniis p 7)

37 See the account of her journey munificence, and testament in the Life of Basil by his grandson Constantine (c. 74 75 76 p 195–197 [Theophan. Contin p 227 sqq 317 sqq ed Bonn])

38 Carsamatium (καρζιμάδες Ducange Gloss) Græci vocant amputatis virilibus et virgâ puerum eunuchum quos Verdunenses mercatores ob immensum lucrum facere solent et in Hispaniam ducere (Liutprand l vi. c. 3 p 470) The last abomination of the abominable slave-trade! Yet I am surprised to find in the tenth century such active speculations of commerce in Lorraine.

39 See the Alexiad (l iii p 78 79 [ed Par tom 1 p 147 sq ed Bonn]) of Anna Comnena who except in filial piety may be compared to Mademoiselle de Montpensier In her awful reverence for titles and forms she styles her father Επιστημονάρχης the inventor of this royal art, the τέχνη τεχνων and ἐπιστήμη ἐπιστημων

40 Στέμμα στέφανος διάδημα see Reiske, ad Ceremoniale, p 14, 15 Ducange has given a learned dissertation on the crowns of Constantinople Rome, France etc. (sur Joinville, xxv p. 289–303) but of his thirty four models none exactly tally with Anna s description

41 Pars exstans curis solo diademate dispar,
Ordine pro rerum vocitatus Cura-Palati

says the African Corippus (de Laudibus Justini, l. 1 136) and in the same century (the sixth) Cassiodorus represents him who virgâ aureâ decoratus inter obsequia numerosa, ante pedes Regios primus incederet (Variar vii 5) But this great officer (unknown) ἀνεπίγνωστος exercising no func*tion* νῦν δὲ οὐδεμίαν was cast down by the modern Greeks to the fifteenth rank (Codin c. 5 p 65 [ed. Par p 35 ed Bonn])

42 Nicetas (in Manuel, l vii c. 1 [p 62 ed. Bonn]) defines him ως ἡ Λατίνων [βούλεται] φωνὴ Καγκελλάριον ως δ Ελληνες εἴποιεν λογοθέτην Yet the epithet of μέγας was added by the elder Andronicus (Ducange tom 1 p 8 2 823)

43 From Leo I (A D 470) the Imperial ink which is still visible on some original acts was a mixture of vermilion and cinnabar or purple The emperor s guardians who shared in this prerogative always marked in green ink the indiction and and the month See the Dictionnaire Diplomatique (tom 1 p 511–513) a valuable abridgment

45 Tagerman is the Arabic name of an interpreter (D Herbelot p 854, 855) πρωτος των ἑρμηνέων οὓς κοινως ὀνομάζουσι δραγομάνους says Codinus (c. v No 70, p 67 [p 40, ed Bonn]) See Villehardouin (No 96) Busbequius (Epist. iv p 338), and Ducange (Observations sur Villehardouin and Gloss Græc et Latin)

46 Κονόσταυλος or κοντόσταυλος a corruption from the Latin Comes stabuli or the French Connétable In a military sense it was used by the Greeks in the eleventh century, at least as early as in France.

47 It was directly borrowed from the Normans. In the twelfth century Giannone reckons the admiral of Sicily among the great officers

48 This sketch of honours and offices is drawn from George Codinus Curopalata who survived the taking of Constantinople by the Turks his elaborate though trifling work (de Officiis Ecclesiæ et Aulæ C. P) has been illustrated by the notes of Goar and the three books of Gretser a learned Jesuit

49 The respectful salutation of carrying the hand to the mouth ad os is the root of the Latin word adoro adorare See our learned Selden (vol. iii, p 143–145 942) in his Titles of Honour It seems, from the first book of Herodotus to be of Persian origin

50. The two embassies of Liutprand to Constantinople, all that he saw or suffered in the Greek capital, are pleasantly described by himself (Hist. l. vi. c 1–4, p 469–471 Legatio ad Nicephorum Phocam, p 479–489)

51 Among the amusements of the feast a boy balanced on his forehead a pike or pole twenty four feet long with a cross bar of two cubits a little below the top Two boys, naked, though cinctured (campestrati) together and singly climbed stood, played, descended etc ita me stupidum reddidit utrum mirabilius nescio (p 470 [Liutpr Hist. vi. c. 43]) At another repast an homily of Chrysostom on the Acts of the Apostles was read elatâ voce non Latine (p. 483 [Murat S. I t. ii.])

52 Gala is not improbably derived from Cala, or Caloat, in Arabic a robe of honour (Reiske, Not in Ceremon p 84)

53. Πολυχρο ἰζ ω is explained by εὐφημίζειν (Codin. c. 7 [c. 6, p 53 ed. Bonn] Ducange, Gloss. Græc. tom. i. p 1199)

54. Κονσέρβετ Δεοὺς ἡμπέριου μ βίστρο μ — βικτωρ ψ ιμ εσ — βήβητε Δόμη ι Ημι ρά ρες ἠν μούλ οι ἄννος (Ceremon. c. 75 p 215 [tom. i. p 370, ed Bonn]) The want of the Latin V obliged the Greeks to employ their β nor do they regard quantity Till he recollected the true language, these strange sentences might puzzle a professor

55. Πολυχρονίζουσι Βαραγγοι, α ἀπὸ πάτριον καὶ οι γλωσσαν αὐτω ἤγο Ιγκλινιστί (Codin p. 90 [p. 57 ed. Bonn]) I wish he had preserved the words, however corrupt, of their English acclamation.

56. For all these ceremonies see the professed work of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, with the notes, or ather dissertations, of his German editors, Leich and Reiske. 57 Et privato Othoni nuper atque eadem dicentī nota adulatio (Tacit Hist. i 85)

58. The thirteenth chapter de Administratione Imperii, may be explained and rectified by the Familiæ Byzantinæ of Ducange.

59 Sequiturque nefas! Egyptia conjunx (Virgil, Æneid viii. 686) Yet this Egyptian wife was the daughter of a long line of kings. Quid te mutavit. (says Antony in a private letter to Augustus) an quod reginam ineo? Uxor mea est (Sueton in August. c. 69) Yet I much question (for I cannot stay to inquire) whether the triumvir ever dared to celebrate his marriage either with Roman or Egyptian rites

60 Berenicem invitus invitam dimisit (Suetonius in Tito c. 7) Have I observed elsewhere that this Jewish beauty was at this time above fifty years of age? The judicious Racine has most discreetly suppressed both her age and her country

61 Constantine was made to praise the εὐγένεια and περιφάνεια of the Franks, with whom he claimed a private and public alliance. The French writers (Isaac Casaubon in Dedicat Polybii) are highly delighted with these compliments.

62 Constantine Porphyrogenitus (de Administrat Imp c. 26) exhibits a pedigree and Life of the illustrious king Hugo (περιβλέπτου ῥηγὸς Οὔγωνος) A more correct idea may be formed from the Criticism of Pagi the Annals of Muratori and the Abridgment of St Marc A D 925–946

63 After the mention of the three goddesses, Liutprand very naturally adds, et quoniam non rex solus iis abutebatur earum nati ex incertis patribus originem ducunt (Hist l. iv c. 6) for the marriage of the younger Bertha, see Hist. l. v c. 5 for the incontinence of the elder dulcis exercitio Hymenæi l. ii c. 15 for the virtues and vices of Hugo l. iii c. 5. Yet it must not be forgot that the bishop of Cremona was a lover of scandal.

64. Licet illa Imperatrix Græca sibi et aliis fuisset satis utilis et optima etc. is the preamble of an inimical writer apud Pagi tom. iv A.D 989, No 3 Her marriage and principal actions may be found in Muratori Pagi and St. Marc, under the proper years.

65. Cedrenus tom ii. p 699 [p 444 ed. Bonn] Zonaras tom ii. p 221 [l. xvii c 7] Elmacin Hist Saracenica l. iii. c. 6 Nestor apud Levesque tom ii p 112 Pagi Critica A.D 987 No 6 a singular concourse! Wolodomir and Anne are ranked among the saints of the Russian church Yet we know his vices and are ignorant of her virtues.

66 Henricus Primus duxit uxorem Scythicam [et] Russam filiam regis Jeroslai. An embassy of bishops was sent into Russia and the father gratanter filiam cum multis donis misit This event happened in the year 1051 See the passages of the original chronicles in Bouquet's Historians of France [tom xi p 29 159 161 319 384 481] Voltaire might wonder at this alliance but he should not have owned his *ignorance of the coun*try rel gion etc of Jeroslaus—a name so conspicuous in the Russian annals

67 A constitution of Leo the Philosopher (lxxviii) ne senatus-consulta amplius fiant speaks the language of naked despotism ἐξ οὗ τὸ μόναρχον ρά ἡ τουτων ἀνήπται διοίκη ιν καὶ ἄκαιρον καὶ μά αιο ὁ ἄχρησ ον με ἀ τω χρείαν παρεχ μενων συ απτ θαι

68 Codinus (de Officiis c. xvii. p 120 121 [p 87 ed Bonn]) gives an idea of this oath so strong to the church πιο ὀς ἱ γεη ιος δο λος αἱ ἰδς τῆς

ἁγίας ἐκκλησίας so weak to the people καὶ ἀπέχεσθαι φόνων καὶ ἀκρωτηριασμῶν καὶ τῶν ὁμοίων τούτοις κατὰ τὸ δυνατὸν

69 If we listen to the threats of Nicephorus to the ambassador of Otho Nec est in mari domino tuo classium numerus Navigantium fortitudo mihi soli inest, qui eum classibus aggrediar, bello mari timas ejus civitates demoliar et quæ fluminibus sunt vicina redigam in favillam (Liutprand in Legat ad Nicephorum Phocam in Muratori Scriptores Rerum Italicarum tom ii pars i p 481) He observes in another place qui cæteris præstant Venetici sunt et Amalphitani

70 Nec ipsa capiet eum (the emperor Otho) in quâ ortus est pauper et pellicea Saxonia pecuniâ quâ pollemus omnes nationes super eum invitabimus et quasi Keramicum [id est, vas fictile] confringemus (Liutprand in Legat p 487) The two books de Administrando Imperio perpetually inculcate the same policy

71 The nineteenth chapter of the Tactics of Leo (Meurs Opera tom vi p 825–848) which is given more correct from a manuscript of Gudius by the laborious Fabricius (Biblioth Græc tom. vi. p 372–379) relates to the Naumachia or naval war

72 Even of fifteen and sixteen rows of oars in the navy of Demetrius Poliorcetes These were for real use the forty rows of Ptolemy Philadelphus were applied to a floating palace whose tonnage according to Dr Arbuthnot (Tables of Ancient Coins etc p 231–236) is compared as 4½ to 1, with an English 100-gun ship

73 The Dromones of Leo etc are so clearly described with two tier of oars that I must censure the version of Meursius and Fabricius who pervert the sense by a blind attachment to the classic appellation of Triremes The Byzantine historians are sometimes guilty of the same inaccuracy

74 Constantin Porphyrogen in Vit Basil c. lxi p 185 He calmly praises the stratagem as a βουλὴν συνετὴν καὶ σοφὴν but the sailing round Peloponnesus is described by his terrified fancy as a circumnavigation of a thousand miles

75 The Continuator of Theophanes (l iv p 122 123 [p 197 ed Bonn]) names the successive stations the castle of Lulum near Tarsus Mount Argæus Isamus Egilus the hill of Mamas, Cyrisus Mocilus the hill of Auxentius, the sun-dial of the Pharus of the great palace He affirms that the news were transmitted ἐν ἀκάρει in an indivisible moment of time Miserable amplification, which by saying too much says nothing How much more forcible and instructive would have been the definition of three or six or twelve hours!

76 See the Ceremoniale of Constantine Porphyrogenitus l ii c 44 p 376–392 [tom i p 651 sqq ed Bonn] A critical reader will discern some inconsistencies in different parts of this account but they are not more obscure or more stubborn than the establishment and effectives the present and fit for duty the rank and file and the private of a modern return which retain in proper hands the knowledge of these profitable mysteries.

77 See the fifth, sixth, and seventh chapters, περὶ ὅπλων περὶ ὁπλίσεως and περὶ γυμνασίας in the Tactics of Leo with the corresponding passages in those of Constantine

78 They observe τῆς γὰρ τοξείας παντελῶς ἀμεληθείσης ἐν τοῖς Ῥωμαίοις τὰ πολλὰ νῦν εἴωθε σφάλματα γενέσθαι (Leo Tactic p 581 [c. vi §5] Constantin p 1216) Yet such were not the maxims of the Greeks and Romans, who despised the loose and distant practice of archery

79 Compare the passages of the Tactics, p. 669 and 721, and the twelfth with the eighteenth chapter

80 In the preface to his Tactics Leo very freely deplores the loss of discipline and the calamities of the times and repeats without scruple (Proem p. 537) the reproaches of ἀμέλεια ἀταξία ἀγυμνασία, δειλία etc nor does it appear that the same censures were less deserved in the next generation by the disciples of Constantine

81 See in the Ceremonial (l ii c. 19 p 353 [tom i p 610 sq ed Bonn]) the form of the emperor's trampling on the necks of the captive Saracens, while the singers chanted Thou hast made my enemies my footstool! and the people shouted forty times the kyrie eleison

82 Leo observes (Tactic p 668) that a fair open battle against any nation whatsoever is ἐπισφαλὲ and ἐπικίνδυνον the words are strong and the remark is true yet if such had been the opinion of the old Romans, Leo had never reigned on the shores of the Thracian Bosphorus.

83 Zonaras (tom ii l xvi [c 25] p 202 03) and Cedrenus (Compend p 668 [p 658 ed Par tom ii p 369 ed Bonn]), who relate the design of Nicephorus must unfortunately apply the epithet of γενναίως to the opposition of the patriarch

84 The eighth chapter of the tactics of the different nations is the most historical and useful of the whole collection of Leo The manners and arms of the Saracens (Tactic p 809–817 and a fragment from the Medicean MS in the preface of the sixth volume of Meursius) the Roman emperor was too frequently called upon to study

85 Παντὸς δὲ καὶ κακοῦ ἔργου τὸν Θεὸν εἶναι αἴτιον ὑποτίθενται καὶ πολέμοις χαίρειν λέγουσι τὸν Θεὸν τὸν διασκορπίζοντα ἔθνη τὰ τοὺς πολέμους θέλοντα Leon. Tactic p 809 [c 18 § 111]

86 Liutprand (p 484 485) relates and interprets the oracles of the Greeks and Saracens in which after the fashion of prophecy, the past is clear and historical the future is dark enigmatical and erroneous From this boundary of light and shade an impartial critic may commonly determine the date of the composition

87 The sense of this distinction is expressed by Abulpharagius (Dynast p 2 62 101) but I cannot recollect the passage in which it is conveyed by this lively apophthegm

88 Ex Francis, quo nomine tam Latinos quam

Teutones comprehendit ludum habuit (Liutprand in Legat. ad Imp Nicephorum, p 483 484) This extension of the name may be confirmed from Constantine (de Administrando Imperio l. ii. c. 27 28) and Eutychius (Annal. tom. i. p 55 56) who both lived before the Crusades. The testimonies of Abulpharagius (Dynast p 69) and Abulfeda (Præfat. ad Geograph.) are more recent.

89. On this subject of ecclesiastical and beneficiary discipline Father Thomassin (tom iii. l. i. c. 40, 45, 46 47) may be usefully consulted A general law of Charlemagne exempted the bishops from personal service but the opposite practice, which prevailed from the ninth to the fifteenth century is countenanced by the example or silence of saints and doctors You justify your cowardice by the holy canons, says Ratherius of Verona the canons likewise forbid you to whore and yet—

90. In the eighteenth chapter of his Tactics the emperor Leo has fairly stated the military vices and virtues of the Franks (whom Meursius ridiculously translates by Galli) and the Lombards or Langobards. See likewise the twenty-sixth Dissertation of Muratori de Antiquitatibus Italiæ medii Ævi.

91 Domini tui milites (says the proud Nicephorus) equitandi ignari, pedestris pugnæ sunt inscii scutorum magnitudo loricarum gravitudo ensium longitudo galearumque pondus neutrâ parte pugnare eos sinit ac subridens impedit, inquit et eos gastrimargia hoc est ventris ingluvies etc. Liutprand in Legat. p 480, 481

92 In Saxonia certo scio decentius ensibus pugnare quam calamis et prius mortem obire quam hostibus terga dare (Liutprand p 482)

93 Φρ γγοl οἶνον αἱ Λογίβ ρδοι λόγ ν ἐλευθ ρίας τιμ λλον ποιοῦνται ἀλλ οἱ μεν Λογίβ ρδοι τὸ πλεο της οὐλτης ἀρε ητ ν ἀπωλ σαν Leonis Tactica, c. 18 p 804. The emperor Leo died A D 911 an historical poem which ends in 916 and appears to have been composed in 940, by a native of Venetia, discriminates in these verses the manners of Italy and France

——Quid inertia bello
Pectora (Ubertus ait) duris prætenditis armis
O Itali? Pot us vobis sacra pocula cordi
Sæpius et stomachum nitidis laxare saginis
Elataque domos rutilo fulcire metallo
Non eadem Gallos similis vel cura remordet
Vicinas quibus est studium devincere terras,
Depressumque larem spoliis hinc inde coactis
Sustentare——

(Anonym. Carmen Panegyricum de Laudibus Berengarii Augusti, l. ii. in Muratori Script Rerum Italic. tom ii. pars i. p 395)

94. Justinian, says the historian Agathias (l v p. 157 [ed. Par p 306 ed. Bonn]) πρῶτος Ῥωμαίων αὐτοκ ρ ἀνόμ ἰ αἱ πράγμ ι Yet the specific title of Emperor of the Romans was not used at Constantinople till it had been claimed by the French and German emperors of old Rome.

95. Constantine Manasses reprobates this design in his barbarous verse
Τὴν πόλιν τὴν βασίλειαν ἀποκοσμησαι θέλω
Καὶ τὴν ἀρχὴ χαρίσασθαι τῇ τριχεμ λφ 1 μμβ
Ως εἶτις ἁβροστόλιστον ἀποκοσμήσει νύμφη
Καὶ γρα ν τινὰ τριώφωρον ως ὀρην ωραῖο ι
[v 3836 p 165, ed. Bonn] and it is confirmed by Theophanes Zonaras Cedrenus, and the Historia Miscella voluit in urbem Romam Imperium transferre (l. xix. p 137 in tom. i. pars i. of the Scriptores Rer Ital. of Muratori)

96 Paul. Diacon l. v c. 11 p 480 Anastasius in Vitis Pontificum, in Muratori s Collection, tom. iii. pars i. p 141

97 Consult the preface of Ducange (ad Gloss. Græc. medii Ævi) and the Novels of Justinian (vii lxvi.) The Greek language was κοινος the Latin was πα ριος to himself κυριωτατος to the πολιτείας σχημα, the system of government.

98 Ο μὴν ἀλλὰ αἱ λατινική λέξ ς αἱ φράσεις εἰσῖτε τους νόμους κρύπτουσα τοὺς συνεῖναι ταύτη μὴ δυναμένους ἰσχυρως ἀπετάκ ζε (Matth Blastares Hist. Juris apud Fabric. B bloth Græc. tom xii. p 369 [ed. Hamb 1724]) The Code and Pandects (the latter by Thalelæus) were translated in the time of Justinian (p 358 366) Theophilus, one of the original triumvirs, has left an elegant, though diffuse, paraphrase of the Institutes. On the other hand, Julian antecessor of Constantinople (A D 570) 120 Novellas Græcas eleganti Latinitate donavit (Heineccius Hist J R. p 396) for the use of Italy and Africa

99 Abulpharagius assigns the seventh Dynasty to the Franks or Romans the eighth to the Greeks the ninth to the Arabs. A tempore Augusti Cæsaris donec imperaret Tiberius Cæsar spatio circiter annorum 600 fuerunt (Imperatores C. P Patricii et præcipua pars exercitûs Roman [i.e. Franci] extra quod consiliarii scribæ et populus omnes Græci fuerunt deinde regnum etiam Græcanicum factum est (p 95 vers Pocock) The Christian and ecclesiastical studies of Abulpharagius gave him some advantage over the more ignorant Moslems

100. Primus ex Græcorum genere in Imperio confirmatus est or according to another MS of Paulus Diaconus (l iii. c 15 p 443) in Græcorum Imperio

101 Quia linguam mores vestesque mutâstis putavit Sanctissimus Papa (an audacious irony) ita vobis displicere Romanorum nomen His nuncios rogabant Nicephorum Imperatorem Græcorum ut cum Othone Imperatore Romanorum amicitiam faceret (Liutprand in Legatione, p 486)

102 By Laonicus Chalcocondyles who survived the last siege of Constantinople the account is thus stated (l. i. p 3 [p 6 ed Bonn]) Constantine transplanted his Latins of Italy to a Greek city of Thrace they adopted the language and manners of the natives who were confounded with them under the name of Romans. The kings of Constantinople, says the historian ἐπὶ τῷ σφας αὐτοὺς

ἁγίας ἐκκλησίας so weak to the people, καὶ ἀπέχεσθαι φόνων καὶ ἀκρωτηριασμῶν καὶ τῶν ὁμοίων τούτοις κατὰ τὸ δυνατόν

69 If we listen to the threats of Nicephorus to the ambassador of Otho Nec est in mari domino tuo classium numerus Navigantium fortitudo mihi soli inest qui eum classibus aggrediar, bello maritimas ejus civitates demoliar et quæ flumin ibus sunt vicina redigam in favillam (Liutprand in Legat ad Nicephorum Phocam in Muratori Scriptores Rerum Italicarum, tom ii pars i p 481) He observes in another place, qui cæteris præstant Venetici sunt et Amalphitani

70 Nec ipsa capiet eum (the emperor Otho) in quâ ortus est pauper et pellicea Saxonia pecuniâ quâ pollemus omnes nationes super eum invitabimus, et quasi Keramicum [id est vas fictile] confringemus (Liutprand in Legat p 487) The two books de Administrando Imperio perpetually inculcate the same policy

71 The nineteenth chapter of the Tactics of Leo (Meurs Opera tom vi p 825–848) which is given more correct from a manuscript of Gudius by the laborious Fabricius (Biblioth Græc tom. vi. p 372–379) relates to the Naumachia or naval war

72 Even of fifteen and sixteen rows of oars in the navy of Demetrius Poliorcetes These were for real use the forty rows of Ptolemy Philadelphus were applied to a floating palace whose tonnage according to Dr Arbuthnot (Tables of Ancient Coins etc p 231–236) is compared as 4½ to 1, with an English 100-gun ship

73 The Dromones of Leo etc are so clearly described with two tier of oars, that I must censure the version of Meursius and Fabricius who pervert the sense by a blind attachment to the classic appellation of Triremes The Byzantine historians are sometimes guilty of the same inaccuracy

74 Constantin Porphyrogen in Vit Basil c lxi. p 185 He calmly praises the stratagem as a βουλὴν συνετὴν καὶ σοφὴν but the sailing round Peloponnesus is described by his terrified fancy as a circumnavigation of a thousand miles

75 The Continuator of Theophanes (l iv p 122 123 [p 197 ed Bonn]) names the successive stations the castle of Lulum near Tarsus Mount Argæus Isamus Egilus the hill of Mamas Cyrisus Mocilus the hill of Auxentius the sun-dial of the Pharus of the great palace He affirms that the news were transmitted ἐν ἀκάρει in an indivisible moment of time Miserable amplification which by saying too much says nothing How much more forcible and instructive would have been the definition of three, or six or twelve hours!

76 See the Ceremoniale of Constantine Porphyrogenitus l ii c 44 p 376–392 [tom i p 651, sqq, ed Bonn] A critical reader will discern some inconsistencies in different parts of this account but they are not more obscure or more stubborn than the establishment and effectives the present and fit for duty the rank and file and the private of a modern return, which retain in proper hands the knowledge of these profitable mysteries.

77 See the fifth sixth and seventh chapters, περὶ ὅπλων περὶ ὁπλίσεως and περὶ γυμνασίας in the Tactics of Leo, with the corresponding passages in those of Constantine

78 They observe τῆς γὰρ τοξείας παντελῶς ἀμεληθείσης ἐν τοῖς Ῥωμαίοις τὰ πολλὰ νῦν εἴωθε σφάλματα γενέσθαι (Leo Tactic p 581 [c vi. §5] Constantin. p 1216) Yet such were not the maxims of the Greeks and Romans, who despised the loose and distant practice of archery

80 In the preface to his Tactics Leo very freely deplores the loss of discipline and the calamities of the times and repeats without scruple (Proem. p. 357) the reproaches of ἀμέλεια ἀταξία ἀγυμνασία, δειλία etc. nor does it appear that the same censures were less deserved in the next generation by the disciples of Constantine

81 See in the Ceremonial (l ii c 19 p 353 [tom i p 610 sq ed Bonn]) the form of the emperor s trampling on the necks of the captive Saracens while the singers chanted Thou hast made my enemies my footstool! and the people shouted forty times the kyrie eleison

82 Leo observes (Tactic p 668) that a fair open battle against any nation whatsoever is ἐπισφαλὲς and ἐπικίνδυνον the words are strong, and the remark is true yet if such had been the opinion of the old Romans Leo had never reigned on the shores of the Thracian Bosphorus

83. Zonaras (tom ii l xvi [c 25] p 202 203) and Cedrenus (Compend p 668 [p 658 ed Par tom ii p 369 ed Bonn]) who relate the design of Nicephorus must unfortunately apply the epithet of γενναίως to the opposition of the patriarch.

84 The eighth chapter of the tactics of the different nations is the most historical and useful of the whole collection of Leo The manners and arms of the Saracens (Tactic p 809–817, and a fragment from the Medicean MS in the preface of the sixth volume of Meursius) the Roman emperor was too frequently called upon to study

85 Παντὸς δὲ καὶ κακοῦ ἔργου τὸν Θεὸν εἶναι αἴτιον ὑποτίθενται καὶ πολέμοις χαίρειν λέγουσι τὸν Θεὸν τὸν διασκορπίζοντα ἔθνη τὰ τοὺς πολέμους θέλοντα Leon. Tactic p 809 [c 18 § 111]

86 Liutprand (p 484 485) relates and interprets the oracles of the Greeks and Saracens, in which after the fashion of prophecy the past is clear and historical the future is dark enigmatical and erroneous From this boundary of light and shade an impartial critic may commonly determine the date of the composition

87 The sense of this distinction is expressed by Abulpharagius (Dynast p 2 62 101) but I cannot recollect the passage in which it is conveyed by this lively apophthegm

iv p. 53, 54) explains the law of England as it was fixed at the Revolution The exceptions of Papists, and of those who deny the Trinity would still leave a tolerable scope for persecution if the national spirit were not more effectual than a hundred statutes.

42 I shall recommend to public animadversion two passages in Dr Priestley which betray the ultimate tendency of his opinions. At the first of these (Hist. of the Corruptions of Christianity vol. i. p 275, 276) the priest at the second (vol ii. p 484) the magistrate may tremble!

Chapter LV

1 All the passages of the Byzantine history which relate to the barbarians are compiled, methodised, and transcribed in a Latin version by the laborious John Gotthelf Stritter in his Memoriæ Populorum ad Danubium Pontum Euxinum, Paludem Mæotidem Caucasum Mare Caspium, et inde magis ad Septemtriones incolentium. Petropoli 1771–1779 in four tomes or six volumes, in 4to But the fashion has not enhanced the price of these raw materials.

2. Hist. vol. v p 8

3. Theophanes p 296–299 [tom. i. p 544–550 ed. Bonn] Anastasius p 113 Nicephorus C. P p 22 23. Theophanes places the old Bulgaria on the banks of the Atell or Volga but he deprives himself of all geographical credit by discharging that river into the Euxine Sea

4 Paul. Diacon. de Gestis Langobard. l. v c. 29, p 881 882 The apparent difference between the Lombard historian and the above mentioned Greeks is easily reconciled by Camillo Pellegrino (de Ducatû Beneventano dissert. vii. in the Scriptores Rerum Ital. tom. v p 186 187) and Beretti (Chorograph. Italiæ medii Evi p. 273 etc) This Bulgarian colony was planted in a vacant district of Samnium, and learned the Latin without forgetting their native language.

5 These provinces of the Greek idiom and empire are assigned to the Bulgarian kingdom in the dispute of ecclesiastical jurisdiction between the patriarchs of Rome and Constantinople (Baronius, Annal. Eccles. A.D 869, No 75)

6 The situation and royalty of Lychnidus or Achrida, are clearly expressed in Cedrenus (p 713 [tom. ii. p 468 ed. Bonn]) The removal of an archbishop or patriarch from Justinianea prima to Lychnidus, and at length to Ternovo has produced some perplexity in the ideas or language of the Greeks (Nicephorus Gregoras l. ii. c. 2 p 14, 15 [tom. i. p 27 ed. Bonn] Thomassin, Discipline de l'Eglise tom. i. l. i. c. 19 23) and a Frenchman (D'Anville) is more accurately skilled in the geography of their own country (Hist. de l Académie des Inscriptions tom. xxxi.)

7 Chalcocondyles, a competent judge, affirms the identity of the language of the Dalmatians, Bosnians Servians, Bulgarians Poles (de Rebus Turcicis, l. x. p. 283 [ed. Par p 530 ed. Bonn]) and elsewhere of the Bohemians (l. ii. p 38 [p 73 ed. Bonn]) The same author has marked the separate idiom of the Hungarians. [Gibbon s assertion that the Bulgarians are Slavonic in origin contradicts his statement in chapter xlii., where he had correctly identified the Bulgarians and the Huns as belonging to the Turkish and not to the Slavonic race.]

8 See the work of John Christopher de Jordan, de Originibus Sclavicis, Vindobonæ 1745, in four parts, or two volumes in folio His collections and researches are useful to elucidate the antiquities of Bohemia and the adjacent countries but his plan is narrow his style barbarous, his criticism shallow and the Aulic counsellor is not free from the prejudices of a Bohemian [The Wallachians are a Romance people, of Illyrian origin speaking a language derived from Latin.]

9. Jordan subscribes to the well known and probable derivation from Slava, laus gloria a word of familiar use in the different dialects and parts of speech and which forms the termination of the most illustrious names (de Originibus Sclavicis, pars i. p 40 pars iv p 101 102)

10. This conversion of a national into an appellative name appears to have arisen in the eighth century in the Oriental France where the princes and bishops were rich in Sclavonian captives, not of the Bohemian (exclaims Jordan) but of Sorabian race. From thence the word was extended to general use, to the modern languages and even to the style of the last Byzantines (see the Greek and Latin Glossaries of Ducange) The confusion of the Σερβλοι or Servians with the Latin Servi was still more fortunate and familiar (Constant. Porphyr de Administrando Imperio c. 32 p 99 [tom. iii. p 152 ed Bonn])

11 The emperor Constantine Porphyrogenitus most accurate for his own times, most fabulous for preceding ages describes the Sclavonians of Dalmatia ([de Admin. Imp] c. 29–36)

12 See the anonymous Chronicle of the eleventh century ascribed to John Sagorninus (p 94–102) and that composed in the fourteenth by the Doge Andrew Dandolo (Script. Rerum Ital. tom. xii. p 227–230)—the two oldest monuments of the history of Venice.

13 The first kingdom of the Bulgarians may be found under the proper dates in the Annals of Cedrenus and Zonaras. The Byzantine materials are collected by Stritter (Memoriæ Populorum tom. ii pars. ii p 441–647) and the series of their kings is disposed and settled by Ducange (Fam. Byzant p 305–318) transplanted by John Zimisces (A D 970) from Armenia to Thrace is mentioned by Zonaras (tom. ii. l xvii [c. 1] p 209) and Anna Comnena (Alexiad, l xiv p 450 etc [ed Par 1651])

24. The Alexiad of Anna Comnena (l v p 131 [t i p 232, ed Bonn] l vi p 154 155 [p 272 sq, ed Bonn] l xiv p 450–457 [ed Par 1651] with the Annotations of Ducange) records the transactions of her apostolic father with the Manichæans whose abominable heresy she was desirous of refuting

25 Basil a monk and the author of the Bogomiles, a sect of Gnostics who soon vanished (Anna Comnena Alexiad l xv p 486–494 [ed Par] Mosheim Hist Ecclesiastica, p 420)

26 Matt Paris Hist Major p 267 This passage of our English historian is alleged by Ducange in an excellent note on Villehardouin (No 208) who found the Paulicians at Philippopolis the friends of the Bulgarians

27 See Marsigli Stato Militare dell Imperio Ottomano p 24

28 The introduction of the Paulicians into Italy and France is amply discussed by Muratori (Antiquitat Italiæ medii Ævi tom v dissert lx p 81–152) and Mosheim (p 379–382 419–422) Yet both have overlooked a curious passage of William the Apulian who clearly describes them in a battle between the Greeks and Normans, A D 1040 (in Muratori Script Rerum Ital tom v p 256)

Cum Græcis aderant quidam quos pessimus error
Fecerat amentes et ab ipso nomen habebant

But he is so ignorant of their doctrine as to make them a kind of Sabellians or Patripassians

29 Bulgari Boulgres Bougres a national appellation has been applied by the French as a term of reproach to usurers and unnatural sinners The Paterini or Patelini has been made to signify a smooth and flattering hypocrite such as l'Avocat Patelin of that original and pleasant farce (Ducange Gloss Latinitat medii et infimi Ævi) The Manichæans were likewise named Cathari or the pure by corruption Gazari etc

30 Of the laws crusade and persecution against the Albigeois a just though general, idea is expressed by Mosheim (p 477–481) The detail may be found in the ecclesiastical historians ancient and modern Catholics and Protestants and among these Fleury is the most impartial and moderate

31 The Acts (Liber Sententiarum) of the Inquisition of Toulouse (A D 1307–1323) have been published by Limborch (Amstelodami 1692) with a previous History of the Inquisition in general. They deserved a more learned and critical editor As we must not calumniate even Satan, or the Holy Office I will observe that of a list of criminals which fills nineteen folio pages only fifteen men and four women were delivered to the secular arm

32 The opinions and proceedings of the reformers are exposed in the second part of the general history of Mosheim but the balance, which he has held with so clear an eye and so steady a hand begins to incline in favour of his Lutheran brethren

33 Under Edward VI our reformation was more bold and perfect but in the fundamental articles of the church of England a strong and explicit declaration against the real presence was obliterated in the original copy to please the people or the Lutherans or Queen Elizabeth (Burnet s History of the Reformation vol. ii p. 82 128, 302)

34 Had it not been for such men as Luther and myself said the fanatic Whiston to Halley the philosopher, you would now be kneeling before an image of St Winifred

35 The article of Servet in the Dictionnaire Critique of Chauffepié is the best account which I have seen of this shameful transaction See likewise the Abbé d Artigny Nouveaux Mémoires d Histoire, etc, tom ii p 55–154

36 I am more deeply scandalised at the single execution of Servetus than at the hecatombs which have blazed in the Auto da Fès of Spain and Portugal 1 The zeal of Calvin seems to have been envenomed by personal malice and perhaps envy He accused his adversary before their common enemies the judges of Vienne, and betrayed, for his destruction the sacred trust of a private correspondence 2 The deed of cruelty was not varnished by the pretence of danger to the church or state. In his passage through Geneva Servetus was a harmless stranger who neither preached nor printed nor made proselytes 3 A Catholic inquisitor yields the same obedience which he requires, but Calvin violated the golden rule of doing as he would be done by a rule which I read in a moral treatise of Isocrates (in Nicocle tom i. p 93, edit. Battie) four hundred years before the publication of the Gospel ἃ πάσχοντες ὑφ' ἑτέρων ὀργίζεσθε, ταῦτα τοῖς ἄλλοις μὴ ποιεῖτε

37 See Burnet vol ii p 84–86 The sense and humanity of the young king were oppressed by the authority of the primate

38 Erasmus may be considered as the father of rational theology After a slumber of a hundred years, it was revived by the Arminians of Holland Grotius Limborch and Le Clerc in England by Chillingworth the latitudinarians of Cambridge (Burnet Hist of own Times vol. i p 261–268, octavo edition) Tillotson Clarke Hoadley etc

39 I am sorry to observe that the three writers of the last age by whom the rights of toleration have been so nobly defended Bayle Leibnitz and Locke are all laymen and philosophers.

40 See the excellent chapter of Sir William Temple on the Religion of the United Provinces. I am not satisfied with Grotius (de Rebus Belgicis Annal. l i p 13 14 edit in 12mo) who approves the Imperial laws of persecution and only condemns the bloody tribunal of the Inquisition

superne servitium etc. is the preface of Liutprand (l. i. c. 2) who frequently expatiates on the calamities of his own times. See l. i. c. 5 l. ii. c. 1 2 4 5 6, 7 l. iii. c. 1 etc. l. v. c. 8 15 in Legat. p. 485. His colours are glaring but his chronology must be rectified by Pagi and Muratori

32 The three bloody reigns of Arpad, Zoltan, and Toxus are critically illustrated by Katona (Hist. Ducum, etc. p. 107-499) His diligence has searched both natives and foreigners yet to the deeds of mischief, or glory I have been able to add the destruction of Bremen (Adam Bremensis, i. 43)

33 Muratori has considered with patriotic care the danger and resources of Modena. The citizens besought St. Geminianus their patron to avert, by his intercession, the rabies flagellum etc.

Nunc te rogamus, licet servi pessimi,
Ab Ungerorum nos defendas jaculis

The bishop erected walls for the public defence, not contra dominos serenos (Antiquitat. Ital. med. Ævi, tom. i. dissertat. i. p. 21 22) and the song of the nightly watch is not without elegance or use (tom. iii. diss. xl. p. 709) The Italian annalist has accurately traced the series of their inroads (Annali d'Italia, tom. vii. p. 365 367 393 401 437 440, tom. viii. p. 19, 41 52 etc.)

34 Both the Hungarian and Russian annals suppose that they besieged or attacked, or insulted Constantinople (Pray dissertat. x. p. 239 Katona, Hist. Ducum p. 354-360) and the fact is almost confessed by the Byzantine historians (Leo Grammaticus, p. 506 [ed. Par. p. 322 ed. Bonn] Cedrenus, tom. ii. p. 629 [tom. ii. p. 316 ed. Bonn]) yet, however glorious to the nation it is denied or doubted by the critical historian and even by the notary of Bela. Their scepticism is meritorious they could not safely transcribe or believe the rusticorum fabulas but Katona might have given due attention to the evidence of Liutprand Bulgarorum gentem atque Græcorum tributariam fecerant (Hist. l. ii. c. 4, p. 435)

35 ———— λέονθ' ὡς δηρινθήτην
Ὥ τ' ὄρεος κορυφῇσι περὶ κ αμ νης ἐλάφοιο
Ἄμφω πεινάοντε μέγα φρονέοντε μάχ εθον
—Iliad. xvi. 756

36 They are amply and critically discussed by Katona (Hist. Ducum p. 360-368 427-470) Liutprand (l. ii. c. 8 9) is the best evidence for the former and Witichind (Annal. Saxon. l. iii.) of the latter but the critical historian will not even overlook the horn of a warrior which is said to be preserved at Jaz berin.

37 Hunc vero triumphum, tam laude quam memoriâ dignum ad Meresburgum rex in superiori cœnaculo domûs per ζωγραφίαν id est picturam, notari præcepit adeo ut rem veram potius quam verisimilem videas a high encomium (Liutprand, l. ii. c. 9) Another palace in Germany had been painted with holy subjects by the order of Charlemagne and Muratori may justly affirm nulla sæcula fuere in quibus picto es desiderati fuerint (Antiquitat. Ital. medii Ævi, tom. ii. dissert. xxi. p. 360, 361) Our domestic claims to antiquity of ignorance and original imperfection (Mr Walpole's lively words) are of a much more recent date (Anecdotes of Painting vol. i. p. 2 etc.)

38 See Baronius, Annal. Eccles. A.D. 929, No. 2-5 The lance of Christ is taken from the best evidence—Liutprand (l. iv. c. 12) Sigebert and the Acts of St. Gerard but the other military relics depend on the faith of the Gesta Anglorum post Bedam l. ii. c. 8.

39 Katona, Hist. Ducum Hungariæ p. 500, etc.

40 Among these colonies we may distinguish—1 The Chazars or Cabari, who joined the Hungarians on their march (Constant. de Admin. Imp. c. 39 40, p. 108 109 [tom. iii. p. 171 seqq. ed. Bonn]) 2 The Jazyges, Moravians, and Siculi whom they found in the land the last were perhaps a remnant of the Huns of Attila, and were intrusted with the guard of the borders. 3. The Russians who like the Swiss in France, imparted a general name to the royal porters. 4. The Bulgarians whose chiefs (A.D. 956) were invited cum magnâ multitudine Hismahelitarum Had any of these Sclavonians embraced the Mohammedan religion? 5. The Bisseni and Cumans a mixed multitude of Patzinacites Uzi, Chazars, etc., who had spread to the lower Danube. The last colony of 40,000 Cumans, A.D. 1239 was received and converted by the kings of Hungary who derived from that tribe a new regal appellation (Pray dissert. vi. vii. p. 109-173 Katona Hist. Ducum p. 95-99, 259-264, 476 479-483 etc.)

41 Christiani autem quorum pars major populi est, qui ex omni parte mundi illuc tracti sunt captivi etc. Such was the language of Piligrinus the first missionary who entered Hungary A.D. 973 Pars major is strong Hist. Ducum p. 517

42 The fideles Teutonici of Geisa are authenticated in old charters and Katona, with his usual industry has made a fair estimate of these colonies which had been so loosely magnified by the Italian Ranzanus (Hist. Critic Ducum, p. 667-681)

43 Among the Greeks this national appellation has a singular form ῥῶς as an undeclinable word of which many fanciful etymologies have been suggested I have perused, with pleasure and profit a dissertation de Origine Russorum (Comment. Academ. Petropolitanæ tom. viii. p. 388-436) by Theophilus Sigefrid Bayer a learned German, who spent his life and labours in the service of Russia A geographical tract of D'Anville, de l'Empire de Russie son Origine et ses Accroissemens (Paris 1772 in 12mo) has likewise been of use.

44 See the entire passage (dignum, says Bayer ut aureis in tabulis figatur) in the Annales Bertiniani Francorum (in Script. Ital. Murato i. tom. ii. pars i. p. 525) A.D. 839 twenty two years before the era of Ruric. In the tenth century Liutprand (Hist. l. v. c. 6) speaks of the Russians and Nor

14. Simeonem semi-Græcum esse aiebant eo quod a pueritiâ Byzantii Demosthenis rhetoricam et Aristotelis syllogismos didicerat Liutprand l. iii c 8 He says, in another place, Simeon fortis bellator, Bulgariæ [Bulgaris] præerat, Christianus, sed vicinis Græcis valde inimicus (l. i c 2)

15 ——Rigidum fera dextera cornu
Dum tenet infregit truncâque à fronte revellit

Ovid (Metamorph ix 1-100) has boldly painted the combat of the river god and the hero—the native and the stranger [The Greeks were de feated by the Servians not on the banks of the Achelous in Greece but at a place of the same name in Bulgaria]

16 The ambassador of Otho was provoked by the Greek excuses cum Christophori filiam Petrus Bulgarorum Vasileus conjugem duceret Symphona, id est consonantia scripto juramento firmata sunt, ut omnium gentium Apostolis id est nuncus penes nos Bulgarorum Apostoli præponantur honoren tur diligantur (Liutprand in Legatione p 482) See the Ceremoniale of Constantine Porphyrogen itus tom i p 82 [p 139 ed Bonn] tom ii p 429 430 434, 435 443 444, 446 447 [tom i p 740-743, 749-752 767, sqq, ed Bonn] with the annotations of Reiske

17 A bishop of Wurtzburg submitted this opin ion to a reverend abbot but he more gravely de cided that Gog and Magog were the spiritual per secutors of the church since Gog signifies the roof, the pride of the heresiarchs and Magog what comes from the roof the propagation of their sects Yet these men once commanded the respect of mankind (Fleury Hist Eccles tom xi p 594 etc)

18 The two national authors from whom I have derived the most assistance are George Pray (Dis sertationes ad Annales veterum Hungarorum etc , Vindobonæ 1775, in folio) and Stephen Katona (Hist Critica Ducum et Regum Hungariæ stirpis Arpadianæ Pæstini 1778-1781 5 vols in octavo) The first embraces a large and often conjectural space the latter by his learning, judgment and perspicuity deserves the name of a critical historian

19 The author of this Chronicle is styled the notary of king Bela Katona has assigned him to the twelfth century and defends his character against the hypercriticism of Pray This rude an nalist must have transcribed some historical records since he could affirm with dignity rejectis falsis fabulis rusticorum et garrulo cantû joculatorum In the fifteenth century these fables were collected by Thurotzius and embellished by the Italian Bonfinius See the Preliminary Discourse in the Hist Critica Ducum, p 7-33

20 See Constantine de Administrando Imperio c. 3 4 13, 38-42 Katona has nicely fixed the composition of this work to the years 949 950 951 (p 4-7) The critical historian (p 34-107) en deavours to prove the existence and to relate the actions of a first duke Almus the father of Arpad who is tacitly rejected by Constantine

21 Pray (Dissert p 37-39 etc.) produces and illustrates the original passages of the Hungarian missionaries Bonfinius and Æneas Sylvius

22 Fischer, in the Quæstiones Petropolitanæ, de Origine Ungrorum and Pray, Dissertat i. ii. iii etc have drawn up several comparative tables of the Hungarian with the Fennic dialects. The affinity is indeed striking but the lists are short the words are purposely chosen and I read in the learned Bayer (Comment Academ. Petropol. tom x p 374) that although the Hungarian has adopted many Fennic words (innumeras voces), it essentially differs toto genio et naturâ

23 In the region of Turfan which is clearly and minutely described by the Chinese geographers (Gaubil Hist du Grand Gengiscan p 13 De Guignes, Hist des Huns tom ii p 31 etc)

24 Hist Généalogique des Tartars par Abul ghazi Bahadur Khan partie ii p 90-98

25 In their journey to Pekin both Isbrand Ives (Harris s Collection of Voyages and Travels vol. ii p 920, 921) and Bell (Travels vol i p 174) found the Vogulitz in the neighbourhood of To bolsky By the tortures of the etymological art, Ugur and Vogul are reduced to the same name the circumjacent mountains really bear the appella tion of Ugrian and of all the Fennic dialects the Vogulian is the nearest to the Hungarian (Fischer, Dissert i p 20-30 Pray Dissert ii p 31-34)

26 The eight tribes of the Fennic race are de scribed in the curious work of M Levêque (Hist des Peuples soumis à la Domination de la Russie, tom i p 361-561)

27 This picture of the Hungarians and Bul garians is chiefly drawn from the Tactics of Leo p 796-801 and the Latin Annals which are alleged by Baronius, Pagi and Muratori A.D 889 etc

28 Buffon Hist Naturelle, tom v p 6 in 12mo Gustavus Adolphus attempted without success to form a regiment of Laplanders Grotius says of these Arctic tribes arma arcus et pharetra sed adversus feras (Annal l iv p 236) and at tempts after the manner of Tacitus to varnish with philosophy their brutal ignorance.

29 Leo has observed that the government of the Turks was monarchical, and that their punish ments were rigorous (Tactic p 796 [c xviii § 46] ἀπηνεῖς καὶ βαρείας) Rhegino (in Chron A D 889) mentions theft as a capital crime and his juris prudence is confirmed by the original code of St Stephen (A D 1016) If a slave were guilty he was chastised for the first time with the loss of his nose or a fine of five heifers for the second with the loss of his ears or a similar fine for the third with death which the freeman did not incur till the fourth offence as his first penalty was the loss of liberty (Katona Hist Regum Hungar tom i. p 231 232)

expertæ sævitium, etc., is the preface of Liutprand (l. i. c. 2) who frequently expatiates on the calamities of his own times. See l. i. c. 5, l. ii. c. 1 2 4, 5 6, 7 l. iii. c. 1 etc. l. v. c. 8 15 in Legat. p. 485 His colours are glaring but his chronology must be rectified by Pagi and Muratori.

32 The three bloody reigns of Arpad, Zoltan and Toxus are critically illustrated by Katona (Hist. Ducum, etc., p. 107 499) His diligence has searched both natives and foreigners yet to the deeds of mischief, or glory I have been able to add the destruction of Bremen (Adam Bremensis, i. 43)

33 Muratori has considered with patriotic care the danger and resources of Modena. The citizens besought St. Germinianus their patron to avert, by his intercession, the rabies flagellum etc.

Nunc te rogamus, licet servi pessimi
Ab Ungerorum nos defendas jaculis

The bishop erected walls for the public defence, not contra dominos serenos (Antiquitat. Ital. med. Ævi, tom. i. dissertat. i. p. 21 22) and the song of the nightly watch is not without elegance or use (tom. iii. diss. xl. p. 709) The Italian annalist has accurately traced the series of their inroads (Annali d'Italia, tom. vii. p. 365 367 393 401 437 440 tom. viii. p. 19, 41 52 etc.)

34. Both the Hungarian and Russian annals suppose that they besieged, or attacked, or insulted Constantinople (Pray dissertat. x. p. 239 Katona, Hist Ducum p. 354 360) and the fact is almost confessed by the Byzantine historians (Leo Grammaticus, p. 506 [ed. Par. p. 322 ed. Bonn] Cedrenus tom. ii. p. 629 [tom. ii. p. 316 ed. Bonn]) yet however glorious to the nation it is denied or doubted by the critical historian and even by the notary of Bela. Their scepticism is meritorious they could not safely transcribe or believe the rusticorum fabulas but Katona might have given due attention to the evidence of Liutprand, Bulgarorum gentem atque Græcorum tributariam fecerant (Hist. l. ii. c. 4, p. 435)

35. —— λεονθ ας ἀηρμυθητη
Ὡς ὅρεος ρυφησι π ρλ αμενης ἐλἀφοιο
Ἀμφω τειναοντε, μεγα φρονεοντε μάχ σθο
—Iliad. xvi. 756.

36. They are amply and critically discussed by Katona (Hist. Ducum p. 360–368 427 470) Liutprand (l. ii. c. 8, 9) is the best evidence for the former and Witichind (Annal. Saxon. l. iii.) of the latter but the critical historian will not even overlook the horn of a warrior which is said to be preserved at Jaz berin

37 Hunc vero triumphum tam laude quam memoriâ dignum ad Meresburgum rex in superiori cœnaculo domûs per ζωγρ φία id est p c turam, notari præcep t adeo ut rem veram potius quam verisimilem videas a high encomium (Liutprand, l. ii. c. 9) Another palace in Germany had been painted with holy subjects by the order of Charlemagne and Murato i may justly affirm nulla sæcula fuere in quibus pictores desiderati fuerint (Antiquitat. Ital. medii Ævi tom. ii. dissert xxiv p. 360, 361) Our domestic claims to antiquity of ignorance and original imperfection (Mr Walpole's lively words) are of a much more recent date (Anecdotes of Painting vol. i. p. 2 etc.)

38 See Baronius, Annal. Eccles A.D. 929 No 2–5. The lance of Christ is taken from the best evi dence—Liutprand (l. iv. c. 12) Sigebert and the Acts of St. Gerard but the other military relics depend on the faith of the Gesta Anglorum post Bedam l. ii. c. 8

39. Katona, Hist. Ducum Hungariæ p. 500 etc.

40. Among these colonies we may distinguish—1 The Chazars, or Cabari who joined the Hungarians on their march (Constant de Admin. Imp c. 39 40, p. 108, 109 [tom. iii. p. 171 seqq ed. Bonn]) 2 The Jazyges, Moravians and Siculi whom they found in the land the last were perhaps a remnant of the Huns of Attila, and were intrusted with the guard of the borders. 3 The Russians who like the Swiss in France imparted a general name to the royal porters. 4. The Bulgarians whose chiefs (A.D 956) were invited cum magnâ multitudine Hismahel itarum Had any of these Sclavonians embraced the Mohammedan religion? 5 The Bisseni and Cumans a mixed multitude of Patzinacites, Uzi, Chazars, etc., who had spread to the lower Danube The last colony of 40 000 Cumans, A.D 1239 was received and converted by the kings of Hungary who derived from that tribe a new regal appellation (Pray dissert. vi. vii. p. 109–173 Katona Hist. Ducum p. 95–99 259–264 476 479–483 etc.)

41 Christiani autem, quorum pars major populi est, qui ex omni parte mundi illuc tracti sunt captivi etc. Such was the language of Piligrinus the first missionary who entered Hungary A.D 973 Pars major is strong Hist. Ducum p. 517

42 The fideles Teutonici of Geisa are authenticated in old charters and Katona with his usual industry has made a fair estimate of these colonies which had been so loosely magnified by the Italian Ranzanus (Hist Critic Ducum p. 667–681)

43 Among the Greeks this national appellation has a singular form ρως as an undeclinable word of which many fanciful etymologies have been suggested I have perused with pleasure and profit, a dissertation de Origine Russorum (Comment Academ Petropolitanæ tom. viii. p. 388–436) by Theophilus Sigefrid Bayer a learned German who spent his life and labours in the service of Russia A geographical tract of D'Anville, de l'Empire de Russie son Origine et ses Accroissemens (Paris 1772 in 12mo) has likewise been of use.

44. See the entire passage (dignum says Bayer ut aureis in tabulis figatur) in the Annales Bertiniani Francorum (in Script. Ital. Muratori. tom ii. pars i. p. 525) A.D 839 twenty two years before the era of Ruric. In the tenth century Liutprand (Hist. l. v c. 6) speaks of the Russians and Nor mans as the same Aquilonares homines of a red complexion

45 My knowledge of these annals is drawn from M Leveque Histoire de Russie Nestor, the first and best of these ancient annalists was a monk of Kiow, who died in the beginning of the twelfth century but his Chronicle was obscure till it was published at Petersburgh, 1767, in 4to Levêque, Hist de Russie, tom 1 p xvi Coxe s Travels vol ii p 184

46 Theophil Sig Bayer de Varagis (for the name is differently spelt) in Comment Academ Petropolitanæ tom iv p 275–311

47 Yet, as late as the year 1018 Kiow and Russia were still guarded ex fugitivorum servorum robore confluentium et maxime Danorum Bayer, who quotes (p 292) the Chronicle of Ditmar of Merseburg observes that it was unusual for the Germans to enlist in a foreign service

49 The original record of the geography and trade of Russia is produced by the emperor Con stantine Porphyrogenitus (de Administrat Im perii c 2 p 55 56, c 9 p 59–61, c 13 p 63–67 c 37, p 106 c 42 p 112 113 [tom iii, p 59 sq, p 74–79 p 82–90 p 165 p 177, sqq ed Bonn]) and illustrated by the diligence of Bayer (de Geo graphiâ Russiæ vicinarumque Regionum circiter A C 948, in Comment Academ Petropol tom. ix. p 367–422 tom x p 371–421) with the aid of the chronicles and traditions of Russia Scandi navia, etc

50 The haughty proverb, Who can resist God and the great Novogorod? is applied by M Le vêque (Hist de Russie, tom 1 p 60) even to the times that preceded the reign of Ruric In the course of his history he frequently celebrates this republic which was suppressed A.D 1475 (tom ii p 252–266) That accurate traveller Adam Ole arius, describes (in 1635) the remains of Novo-gorod and the route by sea and land of the Hol stein ambassadors tom i, p 123–129.

51 In hac magnâ civitate quæ est caput regni plus trecentæ ecclesiæ habentur et nundinæ octo populi etiam ignota manus (Eggehardus ad A D 1018 apud Bayer tom. ix. p 412) He likewise quotes (tom x p 397) the words of the Saxon an nalist Cujus (Russiæ) metropolis est Chive, æmula sceptri Constantinopolitani quæ est clarissimum decus Græciæ The fame of Kiow especially in the eleventh century, had reached the German and the Arabian geographers

52 In Odoræ ostio quâ Scythicas alluit paludes, nobilissima civitas Julinum celeberrimam Bar baris et Græcis qui sunt in circuitû præstans stationem Est sane maxima omnium quas Europa claudit civitatum (Adam Bremensis Hist Eccles. p 19 [l ii, c 12]) A strange exaggeration even in the eleventh century The trade of the Baltic and the Hanseatic League are carefully treated in Anderson s Historical Deduction of Commerce at least in our languages I am not acquainted with any book so satisfactory

53 According to Adam of Bremen (de Situ Daniæ p 58 [c 223 p 140 ed. Madeir]) the old Curland extended eight days journey along the coast and by Peter Teutoburgicus (p 68 A.D 1326) Memel is defined as the common frontier of Russia Curland and Prussia Aurum ibi plurimum (says Adam) divinis auguribus atque nec romanticis omnes domus sunt plenæ a toto orbe ibi responsa petuntur maxime ab Hispanis (forsan Zupanis id est regulis Lettoviæ) et Græcis. The name of Greeks was applied to the Russians even before their conversion an imperfect con version if they still consulted the wizards of Cur land (Bayer tom x p 378, 402 etc., Grotius Prolegomen ad Hist Goth p 99)

54 Constantine only reckons seven cataracts, of which he gives the Russian and Sclavonic names but thirteen are enumerated by the Sieur de Beau plan, a French engineer who had surveyed the course and navigation of the Dnieper or Borys-thenes (Description de l Ukraine Rouen 1660, a thin quarto) but the map is unluckily wanting in my copy

55 Nestor apud Levêque Hist de Russie tom. i p 78–80 From the Dnieper or Borysthenes the Russians went to Black Bulgaria Chazaria, and Syria To Syria how? where? when? May we not instead of Συρία, read Σουανία (de Administrat Imp c 42, p 113)? The alteration is slight the position of Suania between Chazaria and Lazica is per fectly suitable and the name was still used in the eleventh century (Cedren tom ii p 770 [p 573 ed Bonn])

56 The wars of the Russians and Greeks in the ninth tenth and eleventh centuries, are related in the Byzantine annals especially those of Zonaras and Cedrenus and all their testimonies are col lected in the Russica of Stritter tom ii. pars ii. p. 939–1044.

57 Προσεταιρισάμενος δὲ καὶ συμμαχικὸν οὐκ ὀλίγον ἀπὸ τῶν κατοικούντων ἐν ταῖς προσαρκτίοις τοῦ Ὠκεανοῦ νήσοις ἐθνῶν Cedrenus in Compend p 758 [tom. ii p 551 ed. Bonn]

58 See Beauplan (Description de l'Ukraine p 54–61) his descriptions are lively his plans ac curate and except the circumstance of fire arms, we may read old Russians for modern Cosacks.

59 It is to be lamented that Bayer has only given a Dissertation de Russorum primâ Expeditione Constantinopolitanâ (Comment Academ. Petropol. tom. vi. p 365–391) After disentangling some chronological intricacies he fixes it in the years 864 or 865, a date which might have smoothed some doubts and difficulties in the beginning of M. Levêque's history

60. When Photius wrote his encyclic epistle on the conversion of the Russians the miracle was not yet sufficiently ripe he reproaches the nation as ἐν ὠμότητι αἱ μιαιφονίαν πάντας δευτέρους πεττομένων

62. See Nestor and Nicon in Levêque's Hist de Russie, tom 1 p 74–80. Katona (Hist. Ducum p. 75 79) uses his advantage to disprove this Russian victory which would cloud the siege of Kiow by the Hungarians.

64. I can only appeal to Cedrenus (tom ii. p 758 759 [p 551 sq ed Bonn]) and Zonaras (tom ii p 253, 254 [l xvii. c. 24]) but they grow more weighty and credible as they draw near to their own times

65. Nestor apud Levêque Hist. de Russie, tom. i p 87

66 This brazen statue, which had been brought from Antioch and was melted down by the Latins was supposed to represent either Joshua or Bellerophon—an odd dilemma. See Nicetas Choniates p 413 414 [ed Par p 848 849 ed Bonn]) Codinus (de Originibus C P p 24) and the anonymous writer de Antiquitat C P (Banduri, Imp Orient tom i. p 17 18) who lived about the year 1100 They witness the belief of the prophecy the rest is immaterial

67 The life of Swatoslaus or Sviatoslaf or Sphendosthlabus, is extracted from the Russian Chronicles by M. Levêque (Hist. de Russie tom. i. p 94–107)

68. This resemblance may be clearly seen in the ninth book of the Iliad (205–221) in the minute detail of the cookery of Achilles. By such a picture a modern epic poet would disgrace his work and disgust his reader but the Greek verses are harmonious—a dead language can seldom appear low or familiar and, at the distance of two thousand seven hundred years we are amused with the primitive manners of antiquity

69. This singular epithet is derived from the Armenian language and Τζιμισκῆς is interpreted in Greek by μουζακίζης or μοιρακίζης As I profess myself equally ignorant of these words I may be indulged in the question in the play Pray which of you is the interpreter? From the context they seem to signify Adolescentulus (Leo Diacon l. iv MS apud Ducange Glossar Græc p 1570)

70. In the Sclavonic tongue the name of Peristhlaba implied the great or illustrious city μεγάλη οὖσα καὶ λεγομένη says Anna Comnena (Alexiad l vii p 194) From its position between Mount Hæmus and the Lower Danube it appears to fill the ground or at least the station, of Marcianopolis The situation of Durostolus, or Dristra, is well known and conspicuous (Comment Academ. Petropol tom. ix p 415 416 D Anville Geographie Ancienne tom i. p 307 311)

71 The political management of the Greeks, more especially with the Patzinacites is explained in the seven first chapters de Administratione Imperii.

72 In the narrative of this war Leo the Deacon (apud Pagi Critica tom iv A D 968–973) is more authentic and circumstantial than Cedrenus (tom. ii. p 660–683) and Zonaras (tom ii p 205 214) These declaimers have multiplied to 308 000 and 330 000 men those Russian forces of which the contemporary had given a moderate and consistent account.

73 Phot Epistol ii No 35 p 58 edit. Montacut It was unworthy of the learning of the editor to mistake the Russian nation τὸ Ῥῶς for a war cry of the Bulgarians nor did it become the enlightened patriarch to accuse the Sclavonian idolaters τῆς Ἑλληνικῆς καὶ ἀθέου δόξης They were neither Greeks nor atheists

74. M Levêque has extracted from old chronicles and modern researches the most satisfactory account of the religion of the Slavi and the conversion of Russia (Hist de Russie, tom. i. p 35–54, 59, 92 93 113–121 124–129 148 149 etc.)

75 See the Ceremoniale Aulæ Byzant. tom ii c 15 p 343–345 the style of Olga or Elga is Ἀρχόντισσα Ῥωσίας For the chief of barbarians the Greeks whimsically borrowed the title of an Athenian magistrate, with a female termination which would have astonished the ear of Demosthenes

76 See an anonymous fragment published by Banduri (Imperium Orientale tom. ii p 112 113) de Conversione Russorum

77 Cherson or Corsun is mentioned by Herberstein (apud Pagi tom. iv p 56) as the place of Wolodomir's baptism and marriage and both the tradition and the gates are still preserved at Novogorod Yet an observing traveller transports the brazen gates from Magdeburg in Germany (Coxe's Travels into Russia etc vol i p 452) and quotes an inscription which seems to justify his opinion. The modern reader must not confound this old Cherson of the Tauric or Crimæan peninsula with a new city of the same name which has arisen near the mouth of the Borysthenes and was lately honoured by the memorable interview of the empress of Russia with the emperor of the West

78 Consult the Latin text or English version of Mosheim s excellent History of the Church under the first head or section of each of these centuries

79 In the year 1000 the ambassadors of St Stephen received from Pope Silvester the title of King of Hungary with a diadem of Greek workmanship It had been designed for the duke of Poland but the Poles by their own confession were yet too barbarous to deserve an angelical and apostolical crown (Katona, Hist Critic Regum Stirpis Arpadianæ tom 1 p 1–20)

80 Listen to the exultations of Adam of Bremen (A D 1080) of which the substance is agreeable to truth Ecce illa ferocissima Danorum etc natio jamdudum novit in Dei laudibus Alleluia resonare Ecce populus ille piraticus suis nunc finibus contentus est Ecce patria horribilis semper inaccessa propter cultum idolorum prædicatores veritatis ubique certatim admittit, etc etc (de Situ Daniæ, etc p 40 41, edit. Elzevir [c 251, p 161 ed Maderi] a curious and original prospect of the north of Europe, and the introduction of Christianity)

81 The great princes removed in 1156 from Kiow which was ruined by the Tartars in 1240. Moscow became the seat of empire in the fourteenth century See the first and second volumes of Leveque s History and Mr Coxe s Travels into the North tom 1 p 241 etc

82 The ambassadors of St Stephen had used the reverential expressions of regnum oblatum, debitam obedientiam etc , which were most rigorously interpreted by Gregory VII and the Hungarian Catholics are distressed between the sanctity of the pope and the independence of the crown (Katona Hist Critica tom i. p 20–25 tom. ii. p 304 346 360 etc)

Chapter LVI

1 For the general history of Italy in the ninth and tenth centuries I may properly refer to the fifth sixth and seventh books of Sigonius de Regno Italiæ (in the second volume of his works Milan, 1732) the Annals of Baronius with the Criticism of Pagi the seventh and eighth books of the Istoria Civile del Regno di Napoli of Giannone the seventh and eighth volumes (the octavo edition) of the Annali d Italia of Muratori and the second volume of the Abrégé Chronologique of M de St Marc a work which under a superficial title contains much genuine learning and industry But my long accustomed reader will give me credit for saying that I myself have ascended to the fountain head as often as such ascent could be either profitable or possible and that I have diligently turned over the originals in the first volumes of Muratori's great collection of the Scriptores Rerum Italicarum

2 Camillo Pellegrino a learned Capuan of the last century has illustrated the history of the duchy of Beneventum in his two books Historia Principum Longobardorum in the Scriptores of Muratori tom ii pars 1 p 221–345 and tom v p 159–245

3 See Constantin Porphyrogen de Thematibus l ii c xi [tom iii p 62 ed Bonn] in Vit Basil c 55 p 181

4 The original epistle of the emperor Lewis II to the emperor Basil a curious record of the age was first published by Baronius (Annal Eccles A D 871 No 51–71) from the Vatican MS of Erchempert, or rather of the anonymous historian of Salerno

5 See an excellent Dissertation de Republicâ Amalphitanâ in the Appendix (p 1–42) of Henry Brenckmann s Historia Pandectarum (Trajecti ad Rhenum 1722 in 4to)

6 Your master says Nicephorus has given aid and protection principibus Capuano et Beneventano servis meis quos oppugnare dispono Nova (potius nota) res est quòd eorum patres et avi nostro Imperio tributa dederunt (Liutprand, in Legat p 484) Salerno is not mentioned yet the prince changed his party about the same time and Camillo Pellegrino (Script Rer Ital tom ii pars 1 p 285) has nicely discerned this change in the style of the anonymous Chronicle On the rational ground of history and language, Liutprand (p 480) had asserted the Latin claim to Apulia and Calabria

7 See the Greek and Latin Glossaries of Ducange (Κατεπανω catapanus) and his notes on the Alexias (p 275) Against the contemporary notion which derives it from κατὰ παν juxta omne he treats it as a corruption of the Latin capitaneus Yet M de St Marc has accurately observed (Abrégé Chronologique tom ii p 924) that in this age the capitanei were not captains but only nobles of the first rank the great valvassors of Italy

8 Οὐ μόνον διὰ πολεμων ἀκρ θως τεταγμένων τὸ τοιουτον υπηγαγε τὸ ἔθνος (the Lombards) ἀλλὰ καὶ ἀγχινοίᾳ χρησάμενος καὶ δικαιοσύνῃ καὶ χρηστότητι ἐν εικως τε τοις προσερχομένοις προσφερόμενος (Leon Tactic c xv [§ 38] p 741) The little Chronicle of Beneventum (tom ii pars 1 p 280) gives a far different character of the Greeks during the five years (A D 891–896) that Leo was master of the city

9 Calabriam adeunt eamque inter se divisam reperientes funditus depopulati sunt (or depopu

[arunt], ita ut deserta sit velut in diluvio Such is the text of Herempert or Erchempert according to the two editions of Carraccioli (Rer Italic. Script. tom. v p 23) and of Camillo Pellegrino (tom. ii. pars 1 p 246) Both were extremely scarce hen they were reprinted by Muratori

10 Baronius (Annal. Eccles A D 874 No 2) has drawn this story from a MS of Erchempert who died at Capua only fifteen years after the ent. But the Cardinal was deceived by a false le, and we can only quote the anonymous hronicle of Salerno (Paralipomena c. 110) mposed towards the end of the tenth century nd published in the second volume of Muratori's ollection. See the Dissertations of Camillo Pellegrino, tom. ii. pars 1. p. 231–281 etc.

11 Constantine Porphyrogenitus (in Vit Basil c. 58, p 183 [p 296 ed Bonn]) is the original author of this story He places it under the reigns of Basil and Lewis II yet the reduction of Beneventum by the Greeks is dated A D 891 after the decease of both of those princes.

12 In the year 663 the same tragedy is described by Paul the Deacon (de Gestis Langobard l v c 7 8, p 870, 871 edit. Grot) under the walls of the same city of Beneventum. But the actors are fferent, and the guilt is imputed to the Greeks emselves, which in the Byzantine edition is apied to the Saracens In the late war in Germany L d'Assas a French officer of the regiment of uvergne, is said to have devoted himself in a simar manner His behaviour is the more heroic as nere silence was required by the enemy who had nade him prisoner (Voltaire Siècle de Louis XV c. 33, tom. ix. p 172)

13. Theobald who is styled Heros by Liutprand was properly duke of Spoleto and marquis of Camerino, from the year 926 to 935 The title and office of marquis (commander of the march or frontier) was introduced into Italy by the French emperors (Abrégé Chronologique, tom ii p 645 732 etc.)

14. Liutprand, Hist l. iv c. 4, in the Rerum Italic. Script tom. ii. pars 1 p 453 454 Should the licentiousness of the tale be questioned I may exclaim, with poor Sterne that it is hard if I may not transcribe with caution what a bishop could write without scruple What if I had translated ut viris certetis testiculos amputare in quibus nostri corporis refocillat o etc?

15. The original monuments of the Normans in Italy are collected in the fifth volume of Muratori and among these we may distinguish the poem of William Appulus (p 245–278) and the history of Galfridus (Jeff ey) Malaterra (p 537–607) Both were natives of France, but they wrote on the spot in the age of the first conquerors (before A D 1100) and with the spir t of freemen It is needless to recapitulate the compilers and critics of Italian history S gon us, Baronius, Pa i Giannone Muratori, St. Marc, etc whom I have always consulted, and never cop ed

16. Some of the first converts were baptised ten or twelve times, for the sake of the white garment usually given at this ceremony At the funeral of Rollo the gifts to monasteries for the repose of his soul were accompanied by a sacrifice of one hundred captives But in a generation or two the national change was pure and general

17 The Danish language was still spoken by the Normans of Bayeux on the sea-coast at a time (A.D 940) when it was already forgotten at Rouen in the court and capital. Quem (Richard I) confestim pater Baiocas mittens Botoni militiæ suæ principi nutriendum tradidit ut ibi lingua eruditus Danicâ suis exterisque hominibus sciret aperte dare responsa (Wilhelm Gemeticensis de Ducibus Normannis l iii c. 8 p 623 edit Camden) Of the vernacular and favourite idiom of William the Conqueror (A D 1035) Selden (Opera tom ii p 1640–1656) has given a specimen obsolete and obscure even to antiquarians and lawyers

18 See Leandro Alberti (Descrizione d'Italia p 250) and Baronius (A D 493 No 43) If the archangel inherited the temple and oracle perhaps the cavern of old Calchas the soothsayer (Strab Geograph l. vi. p 435 436 [p 284 ed. Casaub]) the Catholics (on this occasion) have surpassed the Greeks in the elegance of their superstition

19 See the first book of William Appulus. His words are applicable to every swarm of barbarians and freebooters —

> Si vicinorum quis perniciosus ad illos
> Confugiebat eum gratanter suscipiebant
> Moribus et linguâ quoscumque venire videbant
> Informant propriâ gens efficiatur ut una. [p 255]

And elsewhere, of the native adventurers of Normandy —

> Pars parat exiguæ vel opes aderant quia nullæ
> Pars, quia de magnis majora subire volebant [p 254.]

20 Liutprand in Legatione, p 485 Pagi has illustrated this event from the MS history of the deacon Leo (tom. iv A D 965 No 17–19)

21 See the Arabian Chronicle of Sicily apud Muratori Script Rerum Ital tom. i p 253

22 Jeffrey Malaterra, who relates the Sicilian war and the conquest of Apulia (l i c. 7 8 9 19) The same events are described by Cedrenus (tom. ii. p 741–743 755 756) and Zonaras (tom ii p 237 238 [l xvii. c. 15]) and the Greeks are so hardened to disgrace that their narratives are impartial enough.

23 Cedrenus specifies the τάγμα of the Obsequium (Phrygia) and the μέρος of the Thracesians (Lydia consult Constantine de Thematibus, i 3 4 [tom. iii p 22 sqq ed. Bonn] with Delisle's map) and afterwards names the Pisidians and Lycaonians with the fœderati

24 Omnes conveniunt et bis sex nobiliores,
Quos genus et gravitas morum decorabat et ætas

Elegere duces Provectis ad comitatum
His alii parent comitatus nomen honoris
Quo donantur, erat Hi totas undique terras
Divisere sibi ni sors inimica repugnet
Singula proponunt loca quæ contingere sorte
Cuique duci debent et quæque tributa locorum [p 255]

And after speaking of Melphi William Appulus adds

Pro numero comitum bis sex statuere plateas
Atque domus comitum totidem fabricantur in urbe [p 256]

Leo Ostiensis (l ii c 67) enumerates the divisions of the Apulian cities which it is needless to repeat

25 Gulielm Appulus l ii c 12, according to the reference of Giannone (Istoria Civile di Napoli tom ii p 31) which I cannot verify in the original The Apulian praises indeed his validas vires, probitas animi and vivida virtus and declares that, had he lived no poet could have equalled his merits (l i p 258 l ii p 259) He was bewailed by the Normans quippe qui tanti consilii virum (says Malaterra, l i c 12, p 552) tam armis strenuum tam sibi munificum affabilem, morigeratum ulterius se habere diffidebant

26 The gens astutissima injuriarum ultrix adulari sciens eloquentiis inserviens of Malaterra (l i c 3 p 550) are expressive of the popular and proverbial character of the Normans

27 The hunting and hawking more properly belong to the descendants of the Norwegian sailors though they might import from Norway and Iceland the finest casts of falcons

28 We may compare this portrait with that of William of Malmesbury (de Gestis Anglorum, l iii p 101 102) who appreciates like a philosophic historian the vices and virtues of the Saxons and Normans England was assuredly a gainer by the conquest

29 The biographer of St Leo IX pours his holy venom on the Normans Videns indisciplinatam et alienam gentem Normannorum crudeli et inauditâ rabie et plusquam Paganâ impietate adversus ecclesias Dei insurgere passim Christianos trucidare etc (Wibert c. 6) The honest Apulian (l ii p 259) says calmly of their accuser, Veris commiscens fallacia

30 The policy of the Greeks revolt of Maniaces etc. must be collected from Cedrenus (tom ii p 757 758 [p 548 sq ed Bonn]) William Appulus (l i p 257 258 l ii p 259) and the two Chronicles of Bari by Lupus Protospata (Muratori Script Ital tom v p 42 43 44) and an anonymous writer (Antiquitat Italiæ medii Ævi tom i p 31-35) This last is a fragment of some value

31 Argyrus received says the anonymous Chronicle of Bari imperial letters, Fœderatûs et Patriciatûs, et Catapani et Vestatûs In his Annals Muratori (tom viii p 426) very properly reads or interprets Sevastatus the title of Sebastos or Augustus But in his Antiquities he was taught by Ducange to make it a palatine office, master of the wardrobe

32 A Life of St Leo IX deeply tinged with the passions and prejudices of the age has been composed by Wibert printed at Paris 1615, in octavo and since inserted in the Collections of the Bollandists, of Mabillon and of Muratori The public and private history of that pope is diligently treated by M de St Marc (Abrégé, tom. ii p 140-210 and p 25-95 second column)

33 See the expedition of Leo IX against the Normans See William Appulus (l ii p 259-261) and Jeffrey Malaterra (l i c 13 14, 15 p 253) They are impartial, as the national is counterbalanced by the clerical prejudice

34 Teutonici quia cæsaries et forma decoros
Fecerat egregie proceri corporis illos
Corpora derident Normannica quæ breviora
Esse videbantur [p 259]

The verses of the Apulian are commonly in this strain though he heats himself a little in the battle Two of his similes from hawking and sorcery are descriptive of manners

35 Several respectable censures or complaints are produced by M de St Marc (tom ii p 200-204) As Peter Damianus the oracle of the times, had denied the popes the right of making war the hermit (lugens eremi incola) is arraigned by the cardinal and Baronius (Annal Eccles A D 1053 No 10-17) most strenuously asserts the two swords of St Peter

36 The origin and nature of the papal investitures are ably discussed by Giannone (Istoria Civile di Napoli tom ii p 37-49 57-66) as a lawyer and antiquarian Yet he vainly strives to reconcile the duties of patriot and Catholic adopts an empty distinction of Ecclesia Romana non dedit sed accepit and shrinks from an honest but dangerous confession of the truth

38 Ὁ δὲ Ῥομπέρτος (a Greek corruption) οὗτος Νορμάννος τὸ γένος τὴν τύχην ἄσημος [tom i p 50]

Again ἐξ ἀφανοῦς πάνυ τύχης περιφανής And elsewhere (l iv p 84 [ed Ven p 104 ed Par tom i p 190 ed Bonn]) ἀπὸ ἐσχάτης πενίας καὶ τύχης ἀφανοῦς Anna Comnena was born in the purple yet her father was no more than a private though illustrious subject, who raised himself to the empire.

39. Giannone (tom. ii. p. 2) forgets all his original authors, and rests this princely descent on the credit of Inveges, an Augustine monk of Palermo in the last century. They continue the succession of dukes from Rollo to William II. the Bastard or Conqueror, whom they hold (communemente si tiene) to be the father of Tancred of Hauteville: a most strange and stupendous blunder! The sons of Tancred fought in Apulia before William II. was three years old (A.D. 1037).

40. The judgment of Ducange is just and moderate. Certè humilis fuit ac tenuis Roberti familia a ducalem et regium spectemus apicem, ad quem postea pervenit; quæ honesta tamen et præter nobilium vulgarium statum et conditionem illustris habita est, quæ nec humi reperet nec altum quid tumeret." (Wilhelm. Malmsbur. de Gestis Anglorum, l. iii. p. 107. Not. ad Alexiad. p. 230.)

41. I shall quote with pleasure some of the best lines of the Apulian (l. ii. p. 260).

Pugnat utrâque manû, nec lancea cassa, nec ensis
Cassus erat, quocunque manû deducere vellet.
Ter dejectus equo, ter viribus ipse resumptis
Major in arma redit: stimulos furor ipse ministrat.
Ut Leo cum frendens, etc.

Nullus in hoc bello sicuti post bella probatum est
Victor vel victus, tam magnos edidit ictus.

42. The Norman writers and editors most conversant with their own idiom interpret Guiscard or Wiscard by Callidus, a cunning man. The root (wise) is familiar to our ear; and in the old word Wiseacre I can discern something of a similar sense and termination. Τὴν ψυχὴν πανουργότατος is no bad translation of the surname and character of Robert.

43. The acquisition of the ducal title by Robert Guiscard is a nice and obscure business. With the good advice of Giannone, Muratori, and St. Marc, I have endeavoured to form a consistent and probable narrative.

44. Baronius (Annal. Eccles. A.D. 1059, No. 69) has published the original act. He professes to have copied it from the Liber Censuum, a Vatican MS. Yet a Liber Censuum of the twelfth century has been printed by Muratori (Antiquit. medii Ævi, tom. v. p. 851-908); and the names of Vatican and Cardinal awaken the suspicions of a Protestant, and even of a philosopher.

45. Read the Life of Guiscard in the second and third books of the Apulian, the first and second books of Malaterra.

46. The conquests of Robert Guiscard and Roger I., the exemption of Benevento and the twelve provinces of the kingdom, are fairly exposed by Giannone in the second volume of his Istoria Civile, l. ix. x. xi. and l. xvii. p. 460-470. This modern division was not established before the time of Frederick II.

47. Giannone (tom. ii. p. 119-127), Muratori (Antiquitat. medii Ævi, tom. iii. dissert. xliv. p. 935, 936), and Tiraboschi (Istoria della Letteratura Italiana) have given an historical account of these physicians; their medical knowledge and practice must be left to our physicians.

48. At the end of the Historia Pandectarum of Henry Brenckmann (Trajecti ad Rhenum, 1722, in 4to) the indefatigable author has inserted two dissertations—de Republicâ Amalphitanâ, and de Amalphi à Pisanis direptâ, which are built on the testimonies of one hundred and forty writers. Yet he has forgotten two most important passages of the embassy of Liutprand (A.D. 969), which compare the trade and navigation of Amalphi with that of Venice.

49. Urbs Latii non est hâc delitiosior urbe
Frugibus, arboribus, vinoque redundat; et unde
Non tibi poma, nuces, non pulchra palatia desunt,
Non species muliebris abest probitasque virorum.
Gulielmus Appulus, l. iii. p. 267.

50. Muratori carries their antiquity above the year (1066) of the death of Edward the Confessor, the rex Anglorum to whom they are addressed. Nor is this date affected by the opinion, or rather mistake, of Pasquier (Recherches de la France, l. vii. c. 2) and Ducange (Glossar. Latin.). The practice of rhyming, as early as the seventh century, was borrowed from the languages of the North and East (Muratori, Antiquitat. tom. iii. dissert. xl. p. 686-708).

51. The description of Amalphi, by William the Apulian (l. iii. p. 267), contains much truth and some poetry, and the third line may be applied to the sailor's compass:—

Nulla magis locuples argento, vestibus, auro
Partibus innumeris: hâc [ac] plurimus urbe moratur
Nauta maris cælique vias aperire peritus.
Huc et Alexandri diversa feruntur ab urbe
Regis et Antiochi. Gens hæc freta plurima transit.
His [Huic] Arabes, Indi, Siculi noscuntur et Afri.
Hæc gens est totum prope nobilitata per orbem,
Et mercando ferens, et amans mercata referre.

52. Latrocinio armigerorum suorum in multis sustentabatur, quod quidem ad ejus ignominiam non dicimus; sed ipso ita præcipiente adhuc viliora et reprehensibiliora dicturi sumus [de ipso scripturi sumus] ut pluribus patescat, quam laboriose et cum quantâ angustiâ a profundâ paupertate ad summum culmen divitiarum vel honoris attigerit. Such is the preface of Malaterra (l. i. c. 25) to the horse-stealing. From the moment (l. i. c. 19) that

ne has mentioned his patron Roger, the elder brother sinks into the second character Something similar in Velleius Paterculus may be observed of Augustus and Tiberius

53 Duo sibi proficua deputans animæ scilicet et corporis si terram idolis deditam ad cultum divinum revocaret (Galfrid Malaterra l ii c 1) The conquest of Sicily is related in the three last books and he himself has given an accurate summary of the chapters (p 544–546)

54 See the word Milites in the Latin Glossary of Ducange

55 Of odd particulars, I learn from Malaterra that the Arabs had introduced into Sicily the use of camels (l ii c 33) and of carrier pigeons (c 42) and that the bite of the tarantula provokes a windy disposition quæ per anum inhoneste crepitando emergit—a symptom most ridiculously felt by the whole Norman army in their camp near Palermo (c 36) I shall add an etymology not unworthy of the eleventh century Messana is derived from Messis, the place from whence the harvests of the isle were sent in tribute to Rome (l ii c 1)

56 See the capitulation of Palermo in Malaterra, l ii c 45 and Giannone who remarks the general toleration of the Saracens (tom ii p 72)

57 John Leo Afer de Medicis et Philosophis Arabibus c 14 apud Fabric Biblioth Græc. tom xiii p 278 279 This philosopher is named Esseriph Essachalli and he died in Africa, A H 516—A D 1122 Yet this story bears a strange resemblance to the Sherif al Edrissi who presented his book (Geographia Nubiensis see preface p 88 90, 170) to Roger king of Sicily A H 548—A D 1153 (D Herbelot Bibliothèque Orientale p 786 Prideaux s Life of Mahomet p 188 Petit de la Croix Hist de Gengiscan p 535 530 Casiri Biblioth Arab Hispan tom ii p 9–13) and I am afraid of some mistake

58 Malaterra remarks the foundation of the bishoprics (l iv c 7) and produces the original of the bull (l iv c 29) Giannone gives a rational idea of this privilege and the tribunal of the monarchy of Sicily (tom ii p 95–102) and St Marc (Abrégé tom iii p 217–301 first column) labours the case with the diligence of a Sicilian lawyer

59 In the first expedition of Robert against the Greeks I follow Anna Comnena (the first third fourth and fifth books of the Alexiad) William Appulus (l iv and v p 270–275) and Jeffrey Malaterra (l iii c 13 14 24–29 39) Their information is contemporary and authentic but none of them were eye witnesses of the war

60 One of them was married to Hugh the son of Azzo or Axo a marquis of Lombardy rich, powerful and noble (Gulielm Appul l iii p 267) in the eleventh century and whose ancestors in the tenth and ninth are explored by the critical industry of Leibnitz and Muratori From the two elder sons of the marquis Azzo are derived the illustrious lines of Brunswick and Este. See Muratori Antichità Estense

Ital. tom. v p 45) Malaterra (l. iii. c 27) speaks in high but indefinite terms of the emperor cum copiis innumerabilibus like the Apulian poet (l. iv p. 272) —

72 See the simple and masterly narrative of Cæsar himself (Comment de Bell. Civil. iii 41– It is a pity that Quintus Icilius (M Guischard) did not live to analyse these operations as he has done the campaigns of Africa and Spain.

73. Παλλὰς ἄλλη κἂν μὴ Ἀθήνη which is very properly translated by the President Cousin (Hist. Constantinople, tom. iv p. 131 in 12mo) qui combattoit comme une Pallas, quoiqu elle ne fut pas aussi sa ante que celle d Athènes. The Grecian goddess was composed of two discordant characters—of Neith, the workwoman of Sais in Egypt and of a virgin Amazon of the Tritonian lake in Libya (Banier Mythologie, tom. iv p 1–31 in 12mo)

74. Anna Comnena (l. iv p 116 (tom 1 p 210 ed. Bonn]) admires, with some degree of terror her masculine virtues They were more familiar to the Latins and though the Apulian (l iv p 273) mentions her presence and her wound, he represents her as far less intrepid.

Uxor in hoc bello Roberti forte sagittâ

Dum sperabat opem, se pœne subegerat hosti.

The last is an unlucky word for a female prisoner

75 Ἀ δ τῆς του Ρομ ρτου προηγησα ενης μαχης ... ἡ τρωτη ... (Anna l v p 133 (tom. i. p 237 ed. Bonn]) and elsewhere οἱ γὰρ Κ λ ... (p 140 [tom. i. p 251 ed Bonn]) The pedantry of the princess in the choice of classic appellations encouraged Ducange to apply to his countrymen the characters of the ancient Gauls.

76. Lupus Protospata (tom v p 45) says 6000 William the Apulian more than 5000 (l. iv p 273) Their modesty is singular and laudable they might with so little trouble have slain two or three myriads of schismatics and infidels!

77 The Romans had changed the inauspicious name of Epi-damnus to Dyrrachium (Plin. iii. 26) and the vulgar corruption of Duracium (see Malaterra) bore some affinity to hardness One of Robert s names was Durand, à durando poor wit! (Alberic. Monach in Chron apud Muratori Annali d Italia tom. ix. p 137)

78 Βρούχους καὶ ἀκρίδας ἂν εἴ τις αὐτοὺς [τὸν] πατέρα καὶ [τὸν] υἱόν (Anna l. i. p 35 [tom. i. p 70 ed Bonn]) By these similes, so different from those of Homer she wishes to inspire contempt as well as horror for the little noxious animal a conqueror Most unfortunately the common sense or common nonsense of mankind resists her laudable design

79. Prodiit hâc auctor Trojanæ cladis Achilles The supposition of the Apulian (l v p 275) may be excused by the more classic poetry of Virgil (Æneid II. 197) Larissæus Achilles but it is not justified by the geography of Homer

80. The τῶν πεδίλων προάλματα which encumbered the knights on foot have been ignorantly translated spurs (Anna Comnena, Alexias l. v p 140 [tom i. p 251 ed Bonn]) Ducange has explained the true sense by a ridiculous and inconvenient fashion, which lasted from the eleventh to the fifteenth century These peaks in the form of a scorpion were sometimes two feet, and fastened to the knee with a silver chain.

81 The epistle itself (Alexias l. iii. p. 93 94, 95 [tom. i. p 174–177 ed Bonn]) well deserves to be read. There is one expression, ἀστροπέλεκυν δεδεμένον μετὰ χρυσαφίου [p 177] which Ducange does not understand I have endeavoured to grope out a tolerable meaning χρυσάφιον is a golden crown, ἀστροπέλεκυς is explained by Simon Portius (in Lexico Græco-Barbar) by κεραυνός πρηστήρ a flash of lightning

82 For these general events I must refer to the general historians Sigonius Baronius, Muratori Mosheim, St Marc, etc.

83 The lives of Gregory VII are either legends or invectives (St Marc Abrégé, tom iii. p 235 etc.) and his miraculous or magical performances are alike incredible to a modern reader He will as usual find some instruction in Le Clerc (Vie de Hildebrand Biblioth ancienne et moderne tom. viii) and much amusement in Bayle (Dictionnaire Critique, Grégoire VII.) That pope was undoubtedly a great man, a second Athanasius in a more fortunate age of the church May I presume to add that the portrait of Athanasius is one of the passages of my history (vol. i. p 697 seq) with which I am the least dissatisfied?

84. Anna, with the rancour of a Greek schismatic, calls him ἀπτυστος ... Πάπας (l. i. p. 32 [tom. i p 66 ed. Bonn]) a pope or priest, worthy to be spit upon and accuses him of scourging shaving and perhaps of castrating the ambassadors of Henry (p 31 33) But this outrage is improbable and doubtful (see the sensible preface of Cousin)

85 Sic uno tempore victi
Sunt terræ Domini duo rex Alemannicus iste
Imperii rector Romani maximus ille
Alter ad arma ruens armis superatur et alter
Nominis auditi solâ formidine cessit

It is singular enough that the Apulian a Latin, should distinguish the Greek as the ruler of the Roman empire (l iv p 274)

86 The narrative of Malaterra (l iii c. 37 p 587, 588) is authentic circumstantial and fair Dux ignem exclamans urbe incensa etc The Apulian softens the mischief (inde quibusdam ædibus exustis), which is again exaggerated in some partial chronicles (Muratori Annali tom ix p 147)

87 After mentioning this devastation, the Jesuit Donatus (de Româ veteri et novâ l iv c 8 p 489) prettily adds Duraret hodieque in Cœlio monte interque ipsum et capitolium miserabilis facies prostratæ urbis nisi in hortorum vinetor umque amœnitatem Roma resurrexisset ut perpetuâ viriditate contegeret vulnera et ruinas suas

Romani regni sibi promisisse coronam
Papa ferebatur

Nor can I understand why Gretser and the other papal advocates should be displeased with this new instance of apostolic jurisdiction

89 See Homer Iliad B (I hate this pedantic mode of quotation by the letters of the Greek alphabet) 87, etc His bees are the image of a disorderly crowd their discipline and public works seem to be the ideas of a later age (Virgil Æneid l i [v 430 sqq])

90 *Gulielm Appulus l v p 276 The admir*able port of Brundusium was double the outward harbour was a gulf covered by an island and narrowing by degrees till it communicated by a small gullet with the inner harbour which embraced the city on both sides Cæsar and nature have laboured for its ruin and against such agents what are the feeble efforts of the Neapolitan government? (Swinburne s Travels in the Two Sicilies vol i p 384–390)

91 William of Apulia (l v p 276) describes the victory of the Normans and forgets the two previous defeats which are diligently recorded by Anna Comnena (l vi p 159 160 161 [p 282–285 ed Bonn]) In her turn she invents or magnifies a fourth action to give the Venetians revenge and rewards Their own feelings were far different since they deposed their doge propter excidium stoli (Dandulus in Chron in Muratori Script Rerum Italicarum tom xii p 249)

92 The most authentic writers William of Apulia (l v 277) Jeffrey Malaterra (l. iii c. 41 p 589) and Romuald of Salerno (Chron. in Muratori Script Rerum Ital tom. vii), are ignorant of this crime, so apparent to our countrymen William of Malmesbury (l iii p 107) and Roger de Hoveden (p 710 in Script post Bedam) and the latter can tell how the just Alexius married crowned and burnt alive his female accomplice. The English historian is indeed so blind that he ranks Robert Guiscard or Wiscard among the knights of Henry I, who ascended the throne fifteen years after the duke of Apulia s death.

93 The joyful Anna Comnena scatters some flowers over the grave of an enemy (Alexiad l. v [vi] p 162–166 [tom i p 288–295 ed Bonn]) and his best praise is the esteem and envy of William the Conqueror, the sovereign of his family Græcia (says Malaterra) hostibus recedentibus libera læta quievit Apulia tota sive Calabria turbatur

is one of the last lines of the Apulian s poem (l. v p 278) William of Malmesbury (l iii. p 107) inserts an epitaph on Guiscard which is not worth transcribing

95 Yet Horace had few obligations to Venusia he was carried to Rome in his childhood (Serm. i. 6 [v 76]) and his repeated allusions to the doubtful limit of Apulia and Lucania (Carm iii. 4 Serm ii i [v 34, sqq]) are unworthy of his age and genius

96 See Giannone (tom. ii p 88–93) and the historians of the first crusade

97 The reign of Roger and the Norman kings of Sicily fills four books of the Istoria Civile of Giannone (tom ii l xi–xiv p 136–340), and is spread over the ninth and tenth volumes of the Italian Annals of Muratori In the Bibliothèque Italique (tom i p 175–222) I find a useful abstract of Capecelatro a modern Neapolitan who has composed in two volumes the history of his country from Roger I to Frederic II inclusive.

98 According to the testimony of Philistus and Diodorus the tyrant Dionysius of Syracuse could maintain a standing force of 10 000 horse 100 000 foot and 400 galleys Compare Hume (Essays vol. i p 268 435) and his adversary Wallace (Numbers of Mankind p 306 307) The ruins of Agrigentum are the theme of every traveller, D Orville, Reidesel Swinburne etc

99 A contemporary historian of the acts of Roger from the year 1127 to 1135 founds his title on merit and power the consent of the barons, and the ancient royalty of Sicily and Palermo without introducing pope Anacletus (Alexand Cœnobii Telesini Abbatis de Rebus Gestis Regis Rogerii lib iv in Muratori, Script Rerum Ital. tom v p 607–645)

100 The kings of France England Scotland Castille, Arragon Navarre Sweden Denmark, and Hungary The three first were more ancient than Charlemagne the three next were created by their sword the three last by their baptism and of these the king of Hungary alone was honoured or debased by a papal crown

101 Fazellus and a crowd of Sicilians had imagined a more early and independent corona tion (A.D 1130 May 1) which Giannone un willingly rejects (tom. ii. p 137–144) This fiction is disproved by the silence of contemporaries nor can it be restored by a spurious charter of Messina (Muratori, Annali d Italia, tom. ix. p 340 Pagi, Critica, tom. iv p 467 468)

102. Roger corrupted the second person of Lothaire's army who sounded or rather cried a retreat, for the Germans (says Cinnamus, l. iii. c. i. p. 52 [ed. Par p 90 ed. Bonn]) are ignorant of the use of trumpets. Most ignorant himself!

103. See De Guignes Hist Générale des Huns, tom. i. p. 369–373 and Cardonne, Hist. de l Afrique, etc., sous la Domination des Arabes, tom. ii. p 70–144. Their common original appears to be Novairi.

104. Tripoli (says the Nubian geographer or more properly the Sherif al Edrisi) urbs fortis saxeo muro vallata, sita prope litus maris. Hanc expugnavit Rogerius qui mulieribus captivis ductis, viros peremit.

105. See the geography of Leo Africanus (in Ramusio tom i. fol. 74 verso fol. 75 recto) and Shaw's Travels (p 110) the seventh book of Thuanus, and the eleventh of the Abbé de Vertot. The possession and defence of the place was offered by Charles V and wisely declined by the knights of Malta.

106. Pagi has accurately marked the African conquests of Roger and his criticism was supplied by his friend the Abbé de Longuerue, with some Arabic memorials (A.D 1147 No 26 27 A.D 1148 No 16 A.D 1153, No 16)

107 Appulus et Calaber Siculus mihi servit et Afer

A proud inscription, which denotes that the Norman conquerors were still discriminated from their Christian and Moslem subjects.

108. Hugo Falcandus (Hist Sicula, in Muratori Script. tom. vii. p 270, 271) ascribes these losses to the neglect or treachery of the admiral Majo

109. The silence of the Sicilian historians who end too soon or begin too late must be supplied by Otho of Frisingen, a German (de Gestis Frederici I. l. i. c. 33, in Muratori Script tom. vi. p 668) the Venetian Andrew Dandulus (Id tom xii. p 282 283) and the Greek writers Cinnamus (l. iii. c. 2–5) and Nicetas (in Manuel. l. iii. c. 1–6 [p 131 199 ed. Bonn])

110. To this imperfect capture and speedy rescue I apply the παρ' ὀλίγον ἦλθε τὸ ἁλῶναι of Cinnamus, l. ii. c. 19, p 49 [p 87 ed Bonn] Muratori, on tolerable evidence (Annali d Italia, tom. ix. p. 420, 421) laughs at the delicacy of the French who maintain, marisque nullo impediente periculo ad regnum proprium reversum esse yet I observe that their advocate, Ducange, is less positive as the commentator on Cinnamus than as the editor of Joinville.

111 In palatium regium sagittas igneas injecit, says Dandulus but Nicetas, l. ii c. 8 p 66 [p 130 ed. Bonn] transforms them into βέλη ἀργυρέας ἔχοντα τὰς ἀτράκτους and adds that Manuel styled this insult παίγνιον and γέλωτα ... λῃστεύοντα. These arrows, by the compiler Vincent de Beauvais, are again transmuted into gold.

112 For the invasion of Italy which is almost overlooked by Nicetas see the more polite history of Cinnamus (l iv c. 1–15, p. 78–101 [p 134–175, ed Bonn]) who introduces a diffuse narrative by a lofty profession περὶ τε Σικελίας καὶ τῆς Ἰταλῶν ἐσκέπτετο γῆς ὡς καὶ ταύτας Ῥωμαίοις ἀνασώσαιτο iii. 5 [p 101 ed. Bonn]

113 The Latin Otho (de Gestis Frederici I L ii. c. 30 p 734) attests the forgery the Greek Cinnamus (l. iv c. 1 p ,8 [p 135, ed. Bonn]) claims a promise of restitution from Conrad and Frederic. An act of fraud is always credible when it is told of the Greeks

114. Quod Anconitani Græcum imperium nimis diligerent Veneti speciali odio Anconam oderunt. The cause of love, perhaps of envy were the beneficia flumen aureum of the emperor and the Latin narrative is confirmed by Cinnamus (l iv c. 14, p 98 [p 170 ed Bonn])

115. Muratori mentions the two sieges of Ancona the first, in 1167 against Frederic I in person (Annali tom. x. p 39, etc.) the second in 1173 against his lieutenant Christian Archbishop of Mentz a man unworthy of his name and office (p 76 etc.) It is of the second siege that we possess an original narrative, which he has published in his great collection (tom. vi. p 921–946)

116 We derive this anecdote from an anonymous chronicle of Fossa Nova published by Muratori (Script Ital tom. vii. p 874)

117 The Βασιλείου σημεῖον of Cinnamus (l iv c. 14, p 99 [p 171 ed. Bonn]) is susceptible of this double sense. A standard is more Latin an image more Greek

118 Nihilominus quoque petebat, ut quia occasio justa et tempus opportunum et acceptabile se obtulerant Romani corona imperii a sancto apostolo sibi redderetur quoniam non ad Frederici Alamanni sed ad suum jus asseruit pertinere (Vit. Alexandri III. a Cardinal. Arragoniæ in Script Rerum Ital. tom. iii. par i. p 458) His second embassy was accompanied cum immensa multitudine pecuniarum.

119 Nimis alta et perplexa sunt (Vit Alexandri III p 460 461) says the cautious pope.

120 Μηδὲν μετὸν ἐ... ας λέγων Ῥώμῃ τῇ ... πρὸς τῇ πρεσβυτέραν πάλαι ἀπορραγείσῃ (Cinnamus l. iv c 14 p 99 [p 171 ed Bonn])

121 In his sixth book, Cinnamus describes the Venetian war which Nicetas has not thought worthy of his attention. The Italian accounts, which do not satisfy our curiosity are reported by the annalist Muratori under the years 1171, etc.

123 For the epistle of William I see Cinnamus (l iv c 15 p 101, 102 [p 173–175 ed Bonn]) and Nicetas (l ii c 8 [p 128 ed Bonn]) It is difficult to affirm whether these Greeks deceived themselves or the public in these flattering portraits of the grandeur of the empire.

124 I can only quote of original evidence the poor chronicles of Sicard of Cremona (p 603) and of Fossa Nova (p 875) as they are published in the seventh tome of Muratori s historians The king of Sicily sent his troops contra nequitiam Andronici ad acquirendum imperium C P They were capti aut confusi decepti captique by Isaac

125 By the failure of Cinnamus we are now reduced to Nicetas (in Andronico l. i c. 7, 8 9 l ii c i in Isaac Angelo l i c 1–4) who now becomes a respectable contemporary As he survived the emperor and the empire, he is above flattery but the fall of Constantinople exasperated his prejudices against the Latins For the honour of learning I shall observe that Homer's great commentator Eustathius archbishop of Thessalonica refused to desert his flock

126 The Historia Sicula of Hugo Falcandus, which properly extends from 1154 to 1169 is inserted in the seventh volume of Muratori s Collection (tom vii p 259–344) and preceded by an eloquent preface or epistle (p 251–258 de Calamitatibus Siciliæ) Falcandus has been styled the Tacitus of Sicily, and after a just but immense, abatement from the first to the twelfth century from a senator to a monk I would not strip him of his title his narrative is rapid and perspicuous, his style bold and elegant his observation keen he had studied mankind and feels like a man I can only regret the narrow and barren field on which his labours have been cast

127 The laborious Benedictines (l'Art de vérifier les Dates p 896) are of opinion that the true name of Falcandus is Fulcandus or Foucault According to them Hugues Foucault a Frenchman by birth and at length Abbot of St Denys had followed into Sicily his patron Stephen de la Perche uncle to the mother of William II, archbishop of Palermo and great chancellor of the kingdom Yet Falcandus has all the feelings of a Sicilian and the title of Alumnus (which he bestows on himself) appears to indicate that he was born or at least educated in the island

128 Falcand p 303 Richard de St Germano begins his history from the death and praises of William II After some unmeaning epithets he thus continues Legis et justitiæ cultus tempore suo vigebat in regno suâ erat quilibet sorte contentus (were they mortals?) ubique pax, ubique securitas nec latronum metuebat viator insidias, nec maris nauta offendicula piratarum (Script. Rerum Ital tom vii p 969)

129 Constantia, primis a cunabulis in deliciarum tuarum affluentiâ diutius educata, tuisque institutis doctrinis et moribus informata tandem opibus tuis Barbaros delatura discessit et nunc cum ingentibus copiis revertitur ut pulcherrimæ nutricis ornamenta barbaricâ fœditate contaminet Intueri mihi jam videor turbulentas barbarorum acies civitates opulentas et loca diuturnâ pace florentia metû concutere cæde vastare rapinis atterere et fœdare luxuriâ [occurrunt] hinc cives aut gladiis intercepti aut servitute depressi virgines constupratæ, matronæ etc. [p 253 and 254]

130 Certe si regem [sibi] non dubiæ virtutis elegerint nec a Saracenis Christiani dissentiant poterit rex creatus rebus licet quasi desperatis et perditis subvenire et incursus hostium si prudenter egerit propulsare [p 253 and 254]

131 In Apuliis qui semper novitate gaudentes, novarum rerum studiis aguntur, nihil arbitror spei aut fiduciæ reponendum [ib]

132 Si civium tuorum virtutem et audaciam attendas murorum etiam ambitum densis turribus circumseptum [ib]

133 Cum crudelitate piraticâ Theutonum confligat atrocitas et inter ambustos lapides et Ethnæ flagrantis incendia etc [ib]

134 Eam partem quam nobilissimarum civitatum fulgor illustrat quæ et toti regno singulari meruit privilegio præminere nefarium esset vel barbarorum ingressû pollui I wish to transcribe his florid but curious, description of the palace city and luxuriant plain of Palermo [ib]

135 Vires non suppetunt et conatus tuos tam inopia civium, quam paucitas bellatorum elidunt [ib]

136 At vero quia difficile est Christianos in tanto rerum turbine sublato regis timore Saracenos non opprimere si Saraceni injuriis fatigati ab eis cœperint dissidere et castella forte maritima vel montanas munitiones occupaverint ut hinc cum Theutonicis summâ [sit] virtute pugnandum illinc Saracenis crebris insultibus occurrendum quid putas acturi sunt Siculi inter has depressi augustias et velut inter malleum et incudem multo cum discrimine constituti? hoc utique agent quod poterunt ut se Barbaris miserabili conditione dedentes in eorum se conferant potestatem O utinam plebis et procerum Christianorum et Saracenorum vota conveniant ut regem sibi concorditer eligentes [irruentes] barbaros totis viribus, toto conamine totisque desideriis proturbare contendant [p 254] The Normans and Sicilians appear to be confounded

137 The testimony of an Englishman of Roger de Hoveden (p 689) will lightly weigh against the silence of German and Italian history (Mura ori, Annali d'Italia, tom. x p 156) The priests and pilgrims, who returned from Rome exalted by every tale, the omnipotence of the holy father 138. Ego enim in eo cum Teutonicis manere non debeo (Caffari, Annal. Genuenses, in Muratori, Script. Rerum Italicarum, tom vi. p. 367 368).

139. For the Saracens of Sicily and Nocera see the Annals of Muratori (tom x. p 149 and A D 1223,1247) Giannone (tom ii p 385) and of the originals, in Muratori s Collection Richard de St Germano (tom. vii. p 996) Matteo Spinelli de Giovenazzo (tom. vii p 1064) Nicholas de Jamsilla (tom. x. 494) and Matteo Villani (tom. xiv L vii p 103) The last of these insinuates that in reducing the Saracens of Nocera Charles II of Anjou employed rather artifice than violence

140. Muratori quotes a passage from Arnold of Lubec (l iv c. 20) Reperit thesauros absconditos et omnem lapidum pretiosorum et gemmarum gloriam ita ut oneratis 160 somariis gloriose ad terram suam redierit. Roger de Hoveden, who mentions the violation of the royal tombs and corpses computes the spoil of Salerno at 200 000 ounces of gold (p 476) On these occasions I am almost tempted to exclaim with the listening maid in La Fontaine, "Je voudrois bien avoir ce qui manque.

Chapter LVII

1 I am indebted for his character and history to D Herbelot (Bibliothèque Orientale, Mahmud p 533-537) M. de Guignes (Histoire des Huns, tom. p 155-173) and our countryman Colonel Alexander Dow (vol. i. p 23-83) In the two first volumes of his History of Hindostan he styles him the translator of the Persian Ferishta but in his florid text it is not easy to distinguish the version and the original

2. The dynasty of the Samanides continued 125 years, A.D 874-999, under ten princes. See their succession and ruin in the Tables of M de Guignes (Hist. des Huns, tom. i. p 404-406) They were followed by the Gaznevides, A D 999-1183 (see tom. i. p. 239, 240) His division of nations often disturbs the series of time and place.

3. Gaznah hortos non habet est emporium et domicilium mercaturæ Indicæ Abulfedæ Geogr ph. Reiske, tab xxiii. p 349 D Herbelot p 364. It has not been visited by any modern traveller

4. By the ambassador of the caliph of Bagdad, who employed an Arabian or Chaldaic word that signifies lord and master (D'Herbelot, p 825) It is interpreted Αὐτοκράτωρ Βασιλεὺς Βασιλέων by the Byzantine writers of the eleventh century and the name (Σουλτανός Soldanus) is familiarly employed in the Greek and Latin languages after it had passed from the Gaznevides to the Seljukides, and other emirs of Asia and Egypt Ducange (Dissertation xvi. sur Joinville, p 238-240 Gloss. Græc. et Latin.) labours to find the title of Sultan in the ancient kingdom of Persia but his proofs are mere shadows a proper name in the Themes of Constantine (ii. 11 [tom. i. p 61 ed Bonn]) an anticipation of Zonaras etc., and a medal of Kai Khosrou, not (as he believes) the Sassanide of the sixth, but the Seljukide of Iconium of the thirteenth century (De Guignes Hist. des Huns tom. i. p. 246)

5. Ferishta (apud Dow Hist. of Hindostan vol i. p. 49) mentions the report of a gun in the Indian army But as I am slow in believing this premature (A.D 1008) use of artillery I must desire to scrutinise first the text and then the authority of Ferishta who lived in the Mogul court in the last century

6 Kinoge or Canouge (the old Palimbothra) is marked in latitude 27 3 longitude 80 13 See D Anville (Antiquité de l Inde p 60-62) corrected by the local knowledge of Major Rennell (in his excellent Memoir on his Map of Hindostan p 37-43) 300 jewellers 30 000 shops for the areca nut 60 000 bands of musicians, etc. (Abulfed Geograph tab xv p 274 Dow vol i p. 16) will allow an ample deduction

7 The idolaters of Europe says Ferishta (Dow vol i. p 66) Consult Abulfeda (p 272) and Rennell s Map of Hindostan

8 D Herbelot Bibliothèque Orientale, p 527 Yet these letters, apophthegms etc. are rarely the language of the heart or the motives of public action

9. For instance, a ruby of four hundred and fifty miskals (Dow vol. i. p 53) or six pounds three ounces the largest in the treasury of Delhi weighed seventeen miskals (Voyages de Tavernier partie ii p 280) It is true that in the East all coloured stones are called rubies (p 355) and that Tavernier saw three larger and more precious among the jewels de notre grand roi le plus puissant et plus magnifique de tous les rois de la terre (p 376)

10 Dow vol. i p 65. The sovereign of Kinoge is said to have possessed 2500 elephants (Abulfed Geograph. tab xv p 274) From these Indian stories the reader may correct a note in my first volume or from that note he may correct these stories

11 See a just and natural picture of these pastoral manners, in the history of William Archbishop of Tyre (l. i. c. vii in the Gesta Dei per Francos, p 633, 634) and a valuable note by the editor of the Histoire Généalogique des Tatars p 535-538

12 The first emigrations of the Turkmans and doubtful origin of the Seljukians may be traced in the laborious History of the Huns, by M de Guignes (tom i Tables Chronologiques, l v tom iii l vii ix. x) and the Bibliothèque Orientale of D Herbelot (p 799–802 897–901), Elmacin (Hist Saracen p 331–333 [4to ed Lugd B, 1625]), and Abulpharagius (Dynast p 221, 222)

13 Dow Hist of Hindostan, vol i p 89, 95–98 I have copied this passage as a specimen of the Persian manner but I suspect that by some odd fatality the style of Ferishta has been improved by that of Ossian

14 The Zendekan of D Herbelot (p 1028), the Dindaka of Dow (vol i p 97), is probably the Dandanekan of Abulfeda (Geograph p 345 Reiske), a small town of Chorasan two days' journey from Marû and renowned through the East for the production and manufacture of cotton

15 The Byzantine historians (Cedrenus tom ii p 766 767 [p 560 sq, ed Bonn] Zonaras tom ii p 255 [l xvii c 25] Nicephorus Bryennius p 21 [p 26, ed Bonn]) have confounded in this revolution the truth of time and place, of names and persons of causes and events The ignorance and errors of these Greeks (which I shall not stop to unravel) may inspire some distrust of the story of Cyaxares and Cyrus as it is told by their most eloquent predecessors

16 Willerm. Tyr l i c 7, p 633 [In Gesta Dei per Franc tom i fol Hanov 1611] The divination by arrows is ancient and famous in the East

17 D Herbelot, p 801 Yet after the fortune of his posterity Seljuk became the thirty fourth in lineal descent from the great Afrasiab emperor of Touran (p 800) The Tartar pedigree of the house of Zingis gave a different cast to flattery and fable and the historian Mirkhond derives the Seljukides from Alankavah, the virgin mother (p 801 col 2) If they be the same as the Zolduts of Abulghazi Bahadur Khan (Hist Généalogique p 148), we quote in their favour the most weighty evidence of a Tartar prince himself the descendant of Zingis Alankavah, or Alancu, and Oguz Khan

19 Cedrenus tom ii p 774 775 [p 580 sq, ed Bonn] Zonaras tom ii p 257 [l xvii c 25] With their usual knowledge of Oriental affairs they describe the ambassador as a sherif who like the syncellus of the patriarch was the vicar and successor of the caliph

20 From William of Tyre I have borrowed this distinction of Turks and Turkmans, which at least is popular and convenient The names are the same, and the addition of man is of the same import in the Persic and Teutonic idioms Few critics will adopt the etymology of James de Vitry (Hist Hierosol L i c. 11 p 1061 [Gesta Dei p Franc i]) of Turcomani quasi Turci et Comani, a mixed people.

21 Hist Générale des Huns, tom iii p 165, 166 167 M de Guignes quotes Abulmahasen, an historian of Egypt

22 Consult the Bibliothèque Orientale, in the articles of the Abbasides Caher and Caiem, and the Annals of Elmacin and Abulpharagius

23 For this curious ceremony I am indebted to M de Guignes (tom iii p 197, 198) and that learned author is obliged to Bondari who composed in Arabic the history of the Seljukides (tom. v p 365) I am ignorant of his age, country and character

24 Eodem anno (A H 455) obiit princeps Togrulbecus rex fuit clemens prudens et peritus regnandi cujus terror corda mortalium invaserat ita ut obedirent ei reges atque ad ipsum scriberent Elmacin Hist Saracen p 342 vers Erpenii [4to ed]

25 For these wars of the Turks and Romans, see in general the Byzantine histories of Zonaras and Cedrenus Scylitzes the continuator of Cedrenus and Nicephorus Bryennius Cæsar The two first of these were monks the two latter statesmen yet such were the Greeks that the difference of style and character is scarcely discernible For the Orientals, I draw as usual on the wealth of D'Herbelot (see titles of the first Seljukides) and the accuracy of De Guignes (Hist des Huns tom iii l. x)

26 Ἐφέρετο γὰρ ἐν Τούρκοις λόγος ὡς εἴη πεπρωμένον καταστραφῆναι τὸ Τούρκων γένος ὑπὸ τῆς τοιαύτης δυνάμεως ὁποίαν ὁ Μακεδὼν Ἀλέξανδρος ἔχων κατεστρέψατο Πέρσας Cedrenus tom ii p 791 [p 611, ed Bonn] The credulity of the vulgar is always probable and the Turks had learned from the Arabs the history or legend of Escander Dulcarnein (D Herbelot p 317, etc.)

27 Οἳ τὴν Ἰβηρίαν καὶ Μεσοποταμίαν καὶ τὴν παρακειμένην οἰκοῦσιν Ἀρμενίαν καὶ οἳ τὴν Ἰουδαϊκὴν τοῦ Νεστορίου καὶ τῶν Ἀκεφάλων θρησκεύουσιν αἵρεσιν (Scylitzes ad calcem Cedreni tom ii p 834 [p 687 ed Bonn], whose ambiguous construction shall not tempt me to suspect that he confounded the Nestorian and Monophysite heresies) He familiarly talks of the μῆνις χόλος ὀργὴ Θεοῦ qualities as I should apprehend very foreign to the perfect Being but his bigotry is forced to confess that they were soon afterwards discharged on the orthodox Romans

28 Had the name of Georgians been known to the Greeks (Stritter Memoriæ Byzant tom. iv Iberica) I should derive it from their agriculture, as the Σκύθαι γεωργοί of Herodotus (l iv c. 18 p 289 edit Wesseling) But it appears only since the crusades among the Latins (Jac a Vitriaco Hist Hierosol c 79 p 1095) and Orientals (D Herbelot p 407) and was devoutly borrowed from St George of Cappadocia

29 Mosheim Institut Hist Eccles p 632 See, in Chardin's Travels (tom i p 171–174) the manners and religion of this handsome but worthless nation. See the pedigree of their princes from dam to the present century in the Tables of M. De Guignes (tom. i. p 433–438)

30. This city is mentioned by Constantine Porphyrogenitus (de Administrat Imperii l. ii. c. 44, p. 119 [tom. iii. p 192 ed. Bonn]) and the Byzantines of the eleventh century under the name of Mantzikierte and by some is confounded with Theodosiopolis but Delisle, in his notes and maps, has very properly fixed the situation. Abulfeda (Geograph. tab xviii. p 310) describes Malasgerd as a small town built with black stone, supplied with water without trees etc.

31 The Uzi of the Greeks (Stritter Memor Byzant. tom. iii. p. 923–948) are the Gozz of the Orientals (Hist des Huns, tom ii. p 522 tom. iii. p. 133, etc.) They appear on the Danube and the Volga, in Armenia, Syria, and Chorasan, and the name seems to have been extended to the whole Turkman race.

32 Urselius [Ursellus] (the Russelius of Zonaras) is distinguished by Jeffrey Malaterra (l. ii. c. 33) among the Norman conquerors of Sicily and with the surname of Baliol and our own historians will tell how the Baliols came from Normandy to Durham built Bernard s castle on the Tees, married an heiress of Scotland, etc. Ducange (Not. ad Nicephor Bryennium, l. ii. No 4) has laboured the subject in honour of the President de Bailleul, whose father had exchanged the sword for the gown.

33. Elmacin (p 343 344) assigns this probable number which is reduced by Abulpharagius to 15,000 (p 227) and by D Herbelot (p 102) to 12 000 horse. But the same Elmacin gives 300 000 men to the emperor of whom Abulpharagius says, Cum centum hominum millibus, multisque equis et magnâ pompâ instructus The Greeks abstain from any definition of numbers.

34. The Byzantine writers do not speak so distinctly of the presence of the sultan he committed his forces to a eunuch had retired to a distance etc. Is it ignorance, or jealousy or truth?

35. He was the son of the Cæsar John Ducas brother of the emperor Constantine (Ducange Fam. Byzant. p 165) Nicephorus Bryennius applauds his virtues and extenuates his faults (L. i p 30, 38 [p 41 54, ed. Bonn] L. ii. p 53 [p 76 ed. Bonn]) Yet he owns his enmity to Romanus, οὐ πάνυ δὲ φιλίως ἔχων πρὸς Βασιλέα. Scylitzes speaks more explicitly of his treason.

36. This circumstance which we read and doubt in Scylitzes and Constantine Manasses, is more prudently omitted by Nicephorus and Zonaras.

37 The ransom and tribute are attested by reason and the Orientals. The other Greeks are modestly silent but Nicephorus Bryennius dares to affirm that the terms were οὐκ ἀναξίας Ῥωμαίων [p. 44, ed. Bonn] and that the emperor would have preferred death to a shameful treaty

38. The defeat and captivity of Romanus Diogenes may be found in John Scylitzes ad calcem Cedreni tom. ii. p 835–843 [p. 689–704, ed. Bonn] Zonaras tom. ii p 281–284 [L xviii. c. 13–15] Nicephorus Bryennius l. i p 25–32 [p 33 44, ed Bonn] Glycas p 325–327 [p 607–611 ed Bonn] Constantine Manasses, p 134 [v 6594 p 280 ed. 39. This interesting death is told by D Herbelot (p 103, 104) and M. de Guignes (tom. iii. p 212, 213) from their Oriental writers but neither of them have transfused the spirit of Elmacin (Hist. Saracen p 344 345)

40. A critic of high renown (the late Dr Johnson) who has severely scrutinised the epitaphs of Pope might cavil in this sublime inscription at the words repair to Maru since the reader must already be at Maru before he could peruse the inscription.

41 The Bibliothèque Orientale has given the text of the reign of Malek (p 542 543 544, 654, 655) and the Histoire Générale des Huns (tom. iii. p 214–224) has added the usual measure of repetition emendation, and supplement Without those two learned Frenchmen I should be blind indeed in the Eastern world.

42 See an excellent discourse at the end of Sir William Jones s History of Nadir Shah, and the articles of the poets Amak, Anvari Raschidi, etc., in the Bibliothèque Orientale.

43 His name was Kheder Khan. Four bags were placed round his sofa, and as he listened to the song he cast handfuls of gold and silver to the poets (D Herbelot p 107) All this may be true but I do not understand how he could reign in Transoxiana in the time of Malek Shah and much less how Kheder could surpass him in power and pomp I suspect that the beginning not the end, of the eleventh century is the true era of his reign

44. See Chardin Voyages en Perse tom. ii. p 235.

45. The Gelalæan era (Gelaleddin Glory of the Faith was one of the names or titles of Malek Shah) is fixed to the fifteenth of March A.H. 471—A D 1079 Dr Hyde has produced the original testimonies of the Persians and Arabians (de Religione veterum Persarum, c. 16 p 200–211)

46 She speaks of this Persian royalty as ἀπάσης κακοδαιμονέστερον πενίας Anna Comnena was only nine years old at the end of the reign of Malek Shah (A D 1092) and when she speaks of his assassination she confounds the sultan with the vizir (Alexias l. vi. p 177 178 [tom. i. p 314–317, ed Bonn])

47 So obscure, that the industry of M de Guignes could only copy (tom. i. p 244 tom. iii. part i. p 269, etc.) the history or rather list of the

Seljukides of Kerman, in Bibliothèque Orientale They were extinguished before the end of the twelfth century

48 Tavernier, perhaps the only traveller who has visited Kerman describes the capital as a great ruinous village twenty five days journey from Ispahan, and twenty seven from Ormus in the midst of a fertile country (Voyages en Turquie et en Perse, p 107 110)

49 It appears from Anna Comnena that the Turks of Asia Minor obeyed the signet and chiauss of the great sultan (Alexias l vi p 170 [tom i p 302, ed Bonn]), and that the two sons of Soliman were detained in his court (p 180 [p 319, ib])

50 This expression is quoted by Petit de la Croix (Vie de Gengiscan, p 161) from some poet most probably a Persian

51 On the conquest of Asia Minor, M de Guignes has derived no assistance from the Turkish or Arabian writers who produce a naked list of the Seljukides of Roum The Greeks are unwilling to expose their shame and we must extort some hints from Scylitzes (p 860 863 [p 731, 736 ed Bonn]) Nicephorus Bryennius (p 88 91 92, etc., 103 104 [p 130, 136, sqq 158 sqq, ed Bonn]), and Anna Comnena (Alexias, p 91, 92 etc, 168, etc. [tom i. p 169 sqq 299 sqq ed Bonn])

52 Such is the description of Roum by Haiton, the Armenian, whose Tartar history may be found in the collections of Ramusio and Bergeron (see Abulfeda Geograph climat xvii p 310–305)

53 Dicit eos quendam abusione Sodomitica intervertisse episcopum (Guibert Abbat Hist Hierosol l i p 468) It is odd enough that we should find a parallel passage of the same people in the present age. Il n'est point d horreur que ces Turcs n aient commis et semblables aux soldats effrénés qui dans le sac d une ville non contens de disposer de tout à leur gré prétendent encore aux succès les moins désirables quelques Siphais ont porté leurs attentats sur la personne du vieux rabbi de la synagogue et celle de l Archevêque Grec (Mémoirs du Baron de Tott tom ii p 193)

54 The emperor or abbot describe the scenes of a Turkish camp as if they had been present Matres correptæ in conspectû filiarum multipliciter repetitis diversorum coitibus vexabantur (is that the true reading?) cum filiæ assistentes carmina præcinere saltando cogerentur Mox eadem passio ad filias etc.

56 William of Tyre (l. i. c 9 10 p 635) gives the most authentic and deplorable account of these Turkish conquests

57 In his epistle to the count of Flanders Alexius seems to fall too low beneath his character and dignity yet it is approved by Ducange (Not ad Alexiad p 335 etc.) and paraphrased by the Abbot Guibert, a contemporary historian The Greek text no longer exists and each translat[or] and scribe might say with Guibert (p 475), verb[is] vestita meis—a privilege of most indefinite latitud[e]

31 In his genuine or fictitious letter to the Count of Flanders, Alexius mingles with the danger of the church and the relics of saints the auri et argenti amor and pulcherrimarum fœminarum voluptas (p. 476 [l. i. c. 4]) as if says the indignant Guibert, the Greek women were handsomer than those of France.

32. See the privileges of the Cruces signati—freedom from debt, usury injury secular justice etc. The pope was their perpetual guardian (Ducange tom. ii. p. 651 652)

33. Guibert (p 481 [l. ii c. 6]) paints in lively colours this general emotion. He was one of the few contemporaries who had genius enough to feel the astonishing scenes that were passing before their eyes. Erat itaque videre miraculum caro omnes emere, atque vili vendere, etc.

34. Some instances of these stigmata are given in the Esprit des Croisades (tom iii. p 169, etc.) from authors whom I have not seen.

35 Fuit et aliud scelus detestabile in hac congregatione pedestris populi stulti et vesanæ levitatis anserem quendam divino spiritû asserebant afflatum et capellam non minus eodem repletam et has sibi duces [hujus] secundæ viæ fecerant etc. (Albert. Aquensis l. i. c. 31 p 196) Had these peasants founded an empire they might have introduced as in Egypt the worship of animals, which their philosophic descendants would have glossed over with some specious and subtle allegory

36. Benjamin of Tudela describes the state of his Jewish brethren from Cologne along the Rhine they were rich generous, learned hospitable and lived in the eager hope of the Messiah (Voyage, tom. i. p 243-245 par Baratier) In seventy years (he wrote about A.D 1170) they had recovered from these massacres.

37 These massacres and depredations on the Jews, which were renewed at each crusade are coolly related It is true that St. Bernard (Epist 363 tom i p 329 [p 328 ed Bened]) admonishes the Oriental Franks non sunt persequendi Judæi non sunt trucidandi. The contrary doctrine had been preached by a rival monk.

38 See the contemporary description of Hungary in Otho of Frisingen l. i. c. 31 in Muratori, Script. Rerum Italicarum, tom. vi. p 665, 666.

39. The old Hungarians, without excepting Turotzius are ill informed of the first crusade which they involve in a single passage. Katona like ourselves, can only quote the writers of France but he compares with local science the ancient and modern geography Ante portam Cyperon is Sopron or Poson Malleville Zemlin Fluvius Maroe Savus Linkax Leith Mesebroch or Merseburg Ouar or Moson Tollenburg Pragg (de Reg Hung iii p 19-53)

40. Anna Comnena (Alexias l. x p 287) describes this ὀστῶν κολωνὸς as a mountain ὑψηλὸν καὶ βάθος καὶ πλάτος ἀξιολογώτατον In the siege of Nice such were used by the Franks themselves as the materials of a wall.

41 See pp. 726-727 below

42 The author of the Esprit des Croisades has doubted and might have disbelieved the crusade and tragic death of Prince Sueno with 1500 or 15 000 Danes, who was cut off by Sultan Soliman in Cappadocia but who still lives in the poem of Tasso (tom. iv p 111-115)

43 The fragments of the kingdoms of Lotharingia or Lorraine, were broken into the two duchies of the Moselle and of the Meuse the first has preserved its name which in the latter has been changed into that of Brabant (Vales Notit. Gall p 283-288)

44. See, in the Description of France by the Abbé de Longuerue, the articles of Boulogne part i. p 54 Brabant part ii p 47 48 Bouillon p 134. On his departure Godfrey sold or pawned Bouillon to the church for 1300 marks

(p 478 [l ii c. 1]) He owns, however that the vivacity of the French degenerates into petulance among foreigners (p 483 [l ii c. 10]) and vain loquaciousness (p 502 [l iv c. 9])

10 John Tilpinus or Turpinus, was Archbishop of Rheims, A D 773 After the year 1000 this romance was composed in his name by a monk of the borders of France and Spain and such was the idea of ecclesiastical merit that he describes himself as a fighting and drinking priest! Yet the book of lies was pronounced authentic by Pope Calixtus II (A D 1122) and is respectfully quoted by the abbot Suger in the great Chronicles of St Denys (Fabric Biblioth Latin. medii Ævi, edit Mansi tom iv p 161)

16 The Truce of God (Treva, or Treuga Dei) was first invented in Aquitain A D 1032 blamed by some bishops as an occasion of perjury and rejected by the Normans as contrary to their privileges (Ducange Gloss Latin tom vi p 682–685)

17 Deus vult Deus vult! was the pure acclamation of the clergy who understood Latin (Robert Mon l. 1 p 32) By the illiterate laity who spoke the Provincial or Limousin idiom it was corrupted to Deus lo vo't, or D ex el volt See Chron Casinense l. iv c. 11, p 497 in Muratori Script Rerum Ital. tom iv, and Ducange (Dissertat xi p 207 sur Joinville and Gloss Latin tom ii p 690) who in his preface, produces a very difficult specimen of the dialect of Rovergue, A D 1100, very near, both in time and place, to the Council of Clermont (p 15 16)

18 Most commonly on their shoulders in gold, or silk or cloth sewed on their garments In the first crusade all were red in the third the French alone preserved that colour, while green crosses were adopted by the Flemings and white by the English (Ducange tom ii p 651) Yet in England the red ever appears the favourite, and as it were the national colour of our military ensigns and uniforms

19 Bongarsius who has published the original writers of the crusades, adopts with much complacency the fanatic title of Guibertus, Gesta Dei per Francos though some critics propose to read Gesta Diaboli per Francos (Hanoviæ, 1611 two vols in folio) I shall briefly enumerate as they stand in this collection, the authors whom I have used for the first crusade I Gesta Francorum II Robertus Monachus III Baldricus IV Raimundus de Agiles V Albertus Aquensis VI Fulcherius Carnotensis VII Guibertus VIII Wilhelmus Tyriensis Muratori has given us, IX Radulphus Cadomensis de Gestis Tancredi (Script Rer Ital tom v p 285–333) and X Bernardus Thesaurarius de Acquisitione Terræ Sanctæ (tom. vii p 664–848) The last of these was unknown to a late French historian, who has given a large and critical list of the writers of the crusades (Esprit des Croisades tom 1 p 13–141) and most of whose judgments my own experience will allow me to ratify It was late before I could obtain a sight of the French historians collected by Duchesne I Petri Tudebodi Sacerdotis Sivracensis Historia de Hierosolymitano Itinere (tom. iv p 773–815) has been transfused into the first anonymous writer of Bongarsius. II The Metrical History of the First Crusade in seven books (p 890–912) is of small value or account

20 If the reader will turn to the first scene of the First Part of Henry the Fourth he will see in the text of Shakspeare the natural feelings of enthusiasm and in the notes of Dr Johnson the workings of a bigoted though vigorous mind greedy of every pretence to hate and persecute those who dissent from his creed.

21 The sixth Discourse of Fleury on Ecclesiastical History (p 223–261) contains an accurate and rational view of the causes and effects of the crusades

22 The penance indulgences etc., of the middle ages are amply discussed by Muratori (Antiquitat Italiæ medii Ævi tom. v dissert lxviii p 709–768) and by M Chais (Lettres sur les Jubilés et les Indulgences tom ii. lettres 21 and 22, p 478–556) with this difference that the abuses of superstition are mildly perhaps faintly exposed by the learned Italian and peevishly magnified by the Dutch minister

23 Schmidt (Histoire des Allemands tom ii p. 211–220 452–462) gives an abstract of the Penitential of Rhegino in the ninth and of Burchard

Of the words gentilis gentilhomme gentleman, …wo etymologies are produced 1 From the bar…barians of the fifth century the soldiers, and at length the conquerors, of the Roman empire, who were vain of their foreign nobility and 2 From the sense of the civilians, who consider gentilis as synonymous with ingenuus Selden inclines to the first, but the latter is more pure, as well as probable.

59. The Familiæ Dalmaticæ of Ducange are meagre and imperfect the national historians are recent and fabulous, the Greeks remote and careless. In the year 1104 Coloman reduced the maritime country as far as Trau and Salona (Katona, Hist. Crit. tom. iii. p. 195-207)

60 Scodras appears in Livy as the capital and fortress of Gentius king of the Illyrians arx munitissima afterwards a Roman colony (Cellarius, tom. i. p 393 394) It is now called Iscodar or Scutari (D Anville Géographie Ancienne tom. i. p 164) The sanjak (now a pasha) of Scutari, or Schendeire was the eighth under the Beglerbeg of Romania, and furnished 600 soldiers on a revenue of 78 ,87 rix-dollars (Marsigli, Stato Militare del Imperio Ottomano p 128)

46 Anna Comnena supposes that Hugh was proud of his nobility, riches and power (l x p 288) the two last articles appear more equivocal but an ἐυγένεια, which seven hundred years ago was famous in the palace of Constantinople attests the ancient dignity of the Capetian family of France

47 Will Gemeticensis, l vii c 7 p 672 673, in Camden Normanicis [ed Frankf 1603] He pawned the duchy for one hundredth part of the present yearly revenue Ten thousand marks may be equal to five hundred thousand livres and Normandy annually yields fifty seven millions to the king (Necker Administration des Finances tom i p 287)

48 His original letter to his wife is inserted in the Spicilegium of Dom Luc d Acheri tom iv, and quoted in the Esprit des Croisades, tom i p 63

49 Unius enim, duum, trium seu quatuor oppidorum dominos quis numeret? quorum tanta fuit copia ut vix totidem Trojana obsidio coegisse putetur (Ever the lively and interesting Guibert p 486 [l ii c 17])

50 It is singular enough that Raymond of St Giles a second character in the genuine history of the crusades should shine as the first of heroes in the writings of the Greeks (Anna Comnen Alex iad l. x. xi) and the Arabians (Longueruana, p 129)

51 Omnes de Burgundiâ et Alverniâ et Vasconiâ et Gothi (of Languedoc) provinciales appellabantur cæteri vero Francigenæ et hoc in exercitu inter hostes autem Franci dicebantur Raymond de Agiles p 144

52 The town of his birth or first appanage, was consecrated to St Ægidius, whose name, as early as the first crusade was corrupted by the French into St Gilles or St Giles It is situate in the Lower Languedoc, between Nismes and the Rhône and still boasts a collegiate church of the foundation of Raymond (Mélanges tirés d une Grande Bibliothèque, tom xxxvii p 51)

53 The mother of Tancred was Emma, sister of the great Robert Guiscard his father the marquis Odo the Good It is singular enough that the family and country of so illustrious a person should be unknown but Muratori reasonably conjectures that he was an Italian and perhaps of the race of the marquises of Montferrat in Piedmont (Script tom v p 281, 282)

54 To gratify the childish vanity of the house of Este Tasso has inserted in his poem and in the first crusade a fabulous hero the brave and am*orous Rinaldo (x 75 xvii 66-94) He might bor*row his name from a Rinaldo with the Aquila bianca Estense, who vanquished as the standard *bearer of the Roman church the emperor Fred*eric I (Storia Imperiale di Ricobaldo in Muratori Script Ital tom ix p 360 Ariosto Orlando Furioso iii 30) But 1 The distance of sixty years between the youth of the two Rinaldos destroys their identity 2 The Storia Imperiale is a forgery of the Conte Boyardo at the end of the fifteenth century (Muratori p 281-289) 3 This Rinaldo and his exploits are not less chimerical than the

from whence our belfry was the movable tower of the ancients (Ducange, tom i p 608)

82. I cannot forbear remarking the resemblance between the siege and lake of Nice with the operations of Hernan Cortez before Mexico See Dr Robertson, Hist. of America l. v

83. Mécréant a word invented by the French crusaders, and confined in that language to its primitive sense. It should seem that the zeal of our ancestors boiled higher and that they branded every unbeliever as a rascal. A similar prejudice still lurks in the minds of many who think themselves Christians.

84. Baronius has produced a very doubtful letter to his brother Roger (A.D 1098 No 15) The enemies consisted of Medes, Persians Chaldæans be . . . The first attack was cum nostro incommodo . . . and tender But why Godfrey of Bouillon and Hugh brothers. Tancred is styled filius—of whom? certainly not of Roger nor of Bohemond

85. Veruntamen dicunt se esse de Francorum generatione et quia nullus homo naturaliter debet esse miles nisi Franci et Turci (Gesta Francorum, p. 7). The same community of blood and valour is attested by archbishop Baldric (p 99)

86. Baussa, Bales a Albal . . . See Muratori, Antiq tom. ii. p. 517 524 Ducange, Gloss Latin. tom. i. p. 53 532 In the time of Anna Comnena, this weapon, which she describes under the name of tzangra, was unknown in the East (l. x. p 291) By a humane inconsistency the pope strove to prohibit in Christian wars.

87 The curious reader may compare the classic learning of Cellarius and the geographical science of D'Anville. William of Tyre is the only historian of the crusades who has any knowledge of antiquity and M. Otter trod almost in the footsteps of the Franks from Constantinople to Antioch (Voyage en Turquie et en Perse, tom. i. p 35–88)

88. This detached conquest of Edessa is best represented by Fulcherius Carnotensis, or of Chartres (in the collections of Bongarsius Duchesne and Martenne) the valiant chaplain of Count Baldwin (Esprit des Croisades tom. i. p 13 14) In the disputes of that prince with Tancred his partiality is encountered by the partiality of Radulphus Cadomensis, the soldier and historian of the gallant marquis.

89. See De Guignes, Hist. des Huns tom. i. p 456

90. For Antioch, see Pocock (Description of the East, vol. ii. p i. p 188–193) Otter (Voyage en Turquie, etc. tom. i. p 8 etc.) the Turkish geographer (in Otter's notes) the Index Geographicus of Schultens (ad calcem Bohadin. Vit. Saladin.) and Abulfeda (Tabula Syriæ p 115, 116, vers Reiske)

91 Ensem elevat eumque à sinistrâ parte scapularum tantâ virtute intorsit, quòd pectus medium disjunxit, spinam et vitalia interrupit, et sic lubricus ensis super crus dextrum integer exivit sicque caput integrum cum dextrâ parte corporis immersit gurgite, partemque quæ equo præsidebat remisit civitati (Robert Mon. p 50) Cujus ense trajectus Turcus duo factus est Turci ut inferior alter in urbem equitaret, alter arcitenens in flumine nataret (Radulph. Cadom c 53 p 304) Yet he justifies the deed by the stupendis viribus of Godfrey and William of Tyre covers it by obstupuit populus facti novitate . . . mirabilis (l. v c. 6 p 701) Yet it must not have appeared incredible to the knights of that age.

92 See the exploits of Robert, Raymond, and the modest Tancred, who imposed silence on his squire (Radulph. Cadom c. 53)

93 After mentioning the distress and humble petition of the Franks Abulpharagius adds the haughty reply of Codbuka, or Kerboga Non evasuri estis nisi per gladium (Dynast. p 242)

94. In describing the host of Kerboga, most of the Latin historians the author of the Gesta (p. 17) Robert Monachus (p 56) Baldric (p 111), Fulcherius Carnotensis (p. 392) Guibert (p 512) William of Tyre (l. vi. c. 3 p 714) Bernard Thesaurarius (c. 39, p 695) are content with the vague expressions of infinita multitudo immensum agmen innumeræ copiæ or gentes which correspond with the μετὰ ἀναριθμήτων χιλιάδων of Anna Comnena (Alexias l. xi. p 318–320) The numbers of the Turks are fixed by Albert Aquensis at 200 000 (l. iv c. 10 p 242) and by Radulphus Cadomensis at 400 000 horse (c. 72 p 309)

95. See the tragic and scandalous fate of an archdeacon of royal birth who was slain by the Turks as he reposed in an orchard playing at dice with a Syrian concubine.

96 The value of an ox rose from five solidi (fifteen shillings) at Christmas to two marks (four pounds) and afterwards much higher a kid or lamb from one shilling to eighteen of our present money in the second famine, a loaf of bread, or the head of an animal sold for a piece of gold. More examples might be produced but it is the ordinary not the extraordinary prices that deserve the notice of the philosopher

97 Alii multi quorum nomina non tenemus quia deleta de libro vitæ præsenti operi non sunt inserenda (Will. Tyr l. vi. c. 5 p 715) Guibert (p 518 523 [l v c. 25 l vi. c. 11]) attempts to excuse Hugh the Great and even Stephen of Chartres

98 See the progress of the crusade the retreat of Alexius the victory of Antioch and the conquest of Jerusalem in the Alexiad, l. x p. 317–327 Anna was so prone to exaggeration that she magnifies the exploits of the Latins

99. The Mohammedan Aboulmahasen (apud De Guignes tom p ii. p 95) is more correct in his account of the holy lance than the Christians Anna Comnena and Abulpharagius the Greek princess confounds it with the nail of the cross (l. xi p 326) the Jacobite primate with St Peter's staff (p 242)

100 The two antagonists who express the most

thirteen the time of the first crusade she was nubile and perhaps married to the younger Nicephorus Bryennius whom she fondly styles τὸν ἐμὸν Καίσαρα (l x p 295 296) Some moderns have imagined that her enmity to Bohemond was the fruit of disappointed love. In the transactions of Constantinople and Nice her partial accounts (Alex. l x. xi p 283–317) may be opposed to the partiality of the Latins but in their subsequent exploits she is brief and ignorant

65 In their views of the character and conduct of Alexius Maimbourg has favoured the Catholic Franks and Voltaire has been partial to the schismatic Greeks The prejudice of a philosopher is less excusable than that of a Jesuit

66 Between the Black Sea the Bosphorus and the river Barbyses which is deep in summer and runs fifteen miles through a flat meadow Its communication with Europe and Constantinople is by the stone bridge of the Blachernæ, which in successive ages was restored by Justinian and Basil (Gyllius de Bosphoro Thracio, l ii c 3 Ducange, C. P Christiana l iv c 2, p 179)

67 There were two sorts of adoption the one by arms, the other by introducing the son between the shirt and skin of his father Ducange (sur Joinville diss xxii p 270) supposes Godfrey's adoption to have been of the latter sort

68 After his return Robert of Flanders became the man of the king of England for a pension of four hundred marks See the first act in Rymer's Fœdera

69 Sensit vetus regnandi, falsos in amore, odia non fingere Tacit [Ann] vi 44.

70 The proud historians of the crusades slide and stumble over this humiliating step Yet since the heroes knelt to salute the emperor as he sat motionless on his throne, it is clear that they must have kissed either his feet or knees It is only singular that Anna should not have amply supplied the silence or ambiguity of the Latins The abasement of their princes would have added a fine chapter to the Ceremoniale Aulæ Byzantinæ.

71 He called himself Φραγγὸς καθαρὸς τῶν εὐγενῶν (Alexias l x. p 301) What a title of noblesse of the eleventh century if any one could now prove his inheritance! Anna relates with visible pleasure, that the swelling barbarian Λατινὸς τετυφωμένος was killed, or wounded after fighting in the front in the battle of Dorylæum (l. xi p 317) This circumstance may justify the suspicion of Ducange (Not p 362) that he was no other than Robert of Paris of the district most peculiarly styled the Duchy or Island of France (L Isle de France)

72 With the same penetration, Ducange discovers his church to be that of St Drausus or Drosin of Soissons, quem duello dimicaturi solent invocare pugiles qui ad memoriam ejus (his tomb) pernoctant invictos reddit ut et de Burgundiâ et Italiâ tali necessitate confugiatur ad eum Joan. Sariberiensis, epist 139.

73 There is some diversity on the numbers his army but no authority can be compared wi that of Ptolemy who states it at five thousa horse and thirty thousand foot (see Usher's A nales p 152)

74 Fulcher Carnotensis p 387 He enumera nineteen nations of different names and languag (p 389) but I do not clearly apprehend his d ference between the Franci and Galli Itali a Apuli Elsewhere (p 385) he contemptuous brands the deserters

75 Guibert p 556 [l vii c. 39] Yet even h gentle opposition implies an immense multitud By Urban II in the fervour of his zeal it is on rated at 300 000 pilgrims (Epist xvi. Concil. tom xii p 731)

76 Alexias l. x p 283 305 Her fastidious del cacy complains of their strange and inarticula names and indeed there is scarcely one that s has not contrived to disfigure with the proud ig norance so dear and familiar to a polished peopl I shall select only one example Sangeles for th count of St Giles

77 William of Malmesbury (who wrote abou the year 1130) has inserted in his history (l iv p 130–154 [Script post Bedam]) a narrative of th first crusade but I wish that instead of listenin to the tenue murmur which had passed the Britis ocean (p 143) he had confined himself to th numbers families, and adventures of his country men I find in Dugdale that an English Norman Stephen earl of Albemarle and Holdernesse, le the rear guard with duke Robert at the battle o Antioch (Baronage part i. p 61)

78 Videres Scotorum apud se ferocium alia imbellium cuneos (Guibert p 471) the crus in tectum and hispida chlamys may suit the Highlanders, but the finibus uliginosis may rather apply to the Irish bogs William of Malmesbury expressly mentions the Welsh and Scots, etc (l iv p 133), who quitted the former venationem saltuum the latter familiaritatem pulicum.

79 This [illegible] sometimes real, more frequently an artifice or a lie, may be found in Anna Comnena (Alexias l x. p 288) Guibert (p. 546) Radulph Cadom (c. 97) The stratagem is related by the author of the Gesta Francorum the monk Robert Baldric, and Raymond de Agiles, in the siege and famine of Antioch

81 On the fortifications engines and sieges of the middle ages see Muratori (Antiquitat Italiæ tom. ii. dissert xxvi. p 452–524) The belfredus,

83. Mecreant a word invented by the French usaders, and confined in that language to its imitive sense. It should seem that the zeal of our cestors boiled higher and that they branded ery unbeliever as a rascal. A similar prejudice ll lurks in the minds of many who think themves Christians.

84. Baronius has produced a very doubtful letter his brother Roger (A.D 1098 No 15) The eneies consisted of Medes, Persians Chaldæans be so. The first attack was cum nostro incommodo ve and tender But why Godfrey of Bouillon and ugh brothers? Tancred is styled filius—of whom? rtainly not of Roger nor of Bohemond

85. Verumtamen dicunt se esse de Francorum neratione et quia nullus homo naturaliter debet se miles nisi Franci et Turci (Gesta Francorum,) The same community of blood and valour is ttested by archbishop Baldric (p 99)

86. Balista Balestra Arbalestre See Muratori Antiq tom. ii. p 517–524 Ducange, Gloss Latin. tom. i. p 531 532 In the time of Anna Comnena, this weapon, which she describes under the name of tzagra, was unknown in the East (l. x. p 291) By a humane inconsistency the pope strove to prohibit it in Christian wars.

87 The curious reader may compare the classic learning of Cellarius and the geographical science of D'Anville. William of Tyre is the only historian of the crusades who has any knowledge of antiquity and M. Otter trod almost in the footsteps of the Franks from Constantinople to Antioch (Voyage en Turquie et en Perse, tom. i p 35–88)

88. This detached conquest of Edessa is best represented by Fulcherius Carnotensis, or of Chartres (in the collections of Bongarsius Duchesne, and Martenne) the valiant chaplain of Count Baldwin (Esprit des Croisades tom. i. p 13 14) In the disputes of that prince with Tancred, his partiality is encountered by the partiality of Radulphus Cadomensis, the soldier and historian of the gallant marquis.

Cadom c. 53 p 304) Yet he justifies the deed by the st pendis viribus of Godfrey and William of Tyre covers it by obstupuit populus facti novitate mirabilis (l. v c. 6, p 701) Yet it must not have appeared incredible to the knights of that age.

92 See the exploits of Robert Raymond, and the modest Tancred who imposed silence on his squire (Radulph. Cadom c. 53)

93 After mentioning the distress and humble petition of the Franks, Abulpharagius adds the haughty reply of Codbuka, or Kerboga Non evasuri estis nisi per gladium (Dynast. p 242)

More examples might be produced but it is the ordinary not the extraordinary prices that deserve the notice of the philosopher

97 Alii multi, quorum nomina non tenemus quia deleta de libro vitæ præsenti operi non sunt inserenda (Will. Tyr l. vi. c. 5, p 715) Guibert (p 518 523 [l. v c. 25 l. vi c. 11]) attempts to excuse Hugh the Great, and even Stephen of Chartres

98 See the progress of the crusade the retreat of Alexius the victory of Antioch and the conquest of Jerusalem, in the Alexiad. l. xi. p. 317–327 Anna was so prone to exaggeration that she magnifies the exploits of the Latins

99. The Mohammedan Aboulmahasen (apud De Guignes tom ii. p ii. p 95) is more correct in his account of the holy lance than the Christians Anna Comnena and Abulpharagius the Greek princess confounds it with the nail of the cross (l. xi. p 326) the Jacobite primate with St Peter's staff (p 242)

100 The two antagonists who express the most intimate knowledge and the strongest conviction of the miracle and of the fraud are Raymond de Agiles and Radulphus Cadomensis the one attached to the count of Toulouse the other to the Norman prince Fulcherius Carnotensis presumes to say, Audite fraudem et non fraudem! and afterwards, Invenit lanceam fallaciter occultatam for sitan The rest of the herd are loud and strenuous

105 See the masterly description of Tacitus (Hist v 11 12 13) who supposes that the Jewish lawgivers had provided for a perpetual state of hostility against the rest of mankind

106 The lively scepticism of Voltaire is balanced with sense and erudition by the French author of the Esprit des Croisades (tom iv p 386-388) who observes that according to the Arabians the inhabitants of Jerusalem must have exceeded 200 000 that in the siege of Titus Josephus collects 1 300 000 Jews that they are stated by Tacitus himself at 600 000 and that the largest defalcation that his accepimus can justify will still leave them more numerous than the Roman army

107 Maundrell, who diligently perambulated the walls found a circuit of 4630 paces or 4167 English yards (p 109 110) from an authentic plan D Anville concludes a measure nearly similar of 1960 French toises (p 23-29) in his scarce and valuable tract For the topography of Jeru salem see Reland (Palestina tom ii p 832-860)

108 Jerusalem was possessed only of the torrent of Kedron dry in summer, and of the little spring or brook of Siloe (Reland tom i p 294 300) Both strangers and natives complained of the want of water, which in time of war was studiously aggravated Within the city Tacitus mentions a perennial fountain an aqueduct and cisterns for rain water The aqueduct was conveyed from the rivulet Tekoe or Etham which is likewise mentioned by Bohadin (in Vit Saladin p 238)

119 An actual muster not including the tribes of Levi and Benjamin gave David an army of 1 300 000 or 1 574 000 fighting men which with the addition of women children and slaves may imply a population of thirteen millions in a country sixty leagues in length and thirty broad The honest and rational Le Clerc (Comment on 2nd Samuel xxiv and 1st Chronicles xxi) æstuat augusto in limite and mutters his suspicion of a false transcript a dangerous suspicion!

120. These sieges are related each in its proper place in the great history of William of Tyre from the ninth to the eighteenth book, and more briefly told by Bernardus Thesaurarius (de Acquisitione Terræ Sanctæ c 87-98 p 732-740) Some domestic facts are celebrated in the Chronicles of Pisa Genoa and Venice in the sixth ninth and twelfth tomes of Muratori

123. Sanut very sensibly descants on the mischiefs of female succession in a land hostibus circumdata ubi cuncta virilia et virtuosa esse deberent. Yet, at the summons and with the approbation of her feudal lord, a noble damsel was obliged to choose a husband and champion (Assises de Jérusalem, c. 242 etc.) See in M. de Guignes (tom. i. p 441–471) the accurate and useful tables of these dynasties, which are chiefly drawn from the Lignages d'Outremer

124. They were called by derision Poullains ..., and their name is never pronounced with... contempt (Ducange, Gloss. Latin. tom. v p. 35, and Observations sur Joinville, p. 84, 85 Jacob à Vitriaco Hist. Hierosol. l. i. c. 67 72 and Sanut, l. iii. p viii. c. 2 p 182) Illustrium virorum qui ad Terræ Sanctæ liberationem in ... manserunt degeneres filii in deliciis enutriti, molles et effeminati, etc.

125. This authentic detail is extracted from the Assises de Jérusalem (c 324, 326–331) Sanut (l. iii. p iii. c. 1 p. 174) reckons only 518 knights and 5775 followers.

126. The sum total and the division, ascertain the service of the three great baronies at 100 knights each and the text of the Assises which extends the number to 500 can only be justified by this supposition.

127 Yet on great emergencies (says Sanut) the barons brought a voluntary aid decentem comitivam militum juxta statum suum

128. William of Tyre (l. xviii. c 3 4, 5) relates the noble origin and early insolence of the Hospitalers, who soon deserted their humble patron, St. John the Eleemosynary for the more august character of St. John the Baptist (see the ineffectual struggles of Pagi, Critica A D 1099 No 14–18) They assumed the profession of arms about the year 1120 the Hospital was mater the Temple filia the Teutonic order was founded A.D 1190 at the siege of Acre (Mosheim Institut p 389, 390)

129. See St. Bernard de Laude Novæ Militiæ Templi, composed A.D 1132–1136 in Opp tom. i. p. ii. p 547–563 edit Mabillon Venet 1750. Such an encomium, which is thrown away on the dead Templars, would be highly valued by the historians of Malta.

130. Matthew Paris Hist Major p 544. He assigns to the Hospitalers 19 000 to the Templars 9000 maneria a word of much higher import (as Ducange has rightly observed) in the English than in the French idiom. Manor is a lordship manoir a dwelling 131 In the three first books of the Histoire des Chevaliers de Malthe, par l Abbé de Vertot the reader may amuse himself with a fair and sometimes flattering picture of the order while it was employed for the defence of Palestine. The subsequent books pursue their emigrations to Rhodes and Malta.

132 The Assises de Jérusalem, in old law French were printed with Beaumanoir's Coûtumes de Beauvoisis (Bourges and Paris 1690 in folio) and illustrated by Gaspard Thaumas de la Thaumassière with a comment and glossary An Italian version had been published in 1535 at Venice, for the use of the kingdom of Cyprus

133. A la terre perdue tout fut perdû is the vigorous expression of the Assise (c. 281) Yet Jerusalem capitulated with Saladin the queen and the principal Christians departed in peace and a code so precious and so portable could not provoke the avarice of the conquerors I have sometimes suspected the existence of this original copy of the Holy Sepulchre which might be invented to sanctify and authenticate the traditionary customs of the French in Palestine

134. A noble lawyer Raoul de Tabarie, denied the prayer of king Amauri (A D 1195–1205) that he would commit his knowledge to writing and frankly declared, que de ce qu il savoit ne feroit il ja nul borjois son pareill, ne nul sage homme letré (c. 81)

135 The compiler of this work Jean d'Ibelin was count of Jaffa and Ascalon lord of Baruth (Berytus) and Rames and died A D 1266 (Sanut l. iii. p xii. c. 5 8 [p 220 222]) The family of Ibelin which descended from a younger brother of a count of Chartres in France, long flourished in Palestine and Cyprus (see the Lignages de deça Mer or d Outremer c. 6 at the end of the Assises de Jérusalem an original book, which records the pedigrees of the French adventurers)

136 By sixteen commissioners chosen in the states of the island the work was finished the 3rd of November 1369, sealed with four seals, and deposited in the cathedral of Nicosia (see the preface to the Assises)

137 The cautious John d Ibelin argues rather than affirms that Tripoli is the fourth barony and expresses some doubt concerning the right or pretension of the constable and marshal ([Assises de Jérus] c. 324)

138. Entre seignor et homme ne n a que la foi mais tant que l homme doit à son seignor reverence en toutes choses (c. 206) Tous les hommes dudit royaume sont par ladite Assise tenus les uns as autres et en celle maniere que le seignor mette main ou face mettre au cors ou au fie d aucun d yaus sans esgard et sans connoissance de court que tous les autres doivent venir devant le seignor etc (212) The form of their remonstrances is conceived with the noble simplicity of freedom.

139 See The Spirit of Laws L xxviii In the forty years since its publication, no work has been more read and criticised and the spirit of inquiry which it has excited is not the least of our obligations to the author

140 For the intelligence of this obscure and obsolete jurisprudence (c. 80–111) I am deeply indebted to the friendship of a learned lord, who

with an accurate and discerning eye, has surveyed the philosophic history of law By his studies posterity might be enriched the merit of the orator and the judge can be felt only by his contemporaries

141 Louis le Gros, who is considered as the father of this institution in France did not begin his reign till nine years (A D 1108) after Godfrey of Bouillon (Assises c. 2 324) For its origin and effects see the judicious remarks of Dr Robertson (History of Charles V vol 1 p 30-36 251-265 quarto edition)

142 Every reader conversant with the historians of the crusades will understand, by the peuple des Suriens, the Oriental Christians Melchites Jacobites or Nestorians, who had all adopted the use of the Arabic language (vol ii p 593)

143 See the Assises de Jérusalem (c. 310, 311 312) These laws were enacted as late as the year 1350 in the kingdom of Cyprus In the same century in the reign of Edward I, I understand from a late publication (of his Book of Account) that the price of a war horse was not less exorbitant in England

Chapter LIX

2 The kings of Jerusalem submitted however to a nominal dependence and in the dates of their inscriptions (one is still legible in the church of Bethlehem) they respectfully placed before their own the name of the reigning emperor (Ducange, Dissertations sur Joinville xxvii p 319)

3 Anna Comnena adds [l xi p 341] that to complete the imitation he was shut up with a dead cock and condescends to wonder how the barbarian could endure the confinement and putrefaction This absurd tale is unknown to the Latins

4 Ἀπὸ Θύλης in the Byzantine geography must mean England yet we are more credibly informed that our Henry I would not suffer him to levy any troops in his kingdom (Ducange Not ad Alexiad p 41)

5 The copy of the treaty (Alexiad l xiii p 406-416) is an original and curious piece which would require and might afford, a good map of the principality of Antioch

6 See in the learned work of M de Guignes (tom. ii part ii) the history of the Seljukians of Iconium Aleppo and Damascus as far as it may be collected from the Greeks, Latins and Arabians The last are ignorant or regardless of the affairs of Roum

7 Iconium is mentioned as a station by Xenophon and by Strabo with the ambiguous title of Κωμόπολις (Cellarius tom ii p 121) Yet St Paul found in that place a multitude (πλῆθος) of Jews and Gentiles Under the corrupt name of Kunijah it is described as a great city with a river and gardens three leagues from the mountains and decorated (I know not why) with Plato s tomb (Abulfeda tabul xvii p 303 vers Reiske and the Index Geographicus of Schultens from Ibn Said)

11 Anna who states these later swarms at 40 000 horse and 100 000 foot calls them Normans and places at their head two brothers of Flanders The Greeks were strangely ignorant of the names families and possessions of the Latin princes

12 William of Tyre and Matthew Paris reckon 70 000 loricati in each of the armies

13 The imperfect enumeration is mentioned by Cinnamus (ἐννενήκοντα μυριάδες [p 69 ed Bonn]) and confirmed by Odo de Diogilo apud Ducange ad Cinnamum with the more precise sum of 900 556 Why must therefore the version and comment suppose the modest and insufficient reckoning of 90,000? Does not Godfrey of Viterbo (Pantheon p xix in Muratori, tom vii p 462) exclaim—

——Numerum si noscere quæras
Millia millena militis agmen erat

14 This extravagant account is given by Albert of Stade (apud Struvium p 414) my calculation is borrowed from Godfrey of Viterbo Arnold of Lubeck apud eundem and Bernard Thesaur (c. 169 p 804) The original writers are silent The Mohammedans gave him 200 000 or 260 000 men

(Bohadin, in V t. Saladin. p. 110 [P iii. c. 61])

15. I must observe that in the second and third crusades, the subjects of Conrad and Frederic are styled by the Greeks and Orientals Alamanni The Lechi and Tzechi of Cinnamus are the Poles and Bohemians and it is for the French that he reserves the ancient appellation of Germans He likewise names the Βρίττιοι or Βριταννοί.

16. Nicetas was a child at the second crusade, but in the third he commanded against the Franks the important post of Philippopolis. Cinnamus is infected with national prejudice and pride.

17 The conduct of the Philadelphians is blamed by Nicetas, while the anonymous German accuses the rudeness of his countrymen (culpâ nostrâ) History would be pleasant if we were embarrassed only by such contradictions. It is likewise from Nicetas that we learn the pious and humane sorrow of Frederic.

18. Χθαμαλὴ ἕδρα, which Cinnamus translates into Latin by the word Σέλλιον [p 83 ed Bonn] Ducange works very hard to save his king and country from such ignominy (sur Joinville, dissertat. xxvii. p 317–320) Louis afterwards insisted on a meeting in mari ex æquo not ex equo according to the laughable readings of some MSS

19. Ego Romanorum imperator sum, ille Romaniorum (Anonym. Canis. p 512) The public and historical style of the Greeks was Ῥὴξ princeps Yet Cinnamus owns that Ἰμπεράτωρ is synonymous to Basileus [p 69, ed. Bonn]

20. In the Epistles of Innocent III (xiii. p 184) and the History of Bohadin (p 129 130) see the views of a pope and a cadhi on this singular toleration.

21 As counts of Vexin, the kings of France were the vassals and advocates of the monastery of St. Denys. The saint's peculiar banner which they received from the abbot was of a square form, and a red or flaming colour The oriflamme appeared at the head of the French armies from the twelfth to the fifteenth century (Ducange sur Joinville dissert. xviii. p 244–253)

22. The original French histories of the second crusade are the Gesta Ludovici VII published in the fourth volume of Duchesne's collection The same volume contains many original letters of the king of Suger his minister etc the best documents of authentic history

23. Terram horroris et salsuginis terram siccam, sterilem, inamœnam. Anonym. Canis. p. 517 The emphatic language of a sufferer

24. Gens innumera, sylvestris, indomita prædones sine ductore. The sultan of Cogni might sincerely rejoice in their defeat. Anonym. Canis. p 517, 518

25. See in the anonymous writer in the Collection of Canisius Tagino and Bohadin (Vit. Saladin. p 119 120 [P iii. c. 69]) the ambiguous conduct of Kilidge Arslan sultan of Cogni who hated and feared both Saladin and Frederic.

26. The desire of comparing two great men has tempted many writers to drown Frederic in the river Cydnus in which Alexander so imprudently bathed (Q. Curt. l. iii. c. 4 5) But, from the march of the emperor I rather judge that his Saleph is the Calycadnus a stream of less fame but of a longer course

27 Marinus Sanutus A.D 1321 lays it down as a precept Quod stolus ecclesiæ per terram nullatenus est ducenda. He resolves by the Divine aid the objection or rather exception of the first crusade (Secreta Fidelium Crucis l. ii. pars ii. c. i. p 37)

28 The most authentic information of St Bernard must be drawn from his own writings published in a correct edition by Père Mabillon and reprinted at Venice, 1750 in six volumes in folio Whatever friendship could recollect or superstition could add, is contained in the two lives by his disciples in the sixth volume whatever learning and criticism could ascertain may be found in the prefaces of the Benedictine editor

29. Clairvaux surnamed the Valley of Absynth is situate among the woods near Bar sur Aube in Champagne. St Bernard would blush at the pomp of the church and monastery he would ask for the library and I know not whether he would be much edified by a tun of 800 muids (914 1 7th hogsheads) which almost rivals that of Heidelberg (Mélanges tirés d une Grande Bibliothèque tom. xlvi. p 15 20)

30 The disciples of the saint (Vit. ima. l iii c. 2 p 1232 Vit iida c. 16 No 45, p 1383) record a marvellous example of his pious apathy Juxta lacum etiam Lausannensem totius diei itinere pergens penitus non attendit aut se videre non vidit. Cum enim vespere facto de eodem lacu socii colloquerentur interrogabat eos ubi lacus ille esset et mirati sunt universi To admire or despise St Bernard as he ought the reader like myself should have before the windows of his library the beauties of that incomparable landscape.

40 Noradinus (says William of Tyre l xx 33 [p 995]) maximus nominis et fidei Christianæ persecutor princeps tamen justus vafer providus et secundum gentis suæ traditiones religiosus To this Catholic witness we may add the primate of the Jacobites (Abulpharag p 267) quo non alter erat inter reges vitæ ratione magis laudabili aut quæ pluribus justitiæ experimentis abundaret The true praise of kings is after their death, and from the mouth of their enemies

41 From the ambassador William of Tyre (l xix c 17, 18) describes the palace of Cairo In the caliph s treasure were found a pearl as large as a pigeon s egg a ruby weighing seventeen Egyptian drachms an emerald a palm and a half in length and many vases of crystal and porcelain of China (Renaudot p 526)

42 Mamluc plur Mamalic is defined by Pocock (Prolegom ad Abulpharag p 7) and D Herbelot (p 545) servum emptitium seu qui pretio numerato in domini possessionem cedit They frequently occur in the wars of Saladin (Bohadin p 236, etc) and it was only the Baharite Mamalukes that were first introduced into Egypt by his descendants

44 It was the Alexandria of the Arabs a middle term in extent and riches between the period of the Greeks and Romans and that of the Turks (Savary Lettres sur l Egypte, tom i p 25 26)

46 For the Curds see De Guignes tom i p 416, 417 the Index Geographicus of Schultens and Tavernier Voyages p i p 308 309 The Ayoubites descended from the tribe of the Rawadiæi, one of the noblest but as they were infected with the heresy of the Metempsychosis the orthodox sultans insinuated that their descent was only on the mother s side, and that their ancestor was a stranger who settled among the Curds

48 We are indebted to the Professor Schultens (Lugd Bat 1755 in folio) for the richest and most authentic materials a Life of Saladin by his friend and minister the Cadhi Bohadin and copious extracts from the history of his kinsman the prince Abulfeda of Hamah To these we may add the article of Salaheddin in the Bibliothèque Orientale and all that may be gleaned from the Dynasties of Abulpharagius

49 Since Abulfeda was himself an Ayoubite he may share the praise for imitating at least tacitly the modesty of the founder

50 Hist Hierosol in the Gesta Dei per Francos p 1152 A similar example may be found in Joinville (p 42 édition du Louvre) but the pious St Louis refused to dignify infidels with the order of Christian knighthood (Ducange Observations p 70)

60. The Latins affirm, the Arabians insinuate, the treason of Raymond but, had he really embraced their religion, he would have been a saint and a hero in the eyes of the latter

61. Renaud, Reginald, or Arnold de Châtillon, celebrated by the Latins in his life and death the circumstances of the latter are more distinctly related by Bohadin and Abulfeda and Joinville (Hist. de St. Louis, p 70) alludes to the practice of Saladin of never putting to death a prisoner who had tasted his bread and salt. Some of the companions of Arnold had been slaughtered and almost sacrificed, in a valley of Mecca, ubi sacrificia mactantur (Abulfeda, p. 32)

65. The sieges of Tyre and Acre are most copiously described by Bernard Thesaurarius (de Acquisitione Terræ Sanctæ c. 167–179) the author of the Historia Hierosolymitana (p 1150–1172 in Bongarsius) Abulfeda (p 43–50) and Bohadin (p. 75 179)

66. I have followed a moderate and probable representation of the fact. by Vertot who adopts without reluctance a romantic tale, the old marquis is actually exposed to the darts of the besieged.

67 Northmanni et Gothi, et cæteri populi insularum quæ inter occidentem et septemtrionem sitæ sunt, gentes bellicosæ, corporis proceri, mortis intrepidæ, bipennibus armatæ, navibus rotundis, quæ Ysnachiæ dicuntur advectæ

70. Bohadin p 14. He quotes the judgment of Balianus and the prince of Sidon and adds, ex illo mundo quasi hominum paucissimi redierunt. Among the Christians who died before St. John d'Acre, I find the English names of De Ferrers earl of Derby (Dugdale Baronage, part i. p 260) Mowbray (idem. p 124) De Mandevil, De Fiennes St. John, Scrope, Pigot Talbot etc.

71 Magnus hic apud eos interque reges eorum tum virtute tum majestate eminens summus rerum arbiter (Bohadin p 159 [P ii. c. 95]) He does not seem to have known the names either of Philip or Richard.

72 Rex Angliæ præstrenuus rege Gallorum minor apud eos censebatur ratione regni atque dignitatis sed tum divitiis florentior tum bellicâ virtute multo erat celebrior (Bohadin, p 161 [P ii. c. 97]) A stranger might admire those riches the national historians will tell with what lawless and wasteful oppression they were collected.

73 Joinville p 17 Cuides-tu que ce soit le roi Richart?

74. Yet he was guilty in the opinion of the Moslems who attest the confession of the assassins that they were sent by the king of England (Bohadin, p 225 [P ii. c. 144]) and his only defence is an absurd and palpable forgery (Hist de l Académie des Inscriptions, tom. xvi p 155–163) a pretended letter from the prince of the assassins, the Sheich, or old man of the mountain, who justified Richard, by assuming to himself the guilt or merit of the murder

75 See the distress and pious firmness of Saladin, as they are described by Bohadin (p 7–9, 235–237) who himself harangued the defenders of Jerusalem their fears were unknown to the enemy (Jacob à Vitriaco l. i c. 100, p 1123 Vinisauf l. v c. 50, p 399)

76 Yet unless the sultan or an Ayoubite prince, remained in Jerusalem, nec Curdi Turcis nec Turci essent obtemperaturi Curdis (Bohadin p 236 [P ii. c. 156]) He draws aside a corner of the political curtain.

77 Bohadin (p 237) and even Jeffrey de Vinisauf (l. vi. c. 1–8 p 403–409) ascribe the retreat to Richard himself and Jacobus à Vitriaco observes that in his impatience to depart, in alterum virum mutatus est (p 1123) Yet Joinville a French knight accuses the envy of Hugh duke of Burgundy (p 116) without supposing like Matthew Paris that he was bribed by Saladin.

78 The expeditions to Ascalon Jerusalem, and Jaffa, are related by Bohadin (p 184–249) and Abulfeda (p 51 52) The author of the Itinerary

Chapter LX

1 In the successive centuries from the ninth to the eighteenth, Mosheim traces the schism of the Greeks with learning clearness, and impartiality the filioque (Institut. Hist. Eccles. p. 277) Leo III p 303 Photius, p 307 308 Michael Cerularius, p. 370, 371 etc.

2. Ἄνδρες δυσσεβεῖς καὶ ἀποτρόπαιοι, ἄνδρες ἐκ σκότους ἀναδύντες, τῆς γὰρ Ἑσπερίου μοίρας ὑπῆρχον γεννήματα (Phot. Epist. p 47 edit. Montacut) The Oriental patriarch continues to apply the images of thunder earthquake, hail, wild boar precursors of Antichrist, etc etc.

3. The mysterious subject of the procession of the Holy Ghost is discussed in the historical theological, and controversial sense, or nonsense, by the Jesuit Petavius (Dogmata Theologica tom. ii. l. vii. p 362 440.)

4 Before the shrine of St Peter he placed two shields of the weight of 94½ pounds of pure silver on which he inscribed the text of both creeds (utroque symbolo) pro amore et cautelâ orthodoxæ fidei (Anastas. in Leon. III in Muratori, tom. iii. pars. i. p 208) His language most clearly proves that neither the filioque nor the Athanasian creed were received at Rome about the year 830

5 The Missi of Charlemagne pressed him to declare that all who rejected the filioque at least the doctrine, must be damned. All, replies the pope, are not capable of reaching the altiora mysteria qui potuerit et non voluerit salvus esse non potest (Collect Concil. tom. ix. p 277–286) The potuerit would leave a large loophole of salvation!

6 In France after some harsher laws the ecclesiastical discipline is now relaxed milk, cheese, and butter are become a perpetual, and eggs an annual indulgence in Lent (Vie privée des François, tom. ii p 27–38)

7 The original monuments of the schism of the charges of the *Greeks against the Latins, are de*posited in the epistles of Photius (Epist Encyclica, ii. p 47–61) and of Michael Cerularius (Canisii Antiq Lectiones tom. iii. p. i. p 281–324, edit. Basnage, with the prolix answer of Cardinal Humbert)

8 The tenth volume of the Venice edition of the Councils contains all the acts of the synods, and history of Photius they are abridged with a faint tinge of prejudice or prudence, by Dupin and Fleury

9. The synod of Constantinople held in the year 869 is the eighth of the general councils the last assembly of the East which is recognised by the Roman church She rejects the synods of Constantinople of the years 867 and 879, which were however equally numerous and noisy but they were favourable to Photius

or the monk of St. Alban s, cannot exaggerate the cadhi s account of the prowess of Richard (Vinisauf l. vi. c. 14–24, p 412–421 Hist Major, p 137–143) and on the whole of this war there is a marvellous agreement between the Christian and Mohammedan writers, who mutually praise the virtues of their enemies

79. See the progress of negotiation and hostility in Bohadin (p 207–260), who was himself an actor in the treaty Richard declared his intention of returning with new armies to the conquest of the Holy Land and Saladin answered the menace with a civil compliment (Vinisauf, l. vi. c. 28 p 423)

80 The most copious and original account of this holy war is Galfridi à Vinisauf Itinerarium Regis Anglorum Richardi et aliorum in Terram Hierosolymorum, in six books published in the second volume of Gale s Scriptores Hist Anglicanæ (p 247–429) Roger Hoveden and Matthew Paris afford likewise many valuable materials and the former describes with accuracy the discipline and navigation of the English fleet

81 Even Vertot (tom i. p 251) adopts the foolish notion of the indifference of Saladin who professed the Koran with his last breath

82 See the succession of the Ayoubites, in Abulpharagius (Dynast p 277 etc.), and the tables of M de Guignes, l Art de Vérifier les Dates, and the Bibliothèque Orientale.

83 Thomassin (Discipline de l'Eglise tom. iii. p 311–374) has copiously treated of the origin abuses and restrictions of these tenths A theory was started but not pursued, that they were rightfully due to the pope a tenth of the Levite s tenth to the high priest (Selden on Tithes see his Works vol. iii. p. ii p. 1083)

84. See the Gesta Innocentii III in Muratori Script Rer Ital (tom iii p i. p 486–568)

85 See the fifth crusade, and the siege of Damietta, in Jacobus à Vitriaco (l iii. p 1125–1149, in the Gesta Dei of Bongarsius) an eye witness Bernard Thesaurarius (in Script. Muratori tom vii. p 825–846 c. 194–207) a contemporary and Sanutus (Secreta Fidel. Crucis, l iii. p xi c. 4–9) a diligent compiler and of the Arabians Abulpharagius (Dynast. p 294), and the Extracts at the end of Joinville (p 533 537 540, 547 etc.)

86 To those who took the cross against Mainfroy the pope (A D 1255) granted plenissimam peccatorum remissionem. Fideles mirabantur quod tantum eis promitteret pro sanguine Christianorum effundendo quantum pro cruore infidelium aliquando (Matthew Paris p 785) A high flight for the reason of the thirteenth century

87 This simple idea is agreeable to the good sense of Mosheim (Institut. Hist. Eccles. p 332) and the fine philosophy of Hume (Hist of England, vol. i. p. 330)

88. The original materials for the crusade of Frederic II may be drawn from Richard de St. Germano (in Muratori Script. Rerum Ital. tom. vii. p 1002–1013) and Matthew Paris (p. 286, 291, 300, 302 304) The most rational moderns are Fleury (Hist. Eccles. tom xvi) Vertot (Chevaliers de Malthe, tom. i l. iii.) Giannone (Istoria Civile di Napoli tom. ii. l. xvi.) and Muratori (Annali d Italia tom x.)

89. Poor Muratori knows what to think, but knows not what to say Chino qui il capo etc p. 322

90. The clergy artfully confounded the mosque or church of the temple with the holy sepulchre and their wilful error has deceived both Vertot and Muratori

91 The irruption of the Carizmians, or Corasmins, is related by Matthew Paris (p 546 547) and by Joinville, Nangis, and the Arabians (p. 111 112 191 192 528, 530)

92 Read if you can, the Life and Miracles of St Louis by the confessor of Queen Margaret (p 291–523 Joinville, du Louvre)

93 He believed all that mother-church taught (Joinville, p. 10) but he cautioned Joinville against disputing with infidels. L omme lay (said he in his old language) quand il ot medire de la loy Crestienne, ne doit pas deffendre la loy Crestienne ne mais que de l espée, dequoi il doit donner parmi le ventre dedens, tant comme elle y peut entrer" (p 12)

94. I have two editions of Joinville the one (Paris, 1668) most valuable for the observations of Ducange the other (Paris au Louvre, 1761) most precious for the pure and authentic text, a MS of which has been recently discovered. The last editor proves that the history of St Louis was finished A D 1309 without explaining or even admiring the age of the author which must have exceeded ninety years (Preface, p. xi. Observations de Ducange, p. 17)

95 Joinville, p 32 Arabic Extracts. p. 549.

96 The last editors have enriched their Joinville with large and curious extracts from the Arabic historians Macrizi Abulfeda etc. See likewise Abulpharagius (Dynast. p 322–325) who calls him by the corrupt name of Redefrans Matthew Paris (p 683 684) has described the rival folly of the French and English who fought and fell at Massoura.

97 Savary in his agreeable Lettres sur l Egypte has given a description of Damietta (tom. i. lettre xxiii. p 274–290) and a narrative of the expedition of St Louis (xxv p. 306–350)

98. For the ransom of St. Louis a million of byzants was asked and granted but the sultan s generosity reduced that sum to 800,000 byzants, which are valued by Joinville at 400 000 French livres of his own time, and expressed by Matthew Paris by 100 000 marks of silver (Ducange, Dissertation xx. sur Joinville)

99. The idea of the emirs to choose Louis for their sultan is seriously attested by Joinville (p. 77 78) and does not appear to me so absurd as to M. de Voltaire (Hist. Générale, tom. ii. p. 386,

387) The Mamalukes themselves were strangers, rebels, and equals they had felt his valour they hoped his conversion and such a motion which was not seconded, might be made perhaps by a secret Christian in their tumultuous assembly

101 Voltaire, Hist. Générale tom. ii. p 391

102 The chronology of the two dynasties of Mamalukes, the Baharites, Turks or Tartars of Kipzak, and the Borgites, Circassians is given by Pocock (Prolegom. ad Abulpharag p 6–31) and De Guignes (tom. i. p 264–270) their history from Abulfeda, Macrizi, etc. to the beginning of the fifteenth century by the same M. de Guignes (tom. iv p 110–328)

103 Savary Lettres sur l Egypte, tom. ii. lettre p. 189–208. I much question the authenticity this copy yet it is true that sultan Selim concluded a treaty with the Circassians or Mamalukes Egypt, and left them in possession of arms, ches, and power See a new Abrégé de l Histoire Ottomane, composed in Egypt, and translated by M. Digeon (tom. i. p 55–58 Paris, 1781) a curious, authentic and national history

104 Si totum quo regnum occupârunt tempus respicias, præsertim quod fini propius reperies illud bellis pugnis injuriis ac rapinis refertum (Al Jannabi apud Pocock p 31) The reign of Mohammed (A.D 1311–1341) affords an happy exception (De Guignes tom iv p 208–210)

105 They are now reduced to 8500 but the expense of each Mamaluke may be rated at 100 louis and Egypt groans under the avarice and insolence of these strangers (Voyages de Volney tom. i. p 89–187)

106 See Carte s History of England vol. ii. p. 165–175 and his original authors Thomas Wikes and Walter Hemingford (l. iii. c. 34 35) in Gale s Collection (tom. ii. p 97 589–592) They are both ignorant of the princess Eleanor s piety in sucking the poisoned wound and saving her husband at the risk of her own life

107 Sanutus Secret. Fidelium Crucis l. iii p xii c. 9 and De Guignes Hist. des Huns tom. iv p 143 from the Arabic historians

108 The state of Acre is represented in all the chronicles of the times, and most accurately in John Villani l. vii. c. 144, in Muratori, Scriptores Rerum Italicarum tom. xiii. p 337 338

109 See the final expulsion of the Franks in Sanutus l. iii. p xii. c 11–22 Abulfeda, Macrizi, etc in De Guignes tom iv p 162 164 and Vertot, tom. i. l. iii. p. 407–428.

Chapter LX

1 In the successive centuries from the ninth to the eighteenth, Mosheim traces the schism of the Greeks with learning clearness, and impartiality the filioque (Institut. Hist. Eccles. p 277) Leo III. p. 303 Photius, p 307 308 Michael Cerularius, p. 370, 371 etc.

2 Ἄνδρες δυσ σεβεῖς … αἱ ἀποτρόπαιοι, ἄνδρες ἐκ σκότου ἀναδύντες … τῆς γὰρ Ἑσ … ρίου μοίρας ὑπῆρχον γεννήματα (Phot. Epist. p 47 edit. Montacut.) The Oriental patriarch continues to apply the images of thunder earthquake, hail, wild boar precursors of Antichrist, etc. etc.

3 The mysterious subject of the procession of the Holy Ghost is discussed in the historical theological, and controversial sense, or nonsense by the Jesuit Petavius (Dogmata Theologica, tom. ii. l. vii, p 362–440.)

4 Before the shrine of St. Peter he placed two shields of the weight of 94⅙ pounds of pure silver on which he inscribed the text of both creeds (utroque symbolo) pro amore et cautelâ orthodoxæ fidei (Anastas. in Leon. III in Muratori, tom. i i. pars. i. p 208) His language most clearly proves that neither the filioque nor the Athanasian creed were received at Rome about the year 830

5 The Missi of Charlemagne pressed him to declare that all who rejected the filioque at least the doctrine, must be damned All replies the pope, are not capable of reaching the altiora mysteria qui potuerit et non voluerit salvus esse non potest (Collect Concil. tom. ix. p 277–286) The potuerit would leave a large loophole of salvation!

6 In France, after some harsher laws the ecclesiastical discipline is now relaxed milk, cheese, and butter are become a perpetual and eggs an annual indulgence in Lent (Vie privée des François, tom. ii. p 27–38)

7 The original monuments of the schism, of the charges of the Greeks against the Latins, are deposited in the epistles of Photius (Epist Encyclica, ii. p 47–61) and of Michael Cerularius (Canisii Antiq Lectiones tom. iii. p i. p 281–324 edit Basnage with the prolix answer of Cardinal Humbert)

8 The tenth volume of the Venice edition of the Councils contains all the acts of the synods, and history of Photius they are abridged with a faint tinge of prejudice or prudence, by Dupin and Fleury

9 The synod of Constantinople held in the year 869, is the eighth of the general councils the last assembly of the East which is recognised by the Roman church. She rejects the synods of Constan*tinople of the years* 867 and 879, which were, however equally numerous and noisy but they were favourable to Photius.

11 Anna Comnena (Alexiad, l i. p 31–33 [tom 1 p 63–68, ed Bonn]) represents the abhorrence, not only of the church but of the palace for Gregory VII the popes, and the Latin communion. The style of Cinnamus and Nicetas is still more vehement Yet how calm is the voice of history compared with that of polemics!

12 His anonymous historian (de Expedit Asiat Fred I in Canisii Lection Antiq tom iii pars ii. p 511, edit Basnage) mentions the sermons of the Greek patriarch quomodo Græcis injunxerat in remissionem peccatorum peregrinos occidere et delere de terrâ Tagino observes (in Scriptores Freher tom. 1 p 409 edit Struv), Græci hæreticos nos appellant clerici et monachi dictis et factis persequuntur We may add the declaration of the emperor Baldwin fifteen years afterwards Hæc est (gens) quæ Latinos omnes non hominum nomine sed canum dignabatur quorum sanguinem effundere penè inter merita reputabant (Gesta Innocent III c 92, in Muratori Script Rerum Italicarum, tom iii pars 1 p 536) There may be some exaggeration but it was as effectual for the action and re action of hatred

14 Ducange Fam Byzant p 186 187

15 Nicetas in Manuel l vii c 2 [p 267, ed Bonn] Regnante enim (Manuele) apud eum tantam Latinus populus repererat gratiam ut neglectis Græculis suis tanquam viris mollibus et effeminatis solis Latinis grandia committeret negotia erga eos profusâ liberalitate abundabat ex omni orbe ad eum tanquam ad benefactorem nobiles et ignobiles concurrebant Willelm Tyr xxii c 10

16 The suspicions of the Greeks would have been confirmed if they had seen the political epistles of Manuel to pope Alexander III the enemy of his enemy Frederic I, in which the emperor declares his wish of uniting the Greeks and Latins as one flock under one shepherd etc (See Fleury Hist Ecclés tom xv p 187 213 243)

17 See the Greek and Latin narratives in Nicetas (in Alexio Comneno, c 10 [p 320 ed Bonn]) and William of Tyre (l xxii c 10 11 12 13) the first soft and concise the second loud copious, and tragical

18 The history of the reign of Isaac Angelus is composed in three books by the senator Nicetas (p 228–290) and his offices of logothete or principal secretary and judge of the veil or palace could not bribe the impartiality of the historian He wrote it is true after the fall and death of his benefactor

19 See Bohadin Vit Saladin p 129–131 226 vers Schultens The ambassador of Isaac was equally versed in the Greek French and Arabic languages a rare instance in those times His embassies were received with honour, dismissed without effect and reported with scandal in the West

20 Ducange Familiæ Dalmaticæ p 318 319 320 The original correspondence of the Bulgarian king and the Roman pontiff is inscribed in the Gesta Innocent III c 66–82 p 513–525

21 The pope acknowledges his pedigree a nobili urbis Romæ prosapiâ genitores tui originem traxerunt This tradition, and the strong resemblance of the Latin and Wallachian idioms are explained by M D Anville (Etats de l Europe p 258–262) The Italian colonies of the Dacia of Trajan were swept away by the tide of emigration from the Danube to the Volga and brought back by another wave from the Volga to the Danube Possible but strange!

22 This parable is in the best savage style but I wish the Wallach had not introduced the classic name of Mysians the experiment of the magnet or loadstone and the passage of an old comic poet (Nicetas in Alex. Comneno l 1 p 299 300 [ed Par p 613 ed Bonn])

23 The Latins aggravate the ingratitude of Alexius by supposing that he had been released by his brother Isaac from Turkish captivity This pathetic tale had doubtless been repeated at Venice and Zara but I do not readily discover its grounds in the Greek historians

24 See the reign of Alexius Angelus or Comnenus in the three books of Nicetas p 291–352

25 See Fleury Hist Ecclés tom xvi p 26 etc and Villehardouin No 1 with the observations of Ducange which I always mean to quote with the original text

26 The contemporary life of Pope Innocent III published by Baluze and Muratori (Scriptores Rerum Italicarum tom iii pars 1 p 486–568) is most valuable for the important and original documents which are inserted in the text The bull of the crusade may be read c 84 85 [p 526]

27 Por-ce que cil pardon fut issi gran si s en esmeurent mult li cuers des genz et mult s en croisierent porce que li pardons ere si gran Villehardouin No 1 Our philosophers may refine on the causes of the crusades but such were the genuine feelings of a French knight

28 This number of fiefs (of which 1800 owed liege homage) was enrolled in the church of St Stephen at Troyes and attested A D 1213 by the marshal and butler of Champagne (Ducange, Observ p 254)

29 Campania militiæ privilegio singularius excellit in tyrociniis prolusione armorum etc Ducange p 249 from the old Chronicle of Jerusalem A D 1177–1199

30 The name of Villehardouin was taken from a village and castle in the diocese of Troyes, near the river Aube between Bar and Arcis. The family was ancient and noble the elder branch of our historian existed after the year 1400 the younger, which acquired the principality of Achaia, merged in the house of Savoy (Ducange p 235–245)

31 This office was held by his father and his descendants, but Ducange has not hunted it with his usual sagacity I find that, in the year 1356 it was in the family of Conflans but these provincial ha e been long since eclipsed by the national mar shals of France.

32 This language, of which I shall produce some specimens, is explained by Vigenere and Ducange, in a version and glossary The President Des Brosses (Méchanisme des Langues tom ii p 83) gives it as the example of a language which has ceased to be French, and is understood only by grammarians.

33 His age, and his own expression, moi qui ceste oeuvre dicta (No 62 etc.) may justify the suspicion (more probable than Mr Wood's on Homer) that he could neither read nor write Yet Champagne may boast of the two first historians, the noble authors of French prose, Villehardouin and Joinville.

34 The crusade and reigns of the counts of Flanders, Baldwin and his brother Henry are the subject of a particular history by the Jesuit Doutremens (Constantinopolis Belgica Turnaci 1638 in 4to) which I have only seen with the eyes of Ducange.

35 History etc., vol. i. p 567

36 The foundation and independence of Venice, and Pepin's invasion, are discussed by Pagi (Critica, tom. iii A.D 810 No 4, etc.) and Beretti (Dissert. Chorograph. Italiæ medii Ævi in Muratori, Script. tom. x. p 153) The two critics have a slight bias, the Frenchman adverse the Italian favourable, to the republic.

37 When the son of Charlemagne asserted his right of sovereignty he was answered by the loyal Venetians, ὅτι ἡμεῖς δοῦλοι θέλομεν εἶναι τ Ῥωμαίων Βασιλέως (Constantin. Porphyrogenit. de Administrat. Imperii, pars ii c. 28 p 85) and the report of the ninth establishes the fact of the tenth century which is confirmed by the embassy of Liutprand of Cremona. The annual tribute which the emperor allows them to pay to the king of Italy alleviates, by doubling their servitude but the hateful word δοῦλοι must be translated as in the charter of 827 (Laugier Hist de Venise, tom. i. p. 67 etc) by the softer appellation of subditi, or fideles

38 See the twenty fifth and thirtieth dissertations of the Antiquitates medii Ævi of Muratori. From Anderson's History of Commerce I understand that the Venetians did not trade to England before the year 1323 The most flourishing state of their wealth and commerce in the beginning of the fifteenth century is agreeably described by the Abbé Dubos (Hist. de la Ligue de Cambray tom. ii. p. 443 480)

39 The Venetians have been slow in writing and publishing their history Their most ancient monuments are, 1 The rude Chronicle (perhaps) of John Sagorninus (Venezia 1765, in octavo) which represents the state and manners of Venice in the year 1008 2 The larger history of the doge (1342–1354) Andrew Dandolo published for the first time in the twelfth tom. of Muratori A.D 1728 The History of Venice by the Abbé Laugier (Paris 1728) is a work of some merit which I have chiefly used for the constitutional part

40 Henry Dandolo was eighty four at his election (A.D 1192) and ninety seven at his death (A.D 1205) See the Observations of Ducange sur Villehardouin No 204. But this extraordinary longevity is not observed by the original writers nor does there exist another example of a hero near a hundred years of age. Theophrastus might afford an instance of a writer of ninety nine but instead of ἐννενήκοντα (Procem. ad Character) I am much inclined to read ἑβδομήκοντα, with his last editor Fischer and the first thoughts of Casaubon It is scarcely possible that the powers of the mind and body should support themselves till such a period of life.

41 The modern Venetians (Laugier tom. ii. p 119) accuse the emperor Manuel but the calumny is refuted by Villehardouin and the older writers who suppose that Dandolo lost his eyes by a wound (No 34 and Ducange)

42 See the original treaty in the Chronicle of Andrew Dandolo p 323–326 [Murat. Script. Ital. t xii.]

43 A reader of Villehardouin must observe the frequent tears of the marshal and his brother knights Sachiez que la ot mainte lerme plorée de pitié (No 17) mult plorant (ibid) mainte lerme plorée (No 34) si orent mult pitié et plorerent mult durement (No 60) i ot mainte lerme plorée de pitié (No 202) They weep on every occasion of grief, joy or devotion

44 By a victory (A.D 1191) over the citizens of Asti by a crusade to Palestine and by an embassy from the pope to the German princes (Muratori, Annali d Italia tom x. p 163 202)

45 See the crusade of the Germans in the Historia C. P of Gunther (Canisii Antiq Lect. tom. iv p. v–viii.) who celebrates the pilgrimage of his abbot Martin one of the preaching rivals of Fulk of Neuilly His monastery of the Cistercian order was situate in the diocese of Basil.

46 Jadera now Zara, was a Roman colony which acknowledged Augustus for its parent It is now only two miles round and contains five or six thousand inhabitants but the fortifications are strong and it is joined to the main land by a bridge. See the Travels of the two companions Spon and Wheeler (Voyage de Dalmatie, de Grèce, etc tom i p 64–70 Journey into Greece p 8–14) the last of whom by mistaking Sestertia for Sestertii values an arch with statues and columns at twelve pounds If, in his time, there were no trees near Zara the cherry trees were not yet planted which produce our incomparable marasquin.

47 Katona (Hist Critica Reg Hungariæ Stir pis Arpad, tom IV p 536–558) collects all the facts and testimonies most adverse to the conquerors of Zara

48 See the whole transaction and the sentiments of the pope in the Epistles of Innocent III Gesta, c 86 87 88

49 A modern reader is surprised to hear of the valet de Constantinople, as applied to young Alexius on account of his youth like the infants of Spain and the nobilissimus puer of the Romans The pages and valets of the knights were as noble as themselves (Villehardouin and Ducange, No 36)

50 The emperor Isaac is styled by Villehardouin Sursac (No 35 etc) which may be derived from the French Sire or the Greek Κυρ (κύριος) melted into his proper name the farther corruptions of Tursac and Conserac will instruct us what licence may have been used in the old dynasties of Assyria and Egypt

51 Reinier and Conrad the former married Maria, daughter of the emperor Manuel Comnenus the latter was the husband of Theodora Angela sister of the emperors Isaac and Alexius Conrad abandoned the Greek court and princess for the glory of defending Tyre against Saladin (Ducange, Fam Byzant p 187 203)

52 Nicetas (in Alexio Comneno l III c 9 [p 715 ed Bonn]) accuses the doge and Venetians as the first authors of the war against Constantinople and considers only as a κυμα ἐπὶ κύματι the arrival and shameful offers of the royal exile

53 Villehardouin and Gunther represent the sentiments of the two parties The abbot Martin left the army at Zara, proceeded to Palestine, was sent ambassador to Constantinople and became a reluctant witness of the second siege

54 The birth and dignity of Andrew Dandolo gave him the motive and the means of searching in the archives of Venice the memorable story of his ancestor His brevity seems to accuse the copious and more recent narratives of Sanudo (in Muratori Script Rerum Italicarum tom XXII) Blondus Sabellicus and Rhamnusius

55 Villehardouin No 62 His feelings and expressions are original he often weeps but he rejoices in the glories and perils of war with a spirit unknown to a sedentary writer

56 In this voyage almost all the geographical names are corrupted by the Latins The modern appellation of Chalcis and all Eubœa is derived from its Euripus Evripo Negri po, Negropont which dishonours our maps (D Anville, Géographie Ancienne tom I p 263)

57 Et sachiez que il ni ot si hardi cui le cuer ne fremist (c 66) Chascuns regardoit ses armes que par tems en arons mestier (c 67) Such is the honesty of courage

58 Eandem urbem plus in solis navibus piscatorum abundare quam illos in toto navigio Habebat enim mille et sexcentas piscatorias naves Bellicas autem sive mercatorias habebant infinitæ multitudinis et portum tutissimum Gunther H C P c 8 p 10 [in Canisus Ant Lect t IV]

59 Καθάπερ ἱερῶν ἄλσεων εἰπεῖν δὲ καὶ θεοφυτων παραδείσων ἐφείδοντο τουτωνί Nicetas in A Comneno l III c 9, p 348 [p 716 ed. Bo

60 From the version of Vigenere I adopt well sounding word palander which is still use believe in the Mediterranean But had I wri in French, I should have preferred the original expressive denomination of vessiers or huissi from the huis or door which was let down a drawbridge but which at sea was closed into side of the ship (See Ducange au Villehardo No 14 and Joinville p 27 28, édit du Louv

61 To avoid the vague expressions of follow etc, I use after Villehardouin the word serjea for all horsemen who were not knights Th were serjeants at arms and serjeants at law an we visit the parade and Westminster Hall we m observe the strange result of the distinction (D cange, Glossar Latin Servientes etc, tom VI 226–231)

62 It is needless to observe that on the subj of Galata the chain, etc Ducange is accurate a full Consult likewise the proper chapters of t C P Christiana of the same author The inha itants of Galata were so vain and ignorant th they applied to themselves St Paul s Epistle to t Galatians

63 The vessel that broke the chain was nam the Eagle Aquila (Dandol Chronicon p 32 which Blondus (de Gestis Venet) has chang into Aquilo the north wind Ducange, Observ tions No 83 maintains the latter reading but had not seen the respectable text of Dandolo n did he enough consider the topography of t harbour The south-east would have been a mo effectual wind

64 Quatre cens mil homes ou plus (Villeha douin No 133) must be understood of men of military age Le Beau (Hist du Bas Empire to xx p 417) allows Constantinople a million of in habitants of whom 60 000 horse and an infini number of foot soldiers In its present decay th capital of the Ottoman empire may contain 400 00 souls (Bell s Travels vol II p 410 402) but the Turks keep no registers and as circumstanc are fallacious it is impossible to ascertain (Ni buhr Voyage en Arabie tom I p 18 19) the re populousness of their cities

65 On the most correct plans of Constantinopl I know not how to measure more than 4000 pace Yet Villehardouin computes the space at thre leagues (No 86) If his eye were not deceived h must reckon by the old Gallic league of 150 paces which might still be used in Champagne.

66 The guards the Varangi are styled by Ville hardouin (No 89 95 etc) Englois et Danois ave leurs haches Whatever had been their origin French pilgrim could not be mistaken in the na tions of which they were at that time composed.

67 For the first siege and conquest of Con stantinople, we may read the original letter of the crusaders to Innocent III Gesta, c. 91 p 533 534 Villehardouin, No 75–99 Nicetas, in Alexio Comnen. l iii. c. 10, p 349–352 [p 718–725, ed. Bonn] Dandolo, in Chron. p 322 Gunther and his abbot Martin were not yet returned from their obstinate pilgrimage to Jerusalem, or St. John d'Acre, where the greatest part of the company had died of the plague.

68. Compare in the rude energy of Villehardouin (No. 66 100) the inside and outside views of Constantinople, and their impression on the minds of the pilgrims. cette ville (says he) que de totes les autres ére souveraine. See the parallel passages of Fulcherius Carnotensis, Hist Hierosol. l i c. 4 [p. 386] and Will. Tyr ii. 3 xx. 26

69. As they played at dice, the Latins took off his diadem, and clapped on his head a woollen or hairy cap, τὸ μεγαλοπρεπὲς καὶ παγκλείστο κατεβ-λαινε ὄνομα (Nicetas, p. 358 [p. 736 ed Bonn]) If these merry companions were Venetians, it was the insolence of trade and a commonwealth.

70. Villehardouin, No 101 Dandolo p 322 The doge affirms that the Venetians were paid more slowly than the French but he owns that the histories of the two nations differed on that subject. Had he read Villehardouin? The Greeks complained, however quòd totius Græciæ opes transtulisset (Gunther Hist. C. P c. 13) See the lamentations and invectives of Nicetas (p 355 [p 729, ed. Bonn])

71 The reign of Alexius Comnenus occupies three books in Nicetas, p 291–352 The short restoration of Isaac and his son is despatched in five chapters, p. 352–362

72 When Nicetas reproaches Alexius for his impious league he bestows the harshest names on the pope's new religion, μείζον καὶ ἀτοπώτατον παρεκτροπὴν πίστεως ... τῶν τοῦ Πάπα προνομίων καινισμὸν ... μεταποίησίν τε καὶ μεταβολὴν τῶν παλαιῶν Ῥωμαίοις ἐθῶν (p 348 [p 715, ed. Bonn]) Such was the sincere language of every Greek to the last gasp of the empire.

73. Nicetas (p 355 [p 731 ed. Bonn]) is positive in the charge and specifies the Flemings (Φλαμίονες) though he is wrong in supposing it an ancient name. Villehardouin (No 107) exculpates the barons, and is ignorant (perhaps affectedly ignorant) of the names of the guilty

74. Compare the suspicions and complaints of Nicetas (p. 359–362 [p 740–747 ed. Bonn]) with the blunt charges of Baldwin of Flanders (Gesta Innocent. III c. 92 p. 534) cum patriarcha et mole nobilium, nobis promissis perjurus et mendax.

75. His name was Nicholas Canabus he deserved the praise of Nicetas and the vengeance of Mourzoufle (p 362 [p 744, ed. Bonn])

76. Villehardouin (No 116) speaks of him as a favourite, without knowing that he was a prince of the blood, Angelus and Ducas Ducange who pries into every corner believes him to be the son of Isaac Ducas Sebastocrator and second cousin of young Alexius.

77 This negotiation probable in itself, and attested by Nicetas (p 365 [p 751 ed. Bonn]) is omitted as scandalous by the delicacy of Dandolo and Villehardouin.

78. Baldwin mentions both attempts to fire the fleet (Gest. c. 92 p 534 535) Villehardouin (No 113–115) only describes the first It is remarkable that neither of these warriors observe any peculiar properties in the Greek fire.

79. Ducange (No 119) pours forth a torrent of learning on the Gonfanon Imperial This banner of the Virgin is shown at Venice as a trophy and relic if it be genuine, the pious doge must have cheated the monks of Citeaux.

80 Villehardouin (No 126) confesses that mult ere grant peril and Guntherus (Hist C. P c. 13 [c. 14, p xiv]) affirms that nulla spes victoriæ arridere poterat Yet the knight despises those who thought of flight and the monk praises his countrymen who were resolved on death

81 Baldwin and all the writers honour the names of these two galleys felici auspicio

82 With an allusion to Homer Nicetas calls him ἐννεόργυιος nine orgyæ, or eighteen yards, high—a stature which would indeed, have excused the terror of the Greek. On this occasion the historian seems fonder of the marvellous than of his country or perhaps of truth Baldwin exclaims, in the words of the psalmist persequitur unus ex nobis centum alienos

83 Villehardouin (No. 130) is again ignorant of the authors of this more legitimate fire, which is ascribed by Gunther to a quidam comes Teutonicus (c. 14 [c 17 p xv]) They seem ashamed the incendiaries!

84. For the second siege and conquest of Constantinople, see Villehardouin (No 113–132) Baldwin's second Epistle to Innocent III (Gesta c. 92 p 534–537) with the whole reign of Mourzoufle in Nicetas (p. 363–375 [p 748–770 ed. Bonn]) and borrow some hints from Dandolo (Chron. Venet p 323–330) and Gunther (Hist. C. P c. 14–18) who add the decorations of prophecy and vision. The former produces an oracle of the Erythræan sibyl, of a great armament on the Adriatic, under a blind chief, against Byzantium, etc. Curious enough, were the prediction anterior to the fact.

85. Ceciderunt tamen eâ die civium quasi duo millia etc. (Gunther c. 18) Arithmetic is an excellent touchstone to try the amplifications of passion and rhetoric.

86 Quidam (says Innocent III. Gesta c. 94, p. 538) nec religioni nec ætati, nec sexui pepercerunt sed fornicationes adulteria, et incestus in oculis omnium exercentes non solum maritatas et viduas sed et matronas et virgines Deoque dicatas, exposuerunt spurcitiis garcionum Villehardouin takes notice of these common incidents

87 Nicetas saved and afterwards married a noble virgin (p 380 [p 781 ed Bonn]) whom a soldier ἐπὶ μάρτυσι πολλοῖς ἀνηδὸν ἐπιβρωμώμενος had almost violated in spite of the ἔντολαι, ἐντάλματα ευ γεγονότων

88 Of the general mass of wealth Gunther observes, ut de pauperibus et advenis cives ditissimi redderentur (Hist C P c 18) Villehardouin (No 132), that since the creation ne fu tant gaaignié en une ville Baldwin (Gesta c 92) ut tantum tota non videatur possidere Latinitas [p 535]

89 Villehardouin, No 133–135 Instead of 400 000, there is a various reading of 500 000 The Venetians had offered to take the whole booty and to give 400 marks to each knight 200 to each priest and horseman and 100 to each foot soldier they would have been great losers (Le Beau Hist du Bas Empire, tom xx. p 506 I know not from whence)

90 At the council of Lyons (A D 1245) the English ambassadors stated the revenue of the crown as below that of the foreign clergy, which amounted to 60 000 marks a year (Matthew Paris p 451 Hume s History of England, vol ii p 170)

91 The disorders of the sack of Constantinople, and his own adventures are feelingly described by Nicetas p 367–369 [p 757–761 ed Bonn] and in the Status Urb C P p 375–384 [p 771–790 ed Bonn] His complaints even of sacrilege are justified by Innocent III (Gesta c. 92) but Villehardouin does not betray a symptom of pity or remorse.

92 If I rightly apprehend the Greek of Nicetas s receipts their favourite dishes were boiled buttocks of beef salt pork and peas and soup made of garlic and sharp or sour herbs (p 382 [p 786 ed Bonn])

93 Nicetas uses very harsh expressions παρ᾽ ἀγραμμάτοις Βαρβάροις καὶ τέλεον ἀναλφαβήτοις (Fragment apud Fabric Biblioth Græc tom. vi p 414) This reproach, it is true applies most strongly to their ignorance of Greek and of Homer In their own language the Latins of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries were not destitute of literature. See Harris s Philological Inquiries p iii c 9 10, 11

94. Nicetas was of Chonæ in Phrygia (the old Colossæ of St Paul) he raised himself to the honours of senator judge of the veil and great logothete beheld the fall of the empire retired to Nice and composed an elaborate history from the death of Alexius Comnenus to the reign of Henry

95 A manuscript of Nicetas in the Bodleian library contains this curious fragment on the statues of Constantinople which fraud or shame or rather carelessness has dropped in the common editions. It is published by Fabricius (Biblioth Græc tom vi p 405–416), and immoderat[ely] praised by the late ingenious Mr Harris of Sal[is]bury (Philological Inquiries p iii. c. 5 p. 3[01]–312)

96 To illustrate the statue of Hercules, M[r] Harris quotes a Greek epigram, and engrave[s a] beautiful gem which does not, however copy t[he] attitude of the statue in the latter, Hercules h[ad] not his club and his right leg and arm were e[x]tended

97 I transcribe these proportions which appe to me inconsistent with each other and may possibly show that the boasted taste of Nicetas was more than affectation and vanity

98 Nicetas in Isaaco Angelo et Alexio c. 3, [p] 359 [p 738 ed Bonn] The Latin editor ve[ry] properly observes that the historian in his bo[m]bast style, produces ex pulice elephantem.

99 In two passages of Nicetas (edit Paris, [p] 360 Fabric p 408) the Latins are branded wi[th] the lively reproach of οἱ του καλου ἀνέραστοι βάρβαροι, and their avarice of brass is clearly e[x]pressed Yet the Venetians had the merit of r[e]moving four bronze horses from Constantinople [to] the place of St Mark (Sanuto Vite de Dogi, [in] Muratori Script Rerum Italicarum, tom. xxii [p] 534)

100 Winckelman, Hist. de l Art, tom. iii. [p] 269 270

102 Fleury Hist Ecclés tom xvi p 139–14[5]

103 I shall conclude this chapter with the no[]tice of a modern history which illustrates the taking of Constantinople by the Latins but which has fallen somewhat late into my hands Paolo Ramusio the son of the compiler of Voyages was directed by the senate of Venice to write the history of the conquest and this order which he received in his youth he executed in a mature age by an elegant Latin work de Bello Constantinopolitano et Imperatoribus Comnenis per Gallos et Venetos restitutis (Venet 1635 in folio) Ramusio or Rhamnusus transcribes and translates sequitur ad unguem, a MS of Villehardouin which he possessed but he enriches his narrative with Greek and Latin materials and we are indebted to him for a correct state of the fleet the names of the fifty Venetian nobles who commanded the galleys of the republic and the patriot opposition of Pantaleon Barbus to the choice of the doge for emperor

Chapter LXI

1 See the original treaty of partition in the Venetian Chronicle of Andrew Dandolo, p 3 6–330, and the subsequent election in Villehardouin, No. 136-140, with Ducange in his Observations, and the 1st book of his Histoire de Constantinople sous l'Empire des François.

2. After mentioning the nomination of the doge by a French elector his kinsman Andrew Dandolo approves his exclusion quidam Venetorum fidelis et nobilis senex, usus oratione satis probabili etc. [p. 330], which has been embroidered by modern writers from Blondus to Le Beau

3. Nicetas (p. 384 [p ,89, ed. Bonn]) with the vain ignorance of a Greek describes the marquis Montferrat as a maritime power Λαμπαρδίαν δὲ κ εἶαι παράλιον Was he deceived by the Byzantine theme of Lombardy which extended along the coast of Calabria?

4. They exacted an oath from Thomas Morosini to appoint no canons of St Sophia the lawful electors, except Venetians who had lived ten years in Venice, etc But the foreign clergy was envious the pope disapproved this national monopoly and of the six Latin patriarchs of Constantinople only the first and the last were Venetians

5. Nicetas p 383 [p ,88 ed. Bonn]

6. The Epistles of Innocent III are a rich fund for the ecclesiastical and civil institution of the Latin empire of Constantinople and the most important of these epistles (of which the collection in 2 vols. in folio is published by Stephen Baluze) are inserted in his Gesta in Muratori Script. Rerum Italicarum tom iii. p 1 c. 94–105.

7 In the treaty of partition most of the names are corrupted by the scribes they might be restored, and a good map suited to the last age of the Byzantine empire would be an improvement of geography But, alas! D Anville is no more!

8 Their style was dominus quartæ partis et dimidiæ [cum dimidio totius] imperii Romani, till Giovanni Dolfino who was elected doge in the year 1 6 (Sanuto p 530 641) For the government of Constantinople see Ducange Histoire de C. P i. 37

9. Ducange (Hist de C. P ii. 6) has marked the conquests made by the state or nobles of Venice of the islands of Candia Corfu Cephalonia Zante Naxos, Paros, Melos Andros, Mycone Scyro Cea and Lemnos

10. Boniface sold the isle of Candia August 12 A.D 1204. See the act in Sanuto p 533 but I cannot understand how it could be his mother s portion, or how she could be the daughter of an emperor Alexius.

11 In the year 1212 the doge Peter Zani sent a colony to Candia drawn from every quarter of Venice. But in their savage manners and frequent rebellions the Candiots may be compared to the Corsicans under the yoke of Genoa and when I compare the accounts of Belon and Tournefort I cannot discern much difference between the Venetian and the Turkish island.

12 Villehardouin (No 159, 160 173–177) and Nicetas (p. 387–394) describe the expedition into Greece of the marquis Boniface The Choniate might derive his information from his brother Michael archbishop of Athens whom he paints as an orator a statesman and a saint His encomium of Athens and the description of Tempe should be published from the Bodleian MS of Nicetas (Fabric Biblioth, Græc. tom vi. p 405), and would have deserved Mr Harris s inquiries

13. Napoli di Romania or Nauplia the ancient seaport of Argos, is still a place of strength and consideration situate on a rocky peninsula, with a good harbour (Chandler s Travels into Greece p. 227)

14. I have softened the expression of Nicetas, who strives to expose the presumption of the Franks See de Rebus C. P expugnatam p 375–384.

15 A city surrounded by the river Hebrus and six leagues to the south of Adrianople received from its double wall the Greek name of Didymoteichos insensibly corrupted into Demotica and Dimot. I have preferred the more convenient and modern appellation of Demotica. This place was the last Turkish residence of Charles XII

16 Their quarrel is told by Villehardouin (No. 146–158) with the spirit of freedom. The merit and reputation of the marshal are acknowledged by the Greek historian (p 387 [p ,94, ed. Bonn]), μ γα παρὰ τ τω Λα ἴνω δυναμένου στρα ἰμασ unlike some modern heroes whose exploits are only visible in their own memoirs

17 See the fate of Mourzoufle in Nicetas (p. 392 [p. 804, ed. Bonn]) Villehardouin (No 141–145 163) and Guntherus (c. 20, 21) Neither the marshal nor the monk afford a grain of pity for a tyrant or rebel, whose punishment however was more unexampled than his crime

18. The column of Arcadius which represents in basso relievo his victories or those of his father Theodosius is still extant at Constantinople It is descr bed and measured Gyllius (Topograph iv 7) Banduri (ad l. 1 Antiquit C. P p 507 etc) and Tournefort (Voyage du Levant tom. ii. lettre xii p 231)

19 The nonsense of Gunther and the modern Greeks concerning this columna f tid ca is unwortly of notice but it is singular enough that fifty years before the Latin conquest the poet Tzetzes (Chiliad ix 277) relates the dream of a matron who saw an army in the forum, and a man sitting on the column clapping his hands and uttering a loud exclamation.

noble virgin (p 380 [p 781 ed Bonn]) whom a soldier, ἐπι μαρτυσι πολλοις ὀνηδὸν ἐπιβρωμωμενος had almost violated in spite of the ἔντολαι ἐντάλματα ευ γεγονότων

19 The nonsense of Gunther and the modern Greeks concerning this columna fatidica is unworthy of notice but it is singular enough that, fifty years before the Latin conquest the poet Tzetzes (Chiliad ix 277) relates the dream of a matron who saw an army in the forum, and a man sitting on the column clapping his hands and uttering a loud exclamation.

20 The dynasties of Nice Trebizond and Epirus (of which Nicetas saw the origin without much pleasure or hope) are learnedly explored and clearly represented, in the Familiæ Byzantinæ of Ducange

21 Except some facts in Pachymer and Nicephorus Gregoras which will hereafter be used the Byzantine writers disdain to speak of the empire of Trebizond or principality of the Last and among the Latins it is conspicuous only in the romances of the fourteenth or fifteenth centuries Yet the indefatigable Ducange has dug out (Fam Byz p 192) two authentic passages in Vincent of Beauvais (l xxxi c 144), and the protonotary Ogerius (apud Wading, A D 1279 No 4)

22 The portrait of the French Latins is drawn in Nicetas by the hand of prejudice and resentment οὐδὲν τῶν ἄλλων ἐθνῶν εἰς Ἄρεος ἔργα παρασυμβεβλῆσθαι σφίσιν ἠνείχοντο ἀλλ οὐδέ τις τῶν Χαρίτων ἢ τῶν Μουσῶν παρὰ τοῖς βαρβάροις τούτοις ἐπεξενίζετο καὶ παρὰ τοῦτο οἶμαι τὴν φύσιν ἦσαν ἀνήμεροι καὶ τὸν χόλον εἶχον τοῦ λόγου προτρέχοντα [P 791 ed Bonn]

23 I here begin to use with freedom and confidence, the eight books of the Histoire de C P sous l Empire des François which Ducange has given as a supplement to Villehardouin and which in a barbarous style deserves the praise of an original and classic work

24 In Calo John s answer to the pope we may find his claims and complaints (Gesta Innocent III c 108 109) he was cherished at Rome as the prodigal son

25 The Comans were a Tartar or Turkman horde which encamped in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries on the verge of Moldavia The greater part were pagans but some were Mohammedans and the whole horde was converted to Christianity (A D 1370) by Lewis king of Hungary

26 Nicetas from ignorance or malice imputes the defeat to the cowardice of Dandolo (p 383 [p 397 ed Par p 814 ed Bonn]) but Villehardouin shares his own glory with his venerable friend, qui viels home ére et gote ne veoit mais mult ére sages et preus et vigueros (No 193)

27 The truth of geography and the original text of Villehardouin (No 194) place Rodosto three days journey (trois jornées) from Adrianople but Vigenere in his version has most absurdly substituted trois heures [lieues] and this error, which is not corrected by Ducange has entrapped several moderns whose names I shall spare

28 The reign and end of Baldwin are related by Villehardouin and Nicetas (p 386-416 [p 791-853 ed Bonn]) and their omissions are supplied by Ducange in his Observations and to the end of his first book

29 After brushing away all doubtful and improbable circumstances we may prove the death of Baldwin—1 By the firm belief of the French barons (Villehardouin No 230) 2 By the declaration of Calo-John himself who excuses his not releasing the captive emperor quia debitum carnis exsolverat cum carcere teneretur (Gesta Innocent III c 109 [p 550])

30 See the story of this impostor from the French and Flemish writers in Ducange Hist de C P iii 9 and the ridiculous fables that were believed by the monks of St Alban s in Matthew Paris Hist Major p 271 272

31 Villehardouin No 257 I quote with regret this lamentable conclusion where we lose at once the original history and the rich illustrations of Ducange The last pages may derive some light from Henry s two epistles to Innocent III (Gesta c 106 107)

32 The marshal was alive in 1212, but he probably died soon afterwards without returning to France (Ducange, Observations sur Villehardouin p 238) His fief of Messinople the gift of Boniface was the ancient Maximianopolis which flourished in the time of Ammianus Marcellinus among the cities of Thrace (No 141)

33 The church of this patron of Thessalonica was served by the canons of the holy sepulchre and contained a divine ointment which distilled daily and stupendous miracles (Ducange Hist de C P ii 4)

34 Acropolita (c 17) observes the persecution of the legate and the toleration of Henry (Ἐρῆ as he calls him) κλύδωνα κατεστόρεσε

35 See the reign of HENRY in Ducange (Hist de C P l i c 35-41 l ii c 1-22) who is much indebted to the Epistles of the Popes Le Beau (Hist du Bas Empire tom xxi p 120-122) has found perhaps in Doutreman some laws of Henry which determined the service of fiefs and the prerogatives of the emperor

36 Acropolita (c 14) affirms that Peter of Courtenay died by the sword (ἔργον μαχαίρας γενέσθαι) but from his dark expressions I should conclude a previous captivity ὡς πάντας ἄρδην δεσμώτας ποιῆσαι σὺν πᾶσι σκεύεσι The Chronicle of Auxerre delays the emperor s death till the year 1219 and Auxerre is in the neighbourhood of Courtenay

37 See the reign and death of Peter of Courtenay in Ducange (Hist de C P l ii c. 22-28) who feebly strives to excuse the neglect of the emperor by Honorius III

38 Marinus Sanutus (Secreta Fidelium Crucis l ii p 4 c 18 p 73) is so much delighted with this bloody deed that he has transcribed it in his margin as a bonum exemplum Yet he acknowledges the damsel for the lawful wife of Robert

39 See the reign of Robert in Ducange (Hist. de C P l iii c 1-12)

40 Rex igitur Franciæ deliberatione habitâ respondit nuntiis se daturum hominem Syriæ partibus aptum in armis probum (preux) in bellis securum in agendis providum Johannem comitem Brennensem Sanut Secret Fidelium l iii p xi c 4, p 205 Matthew Paris p 159

4 Giannone (Istoria Civile, tom. ii. l. xvi p 380-385) discusses the marriage of Frederic II. with the daughter of John of Brienne, and the double union of the crowns of Naples and Jerusalem.

42. Acropolita, c. 27 The historian was at that time a boy and educated at Constantinople. In 1233 when he was eleven years old his father broke the Latin chain left a splendid fortune and escaped to the Greek court of Nice, where his son was raised to the highest honours.

43. Philip Mouskes, bishop of Tournay (A.D. 1274-82) has composed a poem, or rather a string of verses, in bad old Flemish French on the Latin emperors of Constantinople which Ducange has published at the end of Villehardouin see p. 224 for the prowess of John of Brienne.

N'Aie, Ector Roll ne Og ers
Ne Judas Machabeus li fiers
Tant ne fit d armes en estors
Com fist li Rois Jehans cel jors
Et il defors et il dedans
La paru sa force et ses sens
Et li hardiment qu il avoit.

44 See the reign of John de Brienne, in Ducange, Hist. de C. P l. iii. c. 13-26

45 See the reign of Baldwin II till his expulsion from Constantinople in Ducange Hist. de C. P l. iv c. 34, the end, l. v c. 1-33

46 Matthew Paris relates the two visits of Baldwin II. to the English court p 396 637 his return to Greece armatâ manû p 407 his letters of his nomen formidabile, etc., p 481 (a passage which had escaped Ducange) his expulsion p 850

47 Louis IX. disapproved and stopped the alienation of Courtenay (Ducange, l. iv c. 23) It is now annexed to the royal demesne, but granted for a term (engagé) to the family of Boulainvilliers. Courtenay in the election of Nemours in the Isle de France, is a town of 900 inhabitants with the remains of a castle (Mélanges tirés d une Grande Bibliothèque, tom. xlv p 74-77)

48 Joinville, p 104, édit du Louvre. A Coman prince, who died without baptism, was buried at the gates of Constantinople with a live retinue of slaves and horses.

49 Sanut. Secret. Fidel. Crucis, l. ii. p iv c. 18 p. 3.

50 Under the words Perparus Perpera Hyperperum Ducange is short and vague Monetæ genus. From a corrupt passage of Guntherus (Hist. C. P c. 8, p. 10) I guess that the Perpera was the nummus aureus, the fourth part of a mark of silver or about ten shillings sterling in value. In lead it would be too contemptible.

51 For the translation of the holy crown, etc., from Constantinople to Paris, see Ducange (Hist. de C. P l. v c. 11 14, 24, 35) and Fleury (Hist. Eccles. tom. xvi. p 201-204)

52 Mélanges tirés d une Grande Bibliothèque, tom. xliii. p. 201-205. The Lutrin of Boileau exhibits the inside, the soul and manners of the Sainte Chapelle and many facts relative to the institution are collected and explained by his commentators Brosset and De St. Marc.

53 It was performed A.D. 1656 March 24 on the niece of Pascal and that superior genius with Arnauld Nicole, etc. were on the spot to believe and attest a miracle which confounded the Jesuits and saved Port Royal (Œuvres de Racine tom. vi. p. 176-187 in his eloquent History of Port Royal)

54. Voltaire (Siècle de Louis XIV c. 37 Œuvres, tom. ix. p 178 179) strives to invalidate the fact but Hume (Essays vol. ii p. 483 484) with more skill and success seizes the battery and turns the cannon against his enemies

55. The gradual losses of the Latins may be traced in the third fourth and fifth books of the compilation of Ducange but of the Greek conquests he has dropped many circumstances which may be recovered from the larger history of George Acropolita and the three first books of Nicephorus Gregoras two writers of the Byzantine series who have had the good fortune to meet with learned editors, Leo Allatius at Rome and John Boivin in the Academy of Inscriptions of Paris

56 George Acropolita, c. 78 p 89, 90, edit. Paris [p. 171 sq. ed. Bonn]

57 The Greeks ashamed of any foreign aid disguise the alliance and succour of the Genoese but the fact is proved by the testimony of J. Villani (Chron. l. vi. c. 71 in Muratori Script Rerum Italicarum, tom. xiii. p 202 203) and William de Nangis (Annales de St Louis p 248 in the Louvre Joinville) two impartial foreigners and Urban IV threatened to deprive Genoa of her archbishop

58. Some precautions must be used in reconciling the discordant numbers the 800 soldiers of Nicetas the 25 000 of Spandugino (apud Ducange, l. v c. 24) the Greeks and Scythians of Acropolita and the numerous army of Michael in the Epistles of pope Urban IV (i. 129.)

59. Θελημα ριοι. They are described and named by Pachymer (l. ii c. 14)

60. It is needless to seek these Comans in the deserts of Tartary or even of Moldavia A part of the horde had submitted to John Vataces, and was probably settled as a nursery of soldiers on some waste lands of Thrace Cantacuzen (l. i. c. 2)

61 The loss of Constantinople is briefly told by the Latins the conquest is described with more satisfaction by the Greeks by Acropolita (c. 85) Pachymer (l. ii. c. 26 27) Nicephorus Gregoras (l. iv c. 1 2) See Ducange, Hist de C. P l. v c. 19-27

62 See the three last books (l v-viii.) and the genealogical tables of Ducange In the year 1382 the titular emperor of Constantinople was James de Baux, duke of Andria in the kingdom of Naples the son of Margaret daughter of Catherine de Valois, daughter of Catherine daughter of Philip son of Baldwin II (Ducange l. viii. c. 37 38) It is uncertain whether he left any posterity

63 Abulfeda who saw the conclusion of the crusades speaks of the kingdoms of the Franks and those of the Negroes as equally unknown (Prolegom ad Geograph) Had he not disdained the Latin language how easily might the Syrian prince have found books and interpreters!

64 A short and superficial account of these versions from Latin into Greek is given by Huet (de Interpretatione et de claris Interpretibus p 131–135) Maximus Planudes, a monk of Constantinople (A D 1327–1353) has translated Cæsar s Commentaries the Somnium Scipionis the Metamorphoses and Heroides of Ovid, etc (Fabric. Bib Græc tom x. p 533)

65 Windmills, first invented in the dry country of Asia Minor, were used in Normandy as early as the year 1105 (Vie privee des François tom i p 42, 43 Ducange, Gloss Latin tom iv p 474)

66 See the complaints of Roger Bacon (Biographia Britannica vol i p 418 Kippis s edition) If Bacon himself or Gerbert understood some Greek they were prodigies and owed nothing to the commerce of the East

67 Such was the opinion of the great Leibnitz (Œuvres de Fontenelle tom v p 458) a master of the history of the middle ages I shall only instance the pedigree of the Carmelites and the flight of the house of Loretto which were both derived from Palestine

68 If I rank the Saracens with the barbarians it is only relative to their wars or rather inroads in Italy and France where their sole purpose was to plunder and destroy

69 On this interesting subject the progress of society in Europe a strong ray of philosophic light has broke from Scotland in our own times and it is with private as well as public regard that I repeat the names of Hume Robertson and Adam Smith

70 I have applied but not confined myself to A Genealogical History of the noble and illustrious Family of Courtenay by Ezra Cleaveland Tutor to Sir William Courtenay and Rector of Honiton Oxon 1735 in folio The first part is extracted from William of Tyre the second from Bouchet s French history and the third from various memorials public provincial and private of the Courtenays of Devonshire The rector of Honiton has more gratitude than industry and more industry than criticism

71 The primitive record of the family is a passage of the continuator of Aimoin a monk of Fleury who wrote in the twelfth century See his Chronicle in the Historians of France (tom. xi p 276)

72 Turbessel or as it is now styled Telbesher is fixed by D Anville four and twenty miles from the great passage over the Euphrates at Zeugma

73 His possessions are distinguished in the Assises of Jerusalem (c 326) among the feudal tenures of the kingdom which must therefore have been collected between the years 1153 and 1187 His pedigree may be found in the Lignages d Outremer, c. 16

74 The rapine and satisfaction of Reginal Courtenay are preposterously arranged in Epistles of the abbot and regent Suger (cxiv cx the best memorials of the age (Duchesne, S tores Hist Franc tom iv p 530)

75 In the beginning of the eleventh cent after naming the father and grandfather of H Capet the monk Glaber is obliged to add c genus valde in ante reperitur obscurum Yet are assured that the great grandfather of H Capet was Robert the Strong count of Anjou (863–873) a noble Frank of Neustria Neustr generosæ stirpis who was slain in the def of his country against the Normans dum pa fines tuebatur Beyond Robert all is conjectur fable It is a probable conjecture that the t race descended from the second by Childebra the brother of Charles Martel. It is an absurd f that the second was allied to the first by the m riage of Ansbert, a Roman senator and the cestor of St Arnoul with Blitilde a daughte Clotaire I The Saxon origin of the house France is an ancient but incredible opin See a judicious memoir of M de Foncema (Mémoires de l Académie des Inscriptions t xx p 548–579) He had promised to declare own opinion in a second memoir, which never appeared

76 Of the various petitions apologies, e published by the princes of Courtenay I have s the three following all in octavo —1 De Stirpe Origine Domus de Courtenay addita sunt R ponsa celeberrimorum Europæ Jurisconsultoru Paris, 1607 2 Representation du Procedé tent l instance faicte devant le Roi par Messieurs Courtenay pour la conservation de l Honneur Dignité de leur Maison branche de la roya Maison de France à Paris 1613 3 Represent tion du subject qui a porté Messieurs de Salles de Fraville de la Maison de Courtenay à se r tirer hors du Royaume 1614 It was a homici for which the Courtenays expected to be pardon or tried as princes of the blood

77 The sense of the parliaments is thus express by Thuanus Principis nomen nusquam in Gal tributum nisi iis qui per mares e regibus nost originem repetunt qui nunc tantum a Ludovi Nono beatæ memoriæ numerantur nam Cortin et Drocenses a Ludovico crasso genus ducent hodie inter eos minime recensentur—a distincti of expediency rather than justice The sanctity Louis IX could not invest him with any spec prerogative, and all the descendants of Hug Capet must be included in his original compa with the French nation

78 The last male of the Courtenays was Charl Roger who died in the year 1730 without lea any sons The last female was Hélène de Court nay who married Louis de Beaufremont Her tit of Princess du Sang Royal de France was sup pressed (February 7th 1737) by an arret of th parliament of Paris

79 The singular anecdote to which I allude is related in the Recueil des Pièces interessantes et peu connues (Maestricht, 1,86 in 4 vols 12 mo) and the unknown editor quotes his author who had received it from Hélène de Courtenay marquise de Beaufremont

80 Dugdale, Monast con Anglicanum vol. I. p. 86. Yet this fable must have been invented before the reign of Edward III The profuse devotion of the three first generations to Ford Abbey was followed by oppression on one side and ingratitude on the other and in the sixth generation the monks ceased to register the births actions and deaths of their patrons

81 In his Britannia, in the list of the earls of Devonshire. His expression e regio sanguine ortos credunt, betrays, however some doubt or suspicion.

82 In his Baronage, P 1. p. 634, he refers to his own Monasticon. Should he not have corrected the register of Ford Abbey and annihilated the phantom Florus by the unquestionable evidence of the French historians?

83 Besides the third and most valuable book of Cleaveland's History I have consulted Dugdale the father of our genealogical science (Baronage, P 1 p 634-643)

84 This great family de Ripuariis, de Redvers de Rivers ended in Edward the First's time in Isabella de Fortibus a famous and potent dowager who long survived her brother and husband (Dugdale Baronage P 1. p 254-257)

85 Cleaveland p 142 By some it is assigned to a Rivers earl of Devon but the English denotes the fifteenth rather than the thirteenth century

86 Ubi lapsus! Quid feci a motto which was probably adopted by the Powderham branch after the loss of the earldom of Devonshire etc. The primitive arms of the Courtenays were Or three torteaux Gules which seem to denote their affinity with Godfrey of Bouillon and the ancient counts of Boulogne.

Chapter LXII

1 For the reigns of the Nicene emperors, more especially of John Vataces and his son, their minister George Acropolita is the only genuine contemporary but George Pachymer returned to Constantinople with the Greeks at the age of nineteen (Hanckius de Script Byzant c 33 34 p. 564-5 & Fabric. B blioth Græc. tom. vi p 448-460) Yet the history of Nicephorus Gregoras, though of the fourteenth century is a valuable narrative from the taking of Constantinople by the Latins

2 Nicephorus Gregoras (l. ii c. 1) distinguishes between the ὀξεῖα ὁρμὴ of Lascaris and the εὐσταθεία of Vataces. The two portraits are in a very good style.

3 Pachymer l. i. c. 23 24 Nic. Greg l. ii c. 6 [tom. i. p 42 ed Bonn] The reader of the Byzantines must observe how rarely we are indulged with such precious details.

4 Μόνοι γὰρ ἁπάντων ἀνθρώπων ὀνομαστότατοι βασιλεὺς καὶ φιλόσοφος (Greg Acropol. c 32) The emperor in a familiar conversation, examined and encouraged the studies of his future logothete.

5 Compare Acropolita (c. 18 52) and the two first books of Nicephorus Gregoras

6 A Persian saying that Cyrus was the father and Darius the master of his subjects was applied to Vataces and his son. But Pachymer (l. i. c. 23) has mistaken the mild Darius for the cruel Cambyses, despot or tyrant of his people. By the institution of taxes Darius had incurred the less odious but more contemptible, name of Κάπηλος merchant or broker (Herodotus iii. 89)

7 Acropolita (c. 63) seems to admire his own firmness in sustaining a beating and not returning to council till he was called. He relates the exploits of Theodore and his own services, from c 53 to c 74 of his history See the third book of Nicephorus Gregoras.

8 Pachymer (l. i. c. 21 [tom. i p 65 ed Bonn]) names and discriminates fifteen or twenty Greek families, καὶ ὅσοι ἄλλοι οἷς ἡ μεγαλογενὴς σειρὰ καὶ χρυσῆ συγκεκρότητο. Does he mean by this decoration a figurative or a real golden chain? Perhaps both.

9 The old geographers with Cellarius and D Anville and our travellers particularly Pocock and Chandler will teach us to distinguish the two Magnesias of Asia Minor of the Mæander and of Sipylus. The latter our present object, is still flourishing for a Turkish city and lies eight hours or leagues to the north-east of Smyrna (Tournefort Voyage du Levant tom iii lettre xxii p 365-370 Chandler's Travels into Asia Minor p 267)

10 See Acropolita (c. 75 76 etc.) who lived too near the times Pachymer (l. i. c. 13-25) Gregoras (l. iii c. 3 4, 5)

11 The pedigree of Palæologus is explained by Ducange (Famil Byzant p 230 etc.) the events of his private life are related by Pachymer (l. i. c. 7-12) and Gregoras (l. ii 8 l. iii 2 4 l. iv 1) with visible favour to the father of the reigning dynasty

12 Acropolita (c. 50) relates the circumstances of this curious adventure which seem to have escaped the more recent writers

13 Pachymer (l. i c 12 [tom i. p 33 ed. Bonn]) who speaks with proper contempt of this barbarous trial affirms that he had seen in his youth many persons who had sustained without injury the fiery ordeal As a Greek, he is credulous but the ingenuity of the Greeks might furnish some remedies of art or fraud against their own superstition or that of their tyrant.

14 Without comparing Pachymer to Thucydides or Tacitus I will praise his narrative (l i c. 13–32, l. ii c 1–9), which pursues the ascent of Palæologus with eloquence perspicuity and tolerable freedom Acropolita is more cautious and Gregoras more concise

15. The judicial combat was abolished by St. Louis in his own territories and his example and authority were at length prevalent in France (Esprit des Loix l xxviii c 29)

16 In civil cases Henry II gave an option to the defendant Glanvile prefers the proof by evidence and that by judicial combat is reprobated in the Fleta Yet the trial by battle has never been abrogated in the English law and it was ordered by the judges as late as the beginning of the last century

17 Yet an ingenious friend has urged to me in mitigation of this practice 1 That in nations emerging from barbarism it moderates the licence of private war and arbitrary revenge 2 That it is less absurd than the trials by the ordeal or boiling water or the cross which it has contributed to abolish 3 That it served at least as a test of personal courage a quality so seldom united with a base disposition, that the danger of a trial might be some check to a malicious prosecutor and a useful barrier against injustice supported by power The gallant and unfortunate earl of Surrey might probably have escaped his unmerited fate had not his demand of the combat against his accuser been overruled

18 The site of Nymphæum is not clearly defined in ancient or modern geography But from the last hours of Vataces (Acropolita c 52) it is evident the palace and gardens of his favourite residence were in the neighbourhood of Smyrna Nymphæum might be loosely placed in Lydia (Gregoras, l vi 6 [tom. i p 190 ed Bonn])

19 This sceptre the emblem of justice and power was a long staff such as was used by the heroes in Homer By the latter Greeks it was named Dicanice and the Imperial sceptre was distinguished as usual by the red or purple colour

20 Acropolita affirms (c 87) that this bonnet was after the French fashion but from the ruby at the point or summit Ducange (Hist de C P l v c 28 29) believes that it was the high crowned hat of the Greeks Could Acropolita mistake the dress of his own court?

21 See Pachymer (l ii c 28–33) Acropolita (c 88) Nicephorus Gregoras l iv 7) and for the treatment of the subject Latins Ducange (l v c 30 31)

22 This milder invention for extinguishing the sight was tried by the philosopher Democritus on himself when he sought to withdraw his mind from the visible world a foolish story! The word abacinare in Latin and Italian has furnished Ducange (Gloss Latin) with an opportunity to review the various modes of blinding the more vi lent were scooping burning with an iron or h vinegar and binding the head with a strong co till the eyes burst from their sockets Ingenio tyrants!

23 See the first retreat and restoration of A senius in Pachymer (l ii c 15 l iii c. 1 2) a Nicephorus Gregoras (l iii c 1 l iv c 1) Po terity justly accused the ἀφέλεια and ῥαθυμα Arsenius, the virtues of a hermit the vices of minister (l xii c 2)

24 The crime and excommunication of Micha are fairly told by Pachymer (l iii c 10 14 1 etc) and Gregoras (l iv c. 4) His confession a penance restored their freedom.

25 Pachymer relates the exile of Arsenius (l. i
c. 1–16) he was one of the commissaries w visited him in the desert island The last testame of the unforgiving patriarch is still extant (Dupi Bibliothèque Ecclésiastique tom x p 95)

26 Pachymer (l vii c. 22 [tom ii p 60, e Bonn]) relates this miraculous trial like a philos pher and treats with similar contempt a plot
the Arsenites to hide a revelation in the coffin some old saint (l vii c 13 [tom ii p 40 e Bonn]) He compensates this incredulity by a image that weeps another that bleeds (l. vii c 3 [tom ii p 82, ed Bonn]) and the miraculou cures of a deaf and a mute patient (l xi c 3 [tom ii p 453 ed Bonn])

27 The story of the Arsenites is spread throug the thirteen books of Pachymer Their union an triumph are reserved for Nicephorus Gregoras (l vii c 9 [tom i p 262 ed Bonn]) who neithe loves nor esteems these sectaries

28 Of the thirteen books of Pachymer the firs six (as the fourth and fifth of Nicephorus Gregoras) contain the reign of Michael at the time of whos death he was forty years of age Instead of break ing like his editor the Père Poussin his history into two parts I follow Ducange and Cousin, who number the thirteen books in one series

29 Ducange Hist de C. P l v c 33 etc., from the Epistles of Urban IV

30 From their mercantile intercourse with the Venetians and Genoese they branded the Latins as καπηλοι and βαναυσο (Pachymer l v c. 10) Some are heretics in name others like the Latins, in fact said the learned Veccus (l v c 12) who soon afterwards became a convert (c 15 16) and a patriarch (c 24)

31 In this class we may place Pachymer himself whose copious and candid narrative occupies the fifth and sixth books of his history Yet the Greek is silent on the council of Lyons and seems to believe that the popes always resided in Rome and Italy (l v c 17 21)

32 See the acts of the council of Lyons in the year 1274 Fleury Hist Ecclésiastique tom xviii. p 181–199 Dupin Biblioth Ecclés tom x p 135

33 This curious instruction which has been drawn with more or less honesty by Wading and Leo Allatius from the archives of the Vatican, is given in an abstract or version by Fleury (tom. xviii. p. 252-258)

34. This frank and authentic confession of Michael's distress is exhibited in barbarous Latin by Ogerius, who signs himself Protonotarius Interpretum, and transcribed by Wading from the MSS. of the Vatican (A.D. 1278, No. 3). His annals of the Franciscan order, the Fratres Minores, in seventeen volumes in folio (Rome, 1741), I have now accidentally seen among the waste paper of a bookseller.

35. See the sixth book of Pachymer, particularly the chapters 1, 11, 16, 18, 24-27. He is the more credible, as he speaks of this persecution with less anger than sorrow.

36. Pachymer, l. vii. c. 1, 11, 17 [tom. ii. p. 11, 36, 50, ed. Bonn]. The speech of Andronicus the Elder (lib. xii. c. 2) is a curious record, which proves that, if the Greeks were the slaves of the emperor, he was not less the slave of superstition and the clergy.

37. The best accounts, the nearest the time, the most full and entertaining, of the conquest of Naples by Charles of Anjou, may be found in the Florentine Chronicles of Ricordano Malespina (c. 175-193) and Giovanni Villani (l. vii. c. 1-10, 25-30), which are published by Muratori in the eighth and thirteenth volumes of the Historians of Italy. In his Annals (tom. xi. p. 56-72) he has abridged these great events, which are likewise described in the Istoria Civile of Giannone, tom. ii. l. xix., tom. iii. l. xx.

38. Ducange, Hist. de C. P. l. v. c. 49-56, l. vi. c. 1-13. See Pachymer, l. iv. c. 29, l. v. c. 7-10, 25, l. vi. c. 30, 32, 33, and Nicephorus Gregoras, l. iv. 5, l. v. 1, 6.

39. The reader of Herodotus will recollect how miraculously the Assyrian host of Sennacherib was disarmed and destroyed (l. ii. c. 141).

40. According to Sabas Malaspina (Hist. Sicula, l. iii. c. 16, in Muratori, tom. viii. p. 832), a zealous Guelph, the subjects of Charles, who had reviled Mainfroy as a wolf, began to regret him as a lamb; and he justifies their discontent by the oppressions of the French government (l. vi. c. 2, 7). See the Sicilian manifesto in Nicholas Specialis (l. i. c. 11, in Muratori, tom. x. p. 930).

41. See the character and counsels of Peter king of Arragon, in Mariana (Hist. Hispan. l. xiv. c. 6, tom. ii. p. 133). The reader forgives the Jesuit's defects, in favour always of his style, and often of his sense.

42. After enumerating the sufferings of his country, Nicholas Specialis adds, in the true spirit of Italian jealousy, Quæ omnia et graviora quidem, ut arbitror, patienti animo Siculi tolerassent, nisi (quod primum cunctis dominantibus cavendum est) alienas feminas invasissent (l. i. c. 2, p. 924).

43. The French were long taught to remember this bloody lesson: "If I am provoked (said Henry the Fourth), I will breakfast at Milan, and dine at Naples." Your majesty (replied the Spanish ambassador) may perhaps arrive in Sicily for vespers."

44. This revolt, with the subsequent victory, are related by two national writers, Bartholemy à Neocastro (in Muratori, tom. xiii.) and Nicholas Specialis (in Muratori, tom. x.), the one a contemporary, the other of the next century. The patriot Specialis disclaims the name of rebellion and all previous correspondence with Peter of Arragon (nullo communicato consilio), who happened to be with a fleet and army on the African coast (l. i. c. 4, 9).

45. Nicephorus Gregoras (l. v. c. 6) admires the wisdom of Providence in this equal balance of states and princes. For the honour of Palæologus I had rather this balance had been observed by an Italian writer.

46. See the Chronicle of Villani, the eleventh volume of the Annali d'Italia of Muratori, and the twentieth and twenty first books of the Istoria Civile of Giannone.

47. In this motley multitude the Catalans and Spaniards, the bravest of the soldiery, were styled by themselves and the Greeks Amogavares. Moncada derives their origin from the Goths, and Pachymer (l. xi. c. 22 [tom. ii. p. 416, ed. Bonn]) from the Arabs, and, in spite of national and religious pride, I am afraid the latter is in the right.

48. Some idea may be formed of the population of these cities from the 36,000 inhabitants of Tralles, which, in the preceding reign, was rebuilt by the emperor, and ruined by the Turks. (Pachymer, l. vi. c. 20, 21.)

49. I have collected these pecuniary circumstances from Pachymer (l. xi. c. 21, l. xii. c. 4, 5, 8, 14, 19 [tom. ii. p. 493, 494, ed. Bonn]), *who de*scribes the progressive degradation of the gold coin. Even in the prosperous times of John Ducas Vataces, *the byzants were composed in equal pro*portions of the pure and the baser metal. The poverty of Michael Palæologus compelled him to strike a new coin, with nine parts, or carats, of gold, and fifteen of copper alloy. After his death the standard rose to ten carats, till in the public distress it was reduced to the moiety. The prince was relieved for a moment, while credit and commerce were for ever blasted. In France the gold coin is of twenty two carats (one twelfth alloy), and the standard of England and Holland is still higher.

50. The Catalan war is most copiously related by Pachymer, in the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth books, till he breaks off in the year 1308. Nicephorus Gregoras (l. vii. 3-6) is more concise and complete. Ducange, who adopts these adventurers as French, has hunted their footsteps with his usual diligence (Hist. de C. P. l. vi. c. 22-46). He quotes an Arragonese history, which I have read with pleasure, and which the Spaniards extol as a model of style and composition (Expedicion de los Catalanes y Arragoneses contra Turcos y

Ingenious tyrants!

23 See the first retreat and restoration of Arsenius in Pachymer (l ii. c 15 l iii c. 1, 2) and Nicephorus Gregoras (l. iii c. 1 l iv c 1) Posterity justly accused the ἀφέλεια and ῥαθυμία of Arsenius the virtues of a hermit the vices of a minister (l xii c 2)

24 The crime and excommunication of Michael are fairly told by Pachymer (l iii. c 10 14 19 etc) and Gregoras (l iv c 4) His confession and penance restored their freedom

25 Pachymer relates the exile of Arsenius (l. iv c. 1–16) he was one of the commissaries who visited him in the desert island The last testament of the unforgiving patriarch is still extant (Dupin Bibliothèque Ecclésiastique tom x p 95)

26 Pachymer (l vii c. 22 [tom ii p 60 ed Bonn]) relates this miraculous trial like a philosopher and treats with similar contempt a plot of the Arsenites to hide a revelation in the coffin of some old saint (l vii c 13 [tom ii p 40 ed Bonn]) He compensates this incredulity by an image that weeps another that bleeds (l. vii c. 30 [tom ii p 82 ed Bonn]) and the miraculous cures of a deaf and a mute patient (l xi c. 32 [tom ii p 453 ed Bonn])

27 The story of the Arsenites is spread through the thirteen books of Pachymer Their union and triumph are reserved for Nicephorus Gregoras (l. vii c 9 [tom i p 262 ed Bonn]) who neither loves nor esteems these sectaries

28 Of the thirteen books of Pachymer the first six (as the fourth and fifth of Nicephorus Gregoras) contain the reign of Michael at the time of whose death he was forty years of age Instead of breaking like his editor the Père Poussin his history into two parts I follow Ducange and Cousin who number the thirteen books in one series

29 Ducange Hist de C. P l v c 33, etc. from the Epistles of Urban IV

30 From their mercantile intercourse with the Venetians and Genoese they branded the Latins as κάπηλοι and βάναυσοι (Pachymer l v c 10) Some are heretics in name others like the Latins in fact said the learned Veccus (l v c 12) who soon afterwards became a convert (c. 15 16) and a patriarch (c 24)

31 In this class we may place Pachymer himself whose copious and candid narrative occupies the fifth and sixth books of his history Yet the Greek is silent on the council of Lyons and seems to believe that the popes always resided in Rome and Italy (l v c 17 21)

32 See the acts of the council of Lyons in the year 1274 Fleury Hist Ecclésiastique tom xviii. p 181–199 Dupin Biblioth. Ecclés tom. x p 135.

33 This curious instruction which has been plained that in four years and four months a sum of 350,000 byzants of gold was due to him for the expenses of his household (Cantacuzen. l. i c. 48 (tom. i p 23, ed. Bonn]) Yet he would have remitted the debt, if he might have been allowed to squeeze the farmers of the re enue

10. I follow the chronology of Nicephorus Gregoras, who is remarkably exact. It is proved that Cantacuzene has mistaken the dates of his own actions, or rather that his text has been corrupted by ignorant transcribers

11 I have endeavoured to reconcile the 24,000 pieces of Cantacuzene (l. ii c. i) with the 10,000 of Nicephorus Gregoras (l. ix. c. 2) the one of whom wished to soften the other to magnify the hardships of the old emperor

12. See Nicephorus Gregoras (l ix. 6 7 8 10, 14 l. x. c. i) The historian had tasted of the prosperity and shared the retreat of his benefactor and that friendship which waits or to the scaffold or the cell should not lightly be accused as a hireling a prostitute to praise.

13. The sole reign of Andronicus the younger is described by Cantacuzene (l. ii. c. 1–40 p 191–339 [ed. Par]) and Nicephorus Gregoras (l. ix. c. 7–l. xi. c. 11 p 262–351)

14 Agnes, or Irene was the daughter of duke Henry the Wonderful, the chief of the house of Brunswick, and the fourth in descent from the famous Henry the Lion, duke of Saxony and Bavaria, and conqueror of the Slavi on the Baltic coast. Her brother Henry was surnamed the Greek from his two journeys into the East but these journeys were subsequent to his sister s marriage and I am ignorant how Agnes was discovered in the heart of Germany and recommended to the Byzantine court (Rimius Memoirs of the House of Brunswick, p 126–137)

15. Henry the Wonderful was the founder of the branch of Grubenhagen extinct in the year 1596 (Rimius, p 287) He resided in the castle of Wolfenbuttel, and possessed no more than a sixth part of the allodial estates of Brunswick and Luneburg which the Guelph family had saved from the confiscation of their great fiefs. The frequent partitions among brothers had almost ruined the princely houses of Germany till that just but pernicious, law was slowly superseded by the right of primogeniture. The principality of Grubenhagen one of the last remains of the Hercynian forest is a woody mountainous, and barren tract. (Busching s Geography vol. vi. p 270–286 English translation)

16. The royal author of the Memoirs of Brandenburg will teach us how justly in a much later period the north of Germany deserved the epithets of poor and barbarous (Essai sur les Moeurs, etc.) In the year 1306 in the woods of Luneburg some wild people of the Vened race were allowed to bury alive their infirm and useless parents. (Rimius, p. 136)

17 The assertion of Tacitus, that Germany was destitute of the precious metals, must be taken even in his own time with some limitation (Germania c 5 Annal xi 20) According to Spener (Hist Germaniæ Pragmatica tom i p 351) Argentifodinæ in Hercyniis montibus, imperante Othone magno (A.D 968) primum apertæ largam etiam opes augendi dederunt copiam but Rimius (p 258, 259) defers till the year 1016 the discovery of the silver mines of Grubenhagen or the Upper Hartz which were productive in the beginning of the fourteenth century and which still yield a considerable revenue to the house of Brunswick.

18 Cantacuzene has given a most honourable testimony ἦν δ' ἐκ Γερμανῶν αὕτη θυγάτηρ δουκὸς ντὶ Μπρουζουὴκ (the modern Greeks employ the ντ for the δ and the μπ for the β and the whole will read in the Italian idiom di Brunzuic) τῶ παρ' αὐτοῖς ἐπιφανεστάτου, καὶ λαμπρότητι πάντας τοὺς ὁμοφύλους ὑπερβάλλοντος τοῦ γένους [l. i c. 10 tom i p 52 ed Bonn] The praise is just in itself and pleasing to an English ear

19. Anne, or Jane was one of the four daughters of Amedée the Great by a second marriage, and half sister of his successor Edward count of Savoy (Anderson s Tables p 650) See Cantacuzene (l. i c. 40–41)

20. That king if the fact be true must have been Charles the Fair who in five years (1321–1326) was married to three wives (Anderson, p 628) Anne of Savoy arrived at Constantinople in February 1326

21 The noble race of the Cantacuzeni (illustrious from the eleventh century in the Byzantine annals) was drawn from the Paladins of France, the heroes of those romances which in the thirteenth century were translated and read by the Greeks (Ducange Fam. Byzant p 258)

22 See Cantacuzene (l. iii. c. 24 30 36)

23 Saserna in Gaul, and Columella in Italy or Spain allow two yoke of oxen two drivers and six labourers for two hundred jugera (125 English acres) of arable land, and three more men must be added if there be much underwood (Columella de Re Rusticâ, l ii c. 13 p 441 edit. Gesner)

24. In this enumeration (l iii c. 30) the French translation of the president Cousin is blotted with three palpable and essential errors. 1 He omits the 1000 yoke of working oxen. 2 He interprets the πεντακόσιαι πρὸς δισχιλίαις by the number of fifteen hundred 3 He confounds myriads with chiliads, and gives Cantacuzene no more than 5000 hogs Put not your trust in translations!

25 See the regency and reign of John Cantacuzenus and the whole progress of the civil war in his own history (l iii c. 1–100 p 348–700 [ed. Par]) and in that of Nicephorus Gregoras (l xii. c. 1–l. xv c. 9, p 353 492)

26 He assumed the royal privilege of red shoes or buskins placed on his head a mitre of silk and gold subscribed his epistles with hyacinth or green ink and claimed for the new whatever Constantine had given to the ancient Rome (Canta-

Griegos Barcelona 1623 in quarto Madrid, 1777 in octavo) Don Francisco de Moncada Conde de Osona may imitate Cæsar or Sallust he may transcribe the Greek or Italian contemporaries but he never quotes his authorities, and I cannot discern any national records of the exploits of his countrymen

51 See the laborious history of Ducange whose accurate table of the French dynasties recapitulates the thirty five passages in which he mentions the dukes of Athens

52 He is twice mentioned by Villehardouin with honour (No 151 235) and under the first passage Ducange observes all that can be known of his person and family

53 From these Latin princes of the fourteenth century Boccace Chaucer and Shakspeare have borrowed their Theseus duke of Athens An ignorant age transfers its own language and manners to the most distant times

54 The same Constantine gave to Sicily a king, to Russia the magnus dapifer of the empire to Thebes the primicerius and these absurd fables are properly lashed by Ducange (ad Nicephor Greg l vii c 5) By the Latins the lord of Thebes was styled by corruption the Megas Kurios or Grand Sire!

55 Quodam miraculo says Alberic He was probably received by Michael Choniates the archbishop who had defended Athens against the tyrant Leo Sgurus (Nicetas urbs capta p 805 ed Bek) Michael was the brother of the histori Nicetas and his encomium of Athens is still exta in MS in the Bodleian library (Fabric. Biblio Græc tom vi p 405)

56 The modern account of Athens and t Athenians is extracted from Spon (Voyage Grèce tom ii p 79–199) and Wheeler (Trav into Greece p 337–414), Stuart (Antiquities Athens passim) and Chandler (Travels in Greece p 23–172) The first of these travelle visited Greece in the year 1676 the last 1765 a ninety years had not produced much difference the tranquil scene

57 The ancients or at least the Athenians b lieved that all the bees in the world had been pro agated from Mount Hymettus They taught th health might be preserved and life prolonged b the external use of oil and the internal use of hon (Geoponica l xv c 7 p 1089–1094 edit Niclas

58 Ducange Glossar Græc Præfat p 8 wh quotes for his author Theodosius Zygomalas modern grammarian Yet Spon (tom ii p 19 and Wheeler (p 355) no incompetent judge entertain a more favourable opinion of the Att dialect

59 Yet we must not accuse them of corruptin the name of Athens which they still call Athin From the εἰς τὴν Ἀθήνην we have formed ou own barbarism of Setines

Chapter LXIII

1 Andronicus himself will justify our freedom in the invective (Nicephorus Gregoras l i c i) which he pronounced against historic falsehood It is true that his censure is more pointedly urged against calumny than against adulation

2 For the anathema in the pigeon s nest see Pachymer (l ix c 24 [tom ii p 249 ed Bonn]) who relates the general history of Athanasius (l viii c 13–16 20–24 l x c 27–29 31–36 l xi c 1–3 5 6 l xiii c 8 10 23 35) and is followed by Nicephorus Gregoras (l vi c 5 7 l vii c 1, 9) who includes the second retreat of this second Chrysostom

3 Pachymer in seven books 377 folio pages describes the first twenty six years of Andronicus the Elder and marks the date of his composition by the current news or lie of the day (A D 1308) Either death or disgust prevented him from resuming the pen

4 After an interval of twelve years from the conclusion of Pachymer Cantacuzenus takes up the pen and his first book (c 1–59 p 9–150 [ed Ven]) relates the civil war and the eight last years of the elder Andronicus The ingenious comparison with Moses and Cæsar is fancied by his French translator, the president Cousin

5 Nicephorus Gregoras more briefly includes the entire life and reign of Andronicus the Elde (l vi c 1—l x c 1 p 96–291) This is the par of which Cantacuzene complains as a false an malicious representation of his conduct

6 He was crowned May 21st 1295 and die October 12th 1320 (Ducange Fam Byz p 239) His brother Theodore by a second marriage, in herited the marquisate of Montferrat apostatise to the religion and manners of the Latins (ὅτι κα γνώμῃ καὶ πίστει καὶ σχήματι αἱ γενείων κουρᾷ κα πᾶσιν ἔθεσιν Λατῖνος ἦν ἀκραιφνής Nic Greg l ix c 1) and founded a dynasty of Italian princes which was extinguished A D 1533 (Ducange Fam Byz p 249–253)

7 We are indebted to Nicephorus Gregoras (l viii c 1) for the knowledge of this tragic adventure while Cantacuzene more discreetly conceals the vices of Andronicus the Younger of which he was the witness and perhaps the associate (l i c. 1, etc)

8 His destined heir was Michael Catharus the bastard of Constantine his second son In this project of excluding his grandson Andronicus Nicephorus Gregoras (l viii c 3 [6?]) agrees with Cantacuzene (l i c i 2)

9 See Nicephorus Gregoras l viii c 6 [tom i p 317 ed Bonn] The younger Andronicus com

was assured at Caffa that these fishes were some times twenty four or twenty-six feet long weighed eight or nine hundred pounds, and yielded three or four quintals of caviar The corn of the Bosphorus had supplied the Athenians in the time of Demosthenes.

De Guignes, Hist. des Huns, tom iii. p 343
Viaggi di Ramusiol tom. i. fol. 400. But this or water carriage could only be practicable Tartary was united under a wise and powerful monarch.

Nic. Gregoras (l. xiii. c. 12) is judicious and informed on the trade and colonies of the Black Sea. Chardin describes the present ruins of Caffa, where, in forty days, he saw above 400 sail employed in the corn and fish trade (Voyages en Perse, tom. i. p 46 48)

49 See Nic. Gregoras, l. xvii. c. 1

50 The events of this war are related by Cantacuzene (l. iv c. 11) with obscurity and confusion and by Nic. Gregoras (l. xvii. c. 1–7) in a clear and honest narrative. The priest was less responsible than the prince for the defeat of the fleet.

51 This second war is darkly told by Cantacuzene (l. iv c. 18 24, 25, 28–32) who wishes to disguise what he dares not deny I regret this part of Nic. Gregoras which is still in MS at Paris.

52 Muratori (Annali d Italia tom. xii p 144) refers to the most ancient Chronicles of Venice (Caresinus the continuator of Andrew Dandulus, tom. xii. p 421 422) and Genoa (George Stella, Annales Genuenses tom. xvii. p 1091 1092) both which I have diligently consulted in his great Collection of the Historians of Italy

53 See the Chronicle of Matteo Villani of Florence l ii c. 59 60 p 145–147 c 74 75 p 156, 157 in Muratori s Collection tom xiv

54 The Abbé de Sade (Mémoires sur la Vie de Pétrarque, tom. iii. p 257–263) translates this letter which he had copied from a MS in the king of France s library Though a servant of the duke of Milan Petrarch pours forth his astonishment and grief at the defeat and despair of the Genoese in the following year (p 323–332)

Chapter LXIV

1 The reader is invited to review chapters xxii. to xxvi. and xxxiii. to xxxviii. the manners of pastoral nations, the conquests of Attila and the Huns, which were composed at a time when I entertained the wish, rather than the hope, of concluding my history

2 The khans of the Keraites were most probably incapable of reading the pompous epistles composed in their name by the Nestorian missionaries, who endowed them with the fabulous wonders of an Indian kingdom Perhaps these Tartars (the Presbyter or Priest John) had submitted to the rites of baptism and ordination (Asseman. B blioth. Orient tom. iii. p ii p 487–503)

3 Since the history and tragedy of Voltaire, Gengis at least in French seems to be the more fashionable spelling but Abulghazi Khan must have known the true name of his ancestor His etymology appears just Zin, in the Mogul tongue, signifies great and gis is the superlative termination (Hist. Généalogique des Tatars part iii. p 194, 195) From the same idea of magnitude the appellation of Zingis is bestowed on the ocean.

4 The name of Moguls has prevailed among the Orientals and still adheres to the titular sovereign, the Great Mogul of Hindostan

5 The Tartars (more properly Tatars) were descended from Tatar Khan the brother of Mogul Khan (see Abulghazi parts i. and ii.) and once formed a horde of 70 000 families on the borders of Kitay (p 103–112) In the great invasion of Europe (A D 1238) they seem to have led the van guard and the similitude of the name of Tartarei recommended that of Tartars to the Latins (Matt. Paris, p. 398 [p 546 ed. Lond. 1640] etc.)

6 A singular conformity may be found between the religious laws of Zingis Khan and of Mr Locke (Constitutions of Carolina in his works, vol. iv p. 535 4to edition 1777)

7 In the year 1294, by the command of Cazan khan of Persia the fourth in descent from Zingis. From these traditions his vizir Fadlallah composed a Mogul history in the Persian language which has been used by Petit de la Croix (Hist de Genghizcan p 537–539) The Histoire Généalogique des Tatars (à Leyde 1726 in 12mo 2 tomes) was translated by the Swedish prisoners in Siberia from the Mogul MS of Abulgasi Bahadur Khan, a descendant of Zingis who reigned over the Usbeks of Charasm or Carizme (A.D 1644–1663) He is of most value and credit for the names pedigrees, and manners of his nation. Of his nine parts, the first descends from Adam to Mogul Khan the second from Mogul to Zingis the third is the life of Zingis the fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh the general history of his four sons and their posterity the eighth and ninth, the particular history of the descendants of Sheibani Khan who reigned in Maurenahar and Charasm. 27 Nic Gregoras (l XII c 5) confesses the innocence and virtues of Cantacuzenus, the guilt and flagitious vices of Apocaucus nor does he dissemble the motive of his personal and religious enmity to the former νυν δὲ διὰ κακίαν ἄλλων αἴτιος ὁ πρᾳότατος της των ὅλων εδοξεν εἶναι φθορας [tom II p 590 ed Bonn]

28 The princes of Servia (Ducange, Famil Dalmaticæ etc c 2 3 4 9) were styled Despots in Greek and Cral in their native idiom (Ducange, Gloss Græc p 751) That title the equivalent of king appears to be of Sclavonic origin, from whence it has been borrowed by the Hungarians the modern Greeks and even by the Turks (Leunclavius Pandect Turc. p 422) who reserve the name of Padishah for the emperor To obtain the latter instead of the former is the ambition of the French at Constantinople (Avertissement à l Histoire de Timur Bec p 39)

29 Nic Gregoras l XII c 14 [tom II p 622 ed Bonn] It is surprising that Cantacuzene has not inserted this just and lively image in his own writings

30 The two avengers were both Palæologi who might resent, with royal indignation the shame of their chains The tragedy of Apocaucus may deserve a peculiar reference to Cantacuzene (l III c 88) and Nic Gregoras (l XIV c 10)

31 Cantacuzene accuses the patriarch and spares the empress the mother of his sovereign (l III 33 34) against whom Nic Gregoras expresses a particular animosity (l XIV 10, 11 XV 5) It is true that they do not speak exactly of the same time

32 The traitor and treason are revealed by Nic. Gregoras (l XV c 8) but the name is more discreetly suppressed by his great accomplice (Cantacuzen l III c 99)

33 Nic Greg l XV 11 [tom II p 788 ed Bonn] There were however some true pearls but very thinly sprinkled The rest of the stones had only παντοδαπὴν χροιὰν πρὸς τὸ διαυγές

34 From his return to Constantinople, Cantacuzene continues his history and that of the empire one year beyond the abdication of his son Matthew A D 1357 (l IV c 1–50 p 705–911) Nicephorus Gregoras ends with the synod of Constantinople in the year 1351 (l XXII c 3 p 660 the rest to the conclusion of the twenty fourth book p 717 is all controversy) and his fourteen last books are still MSS in the king of France s library

35 The emperor (Cantacuzen l IV c 1) represents his own virtues and Nic Gregoras (l XV c. 11) the complaints of his friends who suffered by its effects I have lent them the words of our poor cavaliers after the Restoration

36 The awkward apology of Cantacuzene (l. IV c 39–41) who relates with visible confusion, his own downfall may be supplied by the less accurate but more honest narratives of Matthew Villani (l IV c. 46 in the Script Rerum Ital. to XIV p 268) and Ducas (c 10, 11)

37 Cantacuzene in the year 1375 was ho oured with a letter from the pope (Fleury Hi Ecclés tom XX p 250) His death is placed by respectable authority on the 20th of Novembe 1411 (Ducange Fam Byzant p 260) But if l were of the age of his companion Andronicus tl Younger he must have lived 116 years—a ra instance of longevity which in so illustrious a pe son would have attracted universal notice

38 His four discourses or books were print at Basil 1543 (Fabric Biblioth Græc. tom VI. 473) He composed them to satisfy a proselyte wh was assaulted with letters from his friends of Isp han Cantacuzene had read the Koran but understand from Maracci that he adopts the vulga prejudices and fables against Mohammed and h religion

Gregoræ) from the unpublished books and Fabricius (Biblioth Græc tom X p 462–473) or rather Montfaucon from the MSS of the Coislin library have added some facts and documents

43 Pachymer (l V c 10 [tom I p 366, ed. Bonn]) very properly explains λιζίους (ligios) by ἰδίους The use of these words in the Greek and Latin of the feudal times may be amply understood from the Glossaries of Ducange (Græc. p. 811 812 Latin tom IV p 109–111)

44. The establishment and progress of the Genoese at Pera or Galata is described by Ducange (C. P Christiana l I p 68 69) from the Byzantine historians Pachymer (l II c 35 l V 10 30 l IX. 15 l XII 6 9) Nicephorus Gregoras (l. V c 4 l VI c 11 l IX c 5 l XI c 1 l XV c. 1 6) and Cantacuzene (l I c 12 l II c 29 etc)

45 Both Pachymer (l III c 3 4 5) and Nic. Greg (l IV c 7) understand and deplore the effects of this dangerous indulgence Bibars sultan of Egypt himself a Tartar but a devout Musulman obtained from the children of Zingis the permission to build a stately mosque in the capital of Crimea (De Guignes Hist des Huns tom III p. 343)

46 Chardin (Voyages en Perse, tom. I. p 48)

25 The Ismaelians of Syria 40 000 Assassins had acquired or founded ten castles in the hills above Tortosa. About the year 1280 they were ex tirpated by the Mamalukes.

26 As a proof of the ignorance of the Chinese in foreign transact ons I must observe that some of their historians extend the conquests of Z ngis him self to Medina, the country of Mohammed (Gau bil, p. 42)

27 The Dashte Kipzak or plain of Kipzak ex tends on either side of the Volga in a boundless space towards the Jaik and Borysthenes and is supposed to contain the primit e name and na tion of the Cosacks.

28 In the year 1238 the inhab tants of Gothia (Sweden) and Frise were prevented by their fear of the Tartars, from sending as usual their ships to the herring fishery on the coast of England and, as there was no exportat on, forty or fifty of these fish were sold for a shilling (Matthew Paris, p. 396) It is whimsical enough that the orders of a Mogul khan, who re gned on the borders of Ch na, should ha e lowered the pr ce of herrings in the English market

38 Pachymer g ves a splend d character of Ca zan Khan the rival of Cyrus and Alexander (l. xii c 1) In the conclus on of his history (l. x i c 36 c 1) [tom. ii p 651 ed Bonn]) he hopes much from the arrival of 30 000 Tochars or Tartars who were ordered by the successor of Cazan to restrain the Turks of B thyn a A.D 1308.

39. The or g n of the Ottoman dynasty is illus trated by the critical learning of MM de Gu gnes (Hist des Huns tom. iv p 329–337) and D'An ville (Empire Turc, p 14–22) two inhab tants of Paris, from whom the Orientals may learn the history and geography of their own country

40 See Pachymer l. x. c. 25, 26 l xiii. c. 33 34, 36 and concerning the guard of the moun tains l. i c 3–6 Nicephorus Gregoras l. vii. c. 1 and the first book of Laonicus Chalcocondyles the Athenian.

41 I am gnorant whether the Turks have any writers older than Mohammed II nor can I reach beyond a meagre chron cle (Annales Turc ci ad Annum 1550) translated by John Gaud er and published by Leunclavius (ad calcem Laon c. Chalcocond p 311–350) with cop ous pandects or commentaries. The History of the Growth and Decay (A.D 1300–1683) of the Othman Emp re was translated nto English from the Latin MS of Demetr us Cantemir prince of Moldavia (Lon don 1734 n fol o) The author is gu lty of strange blunders n Oriental history but he was con er sant w th the language the annals and inst tut ons of the Turks Cantemir partly draws his materials from the Synopsis of Saad Effendi of Larissa ded icated in the year 1696 to sultan Mustapha and a valuable abridgment of the original historians In one of the Ramblers Dr Johnson praises Knolles (A General History of the Turks to the present Year London 1603) as the first of histor ans un happy only in the cho ce of his subject Yet I much doubt whether a part al and verbose compilation from Latin writers thirteen hundred folio pages of speeches and battles can either instruct or of ten years labour, chiefly drawn from the Persian writers among whom Nisavi the secretary of sultan Gelaleddin has the merit and prejudices of a contemporary A slight air of romance is the fault of the originals or the compiler See likewise the articles of Genghizcan Mohammed Gelaleddin, etc in the Bibliothèque Orientale of D Herbelot

10 Haithonus or Aithonus an Armenian prince and afterwards a monk of Premontre (Fabric. Biblioth, Lat medii Ævi tom i p 34) dictated in the French language his book de Tartaris, his old fellow soldiers It was immediately translated into Latin and is inserted in the Novus Orbis of Simon Grynæus (Basil 1555 in folio)

11 Zingis Khan and his first successors occupy the conclusion of the ninth Dynasty of Abulpharagius (vers Pocock, Oxon 1663 in 4to) and his tenth Dynasty is that of the Moguls of Persia Assemannus (Biblioth Orient tom ii) has extracted some facts from his Syriac writings and the lives of the Jacobite maphrians or primates of the East

12 Among the Arabians in language and religion we may distinguish Abulfeda sultan of Hamah in Syria who fought in person under the Mameluke standard against the Moguls

13 Nicephorus Gregoras (l ii c 5 6) has felt the necessity of connecting the Scythian and Byzantine histories He describes with truth and elegance the settlement and manners of the Moguls of Persia but he is ignorant of their origin and corrupts the names of Zingis and his sons

14 M Levesque (Histoire de Russie tom ii) has described the conquest of Russia by the Tartars from the patriarch Nicon and the old chronicles

15 For Poland I am content with the Sarmatia Asiatica et Europæa of Matthew à Michou or De Michoviâ a canon and physician of Cracow (A D 1506) inserted in the Novus Orbis of Grynæus Fabric Biblioth Latin mediæ et infimæ Ætatis tom v p 56

16 I should quote Thuroczius the oldest general historian (tom i c 74 p 150), in the first volume of the Scriptores Rerum Hungaricarum did not the same volume contain the original narrative of a contemporary an eye witness and a sufferer (M Rogerii Hungari Varadiensis Capituli Canonici Carmen miserabile seu Historia super Destructione Regni Hungariæ Temporibus Belæ IV Regis per Tartaros facta p 292–321) the best picture that I have ever seen of all the circumstances of a barbaric invasion

17 Matthew Paris has represented from authentic documents the danger and distress of Europe (consult the word Tartari in his copious Index) From motives of zeal and curiosity the court of the great khan in the thirteenth century was visited by two friars John de Plano Carpini and William Rubruquis and by Marco Polo a Venetian gentleman The Latin relations of the two former are inserted in the first volume of Hakluyt, the Italian original or version of the third (Fabric Biblioth Latin medii Ævi tom ii p 198 tom v p 25) may be found in the second tome of Ramusio

18 In his great History of the Huns M de Guignes has most amply treated of Zingis Khan and his successors See tom iii l xv–xix and in the collateral articles of the Seljukians of Roum tom ii l xi the Carizmians l xiv and the Mamalukes tom iv l xxi consult likewise the tables of the first volume. He is ever learned and accurate yet I am only indebted to him for a general view, and some passages of Abulfeda which are still latent in the Arabic text

19 More properly Yen king, an ancient city whose ruins still appear some furlongs to the south east of the modern Pekin which was built by Cublai Khan (Gaubil p 146) Pe king and Nan king are vague titles the courts of the north and of the south The identity and change of names perplex the most skilful readers of the Chinese geography (p 177)

20 M de Voltaire Essai sur l Histoire Générale tom iii c 60 p 8 His account of Zingis and the Moguls contains as usual much general sense and truth with some particular errors

21 Zagatai gave his name to his dominions of Maurenahar or Transoxiana and the Moguls of Hindostan who emigrated from that country, are styled Zagatais by the Persians This certain etymology and the similar example of Uzbek Nogai etc may warn us not absolutely to reject the derivations of a national from a personal, name.

22 In Marco Polo and the Oriental geographers the names of Cathay and Mangi distinguish the northern and southern empires which from A D 1234 to 1279, were those of the great khan and of the Chinese The search of Cathay after China had been found excited and misled our navigators of the sixteenth century in their attempts to discover the north east passage

23 I depend on the knowledge and fidelity of the Père Gaubil who translates the Chinese text of the annals of the Moguls or Yuen (p 71 93, 153) but I am ignorant at what time these annals were composed and published The two uncles of Marco Polo who served as engineers at the siege of Siengyangfou (l ii c 61 in Ramusio tom ii see Gaubil p 155 157) must have felt and related the effects of this destructive powder and their silence is a weighty and almost decisive objection I entertain a suspicion that the recent discovery was carried from Europe to China by the caravans of the fifteenth century and falsely adopted as an old national discovery before the arrival of the Portuguese and Jesuits in the sixteenth Yet the Père Gaubil affirms that the use of gunpowder has been known to the Chinese above 1600 years

24. All that can be known of the Assassins of Persia and Syria is poured from the copious, and even profuse erudition of M Falconet in two Memoires read before the Academy of Inscriptions (tom xvii p 127–170)

25 The Ismaelians of Syria 40 000 Assassins, had acquired or founded ten castles in the hills above Tortosa About the year 1280 they were ex tirpated by the Mamalukes.

26 As a proof of the ignorance of the Chinese in foreign transactions I must observe that some of their historians extend the conquests of *Zingis him*self to Medina, the country of Mohammed (Gau bil, p 42)

27 The Dasht Kipzak or plain of Kipzak extends on either side of the Volga in a boundless space towards the Jaik and Borysthenes and is supposed to contain the primitive name and nation of the Cosacks

28 In the year 1238 the inhabitants of Gothia (Sweden) and Frise were prevented by their fear of the Tartars, from sending as usual, their ships to the herring fishery on the coast of England and, as there was no exportation, forty or fifty of these fish were sold for a shilling (Matthew Paris, p 396) It is whimsical enough that the orders of a Mogul khan who reigned on the borders of China, should have lowered the price of herrings in the English market

29 I shall copy his characteristic or flattering epithets of the different countries of Europe Furens ac fervens ad arma Germania strenuæ militiæ genitrix et alumna Francia bellicosa et audax Hispania virtuosa viris et classe munita fertilis Anglia, impetuosis bellatoribus referta Alemannia navalis Dacia indomita Italia pacis ignara Burgundia, inquieta Apulia cum maris Græci, Adriatici et Tyrrheni insulis pyraticis et invictis Cretâ Cypro Siciliâ, cum Oceano conterminis insulis, et regionibus cruenta Hybernia cum agili Wallia palustris Scotia glacialis Norwegia suam electam militiam sub vexillo Crucis destinabunt etc. (Matthew Paris p 498)

30 See Carpin's relation in Hakluyt vol. i p 30. The pedigree of the khans of Siberia is given by Abulghazi (part iii p 485 495) Have the Russians found no Tartar chronicles at Tobolskoi?

31 The Map of D Anville and the Chinese Itineraries (De Guignes tom i part ii p 57) seem to mark the position of Holin or Caracorum about six hundred miles to the north west of Pekin. The distance between Selinginsky and Pekin is near 2000 Russian versts between 1300 and 1400 English miles (Bell's Travels vol. ii p 67)

32 Rubruquis found at Caracorum his countryman Guillaume Boucher orfèvre de Paris who had executed for the khan a silver tree supported by four lions, and ejecting four different liquors Abulghazi (part iv p 366) mentions the painters of Kitay or China

33 The attachment of the khans and the hatred of the mandarins to the bonzes and lamas (Duhalde, Hist de la Chine tom i p 502 503) seems to represent them as the priests of the same god of the Indian Fo whose worship prevails among the sects of Hindostan Siam Thibet China and Japan. But this mysterious subject is still lost in a cloud which the researches of our Asiatic Society may gradually dispel

34 Some repulse of the Moguls in Hungary (Matthew Paris p 545 546) might propagate and colour the report of the union and victory of the kings of the Franks on the confines of Bulgaria. Abulpharagius (Dynast p 310) after forty years beyond the Tigris might be easily deceived

35 See Pachymer l. iii. c. 25 and l ix c 26 27 and the false alarm at Nice l iii. c. 27 [c. 28, tom i p 244, ed Bonn] Nicephorus Gregoras l iv c. 6

36 G Acropolita p 36 37 Nic. Greg l. ii. c. 6 l iv c. 5

37 Abulpharagius who wrote in the year 1284, declares that the Moguls, since the fabulous defeat of Batou had not attacked either the Franks or Greeks and of this he is a competent witness Hayton likewise the Armeniac prince celebrates their friendship for himself and his nation

38 Pachymer gives a splendid character of Cazan Khan the rival of Cyrus and Alexander (l xii c. 1) In the conclusion of his history (l. xiii c. 36 [tom ii. p 651 ed Bonn]) he hopes much from the arrival of 30 000 Tochars or Tartars who were ordered by the successor of Cazan to restrain the Turks of Bithynia A D 1308

39. The origin of the Ottoman dynasty is illustrated by the critical learning of MM de Guignes (Hist des Huns, tom. iv p 329–337) and D Anville (Empire Turc, p 14–22) two inhabitants of Paris, from whom the Orientals may learn the history and geography of their own country

40. See Pachymer l x. c 25 26 l. xiii. c. 33 34 36 and concerning the guard of the mountains l. i c 3–6 Nicephorus Gregoras l. vii c i and the first book of Laonicus Chalcocondyles, the Athenian

41 I am ignorant whether the Turks have any writers older than Mohammed II nor can I reach beyond a meagre chronicle (Annales Turcici ad Annum 1550) translated by John Gaudier and published by Leunclavius (ad calcem Laonic. Chalcocond p 311–350) with copious pandects or commentaries. The History of the Growth and Decay (A D 1300–1683) of the Othman Empire was translated into English from the Latin MS of Demetrius Cantemir prince of Moldavia (London 1734 in folio) The author is guilty of strange blunders in Oriental history but he was conversant with the language the annals and institutions of the Turks. Cantemir partly draws his materials from the Synopsis of Saadi Effendi of Larissa dedicated in the year 1696 to sultan Mustapha and a valuable abridgment of the original historians In one of the Ramblers Dr Johnson praises Knolles (A General History of the Turks to the present Year London 1603) as the first of historians unhappy only in the choice of his subject Yet I much doubt whether a partial and verbose compilation from Latin writers thirteen hundred folio pages of speeches and battles can either instruct or amuse an enlightened age which requires from the historian some tincture of philosophy and criticism

42 Cantacuzene though he relates the battle and heroic flight of the younger Andronicus (l. ii c. 6 7 8) dissembles by his silence the loss of Prusa Nice and Nicomedia which are fairly confessed by Nicephorus Gregoras (l viii 15 ix 9, 13 xi 6) It appears that Nice was taken by Orchan in 1330 and Nicomedia in 1339 which are somewhat different from the Turkish dates

43 The partition of the Turkish emirs is extracted from two contemporaries the Greek Nicephorus Gregoras (l vii 1) and the Arabian Marakeschi (De Guignes, tom ii P ii p 76 77) See likewise the first book of Laonicus Chalcocondyles

44. Pachymer, l xiii c 13

45 See the Travels of Wheeler and Spon of Pocock and Chandler and more particularly Smith s Survey of the Seven Churches of Asia, p 205–276 The more pious antiquaries labour to reconcile the promises and threats of the author of the Revelations with the present state of the seven cities Perhaps it would be more prudent to confine his predictions to the characters and events of his own times

46 Consult the fourth book of the Histoire de l Ordre de Malthe par l Abbé de Vertot That pleasing writer betrays his ignorance in supposing that Othman a freebooter of the Bithynian hills, could besiege Rhodes by sea and land

47 Nicephorus Gregoras has expatiated with pleasure on this amiable character (l xii 7 xiii 4, 10 xiv 1 9 xvi 6) Cantacuzene speaks with honour and esteem of his ally (l iii c 56 57 63, 64 66 67 68 86 89 95 96) but he seems ignorant of his own sentimental passion for the Turk and indirectly denies the possibility of such unnatural friendship (l iv c 40 [tom iii p 297 ed. Bonn])

48 After the conquest of Smyrna by the Latins the defence of this fortress was imposed by Pope Gregory XI on the knights of Rhodes (see Vertot, l v)

49 See Cantacuzenus l iii c 95 [tom ii p 586, ed Bonn] Nicephorus Gregoras who, for the light of Mount Thabor brands the emperor with the names of tyrant and Herod excuses rather than blames this Turkish marriage, and alleges the passion and power of Orchan ἐγγύτατος καὶ τῇ δυνάμει τοὺς κατ' αὐτὸν ἤδη Περσικοὺς (Turkish) ὑπεραίρων Σατράπας (l xv 5) He afterwards celebrates his kingdom and armies See his reign in Cantemir p 24–30

50 The most lively and concise picture of this captivity may be found in the history of Ducas (c. 8 [p 32 ed Bonn]) who fairly describes what Cantacuzene confesses with a guilty blush!

51 In this passage, and the first conquests in Europe Cantemir (p 27, etc.) gives a miserable idea of his Turkish guides, nor am I much better satisfied with Chalcocondyles (l i. p 12, etc. [ed Par p 25 ed Bonn]) They forget to consult the most authentic record the fourth book of Cantacuzene I likewise regret the last books which are still manuscript of Nicephorus Gregoras

52 After the conclusion of Cantacuzene and Gregoras there follows a dark interval of a hundred years George Phranza Michael Ducas and Laonicus Chalcocondyles all three wrote after the taking of Constantinople

53 See Cantemir p 37–41 with his own large and curious annotations

54 White and black face are common and proverbial expressions of praise and reproach in the Turkish language Hic niger est hunc tu Romane caveto was likewise a Latin sentence.

55 See the life and death of Morad or Amurath I in Cantemir (p 33–45) the first book of Chalcocondyles and the Annales Turcici of Leunclavius According to another story the sultan was stabbed by a Croat in his tent and this accident was alleged to Busbequius (Epist. i. p 98) as an excuse for the unworthy precaution of pinioning, as it were between two attendants, an ambassador s arms when he is introduced to the royal presence

56 The reign of Bajazet I or Ilderim Bayazid, is contained in Cantemir (p 46) the second book of Chalcocondyles and the Annales Turcici The surname of Ilderim or lightning is an example that the conquerors and poets of every age have felt the truth of a system which derives the sublime from the principle of terror

57 Cantemir who celebrates the victories of the great Stephen over the Turks (p 47) had composed the ancient and modern state of his principality of Moldavia which has been long promised and is still unpublished

58 Leunclav Annal Turcici p 318 319 The venality of the cadhis has long been an object of scandal and satire and if we distrust the observations of our travellers we may consult the feeling of the Turks themselves (D Herbelot Biblioth Orientale p 216 217 229 230)

59. The fact which is attested by the Arabic history of Ben Schounah a contemporary Syrian (De Guignes Hist des Huns tom iv p 336) destroys the testimony of Saad Effendi and Cantemir (p 14 15) of the election of Othman to the dignity of sultan

60 See the Decades Rerum Hungaricarum (Dec iii l ii p 379) of Bonfinius an Italian who in the fifteenth century was invited into Hungary to compose an eloquent history of that kingdom Yet if it be extant and accessible I should give the preference to some homely chronicle of the time and country

61 I should not complain of the labour of this work if my materials were always derived from such books as the Chronicle of honest Froissard (vol iv c 67 69 72 74 79–83 85 87 89), who read little inquired much and believed all The original Mémoires of the Maréchal de Boucicault (partie i. c. 2–28) add some facts but they are dry and deficient, if compared with the pleasant garrulity of Froissard.

62. An accurate Memoir on the Life of Enguerrand VII Sire de Coucy has been given by the Baron de Zurlauben (Hist. de l Académie des Inscriptions, tom. xxv) His rank and possessions were equally considerable in France and England and, in 1375, he led an army of adventurers into Switzerland, to recover a large patrimony which he claimed in right of his grandmother the daughter of the emperor Albert I of Austria (Sinner Voyage dans la Suisse Occidentale, tom. i. p 118–124)

63. That military office, so respectable at present, was still more conspicuous when it was divided between two persons (Daniel Hist de la Milice Françoise, tom. ii. p 5) One of these the marshal of the crusade, was the famous Boucicault, who afterwards defended Constantinople, governed Genoa, invaded the coast of Asia and died in the field of Azincour

64. For this odious fact the Abbé de Vertot quotes the Hist Anonyme de St Denys, l. xvi c 10 11 (Ordre de Malthe tom ii p 310)

65. Sherefeddin Ali (Hist de Timour Bec, l v c. 13) allows Bajazet a round number of 12 000 officers and servants of the chase A part of his spoils was afterwards displayed in a hunting match of Timour —1 hounds with satin housings 2 leopards with collars set with jewels 3 Grecian greyhounds and 4, dogs from Europe as strong as African lions (idem l vi c. 15) Bajazet was particularly fond of flying his hawks at cranes (Chalcocondyles, l. ii. p 35 [p 67 ed Bonn])

66 For the reigns of John Palæologus and his son Manuel from 1354 to 1402 see Ducas, c. 9–15 Phranza l i c 16–21 and the first and second books of Chalcocondyles whose proper subject is drowned in a sea of episode.

67 Cantemir p 50–53 Of the Greeks, Ducas alone (c 13 15) acknowledges the Turkish cadhi at Constantinople Yet even Ducas dissembles the mosque

Chapter LXV

1 These journals were communicated to Sherefeddin, or Cherefeddin, Ali, a native of Yezd who composed in the Persian language a history of Timour Beg which has been translated into French by M. Petit de la Croix (Paris, 1722 in 4 vols. 12mo) and has always been my faithful guide His geography and chronology are wonderfully accurate and he may be trusted for public facts though he servilely praises the virtue and fortune of the hero. Timour's attention to procure intelligence from his own and foreign countries may be seen in the Institutions p 215 217 349 351

2. These Commentaries are yet unknown in Europe but Mr White gives some hope that they may be imported and translated by his friend Major Davy who had read in the East this minute and faithful narrative of an interesting and eventful period.

3. I am ignorant whether the original institution, in the Turki or Mogul language, be still extant The Persic version with an English translation, and most valuable index, was published (Oxford, 1783 in 4to) by the joint labours of Major Davy and Mr White the Arabic professor This work has been since translated from the Persic into French (Paris 1787) by M Langlès a learned Orientalist, who has added the Life of Timour and many curious notes

4. Shaw Allum, the present Mogul reads values but cannot imitate, the institutions of his great ancestor The English translator relies on their internal evidence but if any suspicion should arise of fraud and fiction, they will not be dispelled by Major Davy's letter The Orientals have never cultivated the art of criticism the patronage of a prince less honourable perhaps, is not less lucrative than that of a bookseller nor can it be deemed incredible that a Persian the real author should renounce the credit to raise the value and price of the work.

5 The original of the tale is found in the following work which is much esteemed for its florid elegance of style Ahmed's Arabsiadæ (Ahmed Ebn Arabshah) Vitæ et Rerum Gestarum Timuri Arabice et Latine Edidit Samuel Henricus Manger Franequeræ 1767 2 tom in 4to This Syrian author is ever a malicious and often an ignorant enemy the very titles of his chapters are injurious as how the wicked, as how the impious, as how the viper etc. The copious article of Timur in Bibliothèque Orientale, is of a mixed nature as D Herbelot indifferently draws his materials (p 877–888) from Khondemir Ebn Schounah and the Lebtarikh

6 Demir or Timour signifies in the Turkish language Iron and Beg is the appellation of a lord or prince. By the change of a letter or accent it is changed into Lenc or Lame and a European corruption confounds the two words in the name of Tamerlane

7 After relating some false and foolish tales of Timour Lenc Arabshah is compelled to speak truth and to own him for a kinsman of Zingis, per mulieres (as he peevishly adds) laqueos Satanæ (pars i c. i. p 25) The testimony of Abulghazi Khan (P ii. c 5 P v c. 4) is clear unquestionable, and decisive.

8 According to one of the pedigrees the fourth ancestor of Zingis and the ninth of Timour, were brothers and they agreed that the posterity of the elder should succeed to the dignity of khan and that the descendants of the younger should fill the office of their minister and general This tradition was at least convenient to justify the first steps of Timour s ambition (Institutions p 24 25 from the MS fragments of Timour s History)

9 See the preface of Sherefeddin and Abulfeda s Geography (Chorasmiæ etc, Descriptio p 60 61) in the third volume of Hudson s Minor Greek Geographers

10 See his nativity in Dr Hyde (Syntagma Dissertat tom ii p 466) as it was cast by the astrologers of his grandson Ulugh Beg He was born A D 1336 April 9 11 57 P M lat 36 I know not whether they can prove the great conjunction of the planets from whence like other conquerors and prophets Timour derived the surname of Saheb Keran or master of the conjunctions (Bibliot Orient p 878)

11 In the Institutions of Timour these subjects of the khan of Kashgar are most improperly styled Ouzbegs or Uzbeks a name which belongs to an other branch and country of Tartars (Abulghazi P v c v 5 P vii c 5) Could I be sure that this word is in the Turkish original I would boldly pronounce that the Institutions were framed a century after the death of Timour since the establishment of the Uzbeks in Transoxiana

12 The first book of Sherefeddin is employed on the private life of the hero and he himself or his secretary (Institutions p 3-77) enlarges with pleasure on the thirteen designs and enterprises which most truly constitute his personal merit It even shines through the dark colouring of Arabshah (P 1 c 1-12)

13 The conquests of Persia Tartary and India are represented in the second and third books of Sherefeddin and by Arabshah (c 13-55) Consult the excellent Indexes to the Institutions

14 The reverence of the Tartars for the mysterious number of nine is declared by Abulghazi Khan who for that reason divides his Genealogical History into nine parts

15 According to Arabshah (P 1 c 28 p 183) the coward Timour ran away to his tent and hid himself from the pursuit of Shah Mansour under the women s garments Perhaps Sherefeddin (l iii c 25) has magnified his courage

16 The history of Ormuz is not unlike that of Tyre The old city on the continent was destroyed by the Tartars and renewed in a neighbouring island without fresh water or vegetation The kings of Ormuz rich in the Indian trade and the pearl fishery possessed large territories both in Persia and Arabia but they were at first the tributaries of the sultans of Kerman and at last were delivered (A D 1505) by the Portuguese tyrants from the tyranny of their own vizirs (Marco Polo l i c 15 16 fol 7 8, Abulfeda Geograph tabul xi p 261, 262 an original Chronicle of Ormuz, in Texeira or Stevens History of Persia, p 376-416 and the Itineraries inserted in the first volume of Ramusio of Ludovico Barthema 1503 fol 167 of Andrea Corsali 1517, fol 202 203 and of Odoardo Barbessa in 1516 fol 315-318)

17 Arabshah had travelled into Kipzak and acquired a singular knowledge of the geography cities and revolutions of that northern region (P 1 c 45-49)

18 Institutions of Timour, p 123 125 Mr White the editor bestows some animadversion on the superficial account of Sherefeddin (l iii c 12 13 14), who was ignorant of the designs of Timour and the true springs of action

19 The furs of Russia are more credible than the ingots But the linen of Antioch has never been famous and Antioch was in ruins I suspect that it was some manufacture of Europe, which the Hanse merchants had imported by the way of Novogorod

20 M Levesque (Hist de Russie tom ii p 247 Vie de Timour p 64-67 before the French version of the Institutes) has corrected the error of Sherefeddin and marked the true limit of Timour s conquests His arguments are superfluous and a simple appeal to the Russian annals is sufficient to prove that Moscow which six years before had been taken by Toctamish escaped the arms of a more formidable invader

21 An Egyptian consul from Grand Cairo is mentioned in Barbaro s Voyage to Tana in 1436 after the city had been rebuilt (Ramusio, tom ii fol 92)

22 The sack of Azoph is described by Sherefeddin (l iii c 55) and much more particularly by the author of an Italian chronicle (Andreas de Redusiis de Quero in Chron Tarvisiano in Muratori Script Rerum Italicarum tom xix p 802-805) He had conversed with the Mianis two Venetian brothers one of whom had been sent a deputy to the camp of Timour and the other had lost at Azoph three sons and 12 000 ducats

23 Sherefeddin only says (l iii c 13) that the rays of the setting and those of the rising sun were scarcely separated by any interval a problem which may be solved in the latitude of Moscow (the 56th degree) with the aid of the Aurora Borealis and a long summer twilight But a day of forty days (Khondemir apud D Herbelot p 880) would rigorously confine us within the polar circle

24 For the Indian war see the Institutions (p 129-139) the fourth book of Sherefeddin and the history of Ferishta (in Dow vol ii p 1-20) which throws a general light on the affairs of Hindostan

25 The rivers of the Punjab the five eastern branches of the Indus have been laid down for the first time with truth and accuracy in Major Rennell s incomparable map of Hindostan In his Critical Memoir he illustrates with judgment and learning the marches of Alexander and Timour

26 The two great rivers the Ganges and Bur

rampooter rise in Thibet from the oppos te r dges of the same hills, separate from each other to the distan e of 200 miles, and af er a wind ng course of 2000 miles, again meet in one po nt near the gulf of Bengal. Yet so cap cious is Fame that the Burrampooter is a late disco ery wh le his brother Ganges has been the theme of anc ent and modern story Coupele, the scene of Timour s last ctory must be s ua e near Loldong 1100 m les from Calcutta and in 7 4 a Br tish camp! (Rennell s Memoir p 7 59, 90 9 99)

28. We ha e th ee cop es of these host le epistles in the Institu ions (p 147) in Sherefeddin (l v c. 4 and in Arabshah (tom. ii c. 19, p 183-201) which agree w th each o her n the spir t and substance ather than in the style. It is probable that they ha e been translated, w h var ous lat tude, from the Turkish or ginal in o the Arab c and Persian tongues.

29. The Mogul emir distinguishes himself and his countrymen by the name of Turks and st gma ises the ace and nation of Bajazet w th the less onourab e ep thet of Turkmans Yet I do not understand how the Ottomans could be descended from a Turkman sailor those inland shepherds ere so remo e from the sea and all mar time affairs.

30. According to the Koran (c. ii p 27 and Sale s Discourses, p 134) a Musulman who had thrice di orced his wife (who had thr ce repeated the words of a di orce) could not take her again till after he had been marr ed to and repudiated by another husband an gnom n ous transaction which is needless to a gra a e by supposing that the first husband must see her enjoyed by a second before his face (Rycaut s Sta e of the O toman Empire, l. ii. c. 2)

3 The common delicacy of the Or entals in never speaking of their women s ascr bed in a much higher degree by Arabshah to the Turkish nations, and it is remarkable enough that Chalcocond les (l ii. p 55 [p 103 ed. Bonn]) had some knowledge of the prejud ce and the insult

32. For the style of the Moguls see the Institutions p 3 4) and for the Pers ans the B bl otheq Orientale (p 882) but I do not find that the title of Cæsar has been applied by he Arab ans, or assumed by the O omans hemselves

33. See the eigns of Barkok and Faradge, n M de Guignes (tom. l. xxi) wl o from the Arabic texts of Aboulmahasen Ebn Schounah and Aintabi, has added some facts to our common stock of materials.

34. For these recent and domest c transact ons, Arabshah, though a par ial, is a cred ble w ness (tom. i. c. 64-68 tom. ii. c. 1 14) Timour n ust have been odious to a Syr an but the notor ety of facts would have obliged him in some measure, to respect his enemy and himself. His b tters may correct the luscious sweets of Sherefedd n (L v c 17-29)

35. These interest ng conversat ons appear to ha e been cop ed by Arabshah (tom i c. 68 p 625-645) fro n the cadhi and l istorian Ebn Schounah a p incipal actor Yet how could he be al e seventy f ve yea s afterwards (D Herbelot p 92)?

36 The ma ches and occupat ons of Timour between tl e Syr an and Otto nan wars are repre sented by Sherefedd n (L v c. 29-43) and Arabshah (tom i c. 15 18)

37 Th is number of 800 000 was extracted by Arabshah or rather by Ebn Schounah ex ratione o Timuri in the faith of a Carizmian officer (tom. i. c. 68 p 617) and t is remarkable enough that a Greek histor an (Phranza l i c. 29) adds no more tl an 20 000 men. Pogg us reckons 1 000 000 anotl er Latin contemporary (Chron Tarvisianum apud Muratori tom. xix p 800) 1 100 000 and the enormous sum of 1 600 000 is attested by a German sold er who was present at the battle of Angora (Leunclav ad Chalcocondyl l iii. p 82) T mour in h s Inst tut ons has not deigned to calculate his troops, l is subjects, or his revenues.

38. A wide lat tude of non-effect es was allowed by tl e Great Mogul for l is own pr de and the benefit of his officers. Bern er s patron was Penge Hazar commander of 5000 horse of which l e maintained no more than 500 (Voyages tom. 1 p 288 289)

39. T mour himself fixes at 400 000 men tl e Ottoman army (Inst tut ons, p 153) wl ch is reduced to 150,000 by Phranza (l i c. 29) and swelled by the German sold er to 1 400 000. It is evident that tl e Moguls were the more numerous.

40. It may not be useless to mark the distances between Angora and the ne ghbouring cit es by the journeys of the caravans, each of twenty or twenty f e miles to Smyrna twenty to K otah a ten to Boursa ten to Cæsarea eight to Sinope ten to N comedia n ne, to Constantinople twelve or thirteen (see Tournefort Voyage au Levant tom ii lettre xxi)

4 See the Systems of Tact cs in the Inst tutions which the English ed ors have illustrated w th elaborate plans (p 373 407)

42 The sultan himself (says Timour) must then put the foot of courage nto the stirrup of pat ence A Tartar metaphor wh ch is lost in the English but preserved in the French vers on of the Inst tutes (p 156 157)

43 The Greek fire, on Timour's s de is attested by Sherefeddin (l. v c 47) but Voltaire s strange susp c on that some cannon inscr bed w th strange characters must ha e been sent by that monarch to Delh is refuted by the un ersal s lence of con temporar es

44. Timour has dissembled th s secret and important nego iat on w th tl e Tartars wh ch is in disputably proved by the jo nt ev dence of the Arabian (tom. i. c 47 p 391) Turkish (Annal.

Leunclav p 321), and Persian historians (Khondemir apud D Herbelot p 882)

45 For the war of Anatolia or Roum I add some hints in the In titutions to the copious narratives of Sherefeddin (l v c 44–65) and Arabshah (tom ii c 20–35) On this part only of Timour s history it is lawful to quote the Turks (Cantemir, p 53–55 Annal Leunclav p 320–322) and the Greeks (Phranza l i c 29 Ducas c 15–17 Chalcocondyles l iii)

46 The scepticism of Voltaire (Essai sur l Histoire Générale c 88) is ready on this as on every occasion, to reject a popular tale and to diminish the magnitude of vice and virtue and on most occasions his incredulity is reasonable

47 See the History of Sherefeddin (l v c 49 52 53 59 60) This work was finished at Shiraz, in the year 1424 and dedicated to sultan Ibrahim, the son of Sharokh the son of Timour who reigned in Farsistan in his father s lifetime

48 After the perusal of Khondemir Ebn Schounah etc, the learned D Herbelot (Biblioth Orientale p 882) may affirm that this fable is not mentioned in the most authentic histories but his denial of the visible testimony of Arabshah leaves some room to suspect his accuracy

49 Et fut lui même (Bajazet) pris et mené en prison en laquelle mourut de dure mort! Mémoires de Boucicault P i c. 37 These memoirs were composed while the marshal was still governor of Genoa from whence he was expelled in the year 1409 by a popular insurrection (Muratori Annali d Italia, tom xii p 473 474)

50 The reader will find a satisfactory account of the life and writings of Poggius in the Poggiana an entertaining work of M Lenfant and in the Bibliotheca Latina mediæ et infimæ Ætatis of Fabricius (tom v p 305–308) Poggius was born in the year 1380 and died in 1459

51 The dialogue de Varietate Fortunæ (of which a complete and elegant edition has been published at Paris in 1723 in 4to) was composed a short time before the death of pope Martin V (p 5) and consequently about the end of the year 1430

53 The Chronicon Tarvisianum (in Muratori Script Rerum Italicarum tom xix p 800) and the Annales Estenses (tom xviii p 974) The two authors Andrea de Redusiis de Quero and James de Delayto were both contemporaries and both chancellors the one of Trevigi the other of Ferrara The evidence of the former is the most positive

64 Sherefeddin (l vi c 24) mentions the am[]bassadors of one of the most potent sovereigns o[f] Europe We know that it was Henry III king o[f] Castile and the curious relation of his two em[]bassies is still extant (Mariana Hist Hispan l xix c 11 tom ii p 329 330 Avertissement à l Hist de Timur Bec p 28 33) There appears likewise to have been some correspondence between th[e] Mogul emperor and the court of Charles VII king of France (Histoire de France par Velly et Villaret tom xii p 336)

65 See the translation of the Persian account of their embassy a curious and original piece (in the fourth part of the Relations de Thevenot) They presented the emperor of China with an old horse which Timour had formerly rode It was in the year 1419 that they departed from the court of Herat, to which place they returned in 1422 from Pekin.

66. From Arabshah tom. ii. c. 96. The bright or softer colours are borrowed from Sherefeddin, D'Herbelot, and the Institutions.

67. His new system was multiplied from 32 pieces and 64 squares to 56 pieces and 110 or 130 squares but, except in his court the old game has been thought sufficiently elaborate. The Mogul emperor was rather pleased than hurt with the victory of a subject a chess-player will feel the value of this encomium!

68. See Sherefeddin, l. v c. 15, 25. Arabshah (tom. ii. c. 96 p. 801 803) reproves the impiety of Timour and the Moguls who almost preferred to the koran the Yacsa or Law of Zingis (cui Deus maledicat) nor will he believe that Sharokh had abolished the use and authority of that pagan code.

69. Besides the bloody passages of this narrative I must refer to an anticipation in the first volume of the Decline and Fall which in a single note (p 832 note 25) accumulates near 300 000 heads of the monuments of his cruelty Except in Rowe's play on the fifth of November I did not expect to hear of Timour's amiable moderation (White's preface, p. 7) Yet I can excuse a generous enthusiasm in the reader and still more in the editor of the Institutions

70. Consult the last chapters of Sherefeddin and Arabshah, and M. de Guignes (Hist. des Huns, tom. iv l. xx.) Fraser's History of Nadir Shah (p 62) The story of Timour s descendants is imperfectly told and the second and third parts of Sherefeddin are unknown

71 Shah Allum, the present Mogul, is in the fourteenth degree from Timour by Miran Shah his third son. See the second volume of Dow's History of Hindostan.

72. The civil wars, from the death of Bajazet to that of Mustapha, are related according to the Turks, by Demetrius Cantemir (p 58–82) Of the Greeks, Chalcocondyles (l. iv and v) Phranza (l. i c. 30–32) and Ducas (c. 18–27) the last is the most copious and best informed.

73 Arabshah tom ii. c. 26 whose testimony on this occasion is weighty and valuable The existence of Isa (unknown to the Turks) is likewise confirmed by Sherefeddin (l. v c 57)

74. Arabshah, loc citat. Abulfeda, Geograph. tab. xvii. p 302 Busbequius, epist. i. p 96 97 in Itinere C. P et Amasiano

75. The virtues of Ibrahim are praised by a contemporary Greek (Ducas, c. 25) His descendants are the sole nobles in Turkey they content themselves with the administration of his pious foundations, are excused from public offices, and receive two annual visits from the sultan (Cantemir p 76)

76. See Pachymer (l. v c 29 [c. 30 tom. i. p. 420, ed. Bonn]) Nicephorus Gregoras (l. ii c. 1 [xv 7 vol. ii. p 766 ed Bonn]) Sherefeddin (l. v c. 57) and Ducas (c. 25) The last of these, a curious and careful observer is entitled from his birth and station to particular credit in all that concerns Ionia and the islands. Among the nations that resorted to New Phocæa he mentions the English (Ἰγγλῆνοι [p 161 ed Bonn]) an early evidence of Mediterranean trade

77 For the spirit of navigation and freedom of ancient Phocæa, or rather of the Phocæans, consult the first book of Herodotus and the Geographical Index of his last and learned French translator M Larcher (tom vii p 299)

78 Phocæa is not enumerated by Pliny (Hist. Nat. xxxv 52) among the places productive of alum he reckons Egypt as the first, and for the second the isle of Melos whose alum mines are described by Tournefort (tom. i lettre iv) a traveller and a naturalist. After the loss of Phocæa the Genoese in 1459 found that useful mineral in the isle of Ischia (Ismael. Bouillaud ad Ducam c. 25)

79. The writer who has the most abused this fabulous generosity is our ingenious Sir William Temple (his Works vol iii p 349, 350 octavo edition) that lover of exotic virtue. After the conquest of Russia etc. and the passage of the Danube his Tartar hero relieves visits, admires, and refuses the city of Constantine. His flattering pencil deviates in every line from the truth of history yet his pleasing fictions are more excusable than the gross errors of Cantemir

80. For the reigns of Manuel and John of Mohammed I and Amurath II see the Othman history of Cantemir (p 70–95) and the three Greeks, Chalcocondyles, Phranza, and Ducas, who is still superior to his rivals.

81 The Turkish asper (from the Greek ἄσπρος) is, or was a piece of white or silver money at present much debased but which was formerly equivalent to the fifty fourth part at least of a Venetian ducat or sequin and the 300 000 aspers a princely allowance or royal tribute, may be computed at £2500 sterling (Leunclav Pandect. Turc. p 406–408)

82 For the siege of Constantinople in 1422 see the particular and contemporary narrative of John Cananus, published by Leo Allatius at the end of his edition of Acropolita (p 188–199)

83. Cantemir p 80. Cananus, who describes Seid Bechar without naming him, supposes that the friend of Mohammed assumed in his amours the privilege of a prophet and that the fairest of the Greek nuns were promised to the saint and his disciples

84. For this miraculous apparition Cananus appeals to the Musulman saint but who will bear testimony for Seid Bechar?

85. See Rycaut (l i. c. 13) The Turkish sultans assume the title of khan Yet Abulghazi is ignorant of his Ottoman cousins

86 The third grand vizir of the name of Kiuperli, who was slain at the battle of Salankanen in 1691 (Cantemir p 382) presumed to say that all the successors of Soliman had been fools or tyrants, and that it was time to abolish the race (Marsigli Stato Militare etc p 28) This political heretic was a good Whig and justified against the French embassador the revolution of England (Mignot, Hist des Ottomans tom iii p 434) His presumption condemns the singular exception of continuing offices in the same family

87 Chalcocondyles (l v) and Ducas (c 23) exhibit the rude lineaments of the Ottoman policy, and the transmutation of Christian children into Turkish soldiers

88 This sketch of the Turkish education and discipline is chiefly borrowed from Rycaut s State of the Ottoman Empire the Stato Militare del Imperio Ottomanno of Count Marsigli (in Haya 1732 in folio) and a Description of the Seraglio, approved by Mr Greaves himself a curious traveller and inserted in the second volume of his works

89 From the series of 115 vizirs till the siege of Vienna (Marsigli p 13) their place may be valued at three years and a half purchase

90 See the entertaining and judicious letters of Busbequius

91 The first and second volumes of Dr Watson s Chemical Essays contain two valuable discourses on the discovery and composition of gun powder

92 On this subject modern testimonies cannot be trusted The original passages are collected by Ducange (Gloss Latin tom i p 675 Bombarda) But in the early doubtful twilight the name sound fire and effect that seem to express our artillery may be fairly interpreted of the old engines and the Greek fire For the English cannon at Crecy the authority of John Villani (Chron l xii c 65) must be weighed against the silence of Froissard Yet Muratori (Antiquit Italiæ medii Ævi tom ii Dissert xxvi p 514 515) has produced a decisive passage from Petrarch (De Remediis utriusque Fortunæ Dialog) who before the year 1344 execrates this terrestrial thunder, nuper rara nunc communis

93 The Turkish cannon which Ducas (c 30 [p 211 ed Bonn]) first introduces before Belgrade (A D 1436) is mentioned by Chalcocondyles (l v p 123 [p 231, ed Bonn]) in 1422 at the siege of Constantinople

Chapter LXVI

1 This curious instruction was transcribed (I believe) from the Vatican archives by Odoricus Raynaldus in his Continuation of the Annals of Baronius (Romæ 1646–1677 in ten volumes in folio) I have contented myself with the abbé Fleury (Hist Ecclésiastique tom xx p 1–8) whose abstracts I have always found to be clear accurate and impartial

2 The ambiguity of this title is happy or ingenious and moderator as synonymous to rector gubernator is a word of classical and even Ciceronian Latinity which may be found not in the Glossary of Ducange but in the Thesaurus of Robert Stephens

3 The first epistle (sine titulo) of Petrarch exposes the danger of the bark and the incapacity of the pilot Hæc inter vino madidus, ævo gravis ac soporifero rore perfusus jamjam nutitat dormitat jam somno præceps atque (utinam solus) ruit Heu quanto felicius patrio terram sulcasset aratro quam scalmum piscatorium ascendisset! This satire engages his biographer to weigh the virtues and vices of Benedict XII which have been exaggerated by Guelphs and Ghibelines by Papists and Protestants (see Mémoires sur la Vie de Pétrarque tom i p 259 ii not xv p 13–16) He gave occasion to the saying Bibamus papaliter

4 See the original Lives of Clement VI in Muratori (Script Rerum Italicarum tom iii P ii p 550–589) Matteo Villani (Chron l iii c 43 in Muratori tom xiv p 186) who styles him molto cavallaresco poco religioso Fleury (Hist Ecclés tom. xx p 126) and the Vie de Pétrarque (tom ii p 42–45) The abbé de Sade treats him with the most indulgence but he is a gentleman as well as a priest

5 Her name (most probably corrupted) was Zampea She had accompanied and alone remained with her mistress at Constantinople where her prudence erudition and politeness deserved the praises of the Greeks themselves (Cantacuzen l i c 42 [tom i p 205 ed Bonn])

6 See this whole negotiation in Cantacuzene (l iv c 9) who amidst the praises and virtues which he bestows on himself reveals the uneasiness of a guilty conscience

7 See this ignominious treaty in Fleury (Hist Ecclés p 151–154) from Raynaldus who drew it from the Vatican archives It was not worth the trouble of a pious forgery

8 See the two first original Lives of Urban V (in Muratori Script Rerum Italicarum tom iii P ii p 623 635) and the Ecclesiastical Annals of Spondanus (tom i p 573 A D 1369 No 7) and Raynaldus (Fleury Hist Ecclés tom xx p 223 224) Yet from some variations I suspect the papal writers of slightly magnifying the genuflexions of Palæologus

9 Paullo minus quam si fuisset Imperator Romanorum Yet his title of Imperator Græcorum was no longer disputed (Vit Urban V p 623)

10 It was confined to the successors of Charlemagne and to them only on Christmas Day On all other festivals these Imperial deacons were content to serve the pope as he said mass, with the book and the corporal Yet the abbé de Sade gen

ously thinks that the merits of Charles IV might have entitled him, though not on the proper day (A.D. 1368, November 1) to the whole privilege. He seems to affix a just value on the privilege and the man (Vie de Pétrarque, tom. iii. p 735)

11 Through some Italian corruptions the ety mology of Falcone in bosco (Matteo [Filippo] Villani, l. xi. c. 79, in Muratori tom. xiv p 746) suggests the English word Hawkwood, the true name of our adventurous countryman (Thomas Walsingham, Hist Anglican. inter Scriptores Camdeni, p. 184) After two-and-twenty victories and one defeat he died, in 1394, general of the Florentines, and was buried with such honours as the republic has not paid to Dante or Petrarch Muratori, Annali d Italia, tom xii. p 212–371)

12. This torrent of English (by birth or service) overflowed from France into Italy after the peace of Bretigny in 1360. Yet the exclamation of Muratori (Annali, tom. xii. p 197) is rather true than civil "Ci mancava ancor questo che dopo essere lacerata l'Italia da tanti masnadieri Tedeschi Ungheri, venissero fin dall Inghilterra nuovi cani a finire di divorarla."

13. Chalcocondyles l. i. p. 25 26 [p 50 sq ed. Bonn]. The Greek supposes his journey to the king of France, which is sufficiently refuted by the silence of the national historians Nor am I much more inclined to believe that Palæologus departed from Italy valde bene consolatus et contentus (Vit. Urban V p. 623)

14. His return in 1370 and the coronation of Manuel, Sept. 25 1373 (Ducange, Fam. Byzant. p. 241) leaves some intermediate era for the conspiracy and punishment of Andronicus.

15. Mémoires de Boucicault P i. c. 35, 36

16 His journey into the west of Europe is slightly and I believe reluctantly noticed by Chalcocondyles (l. ii. p. 44–50 [p 84–97 ed Bonn]) and Ducas (c. 14)

17 Muratori, Annali d Italia, tom. xii. p 406 John Galeazzo was the first and most powerful duke of Milan. His connection with Bajazet is attested by Froissard, and he contributed to save and deliver the French captives of Nicopolis.

18. For the reception of Manuel at Paris, see Spondanus (Annal. Eccles. tom. i. p 676 677 A.D 1400, No 5) who quotes Juvenal des Ursins, and the monk of St. Denys and Villaret (Hist. de France, tom. xii. p 331–334) who quotes nobody according to the last fashion of the French writers.

19. A short note of Manuel in England is extracted by Dr Hody from a MS at Lambeth (de Græcis illustribus, p. 14) C. P Imperator diu variisque et horrendis Paganorum insultibus coarctatus, ut pro eisdem resistentiam triumphalem perquireret, Anglorum Regem visitare decrevit etc. Rex (says Walsingham, p. 364 [cum] nobili apparatû suscepit (ut decuit) tantum Heroa, duxitque Londonias, et per multos dies exhibuit gloriose, pro expensis hospitii sui solvens, et eum respiciens [dignis] tanto fastigio donativis. He repeats the same in his Upodigma Neustriæ (p 556)

20 Shakespeare begins and ends the play of Henry IV with that prince's vow of a crusade and his belief that he should die in Jerusalem

21 This fact is preserved in the Historia Politica A.D 1391–1478 published by Martin Crusius (Turco-Græcia p 1–43) The image of Christ, which the Greek emperor refused to worship was probably a work of sculpture.

22 The Greek and Turkish history of Laonicus Chalcocondyles ends with the winter of 1463 and the abrupt conclusion seems to mark that he laid down his pen in the same year We know that he was an Athenian, and that some contemporaries of the same name contributed to the revival of the Greek language in Italy But in his numerous digressions the modest historian has never introduced himself and his editor Leunclavius, as well as Fabricius (Biblioth. Græc. tom. vi p 474) seems ignorant of his life and character For his descriptions of Germany France, and England see l. ii. p. 36 37 44–50 [p. 70–72 83–96 ed. Bonn]

23 I shall not animadvert on the geographical errors of Chalcocondyles. In this instance he perhaps followed, and mistook, Herodotus (l. ii. c 33) whose text may be explained (Herodote de Larcher tom. ii. p. 219, 220) or whose ignorance may be excused Had these modern Greeks never read Strabo or any of their lesser geographers?

24. A citizen of new Rome, while new Rome survived, would have scorned to dignify the German Ῥήξ with the titles of Βασιλεὺς or Αὐτοκράτωρ Ῥωμαίων but all pride was extinct in the bosom of Chalcocondyles, and he describes the Byzantine prince and his subject by the proper though humble, names of Ἕλληνες and Βασιλεὺς Ἑλλήνων

25 Most of the old romances were translated in the fourteenth century into French prose, and soon became the favourite amusement of the knights and ladies in the court of Charles VI. If a Greek believed in the exploits of Rowland and Oliver he may surely be excused since the monks of St Denys the national historians, have inserted the fables of Archbishop Turpin in their Chronicles of France.

26. Λονδρων δὲ ἡ πόλις δυνάμει τε προέχουσα ... ἐν τῇ νήσῳ ταύτῃ πασῶν πόλεων ὄλβῳ τε καὶ τῇ ἄλλῃ εὐδαιμονίᾳ οὐδ μια τω πρὸς ἑσπέραν λειπομένη [l ii. p 93 ed. Bonn] Even since the time of Fitzstephen (the twelfth century) London appears to have maintained this pre eminence of wealth and magnitude and her gradual increase has, at least kept pace with the general improvement of Europe.

27 If the double sense of the verb Κύω (osculor and in utero gero) be equivocal the context and pious horror of Chalcocondyles can leave no doubt of his meaning and mistake (p 49 [p 93 ed Bonn])

28 Erasmus (Epist Fausto Andrelino) has a pretty passage on the English fashion of kissing strangers on their arrival and departure, from

whence however, he draws no scandalous inferences

29 Perhaps we may apply this remark to the community of wives among the old Britons as it is supposed by Cæsar (Bell Gall l v c 14) and Dion (Dion Cassius l lxii tom. ii [c. 6] p 1007), with Reimar's judicious annotation The Arreoy of Otaheite so certain at first is become less visible and scandalous in proportion as we have studied the manners of that gentle and amorous people

30 See Lenfant Hist du Concile de Constance, tom ii p 576 and for the ecclesiastical history of the times the Annals of Spondanus, the Bibliothèque of Dupin tom xii and twenty first and twenty second volumes of the History or rather the Continuation of Fleury

31 From his early youth George Phranza or Phranzes was employed in the service of the state and palace and Hanckius (de Script Byzant P i c 40) has collected his life from his own writings He was no more than four and twenty years of age at the death of Manuel who recommended him in the strongest terms to his successor Imprimis vero hunc Phranzen tibi commendo qui ministravit mihi fideliter et diligenter (Phranzes l ii c. 1 [p 125] ed Bonn]) Yet the emperor John was cold and he preferred the service of the despots of Peloponnesus

32 See Phranzes, l ii c 13 [p 178 ed Bonn] While so many manuscripts of the Greek original are extant in the libraries of Rome Milan the Escurial etc. it is a matter of shame and reproach that we should be reduced to the Latin version, or abstract of James Pontanus (ad calcem Theophylact Simocattæ Ingolstadt, 1604) so deficient in accuracy and elegance (Fabric Biblioth Græc. tom vi p 615–620)

33 See Ducange Fam Byzant p 243–248

34 The exact measure of the Hexamilion from sea to sea was 3800 orgyiæ or toises of six Greek feet (Phranzes l i c 35 [p 108 ed Bonn]) which would produce a Greek mile still smaller than that of 660 French toises which is assigned by D Anville as still in use in Turkey Five miles are commonly reckoned for the breadth of the isthmus See the Travels of Spon Wheeler and Chandler

35 The first objection of the Jews is on the death of Christ if it were voluntary Christ was a suicide which the emperor parries with a mystery They then dispute on the conception of the Virgin, the sense of the prophecies etc (Phranzes l. ii c 12 a whole chapter)

36 In the treatise delle Materie Beneficiarie of Fra Paolo (in the fourth volume of the last and best edition of his works) the papal system is deeply studied and freely described Should Rome and her religion be annihilated this golden volume may still survive a philosophical history and a salutary warning

37 Pope John XXII (in 1334) left behind him at Avignon eighteen millions of gold florins and the value of seven millions more in plate and jewels See the Chronicle of John Villani (L xi 20, in Muratori s Collection tom. xiii p. 7[illegible] whose brother received the account from the pa[illegible] treasurers. A treasure of six or eight millions s[illegible] ling in the fourteenth century is enormous, [illegible] almost incredible

38 A learned and liberal Protestant M L[illegible] fant has given a fair history of the councils of P[illegible] Constance, and Basil, in six volumes in qua[illegible] but the last part is the most hasty and imper[illegible] except in the account of the troubles of Bohem[illegible]

39 The original acts or minutes of the cou[illegible] of Basil are preserved in the public library [illegible] twelve volumes in folio Basil was a free city c[illegible] veniently situate on the Rhine, and guarded [illegible] the arms of the neighbouring and confeder[illegible] Swiss In 1459 the university was founded by p[illegible] Pius II (Æneas Sylvius) who had been secret[illegible] to the council But what is a council or a univers[illegible] to the presses of Froben and the studies of Erasm[illegible]

40 This Turkish embassy attested only [illegible] Crantzius is related with some doubt by the [illegible] nalist Spondanus, A D 1433 No 25 tom. i p 8[illegible]

41 Syropulus p 19 In this list the Greeks [illegible] pear to have exceeded the real numbers of [illegible] clergy and laity which afterwards attended [illegible] emperor and patriarch, but which are not clea[illegible] specified by the great ecclesiarch The 75,0[illegible] florins which they asked in this negotiation of [illegible] pope (p 9) were more than they could hope [illegible] want

42 I use indifferently the words ducat and flor[illegible] which derive their names, the former from [illegible] dukes of Milan, the latter from the republic [illegible] Florence These gold pieces the first that w[illegible] coined in Italy perhaps in the Latin world m[illegible] be compared in weight and value to one third [illegible] the English guinea

43 At the end of the Latin version of Phranz[illegible] we read a long Greek epistle or declamation [illegible] George of Trebizond who advises the emperor [illegible] prefer Eugenius and Italy He treats with co[illegible] tempt the schismatic assembly of Basil the ba[illegible] barians of Gaul and Germany who had conspir[illegible] to transport the chair of St Peter beyond the Alp[illegible] οἱ ἄθλιοι (says he) σε καὶ τὴν μετὰ σου σύνοδον [illegible] Ἡρακλείων στηλῶν καὶ πέρα Γαδήρων [illegible] Wa[illegible] Constantinople unprovided with a map?

44 Syropulus (p 26–31) attests his own indig[illegible] nation and that of his countrymen and the Bas[illegible] deputies who excused the rash declaration coul[illegible] neither deny nor alter an act of the council.

45 Condolmieri, the pope s nephew and ad[illegible] miral expressly declared, ὅτι ὁρισμὸν ἔχει παρὰ τ[illegible] Πάπα [illegible] πολεμήσῃ ὅπου ἂν εὕρῃ τὰ κάτεργα τ[illegible] Συνόδου καὶ εἰ δυνηθῇ καταδύσῃ καὶ ἀφανίσῃ Th[illegible] naval orders of the synod were less peremptor[illegible] and till the hostile squadrons appeared bot[illegible] parties tried to conceal their quarrel from th[illegible] Greeks

46 Syropulus mentions the hopes of Palæologu[illegible] (p 36) and the last advice of Sigismond (p. 57[illegible]

At Corfu the Greek emperor was informed of his friend's death had he known it sooner he would have returned home (p. 79)

47. Phranzes himself, though from different motives, was of the advice of Amurath (l. ii. c. 13) Utinam ne synodus ista unquam fuisset, si tantas offensiones et detrimenta paritura erat. This Turkish embassy is likewise mentioned by Syropulus (p. 58) and Amurath kept his word. He might threaten (p. 125, 219) but he never attacked the city

48. The reader will smile at the simplicity with which he imparted these hopes to his favourites τοιαύτην πληροφορίαν σχήσειν ἤλπιζε καὶ διὰ τοῦ Πάπα ἠθέλησε ἐλευθερῶσαι τὴν ἐκκλησίαν ἀπὸ τῆς ἀποτεθείσης αὐτοῦ δουλείας παρὰ τοῦ βασιλέως (p 92) Yet it would have been difficult for him to have practised the lessons of Gregory VII

49. The Christian name of Sylvester is borrowed from the Latin calendar In modern Greek πουλος, as a diminutive is added to the end of words nor can any reasoning of Creyghton the editor, excuse his changing into Sguropulus (Sguros, fuscus) the Syropulus of his own manuscript, whose name is subscribed with his own hand in the acts of the council of Florence. Why might not the author be of Syrian extraction?

50. From the conclusion of the history I should fix the date to the year 1444, four years after the synod, when the great ecclesiarch had abdicated his office (sectio xii. p. 330–350) His passions were cooled by time and retirement, and, although Syropulus is often partial, he is never intemperate.

51. Vera historia unionis non veræ inter Græcos et Latinos (Hagæ Comitis 1660, in folio) was first published with a loose and florid version, by Robert Creyghton, chaplain to Charles II in his exile. The zeal of the editor has prefixed a polemic title, for the beginning of the original is wanting Syropulus may be ranked with the best of the Byzantine writers for the merit of his narration, and even of his style but he is excluded from the orthodox collections of the councils.

52. Syropulus (p. 63) simply expresses his intention ἵν' οὕτω πομπάων ἐν Ἰταλοῖς μέγας βασιλεὺς παρ' ἐκείνων νομίζοιτο and the Latin of Creyghton may afford a specimen of his florid paraphrase. Ut pompâ circumductus noster Imperator Italiæ populis aliquis deauratus Jupiter crederetur aut Crœsus ex opulentâ Lydiâ.

53. Although I cannot stop to quote Syropulus for every fact, I will observe that the navigation of the Greeks from Constantinople to Venice and Ferrara is contained in the fourth section (p. 67–100) and that the historian has the uncommon talent of placing each scene before the reader's eye.

54. At the time of the synod Phranzes was in Peloponnesus but he received from the despot Demetrius a faithful account of the honourable reception of the emperor and patriarch both at Venice and Ferrara (Dux sedentem Imperatorem adorat) which are more slightly mentioned by the Latins (l. ii. c. 14, 15, 16)

55. The astonishment of a Greek prince and a French ambassador (Mémoires de Philippe de Comines, l. vii. c. 18) at the sight of Venice, abundantly proves that in the fifteenth century it was the first and most splendid of the Christian cities. For the spoils of Constantinople at Venice see Syropulus (p 87)

56. Nicholas III of Este reigned forty-eight years (A D 1393–1441) and was lord of Ferrara, Modena Reggio Parma, Rovigo and Commachio See his Life in Muratori (Antichità Estense tom ii. p 159–201)

57 The Latin vulgar was provoked to laughter at the strange dresses of the Greeks, and especially the length of their garments their sleeves, and their beards nor was the emperor distinguished, except by the purple colour and his diadem or tiara with a jewel on the top (Hody de Græcis Illustribus p. 31) Yet another spectator confesses that the Greek fashion was più grave e più degna than the Italian (Vespasiano in Vit. Eugen. IV. in Muratori tom xxv p. 261)

58 For the emperor's hunting see Syropulus (p. 143 144, 191) The pope had sent him eleven miserable hacks but he bought a strong and swift horse that came from Russia. The name of Janizaries may surprise but the name, rather than the institution had passed from the Ottoman to the Byzantine court and is often used in the last age of the empire.

59. The Greeks obtained, with much difficulty that instead of provisions, money should be distributed, four florins per month to the persons of honourable rank and three florins to their servants with an addition of thirty more to the emperor twenty five to the patriarch, and twenty to the prince, or despot, Demetrius The payment of the first month amounted to 691 florins, a sum which will not allow us to reckon above 200 Greeks of every condition (Syropulus, p. 104, 105) On the 20th October 1438 there was an arrear of four months in April 1439, of three and of five and a half in July at the time of the union (p 172 225, 271)

60 Syropulus (p 141 142 204, 221) deplores the imprisonment of the Greeks and the tyranny of the emperor and patriarch.

61 The wars of Italy are most clearly represented in the thirteenth volume of the Annals of Muratori. The schismatic Greek Syropulus (p 145) appears to have exaggerated the fear and disorder of the pope in his retreat from Ferrara to Florence, which is proved by the acts to have been somewhat more decent and deliberate

62 Syropulus is pleased to reckon seven hundred prelates in the council of Basil. The error is manifest and perhaps voluntary That extravagant number could not be supplied by all the ecclesiastics of every degree who were present at the council, nor by all the absent bishops of the West who expressly or tacitly might adhere to its decrees

29 Perhaps we may apply this remark to the community of wives among the old Britons as it is supposed by Cæsar (Bell Gall l v c 14) and Dion (Dion Cassius, l lxii tom. ii [c. 6] p 1007) with Reimar s judicious annotation The Arreoy of Otaheite so certain at first, is become less visible and scandalous in proportion as we have studied the manners of that gentle and amorous people

Nam viri aulici veterem sermonis dignitatem atque elegantiam retinebant in primisque ipsæ nobiles mulieres quibus cum nullum esset omnino cum viris peregrinis commercium merus ille ac purus Græcorum sermo servabatur intactus (Philelph. Epist. ad ann. 1451 apud Hodium, p 188, 189). He observes in another passage, uxor illa mea Theodora locutione erat admodum moderatâ et suavi et maxime Atticâ.

82. Philelphus, absurdly enough, derives this Greek or Oriental jealousy from the manners of ancient Rome.

83. See the state of learning in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries in the learned and judicious Mosheim (Institut. Hist. Eccles p 434–440, 490–494)

84. At the end of the fifteenth century there existed in Europe about fifty universities, and of these the foundation of ten or twelve is prior to the year 1300. They were crowded in proportion to their scarcity Bologna contained 10 000 students chiefly of the civil law In the year 1357 the number at Oxford had decreased from 30 000 to 6000 scholars (Henry's History of Great Britain, vol. iv p 478) Yet even this decrease is much superior to the present list of the members of the university

85. Of those writers who professedly treat of the restoration of the Greek learning in Italy the two principal are Hodius Dr Humphrey Hody (de Græcis Illustribus Linguæ Græcæ Literarumque humaniorum Instauratoribus Londini 1742 in large octavo) and Tiraboschi (Istoria della Letteratura Italiana, tom. v p 364–377 tom. vii. p 112–143) The Oxford professor is a laborious scholar but the librarian of Modena enjoys the superiority of a modern and national historian.

86. In Calabria quæ olim Magna Græcia dicebatur coloniis Græcis repleta, remansit quædam linguæ veteris cognitio (Hodius, p 2) If it were eradicated by the Romans, it was revived and perpetuated by the monks of St Basil, who possessed seven convents at Rossano alone (Giannone Istoria di Napoli, tom. i. p 520)

87 Ii Barbari (says Petrarch the French and Germans) vix, non dicam libros sed nomen Homeri audiverunt. Perhaps in that respect the thirteenth century was less happy than the age of Charlemagne.

88. See the character of Barlaam, in Boccace de Genealog Deorum, l. xv c. 6

89. Cantacuzen. l. ii, c. 36 [c. 39 tom i. p 543 ed. Bonn].

90. For the connection of Petrarch and Barlaam, and the two interviews at Avignon in 1339 and at Naples in 1342 see the excellent Mémoires sur la Vie de Pétrarque tom. i. p 406–410 tom. ii. p 75–77

91 The bishopric to which Barlaam retired was the old Locri, in the middle ages Scta. Cyriaca and by corruption Hieracium, Gerace (Dissert. Chorographica Italiæ medii Ævi p 312) The dives opum of the Norman times soon lapsed into poverty since even the church was poor yet the town still contains 3000 inhabitants (Swinburne p 340)

92 I will transcribe a passage from this epistle of Petrarch (Famil. ix. 2) Donasti Homerum non in alienum sermonem violento alveo derivatum sed ex ipsis Græci eloquii scatebris et qualis divino illi profluxit ingenio Sine tuâ voce Homerus tuus apud me mutus, immo vero ego apud illum surdus sum. Gaudeo tamen vel adspectû solo ac sæpe illum amplexus atque suspirans dico O magne vir etc.

93 For the life and writings of Boccace, who was born in 1313 and died in 1375, Fabricius (Biblioth Latin medii Ævi tom. i. p 248 etc.) and Tiraboschi (tom. v p 83 439–451) may be consulted The editions, versions imitations of his novels are innumerable Yet he was ashamed to communicate that trifling and perhaps scandalous, work to Petrarch his respectable friend in whose letters and memoirs he conspicuously appears.

94. Boccace indulges an honest vanity Ostentationis causâ Græca carmina adscripsi jure utor meo meum est hoc decus mea gloria scilicet inter Etruscos Græcis uti carminibus Nonne ego fui qui Leontium Pilatum, etc. (de Genealogiâ Deorum l. xv c. 7 a work which though now forgotten has run through thirteen or fourteen editions)

95. Leontius or Leo Pilatus, is sufficiently made known by Hody (p 2–11) and the abbé de Sade (Vie de Pétrarque tom iii p 625–634 670–673) who has very happily caught the lively and dramatic manner of his original.

96 Dr Hody (p 54) is angry with Leonard Aretin Guarinus, Paulus Jovius, etc. for affirming that the Greek letters were restored in Italy post septingentos annos as if says he they had flourished till the end of the seventh century These writers most probably reckoned from the last period of the exarchate and the presence of the Greek magistrates and troops at Ravenna and Rome must have preserved, in some degree, the use of their native tongue.

97 See the article of Emanuel or Manuel Chrysoloras in Hody (p 12–54) and Tiraboschi (tom. vii. p 113–118) The precise date of his arrival floats between the years 1390 and 1400 and is only confined by the reign of Boniface IX

98 The name of Aretinus has been assumed by five or six natives of Arezzo in Tuscany of whom the most famous and the most worthless lived in the sixteenth century Leonardus Brunus Aretinus the disciple of Chrysoloras was a linguist an orator and an historian the secretary of four successive popes, and the chancellor of the republic of Florence where he died A.D 1444, at the age of seventy five (Fabric. Biblioth medii Ævi tom i p 190 etc. Tiraboschi tom. vii p 33–38)

99. See the passage in Aretin Commentario

63 The Greeks who disliked the union were unwilling to sally from this strong fortress (p 178, 193 195, 202, of Syropulus) The shame of the Latins was aggravated by their producing an old MS of the second council of Nice, with filioque in the Nicene creed A palpable forgery! (p 173)

64 Ὡς ἔγω (said an eminent Greek) ὁτὰν εἰς νάον εἰσέλθω Λατίνων οὐ προσκύνω τινα των ἐκεισε ἁγίων, ἐπει οὐδε γνωρίζω τινα (Syropulus p 109) See the perplexity of the Greeks (p 217, 218, 252 253 273)

65 See the polite altercation of Mark and Bessarion in Syropulus (p 257) who never dissembles the vices of his own party, and fairly praises the virtues of the Latins

66 For the poverty of the Greek bishops, see a remarkable passage of Ducas (c 31 [p 216, ed Bonn]) One had possessed for his whole property, three old gowns etc By teaching one-and twenty years in his monastery Bessarion himself had collected forty gold florins but of these the archbishop had expended twenty eight in his voyage from Peloponnesus and the remainder at Constantinople (Syropulus p 127)

67 Syropulus denies that the Greeks received any money before they had subscribed the act of union (p 283) yet he relates some suspicious circumstances and their bribery and corruption are positively affirmed by the historian Ducas [loc cit]

68 The Greeks most piteously express their own fears of exile and perpetual slavery (Syropul p 196) and they were strongly moved by the emperor s threats (p 260)

69 I had forgot another popular and orthodox protester a favourite hound who usually lay quiet on the foot cloth of the emperor s throne but who barked most furiously while the act of union was reading without being silenced by the soothing or the lashes of the royal attendants (Syropul p 265, 266)

70 From the original Lives of the Popes in Muratori s Collection (tom iii P ii tom xxv) the manners of Eugenius IV appear to have been decent and even exemplary His situation exposed to the world and to his enemies, was a restraint, and is a pledge

71 Syropulus rather than subscribe would have assisted as the least evil at the ceremony of the union He was compelled to do both and the great ecclesiarch poorly excuses his submission to the emperor (p 290-292)

72 None of these original acts of union can at present be produced. Of the ten MSS that are preserved (five at Rome, and the remainder at Florence Bologna Venice Paris and London) nine have been examined by an accurate critic (M. de Brequigny) who condemns them for the variety and imperfections of the Greek signatures. Yet several of these may be esteemed as authentic copies, which were subscribed at Florence, before (26th of August, 1439) the final separation of the pope and emperor (Mémoires de l Académie des Inscriptions tom xliii p 287-311)

73 Ημιν δὲ ως ἀσήμοι ἐδόκουν φωναι (Syropul p 297)

74 In their return the Greeks conversed at Bologna with the ambassadors of England and after some questions and answers these impartial strangers laughed at the pretended union of Florence (Syropul p 307)

75 So nugatory or rather so fabulous are these reunions of the Nestorians Jacobites etc, that I have turned over, without success the Bibliotheca Orientalis of Assemannus a faithful slave of the Vatican

76 Ripaille is situate near Thonon, in Savoy on the southern side of the lake of Geneva It is now a Carthusian abbey and Mr Addison (Travels into Italy vol ii p 147, 148 of Baskerville's edition of his works) has celebrated the place and the founder Æneas Sylvius and the fathers of Basil applaud the austere life of the ducal hermit but the French and Italian proverbs most unluckily attest the popular opinion of his luxury

77 In this account of the councils of Basil Ferrara, and Florence I have consulted the original acts which fill the seventeenth and eighteenth tomes of the edition of Venice and are closed by the perspicuous though partial history of Augustin Patricius an Italian of the fifteenth century They are digested and abridged by Dupin (Bibliothèque Ecclés tom xii) and the continuator of Fleury (tom xxii) and the respect of the Gallican church for the adverse parties confines their members to an awkward moderation

78 In the first attempt Meursius collected 3600 Græco barbarous words to which in a second edition he subjoined 1800 more yet what plenteous gleanings did he leave to Portius Ducange, Fabrotti, the Bollandists etc! (Fabric. Biblioth Græc tom x. p 101 etc) Some Persic words may be found in Xenophon and some Latin ones in Plutarch and such is the inevitable effect of war and commerce but the form and substance of the language were not affected by this slight alloy

79 The life of Francis Philelphus a sophist proud restless and rapacious has been diligently composed by Lancelot (Mémoires de l Academie des Inscriptions tom x p 691-751) and Tiraboschi (Istoria della Letteratura Italiana tom. vii p 282-294) for the most part from his own letters. His elaborate writings and those of his contemporaries are forgotten but their familiar epistles still describe the men and the times

80. He married and had perhaps debauched the daughter of John and the granddaughter of Manuel Chrysoloras. She was young beautiful and wealthy and her noble family was allied to the Dorias of Genoa and the emperors of Constantinople

81 Græci quibus lingua depravata non sit ita loquuntur vulgo hâc etiam tempestate ut Aristophanes comicus aut Euripides tragicus, ut ora-

115. The jealous Italians were desirous of keeping a monopoly of Greek learning When Aldus was about to publish the Greek scholiasts on Sophocles and Euripides Cave (said they) cave hoc facias, ne Barbari istis adjuti domi maneant et pauciores in Italiam ventitent (Dr Knight in his Life of Erasmus, p. 365, from Beatus Rhenanus)

116. The press of Aldus Manutius, a Roman, was established at Venice about the year 1494 he printed above sixty considerable works of Greek literature, almost all for the first time several containing different treatises and authors and of several authors two three, or four editions (Fabric. Biblioth. Græc. tom. xiii, p 605, etc.) Yet his glory must not tempt us to forget that the first Greek book, the Grammar of Constantine Lascaris, was printed at Milan in 1476 and that the Florence Homer of 1488 displays all the luxury of the typographical art. See the Annales Typographici of Mattaire, and the Bibliographie Instructive of De Bure, a knowing bookseller of Paris.

117 I will select three singular examples of this classic enthusiasm. 1 At the synod of Florence Gemistus Pletho said in familiar conversation to George of Trebizond that in a short time mankind would unanimously renounce the Gospel and the Koran for a religion similar to that of the Gentiles (Leo Allatius, apud Fabricium tom. x. p 751) 2 Paul II persecuted the Roman academy which had been founded by Pomponius Lætus and the principal members were accused of heresy impiety and paganism (Tiraboschi, tom vi P i p. 81 82) 3 In the next century some scholars and poets in France celebrated the success of Jodelle's tragedy of Cleopatra by a festival of Bacchus, and as it is said by the sacrifice of a goat (Bayle, Dictionnaire, JODELLE Fontenelle, tom. iii. p 56–61) Yet the spirit of bigotry might often discern a serious impiety in the sportive play of fancy and learning

118 The survivor Boccace died in the year 1375 and we cannot place before 1480 the composition of the Morgante Maggiore of Pulci and the Orlando Inamorato of Boiardo (Tiraboschi, tom. vi. P ii. p. 174–177)

Chapter LXVII

1 The epistle of Manuel Chrysoloras to the emperor John Palæologus will not offend the eye or ear of a classical student (ad calcem Codini de Antiquitatibus C. P p 107–126) The superscription suggests a chronological remark, that John Palæologus II was associated in the empire before the year 1414, the date of Chrysoloras's death A still earlier date, at least 1408, is deduced from the age of his youngest sons, Demetrius and Thomas, who were both Porphyrogeniti (Ducange, Fam. Byzant. p. 244, 247)

2. Somebody observed that the city of Athens might be circumnavigated (ὡς εἶχεν τὴν πόλιν τῶν Ἀθηναίων δύνασθαι καὶ παραπλεῖν καὶ περιπλεῖν) But what may be true in a rhetorical sense of Constantinople, cannot be applied to the situation of Athens, five miles from the sea and not intersected or surrounded by any navigable streams.

3. Nicephorus Gregoras has described the colossus of Justinian (l. vii. 12) but his measures are false and inconsistent. The editor Boivin consulted his friend Girardon and the sculptor gave him the true proportions of an equestrian statue. That of Justinian was still visible to Peter Gyllius, not on the column, but in the outward court of the seraglio and he was at Constantinople when it was melted down, and cast into a brass cannon (de Topograph. C. P l. ii. c. 17)

4. See the decay and repairs of St. Sophia, in Nicephorus Gregoras (l. vii. 12 l. xv 2) The building was propped by Andronicus in 1317 the eastern hemisphere fell in 1345. The Greeks, in their pompous rhetoric, exalt the beauty and holiness of the church, an earthly heaven, the abode of angels, and of God himself etc.

5. The genuine and original narrative of Syropulus (p 312–351) opens the schism from the first office of the Greeks at Venice to the general opposition at Constantinople of the clergy and people

6 On the schism of Constantinople, see Phranza (l. ii. c. 17) Laonicus Chalcocondyles (l. vi p 155, 156 [p 292–295, ed Bonn]) and Ducas (c. 31) the last of whom writes with truth and freedom. Among the moderns we may distinguish the continuator of Fleury (tom. xxii p 338 etc. 401 420, etc.) and Spondanus (A D 1440–50) The sense of the latter is drowned in prejudice and passion as soon as Rome and religion are concerned

7 Isidore was metropolitan of Kiow but the Greeks subject to Poland have removed that see from the ruins of Kiow to Lemberg or Leopold (Herbestein, in Ramusio tom. ii p 127) On the other hand the Russians transferred their spiritual obedience to the archbishop who became, in 1588 the patriarch of Moscow (Levesque Hist. de Russie tom. iii. p 188 190, from a Greek MS at Turin Iter et labores Archiepiscopi Arsenii)

8 The curious narrative of Levesque (Hist de Russie tom. ii. p 242–247) is extracted from the patriarchal archives The scenes of Ferrara and Florence are described by ignorance and passion but the Russians are credible in the account of their own prejudices.

9 The Shamanism the ancient religion of the Samanæans and Gymnosophists has been driven by the more popular Bramins from India into the northern deserts the naked philosophers were

100 In this domestic discipline Petrarch who loved the youth, often complains of the eager curiosity restless temper, and proud feelings, which announce the genius and glory of a riper age (Mémoires sur Petrarque tom III p 700-709)

101 Hinc Græcæ Latinæque scholæ exortæ sunt, Guarino Philelpho Leonardo Aretino Caroloque ac plerisque aliis tanquam ex equo Trojano prodeuntibus quorum emulatione multa ingenia deinceps ad laudem excitata sunt (Platina in Bonifacio IX.) Another Italian writer adds the names of Paulus Petrus Vergerius, Omnibonus Vincentius, Poggius Franciscus Barbarus etc But I question whether a rigid chronology would allow Chrysoloras all these eminent scholars (Hodius, p 25-27, etc)

102 See in Hody the article of Bessarion (p 136-177) Theodore Gaza, George of Trebizond and the rest of the Greeks whom I have named or omitted, are inserted in their proper chapters of his learned work. See likewise Tiraboschi, in the first and second parts of the sixth tome

103 The cardinals knocked at his door but his conclavist refused to interrupt the studies of Bessarion Nicholas,' said he thy respect has cost thee a hat, and me the tiara

104 Such as George of Trebizond Theodore Gaza Argyropulus Andronicus of Thessalonica, Philelphus Poggius Blondus Nicholas Perrot, Valla, Campanus Platina etc Viri (says Hody with the pious zeal of a scholar) nullo ævo perituri (p 156)

105 He was born before the taking of Constantinople but his honourable life was stretched far into the sixteenth century (A D 1535) Leo X and Francis I were his noblest patrons under whose auspices he founded the Greek colleges of Rome and Paris (Hody p 247-275) He left posterity in France but the counts de Vintimille and their numerous branches derive the name of Lascaris from a doubtful marriage in the thirteenth century with the daughter of a Greek emperor (Ducange Fam Byzant p 224-230)

106 Two of his epigrams against Virgil and three against Tully are preserved and refuted by Franciscus Floridus who can find no better names than Græculus ineptus et impudens (Hody p 274) In our own times an English critic has accused the Æneid of containing multa languida, nugatoria, spiritû et majestate carminis heroici defecta many such verses as he the said Jeremiah Markland would have been ashamed of owning (præfat ad. Statii Sylvas p 21 22)

107 Manuel Chrysoloras and his colleagues are accused of ignorance envy or avarice (Sylloge, etc., tom. II. p 235) The modern Greeks pronounce the β as a V consonant and confound three vowels (η ι υ) and several diphthongs Such was the vulgar pronunciation which the stern Gardiner maintained by penal statutes in the university of Cambridge but the monosyllable βη represented [to an] Attic ear the bleating of sheep and a bellwet[her is] better evidence than a bishop or a chancellor [The] treatises of those scholars particularly Eras[mus] who asserted a more classical pronunciation [are] collected in the Sylloge of Havercamp (2 vo[ls] octavo Lugd Bat 1736 1740) but it is diffic[ult to] paint sounds by words and, in their referen[ce to] modern use they can be understood only by [their] respective countrymen We may observe tha[t the] peculiar pronunciation of the θ, th is approv[ed by] Erasmus (tom II p 130)

111 Lord Bolingbroke observes with truth [and] spirit, that the popes in this instance were w[orse] politicians than the muftis and that the ch[arm] which had bound mankind for so many ages [was] broken by the magicians themselves (Letters [on] the Study of History l. VI p 165 166 oct[avo] edition 1779)

112 See the literary history of Cosmo and [Lo]renzo of Medicis in Tiraboschi (tom. VI P I [l. I] c. 2) who bestows a due measure of praise on [Al]phonso of Arragon king of Naples, the dukes [of] Milan Ferrara Urbino, etc. The republic [of] Venice has deserved the least from the gratit[ude] of scholars

113 Tiraboschi (tom VI P I p 104), from [the] preface of Janus Lascaris to the Greek Antholog[y] printed at Florence 1494 Latebant (says Aldus, [in] his preface to the Greek orators apud Hodium [p] 249) in Atho Thraciæ monte Eas Lascaris [in] Italiam reportavit Miserat enim ipsum Laure[n]tius ille Medices in Græciam ad inquirendos sim[ul] et quantovis emendos pretio bonos libros. 114. The Greek language was introduced in the university of Oxford in the last years of the f[if]teenth century by Grocyn Linacer and Latime[r] who had all studied at Florence under Demetri[us] Chalcocondyles See Dr Knight's curious Life [of] Erasmus. Although a stout academical patriot [he] is forced to acknowledge that Erasmus learne[d] Greek at Oxford, and taught it at Cambridge.

-tary had not been sworn. The Moslems suppose with more simplicity an appeal to God and his prophet Jesus, which is likewise insinuated by Callimachus (l. iii. p. 516 Spondan. A D 1444, No 8)

27 A critic will always distrust these spolia opima of a victorious general, so difficult for valour to obtain, so easy for flattery to invent (Cantemir p. 90, 91) Callimachus (l. iii. p 517) more simply and probably affirms, supervenientibus Janizaris, telorum multitudine, non tam confossus est quam obrutus.

28 Besides some valuable hints from Æneas Sylvius, which are diligently collected by Spondanus, our best authorities are three historians of the fifteenth century Philippus Callimachus (de Rebus a Vladislao Polonorum atque Hungarorum Rege gestis, libri iii. in Bell. Script. Rerum Hungaricarum, tom. i. p 433–518) Bonfinius (decad iii. l. v p 460–467) and Chalcocondyles (l vii. p 165 179 [p 312 seq ed. Bonn]) The two first were Italians, but they passed their lives in Poland and Hungary (Fabric. Biblioth. Latin med. et infimæ Ætatis, tom. i. p 324. Vossius de Hist. Latin. l. iii. c. 8 11 Bayle, Dictionnaire Bonfinius) A small tract of Fælix Petancius chancellor of Segnia (ad calcem Cuspinian de Cæsaribus, p. 716, 722) represents the theatre of the war [in t]he fifteenth century

29 M. Lenfant has described the origin (Hist. Concile de Basle tom. i. p. 247 etc.) and Bohemian campaign (p 315 etc.) of Cardinal Julian [his] services at Basil and Ferrara and his unfor[tun]ate end, are occasionally related by Spondanus [and] the continuator of Fleury

30. Syropulus honourably praises the talents of [an] enemy (p 117) το αυτα ινα ἔιπεν ὁ Ιουλιανὸς λελογισμένως ἄγαν καὶ λογικῶς ... μετ ἐν στήμης δεινότητος ῥητορικῆς

31 See Bonfinius decad iii. l. iv p 423. Could [th]e Italian historian pronounce, or the king of [H]ungary hear without a blush the absurd flattery [wh]ich confounded the name of a Wallachian vil[la]ge with the casual though glorious epithet of a [sin]gle branch of the Valerian family at Rome?

32. Philip de Comines (Memoires, l. vi. c. 13) [fr]om the tradition of the times, mentions him with [hi]gh encomiums, but under the whimsical name [of] the Chevalier Blanc de Valaigne (Vallachia) [T]he Greek Chalcocondyles and the Turkish annals [o]f Leunclavius, presume to accuse his fidelity or [val]our

33. See Bonfinius (decad iii. l. viii. p 492) and Spondanus (A.D 1456 No 1–7) Huniades shared [th]e glory of the defence of Belgrade with Capistran, a Franciscan friar and in their respective narratives, neither the saint nor the hero condescends to take notice of his rival s merit.

34. See Bonfinius, decad iii l. viii —decad iv [l.] viii. The observations of Spondanus on the life and character of Matthias Corvinus are curious and critical (A.D 1464, No. 1 1475 No 6 1476 No, 14 16 1490 No 4, 5) Italian fame was the object of his vanity His actions are celebrated in the Epitome Rerum Hungaricarum (p 322–412) of Peter Ranzanus a Sicilian His wise and facetious sayings are registered by Galestus Martius of Narni (528–568) and we have a particular narrative of his wedding and coronation. These three tracts are all contained in the first vol of Bel s Scriptores Rerum Hungaricarum.

35 They are ranked by Sir William Temple in his pleasing Essay on Heroic Virtue (Works vol. iii. p 385) among the seven chiefs who have deserved without wearing a royal crown Belisarius, Narses Gonsalvo of Cordova William first prince of Orange Alexander duke of Parma John Huniades, and George Castriot or Scanderbeg

36 I could wish for some simple, authentic memoirs of a friend of Scanderbeg which would introduce me to the man, the time and the place. In the old and national history of Marinus Barletius a priest of Scodra (de Vitâ Moribus, et Rebus gestis Georgii Castrioti etc libri xiii. pp 367 Argentorat 1537 in fol.) his gaudy and cumbersome robes are stuck with many false jewels. See likewise Chalcocondyles l vii. p 185, l. viii. p 229 [p 350 and 432 ed. Bonn]

37 His circumcision education etc. are marked by Marinus with brevity and reluctance (l. i p 6 7)

38 Since Scanderbeg died A.D 1466 in the sixty third year of his age (Marinus, l. xiii p 370) he was born in 1403 since he was torn from his parents by the Turks when he was novennis (Marinus l i p i 6) that event must have happened in 1412 nine years before the accession of Amurath II who must have inherited not acquired the Albanian slave Spondanus has remarked this inconsistency A D 1431 No 31 1443 No 14.

39 His revenue and forces are luckily given by Marinus (l ii p 44)

40 There were two Dibras the upper and lower the Bulgarian and Albanian the former 70 miles from Croya (l i p 17) was contiguous to the fortress of Sfetigrade, whose inhabitants refused to drink from a well into which a dead dog had traitorously been cast (l. v p 139 140) We want a good map of Epirus

41 Compare the Turkish narrative of Cantemir (p 92) with the pompous and prolix declamation in the fourth fifth and sixth books of the Albanian priest who has been copied by the tribe of strangers and moderns

42 In honour of his hero Barletius (l. vi p 188–192) kills the sultan by disease indeed, under the walls of Croya But this audacious fiction is disproved by the Greeks and Turks who agree in the time and manner of Amurath s death at Adrianople.

43 See the marvels of his Calabrian expedition in the ninth and tenth books of Marinus Barletius which may be rectified by the testimony or silence of Muratori (Annali d Italia tom xiii. p 291) and his original authors (Joh Simonetta de Rebus compelled to wrap themselves in fur but they insensibly sunk into wizards and physicians The Mordvans and Tcheremisses in the European Russia adhere to this religion, which is formed on the earthly model of one king or God his ministers or angels and the rebellious spirits who oppose his government As these tribes of the Volga have no images they might more justly retort on the Latin missionaries the name of idolaters (Levesque Hist. des Peuples soumis à la Domination des Russes, tom 1 p 194-237 423-460)

10 Spondanus, Annal Eccles tom II A D 1451, No 13 The epistle of the Greeks with a Latin version is extant in the college library at Prague

11 See Cantemir, History of the Othman Empire p 94 Murad or Morad, may be more correct but I have preferred the popular name to that obscure diligence which is rarely successful in translating an Oriental, into the Roman, alphabet

12 See Chalcocondyles (L vii p 186 198 [p 375 ed Bonn]) Ducas (c 33 [p 2-8 ed Bonn]), and Marinus Barletius (in Vit Scanderbeg p 145 146) In his good faith towards the garrison of Sfetigrade he was a lesson and example to his son Mohammed

13 Voltaire (Essai sur l Histoire Générale, c. 89 p 283 284) admires le Philosophe Turc would he have bestowed the same praise on a Christian prince for retiring to a monastery? In his way, Voltaire was a bigot an intolerant bigot

14 See the articles Dervische Fakir Nasser Rohbaniat in D Herbelot s Bibliothèque Orientale. Yet the subject is superficially treated from the Persian and Arabian writers It is among the Turks that these orders have principally flourished

15 Rycaut (in the Present State of the Ottoman Empire p 242-268) affords much information, which he drew from his personal conversation with the heads of the dervishes most of whom ascribed their origin to the time of Orchan He does not mention the Zichidæ of Chalcocondyles (l vii p 186 [p 352 ed Bonn]), among whom Amurath retired the Seids of that author are the descendants of Moha nmed

16 In the year 1431 Germany raised 40 000 horse men at arms against the Hussites of Bohemia (Lenfant Hist du Concile de Basle tom. I p 318) At the siege of Nuys on the Rhine in 1474, the princes prelates and cities sent their respective quotas and the bishop of Munster (qui n est pas des plus grands) furnished 1400 horse, 6000 foot all in green with 1200 waggons. The united armies of the king of England and the duke of Burgundy scarcely equalled one third of this German host (Mémoires de Philippe de Comines l iv c 2) At present six or seven hundred thousand men are maintained in constant pay and admirable discipline by the powers of Germany

17 It was not till the year 1444 that France and England could agree on a truce of some months. (See Rymer's Fœdera, and the chronicles of both nations)

18 In the Hungarian crusade, Spondanus (Annal Eccles A.D 1443 1444) has been my leading guide He has diligently read and critically compared the Greek and Turkish materials, the historians of Hungary Poland and the West. His narrative is perspicuous and where he can be free from a religious bias the judgment of Spondanus is not contemptible

19 I have curtailed the harsh letter (Wladislaus) which most writers affix to his name, either in compliance with the Polish pronunciation, or to distinguish him from his rival the infant Ladislaus of Austria Their competition for the crown of Hungary is described by Callimachus (l. i ii p 447-486) Bonfinius (Decad iii l. iv) Spondanus and Lenfant

20 The Greek historians Phranza Chalcocondyles, and Ducas do not ascribe to their prince a very active part in this crusade, which he seems to have promoted by his wishes and injured by his fears

21 Cantemir (p 88) ascribes to his policy the original plan and transcribes his animating epistle to the king of Hungary But the Mohammedan powers are seldom informed of the state of Christendom and the situation and correspondence of the knights of Rhodes must connect them with the sultan of Caramania

22 In their letters to the emperor Frederic III the Hungarians slay 30 000 Turks in one battle but the modest Julian reduces the slaughter to 6000 or even 2000 infidels (Æneas Sylvius in Europ c 5 and epist 44 81 apud Spondanum)

23 See the origin of the Turkish war and the first expedition of Ladislaus in the fifth and sixth books of the third decad of Bonfinius who in his division and style copies Livy with tolerable success Callimachus (l ii p 487-496) is still more pure and authentic

24 I do not pretend to warrant the literal accuracy of Julian s speech which is variously worded by Callimachus (l iii p 505-507) Bonfinius (dec iii l vi p 457 458) and other historians, who might indulge their own eloquence while they represent one of the orators of the age But they all agree in the advice and arguments for perjury which in the field of controversy are fiercely attacked by the Protestants and feebly defended by the Catholics The latter are discouraged by the misfortune of Varna

25 Varna under the Grecian name of Odessus was a colony of the Milesians which they denominated from the hero Ulysses (Cellarius, tom i p 374 D Anville, tom 1 p 312) According to Arrian s Periplus of the Euxine (p 24 25 in the first volume of Hudson s Geographers) it was situate 1740 stadia, or furlongs from the mouth of the Danube 2140 from Byzantium and 360 to the north of a ridge or promontory of Mount Hæmus which advances into the sea

26 Some Christian writers affirm that he drew from his bosom the host or wafer on which the

The sophis of Persia can produce a more regular succession and in the last age our European travellers were the witnesses and companions of their revels.

9 Calapin, one of these royal infants, was saved from his cruel brother and baptised at Rome under the name of Callistus Othomannus. The emperor Frederic III presented him with an estate in Austria, where he ended his life and Cuspinian, who in his youth conversed with the aged prince at Vienna, applauds his piety and wisdom (de Cæsaribus, p 672 673)

10. See the accession of Mohammed II in Ducas (c. 33) Phranza (l. i. c. 33 l. iii. c. 2) Chalcocondyles (l. vii. p 199 [p. 376 ed Bonn]) and Cantemir (p 96)

11 Before I enter on the siege of Constantinople I shall observe that, except the short hints of Cantemir and Leunclavius I have not been able to obtain any Turkish account of this conquest—such an account as we possess of the siege of Rhodes by Soliman II (Mémoires de l Académie des Inscriptions, tom. xxvi. p. 723–769) I must therefore depend on the Greeks whose prejudices, in some degree, are subdued by their distress. Our standard texts are those of Ducas (c. 34–42) Phranza (l. iii. 7–10) Chalcocondyles (l viii. p 201–214 [p 0–403, ed. Bonn]) and Leonardus Chiensis (Historia C. P a Turco expugnatæ Norimberghæ 544, in 4to 20 leaves) The last of these narratives the earliest in date, since it was composed in the Isle of Chios, the 16th of August 1453 only seventy nine days after the loss of the city and in the first confusion of ideas and passions Some hints may be added from an epistle of Cardinal Isidore (in Farragine Rerum Turcicarum ad calcem Chalcocondyl. Clauseri, Basil 1556) to Pope Nicholas V and a tract of Theodosius Zygomala, which he addressed in the year 1581 to Martin Crusius (Turco-Græcia l. i. p 74–98, Basil 1584) The various facts and materials are briefly though critically reviewed by Spondanus (A.D 1453 No. 1–27) The hearsay relations of Monstrelet and the distant Latins I shall take leave to disregard

12. The situation of the fortress and the topography of the Bosphorus are best learned from Peter Gyllius (de Bosphoro Thracio l. ii. c 13) Leunclavius (Pandect. p 445) and Tournefort (Voyage dans le Levant tom. ii lettre xv p 443 444) but I must regret the map or plan which Tournefort sent to the French minister of the marine The reader may turn back to chap xvii. of this History

13. The opprobrious name which the Turks bestow on the infidels is expressed αβοιρ by Ducas, and Giaour by Leunclavius and the moderns The former term is derived by Ducange (Gloss Græc. tom. i. p 530) from αβοιρον, in vulgar Greek a tortoise, as denoting a retrograde motion from the faith. But, alas! Gabour is no more than Gheber which was transferred from the Persian to the Turkish language, from the worshippers of fire to those of the crucifix (D Herbelot Biblioth Orient p 375)

14. Phranza does justice to his master's sense and courage—Calliditatem hominis non ignorans Imperator prior arma movere constituit and stigmatises the folly of the cum sacri tum profani proceres which he had heard amentes spe vanâ pasci. Ducas was not a privy counsellor

15. Instead of this clear and consistent account the Turkish Annals (Cantemir p 97) revived the foolish tale of the ox s hide and Dido s stratagem in the foundation of Carthage. These annals (unless we are swayed by an anti Christian prejudice) are far less valuable than the Greek historians.

16 In the dimensions of this fortress the old castle of Europe Phranza does not exactly agree with Chalcocondyles, whose description has been verified on the spot by his editor Leunclavius.

17 Among these were some pages of Mohammed, so conscious of his inexorable rigour that they begged to lose their heads in the city unless they could return before sunset

18 Ducas, c. 35 [p 248 ed. Bonn] Phranza (l iii. c. 3) who had sailed in his vessel commemorates the Venetian pilot as a martyr

19. Auctum est Palæologorum genus, et Imperii successor parvæque Romanorum scintillæ hæres natus, Andreas etc. (Phranza l iii. c. 3 [p 236 ed. Bonn]) The strong expression was inspired by his feelings.

20. Cantemir p. 97 98 The sultan was either doubtful of his conquest or ignorant of the superior merits of Constantinople. A city or a kingdom may sometimes be ruined by the Imperial fortune of their sovereign

21 Συντροφός by the president Cousin is translated père nourricier most correctly indeed from the Latin version but in his haste he has overlooked the note by which Ismael Boillaud (ad Ducam, c. 35 [p 251 ed. Bonn]) acknowledges and rectifies his own error

22 The Oriental custom of never appearing without gifts before a sovereign or a superior is of high antiquity and seems analogous with the idea of sacrifice, still more ancient and universal. See the examples of such Persian gifts, Ælian, Hist. Var l. i. c. 31 32 33

23 The Lala of the Turks (Cantemir p 34) and the Tata of the Greeks (Ducas, c. 35) are derived from the natural language of children and it may be observed that all such primitive words which denote their parents are the simple repetition of one syllable composed of a labial or dental consonant and an open vowel (Des Brosses, Méchanisme des Langues, tom. i p 231–247)

24. The Attic talent weighed about sixty minæ or avoirdupois pounds (see Hooper on Ancient Weights Measures etc) but among the modern Greeks that classic appellation was extended to a weight of one hundred or one hundred and twenty five pounds (Ducange, ταλαντον) Leonardus Chiensis measured the ball or stone of the second

44 Spondanus from the best evidence and the most rational criticism has reduced the giant Scanderbeg to the human size (A D 1461, No 20 1463 No 9 1465 No 12, 13 1467, No 1) His own letter to the pope and the testimony of Phranza (l iii c 28), a refugee in the neighbouring isle of Corfu demonstrate his last distress, which is awkwardly concealed by Marinus Barletius (l x)

46 This colony of Albanese is mentioned by Mr Swinburne (Travels into the Two Sicilies, vol. i. p 350–354)

47 The chronology of Phranza is clear and authentic but instead of four years and seven months Spondanus (A D 1445, No 7) *assigns seven or eight years to the reign of the last Con*stantine, which he deduces from a spurious epistle of Eugenius IV to the king of Æthiopia

48 Phranza (l iii c 1–6) deserves credit and esteem

49 Suppose him to have been captured in 1394, in Timour s first war in Georgia (Sherefeddin, l iii c 50), he might follow his Tartar master into Hindostan in 1398 and from thence sail to the Spice islands

52 Cantemir (p 83) who styles her the da[illegible] ter of Lazarus Ogli and the Helen of the Serv[illegible] places her marriage with Amurath in the [illegible] 1424 It will not easily be believed that, in six [illegible] twenty years' cohabitation the sultan corpus non tetigit After the taking of Constantinopl[illegible] fled to Mohammed II (Phranza l iii c. 22)

53 The classical reader will recollect the o[illegible] of Agamemnon (Iliad I v 144), and the ge[illegible] practice of antiquity

54 Cantacuzene (I am ignorant of his rela[illegible] to the emperor of that name) was a great dome[illegible] a firm asserter of the Greek creed, and a broth[illegible] the queen of Servia, whom he visited with [illegible] character of ambassador (Syropulus, p 37[illegible] 45)

Chapter LXVIII

1 For the character of Mohammed II it is dangerous to trust either the Turks or the Christians The most moderate picture appears to be drawn by Phranza (l i c 32 [p 93 ed Bonn]), whose resentment had cooled in age and solitude See likewise Spondanus (A D 1451, No 11) and the continuator of Fleury (tom xxii p 552) the Elogia of Paulus Jovius (l iii p 164–166), and the Dictionnaire de Bayle (tom iii p 272–279)

2 Cantemir (p 115), and the mosques which he founded attest his public regard for religion Mohammed freely disputed with the patriarch Gennadius on the two religions (Spond A D 1453, No 22)

3 Quinque linguas præter suam noverat Græcam Latinam Chaldaicam Persicam The Latin translator of Phranza has dropped the Arabic, which the Koran must recommend to every Musulman

4 Philelphus, by a Latin ode requested and obtained the liberty of his wife s mother and sisters from the conqueror of Constantinople It was delivered into the sultan s hands by the envoys of the duke of Milan Philelphus himself was suspected of a design of retiring to Constantinople yet the orator often sounded the trumpet of holy war [illegible] his Life by M Lancelot in the Mémoires [illegible] l Académie des Inscriptions tom x p 718, [illegible] etc)

5 Robert Valturio published at Verona [illegible] 1483 his twelve books de Re Militari in which [illegible] first mentions the use of bombs By his patron [illegible]ismond Malatesta prince of Rimini it had b[illegible] addressed with a Latin epistle to Mohammed

6 According to Phranza he assiduously stud[illegible] the lives and actions of Alexander Augustus C[illegible]stantine and Theodosius I have read somewh[illegible] that Plutarch s Lives were translated by his ord[illegible] into the Turkish language If the sultan him[illegible] understood Greek it must have been for the bene[illegible] of his subjects Yet these Lives are a school of fr[illegible] dom as well as of valour

7 The famous Gentile Bellino whom he h[illegible] invited from Venice was dismissed with a cha[illegible] and collar of gold and a purse of 3000 duca[illegible] With Voltaire I laugh at the foolish story of a sla[illegible] purposely beheaded to instruct the painter in t[illegible] action of the muscles

8 These Imperial drunkards were Soliman [illegible] Selim II and Amurath IV (Cantemir p 61[illegible]

44 The perpetual decay and weakness of the Turkish navy may be observed in Rycaut (State of the Ottoman Empire, p 372–378) Thévenot (Voyages, P i, p 229–242) and Tott (Mémoires tom. iii.) the last of whom is always solicitous to amuse and amaze his reader

45 I must confess that I have before my eyes the living picture which Thucydides (vii 71) has drawn of the passions and gestures of the Athenians in a naval engagement in the great harbour of Syracuse.

46 According to the exaggeration or corrupt text of Ducas (c. 38 [p 270 ed. Bonn]) this golden bar was of the enormous and incredible weight of 500 libræ, or pounds Boulliaud s reading of 500 drachms, or five pounds is sufficient to exercise the arm of Mohammed, and bruise the back of his admiral.

47 Ducas, who confesses himself ill informed of the affairs of Hungary assigns a motive of superstition, a fatal belief that Constantinople would be the term of the Turkish conquests. See Phranza (l. iii c. 20) and Spondanus.

48 The unanimous testimony of the four Greeks is confirmed by Cantemir (p 96) from the Turkish annals but I could wish to contract the distance of ten miles, and to prolong the term of one night.

49 Phranza relates two examples of a similar transportation over the six miles of the isthmus of Corinth the one fabulous of Augustus after the battle of Actium the other true of Nicetas, a Greek general in the tenth century To these he might have added a bold enterprise of Hannibal to introduce his vessels into the harbour of Tarentum (Polybius, l. viii. [c. 36] p 749, edit Gronov)

50 A Greek of Candia, who had served the Venetians in a similar undertaking (Spond. A.D. 1438, No 37) might possibly be the adviser and agent of Mohammed.

51 I particularly allude to our own embarkations on the lakes of Canada in the years 1776 and 1777 so great in the labour so fruitless in the event.

52 Chalcocondyles and Ducas differ in the time and circumstances of the negotiation and as it was neither glorious nor salutary the faithful Phranza spares his prince even the thought of a surrender

53 These wings (Chalcocondyles, l. viii p 208 [p. 333, ed. Bonn]) are no more than an Oriental figure but in the tragedy of Irene Mohammed s passion soars above sense and reason —

> Should the fierce North upon his frozen wings,
> Bear him aloft above the wondering clouds,
> And seat him in the Pleiads golden chariot—
> Thence should my fury drag him down to tortures.

Besides the extravagance of the rant I must observe, 1 That the operation of the winds must be confined to the lower region of the air 2 That the name, etymology and fable of the Pleiads are purely Greek (Scholiast ad Homer Σ 686 Eudocia in Ionia, p 339 Apollodor l. iii. c. 10 Heyne, p. 229 Not. 682) and had no affinity with the astronomy of the East (Hyde ad Ulugbeg Tabul in Syntagma Dissert tom. i. p 40 42 Goguet Origine des Arts, etc., tom. vi p 73–78 Gebelin, Hist du Calendrier p 73) which Mohammed had studied. 3 The golden chariot does not exist either in science or fiction but I much fear that Dr Johnson has confounded the Pleiads with the great bear or waggon the zodiac with a northern constellation —

> Ἄρκτον θ' ἣν καὶ ἄμαξαν ἐπίκλησιν καλέουσιν
> Il. xviii. 487

54 Phranza quarrels with these Moslem acclamations not for the name of God but for that of the prophet the pious zeal of Voltaire is excessive and even ridiculous.

55 I am afraid that this discourse was composed by Phranza himself and it smells so grossly of the sermon and the convent that I almost doubt whether it was pronounced by Constantine. Leonardus assigns him another speech, in which he addresses himself more respectfully to the Latin auxiliaries

56 This abasement which devotion has sometimes extorted from dying princes, is an improvement of the Gospel doctrine of the forgiveness of injuries it is more easy to forgive 490 times than once to ask pardon of an inferior

57 Besides the 10 000 guards, and the sailors and the marines, Ducas numbers in this general assault 250 000 Turks, both horse and foot [c. 39 p 283 ed. Bonn]

58 In the severe censure of the flight of Justiniani Phranza expresses his own feelings and those of the public. For some private reasons he is treated with more lenity and respect by Ducas but the words of Leonardus Chiensis express his strong and recent indignation, gloriæ salutis suique oblitus In the whole series of their Eastern policy his countrymen the Genoese, were always suspected, and often guilty

59 Ducas kills him with two blows of Turkish soldiers Chalcocondyles wounds him in the shoulder and then tramples him in the gate. The grief of Phranza, carrying him among the enemy escapes from the precise image of his death but we may without flattery apply these noble lines of Dryden —

> As to Sebastian let them search the field
> And where they find a mountain of the slain,
> Send one to climb and looking down beneath
> There they will find him at his manly length
> With his face up to heaven in that red monument
> Which his good sword had digg d.

60 Spondanus (A.D 1453 No 10) who has hopes of his salvation wishes to absolve this demand from the guilt of suicide.

61 Leonardus Chiensis very properly observes that the Turks had they known the emperor would have laboured to save and secure a captive so acceptable to the sultan.

62 Cantemir p 96 The Christian ships in the cannon Lapidem, qui palmis undecim ex meis ambibat in gyro

25 See Voltaire (Hist Générale c xci p 294, 295) He was ambitious of universal monarchy and the poet frequently aspires to the name and style of an astronomer a chemist, etc

26 The Baron de Tott (tom iii p 85-89), who fortified the Dardanelles against the Russians describes in a lively and even comic strain his own prowess, and the consternation of the Turks But that adventurous traveller does not possess the art of gaining our confidence.

27 Non audivit indignum ducens says the honest Antoninus but, as the Roman court was afterwards grieved and ashamed we find the more courtly expression of Platina, in animo fuisse pontifici juvare Græcos, and the positive assertion of Æneas Sylvius structam classem etc. (Spond A D 1453 No 3)

28 Antonin in Proem —Epist Cardinal Isidor apud Spondanum and Dr Johnson, in the tragedy of Irene, has happily seized this characteristic circumstance —

The groaning Greeks dig up the golden caverns
The accumulated wealth of hoarding ages
That wealth which, granted to their weeping prince,
Had rang d embattled nations at their gates

29 The palatine troops are styled Capiculi the provincials Seratculi and most of the names and institutions of the Turkish militia existed before the Canon Nameh of Soliman II, from which, and his own experience Count Marsigli has composed his Military State of the Ottoman Empire

30 The observation of Philelphus is approved by Cuspinian in the year 1508 (de Cæsaribus in Epilog de Militiâ Turcicâ p 697) Marsigli proves that the effective armies of the Turks are much less numerous than they appear In the army that besieged Constantinople Leonardus Chiensis reckons no more than 15,000 Janizaries

31 Ego, eidem (Imp) tabellas extribui non absque dolore et mœstitia, mansitque apud nos duos aliis occultus numerus (Phranza, l iii c 3 [p 241, ed Bonn]) With some indulgence for national prejudices we cannot desire a more authentic witness, not only of public facts but of private counsels

32 In Spondanus the narrative of the union is not only partial but imperfect The bishop of Pamiers died in 1642 and the history of Ducas, which represents these scenes (c. 36 37) with such truth and spirit was not printed till the year 1649

33 Phranza, one of the conforming Greeks acknowledges that the measure was adopted only propter spem auxilii he affirms with pleasure that those who refused to perform their devotions in St Sophia extra culpam et in pace essent (l iii c. 20)

34 His primitive and secular name was George Scholarius, which he changed for that of Gennadius, either when he became a monk or a patriarch His defence at Florence, of the same uni which he so furiously attacked at Constantinop has tempted Leo Allatius (Diatrib de Georgiis Fabric Biblioth Græc tom x p 760-786) divide him into two men but Renaudot (p 34 383) has restored the identity of his person and t duplicity of his character

35 Φακιόλιον κάλυπτρα may be fairly tra lated a cardinal s hat The difference of the Gre and Latin habits embittered the schism.

36 We are obliged to reduce the Greek miles the smallest measure which is preserved in t wersts of Russia of 547 French toises and of 104 to a degree The six miles of Phranza do not e ceed four English miles (D Anville, Mesures Itin raires, p 61 123 etc)

37 At indies doctiores nostri facti paravere co tra hostes machinamenta, quæ tamen avare d bantur Pulvis erat nitri modica exigua tela m dica bombardæ si aderant incommoditate lo primum hostes offendere maceriebus alveisqu tectos non poterant Nam si quæ magnæ eran ne murus concuteretur noster, quiescebant Th passage of Leonardus Chiensis is curious and im portant

38 According to Chalcocondyles and Phranz the great cannon burst an accident which, a cording to Ducas, was prevented by the artist skill It is evident that they do not speak of th same gun

39 Near a hundred years after the siege of Con stantinople the French and English fleets in th Channel were proud of firing 300 shot in an en gagement of two hours (Mémoires de Martin d Bellay l x in the Collection Générale, tom xx p 239)

40 I have selected some curious facts withou striving to emulate the bloody and obstinate elo quence of the Abbé de Vertot in his prolix de scriptions of the sieges of Rhodes Malta etc. Bu that agreeable historian had a turn for romance and as he wrote to please the Order he ha adopted the same spirit of enthusiasm and chivalry

41 The first theory of mines with gunpowde appears in 1480 in a MS of George of Sienn (Tiraboschi, tom vi P i p 324) They were firs practised at Sarzanella in 1487 but the honou and improvement in 1503 is ascribed to Peter o Navarre who used them with success in the war of Italy (Hist de la Ligue de Cambray tom ii p 93-97)

42 It is singular that the Greeks should no agree in the number of these illustrious vessels the five of Ducas the four of Phranza and Leonardus and the two of Chalcocondyles must be extended to the smaller or confined to larger size Voltaire, in giving one of these ships to Frederic III confounds the emperors of the East and West

43 In bold defiance or rather in gross ignorance of language and geography, the president Cousin detains them at Chios with a south and wafts them to Constantinople with a north wind.

84. Cantemir (p. 101–105) insists on the unanimous consent of the Turkish historians, ancient as well as modern, and argues that they would not have violated the truth to diminish their national glory, since it is esteemed more honourable to take a city by force than by composition. But, 1. I doubt this consent, since he quotes no particular historian, and the Turkish Annals of Leunclavius affirm, without exception, that Mohammed took Constantinople per vim (p. 329). 2. The same argument may be turned in favour of the Greeks of the times, who would not have forgotten this honourable and salutary treaty. Voltaire, as usual, prefers the Turks to the Christians.

85. For the genealogy and fall of the Comneni of Trebizond, see Ducange (Fam. Byzant. p. 195); for the last Palæologi, the same accurate antiquarian (p. 244, 247, 248). The Palæologi of Montferrat were not extinct till the next century; but they had forgotten their Greek origin and kindred.

86. In the worthless story of the disputes and misfortunes of the two brothers, Phranza (l. iii. c. 21–30) is too partial on the side of Thomas; Ducas (c. 44, 45) is too brief, and Chalcocondyles (l. viii. ix. x.) too diffuse and digressive.

87. See the loss or conquest of Trebizond in Chalcocondyles (l. ix. p. 263–266 [p. 494–498, ed. Bonn]), Ducas (c. 45 [p. 343, ed. Bonn]), Phranza (l. iii. c. 27), and Cantemir (p. 107).

88. Though Tournefort (tom. iii. lettre xvii. p. 179) speaks of Trebizond as mal peuplée, Peyssonel, the latest and most accurate observer, can find 100,000 inhabitants (Commerce de la Mer Noire, tom. ii. p. 72, and for the province, p. 53–90). Its prosperity and trade are perpetually disturbed by the factious quarrels of two odas of Janizaries, in one of which 30,000 Lazi are commonly enrolled (Mémoires de Tott, tom. iii. p. 16, 17).

89. Ismael Beg, prince of Sinope or Sinople, was possessed (chiefly from his copper mines) of a revenue of 200,000 ducats (Chalcocond. l. ix. p. 258, 259 [p. 489, ed. Bonn]). Peyssonel (Commerce de la Mer Noire, tom. ii. p. 100) ascribes to the modern city 60,000 inhabitants. This account seems enormous; yet it is by trading with a people that we become acquainted with their wealth and numbers.

90. Spondanus (from Gobelin Comment. Pii II. l. v.) relates the arrival and reception of the despot Thomas at Rome (A.D. 1461, No. 3).

91. By an act dated A.D. 1494, Sept. 6, and lately transmitted from the archives of the Capitol to the royal library of Paris, the despot Andrew Palæologus, reserving the Morea, and stipulating some private advantages, conveys to Charles VIII. king of France the empires of Constantinople and Trebizond (Spondanus, A.D. 1495, No. 2). M. de Foncemagne (Mém. de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. xvii. p. 539–578) has bestowed a dissertation on this national title, of which he had obtained a copy from Rome.

92. See Philippe de Comines (l. vii. c. 14), who reckons with pleasure the number of Greeks who were prepared to rise, 60 miles of an easy navigation, eighteen days' journey from Valona to Constantinople, etc. On this occasion the Turkish empire was saved by the policy of Venice.

93. See the original feast in Olivier de la Marche (Mémoires, P. i. c. 29, 30), with the abstract and observations of M. de Ste. Palaye (Mémoires sur la Chevalerie, tom. i. P. iii. p. 182–185). The peacock and the pheasant were distinguished as royal birds.

94. It was found by an actual enumeration that Sweden, Gothland, and Finland contained 1,800,000 fighting men, and consequently were far more populous than at present.

95. In the year 1454 Spondanus has given, from Æneas Sylvius, a view of the state of Europe, enriched with his own observations. That valuable annalist, and the Italian Muratori, will continue the series of events from the year 1453 to 1481, the end of Mohammed's life and of this chapter.

96. Besides the two annalists, the reader may consult Giannone (Istoria Civile, tom. iii. p. 449–455) for the Turkish invasion of the kingdom of Naples. For the reign and conquests of Mohammed II. I have occasionally used the Memorie Istoriche de' Monarchi Ottomanni di Giovanni Sagredo (Venezia, 1677, in 4to). In peace and war the Turks have ever engaged the attention of the republic of Venice. All her despatches and archives were open to a procurator of St. Mark, and Sagredo is not contemptible either in sense or style. Yet he too bitterly hates the infidels: he is ignorant of their language and manners; and his narrative, which allows only seventy pages to Mohammed II. (p. 69–140), becomes more copious and authentic as he approaches the years 1640 and 1644, the term of the historic labours of John Sagredo.

97. As I am now taking an everlasting farewell of the Greek empire, I shall briefly mention the great collection of Byzantine writers whose names and testimonies have been successively repeated in this work. The Greek presses of Aldus and the Italians were confined to the classics of a better age; and the first rude editions of Procopius, Agathias, Cedrenus, Zonaras, etc., were published by the learned diligence of the Germans. The whole Byzantine series (thirty-six volumes in folio) has gradually issued (A.D. 1648, etc.) from the royal press of the Louvre, with some collateral aid from Rome and Leipsic; but the Venetian edition (A.D. 1729), though cheaper and more copious, is not less inferior in correctness than in magnificence to that of Paris. The merits of the French editors are various; but the value of Anna Comnena, Cinnamus, Villehardouin, etc., is enhanced by the historical notes of Charles du Fresne du Cange. His supplemental works, the Greek Glossary, the Constantinopolis Christiana, the Familiæ Byzantinæ, diffuse a steady light over the darkness of the Lower Empire.

63 Chalcocondyles most absurdly supposes that Constantinople was sacked by the Asiatics in revenge for the ancient calamities of Troy [l viii p. 403 ed Bonn] and the grammarians of the fifteenth century are happy to melt down the uncouth appellation of Turks into the more classical name of Teucri

64 When Cyrus surprised Babylon during the celebration of a festival so vast was the city and so careless were the inhabitants that much time elapsed before the distant quarters knew that they were captives Herodotus (l i c. 191) and Usher (Annal p 78), who has quoted from the prophet Jeremiah a passage of similar import

65 This lively description is extracted from Ducas (c 39 [p 291 ed Bonn]) who two years afterwards, was sent ambassador from the prince of Lesbos to the sultan (c. 44) Till Lesbos was subdued in 1463 (Phranza l. iii c 27) that island must have been full of the fugitives of Constantinople who delighted to repeat perhaps to adorn, the tale of their misery

66 See Phranza, l iii c. 20 21 His expressions are positive Ameras suâ manu jugulavit volebat enim eo turpiter et nefarie abuti Me miserum et infelicem! Yet he could only learn from report the bloody or impure scenes that were acted in the dark recesses of the seraglio

67 See Tiraboschi (tom vi P i p 290) and Lancelot (Mém de l Académie des Inscriptions, tom x p 718) I should be curious to learn how he could praise the public enemy, whom he so often reviles as the most corrupt and inhuman of tyrants.

68 The Commentaries of Pius II suppose that he craftily placed his cardinal s hat on the head of a corpse which was cut off and exposed in triumph while the legate himself was bought and delivered as a captive of no value The great Belgic Chronicle adorns his escape with new adventures which he suppressed (says Spondanus A D 1453 No 15) in his own letters lest he should lose the merit and reward of suffering for Christ

69 Busbequius expatiates with pleasure and applause on the rights of war and the use of slavery among the ancients and the Turks (de Legat. Turcicâ Epist iii p 161)

70 This sum is specified in a marginal note of Leunclavius (Chalcocondyles l. viii. p 211) but in the distribution to Venice Genoa Florence and Ancona of 50 20 20, and 15 000 ducats I suspect that a figure has been dropped Even with the restitution, the foreign property would scarcely exceed one fourth

71 See the enthusiastic praises and lamentations of Phranza (l iii c. 17)

72 See Ducas (c 42 [p 312 ed Bonn]) and an epistle July 15th 1453 from Laurus Quirinus to Pope Nicholas V (Hody de Græcis, p 192 from a MS in the Cotton library)

73 The Julian calendar, which reckons the days and hours from midnight was used at Constantinople. But Ducas seems to understand the natural hours from sunrise

74 See the Turkish Annals p 329 and the Pandects of Leunclavius p 448

75 I have had occasion (vol. i. p 238) to mention this curious relic of Grecian antiquity

76 We are obliged to Cantemir (p 102) for the Turkish account of the conversion of St Sophia, so bitterly deplored by Phranza and Ducas It is amusing enough to observe in what opposite lights the same object appears to a Musulman and a Christian eye.

77 This distich which Cantemir gives in the original derives new beauties from the application It was thus that Scipio repeated in the sack of Carthage the famous prophecy of Homer The same generous feeling carried the mind of the conqueror to the past or the future.

78 I cannot believe with Ducas (see Spondanus, A D 1453 No 13) that Mohammed sent round Persia Arabia etc the head of the Greek emperor he would surely content himself with a trophy less inhuman

79 Phranza was the personal enemy of the great duke nor could time or death or his own retreat to a monastery extort a feeling of sympathy or forgiveness Ducas is inclined to praise and pity the martyr Chalcocondyles is neuter, but we are indebted to him for the hint of the Greek conspiracy

80 For the restitution of Constantinople and the Turkish foundations see Cantemir (p 102–109) Ducas (c. 42 [p 317 ed Bonn]) with Thévenot, Tournefort and the rest of our modern travellers From a gigantic picture of the greatness, population etc. of Constantinople and the Ottoman empire (Abrégé de l Histoire Ottomane, tom. i p 10–21) we may learn that in the year 1586, the Moslems were less numerous in the capital than the Christians or even the Jews

81 The Turbé or sepulchral monument of Abou Ayub is described and engraved in the Tableau Générale de l Empire Ottoman (Paris 1787 in large folio) a work of less use, perhaps than magnificence (tom i. p 305 306)

82 Phranza (l iii c. 19) relates the ceremony, which has possibly been adorned in the Greek reports to each other and to the Latins. The fact is confirmed by Emanuel Malaxus, who wrote in vulgar Greek the History of the Patriarchs after the taking of Constantinople inserted in the Turco-Græcia of Crusius (l v p 106–184) But the most patient reader will not believe that Mohammed adopted the Catholic form Sancta Trinitas quæ mihi donavit imperium te in patriarcham novæ Romæ deligit

83 From the Turco-Græcia of Crusius etc., Spondanus (A D 1453 No. 21 1458, No. 16) describes the slavery and domestic quarrels of the Greek church The patriarch who succeeded Gennadius threw himself in despair into a well.

84 Cantemir (p. 101–105) insists on the unanimous consent of the Turkish historians ancient as well as modern, and argues that they would not have violated the truth to diminish their national glory since it is esteemed more honourable to take a city by force than by composition. But 1 I doubt this consent since he quotes no particular historian and the Turkish Annals of Leunclavius affirm without exception, that Mohammed took Constantinople per vim (p 329) 2 The same argument may be turned in favour of the Greeks of the times, who would not have forgotten this honourable and salutary treaty Voltaire, as usual prefers the Turks to the Christians

85 For the genealogy and fall of the Comneni of Trebizond, see Ducange (Fam Byzant. p 195) for the last Palæologi the same accurate antiquarian (p. 244, 247 248) The Palæologi of Montferrat were not extinct till the next century but they had forgotten their Greek origin and kindred.

86 In the worthless story of the disputes and misfortunes of the two brothers Phranza (L iii. c. 21–30) is too partial on the side of Thomas Ducas (c. 44, 45) is too brief and Chalcocondyles (L viii. ix. x.) too diffuse and digressive.

87 See the loss or conquest of Trebizond in Chalcocondyles (L ix. p 263–266 [p 494–498 ed. Bonn]) Ducas (c. 45 [p. 343 ed. Bonn]) Phranza (L iii, c. 27) and Cantemir (p 107)

88 Though Tournefort (tom. iii lettre xvii. p 1 9) speaks of Trebizond as mal peuplée Peyssonel, the latest and most accurate observer can find 100 000 inhabitants (Commerce de la Mer Noire, tom. ii. p 72 and for the province, p 53–90) Its prosperity and trade are perpetually disturbed by the factious quarrels of two odas of Janizaries, in one of which 30 000 Lazi are commonly enrolled (Mémoires de Tott tom. iii p 16 17)

This account seems enormous yet it is by trading with a people that we become acquainted with their wealth and numbers.

95 In the year 1454 Spondanus has given from Æneas Sylvius, a view of the state of Europe, enriched with his own observations That valuable annalist and the Italian Muratori, will continue the series of events from the year 1453 to 1481 the end of Mohammed s life and of this chapter

96 Besides the two annalists the reader may consult Giannone (Istoria Civile tom iii. p 449–455) for the Turkish invasion of the kingdom of Naples For the reign and conquests of Mohammed II I have occasionally used the Memorie Istoriche de Monarchi Ottomanni di Giovanni Sagredo (Venezia 1677 in 4to) In peace and war the Turks have ever engaged the attention of the republic of Venice. All her despatches and archives were open to a procurator of St Mark and Sagredo is not contemptible either in sense or style Yet he too bitterly hates the infidels he is ignorant of their language and manners and his narrative, which allows only seventy pages to Mohammed II (p. 69–140) becomes more copious and authentic as he approaches the years 1640 and 1644, the term of the historic labours of John Sagredo

97 As I am now taking an everlasting farewell of the Greek empire, I shall briefly mention the great collection of Byzantine writers whose names and testimonies have been successively repeated in this work The Greek presses of Aldus and the Italians were confined to the classics of a better age and the first rude editions of Procopius Agathias Cedrenus Zonaras etc were published by the learned diligence of the Germans The whole Byzantine series (thirty-six volumes in folio) has gradually issued (A.D 1648 etc.) from the royal press of the Louvre, with some collateral aid from Rome and Leipsic but the Venetian edition (A.D 1729) though cheaper and more copious is not less inferior in correctness than in magnificence to that of Paris The merits of the French editors are various but the value of Anna Comnena, Cinnamus Villehardouin etc. is enhanced by the historical notes of Charles du Fresne du Cange His supplemental works the Greek Glossary the Constantinopolis Christiana the Familiæ Byzantinæ diffuse a steady light over the darkness of the Lower Empire.

Chapter LXIX

1 The abbe Dubos who with less genius than his successor Montesquieu, has asserted and magnified the influence of climate objects to himself the degeneracy of the Romans and Batavians To the first of these examples he replies 1 That the change is less real than apparent, and that the modern Romans prudently conceal in themselves the virtues of their ancestors 2 That the air the soil and the climate of Rome have suffered a great and visible alteration (Reflexions sur la Poesie et sur la Peinture part ii sect 16)

2 The reader has been so long absent from Rome that I would advise him to recollect or review the xlix chapter of this History

3 The coronation of the German emperors at Rome more especially in the eleventh century is best represented from the original monuments by Muratori (Antiquitat Italiæ medii Ævi tom i dissertat ii p 99 etc) and Cenni (Monument Domin Pontif tom ii diss vi p 261) the latter of whom I only know from the copious extract of Schmidt (Hist des Allemands tom iii p 255–266)

4 Exercitui Romano et Teutonico! The latter was both seen and felt but the former was no more than magni nominis umbra

5 Muratori has given the series of the papal coins (Antiquitat tom ii diss xxvii p 548–554) He finds only two more early than the year 800 fifty are still extant from Leo III to Leo IX with the addition of the reigning emperor none remain of Gregory VII or Urban II but in those of Paschal II he seems to have renounced this badge of dependence

6 See Ducange Gloss mediæ et infimæ Latinitat tom vi p 364 365 Staffa This homage was paid by kings to archbishops and by vassals to their lords (Schmidt tom iii p 262) and it was the nicest policy of Rome to confound the marks of filial and of feudal subjection

7 The appeals from all the churches to the Roman pontiff are deplored by the zeal of St Bernard (de Consideratione l iii tom ii p 431–442 edit Mabillon Venet 1750) and the judgment of Fleury (Discours sur l Hist Ecclésiastique iv et vii) But the saint who believed in the false decretal condemns only the abuse of these appeals the more enlightened historian investigates the origin and rejects the principles of this new jurisprudence

8 Germanici summarii non levatis sarcinis onusti nihilominus repatriant inviti Nova res! quando hactenus aurum Roma refudit? Et nunc Romanorum consilio id usurpatum non credimus (Bernard de Consideratione l iii c 3, p 437) The first words of the passage are obscure and probably corrupt

9 Quand les sauvages de la Louisiane veulent avoir du fruit ils coupent l arbre au pied et cueillent le fruit Voilà le gouvernement despotique (The Spirit of Laws l v c 13) and passion and ignorance are always despotic

10 In a free conversation with his countryman Adrian IV John of Salisbury accuses the avarice of the pope and clergy Provinciarum diripiun spolia ac si thesauros Crœsi studeant reparare Sed recte cum eis agit Altissimus quoniam et ips aliis et sæpe vilissimis hominibus dati sunt in direptionem (de Nugis Curialium, l vi c. 24, p 387) In the next page he blames the rashness and infidelity of the Romans whom their bishops vainly strove to conciliate by gifts instead of virtues It is pity that this miscellaneous writer has not given us less morality and erudition, and more pictures of himself and the times

11 Hume s History of England vol i p 419. The same writer has given us from Fitz Stephen a singular act of cruelty perpetrated on the clergy by Geoffrey the father of Henry II When he was master of Normandy the chapter of Seez presumed without his consent to proceed to the election of a bishop upon which he ordered all of them with the bishop elect to be castrated, and made all their testicles be brought him in a platter Of the pain and danger they might justly complain yet since they had vowed chastity he deprived them of a superfluous treasure

12 From Leo IX and Gregory VII an authentic and contemporary series of the lives of the popes by the Cardinal of Arragon Pandulphus Pisanus Bernard Guido etc is inserted in the Italian Historians of Muratori (tom iii P i p 277–685) and has been always before my eyes

13 Throughout this chapter the Annals of Muratori have been my ordinary and excellent guide. Muratori uses and indeed quotes with the freedom of a master his great Collection of the Italian Historians in twenty-eight volumes and as that treasure is in my library I have thought it an amusement if not a duty to consult the originals.

14 I cannot refrain from transcribing the high coloured words of Pandulphus Pisanus (p 384) Hoc audiens inimicus pacis atque turbator jam fatus Centius Frajapane, more draconis immanissimi sibilans et ab imis pectoribus trahens longa suspiria accinctus retro gladio sine more cucurrit valvas ac fores confregit Ecclesiam furibundus introit inde custode remoto papam per gulam accepit distraxit pugnis calcibusque percussit et tanquam brutum animal intra limen ecclesiæ acriter calcaribus cruentavit et latro tantum dominum per capillos et brachia Jesu bono interim dormiente detraxit ad domum usque deduxit inibi catenavit et inclusit

15 Ego coram Deo et Ecclesiâ dico si unquam possibile esset mallem unum imperatorem quam tot dominos (Vit Gelas II p 398)

16. Quid tam notum seculis quam protervia et cervicositas Romanorum? Gens insueta paci tu multui assueta, gens immitis et intractabilis usque adhuc, subdi nescia, nisi cum non valet resistere (de Considerat, l. iv c. 2 p 441) The saint takes breath, and then begins again Hi invisi terræ et cœlo, utrique injecere manus, etc. (p 443)

17 As a Roman citizen, Petrarch takes leave to observe that Bernard, though a saint was a man that he might be provoked by resentment and possibly repent of his hasty passion etc (Mémoires sur la Vie de Pétrarque, tom i p 330.)

18. Baronius, in his index to the twelfth volume of his Annals, has found a fair and easy excuse. He makes two heads, of Romani Catholici and Schismatici, to the former he applies all the good, to the latter all the evil, that is told of the city

19. The heresies of the twelfth century may be found in Mosheim (Institut Hist Eccles. p 419–427) who entertains a favourable opinion of Arnold of Brescia. I have already described the sect of the Paulicians, and followed their migration from Armenia to Thrace and Bulgaria Italy and France,

20. The original pictures of Arnold of Brescia are drawn by Otho bishop of Frisingen (Chron. l. vii c. 31 de Gestis Frederici I l. i. c. 27 l. ii. c. 21) and in the third book of the Ligurinus a poem of Gunther who flourished A.D 1200 in the monastery of Paris near Basil (Fabric. Biblioth Latin. med. et infimæ Ætatis, tom. iii p 174, 175) The long passage that relates to Arnold is produced by Guilliman (de Rebus Helveticis l. iii c 5 p 108)

21 The wicked wit of Bayle was amused in composing with much levity and learning the articles of ABELARD FOULQUES, HELOISE in his Dictionnaire Critique. The dispute of Abelard and St. Bernard, of scholastic and positive divinity is well understood by Mosheim (Institut. Hist. Eccles. p 412–415)

22. ——Damnatus ab illo
Præsule qui numeros vetitum contingere nostros
Nomen ab innocuâ ducit laudabile vitâ.

We may applaud the dexterity and correctness of Ligurinus, who turns the unpoetical name of Innocent II. into a compliment

23. A Roman inscription of Statio Turicensis has been found at Zurich (D Anville Notice de l'Ancienne Gaul, p 642–644) but it is without sufficient warrant that the city and canton have usurped, and even monopolised, the names of Tigurum and Pagus Tigurinus.

24. Guilliman (de Rebus Helveticis l. iii. c. 5, p. 106) recapitulates the donation (A.D 833) of the emperor Lewis the Pious to his daughter the Abbess Hildegardis. Curtim nostram Turegum in ducatu Alamanniæ in pago Durgaugensi with villages, woods, meadows waters slaves, churches etc.—a noble gift. Charles the Bald gave the jus monetæ, the city was walled under Otho I and the line of the bishop of Frisingen,

Nobile Turegum multarum copiâ rerum

is repeated with pleasure by the antiquaries of Zurich

25. Bernard Epistol cxcv cxcvi. tom. i. p 187–190. Amidst his invectives he drops a precious acknowledgement qui utinam quam sanæ esset doctrinæ quam districtæ est vitæ. He owns that Arnold would be a valuable acquisition for the church

26 He advised the Romans,

Consiliis armisque sua moderamina summa
Arbitrio tractare suo nil juris in hâc re
Pontifici summo modicum concedere regi
Suadebat populo Sic læsâ stultus utrâque
Majestate, reum geminæ se fecerat aulæ

Nor is the poetry of Gunther different from the prose of Otho

27 See Baronius (A.D 1148 No 38 39) from the Vatican MSS. He loudly condemns Arnold (A D 1141 No 3) as the father of the political heretics whose influence then hurt him in France.

28 The English reader may consult the Biographia Britannica, ADRIAN IV but our own writers have added nothing to the fame or merits of their countryman

29. Besides the historian and poet *already quot*ed the last adventures of Arnold are related by the biographer of Adrian IV (Muratori Script. Rerum Ital. tom. iii. P i p 441 442)

30 Ducange (Gloss. Latinitatis mediæ et infimæ Ætatis, DECARCHONES, tom. ii p 726) gives me a quotation from Blondus (Decad ii l. ii.) Duo consules ex nobilitate quotannis fiebant qui ad vetustum consulum exemplar summæ rerum præessent And in Sigonius (de Regno Italiæ l. vi Opp tom ii p 400) I read of the consuls and tribunes of the tenth century Both Blondus and even Sigonius too freely copied the classic method of supplying from reason or fancy the deficiency of records

31 In the panegyric of Berengarius (Muratori Script Rer Ital. tom. ii. P i p 408) a Roman is mentioned as consulis natus in the beginning of the tenth century Muratori (Dissert v) discovers in the years 952 and 956 Gratianus in Dei nomine consul et dux Georgius consul et dux and in 1015, Romanus, brother of Gregory VIII proudly but vaguely styles himself consul et dux et omnium Romanorum senator

32 As late as the tenth century the Greek emperors conferred on the dukes of Venice Naples Amalphi etc. the title of ὕπατος or consuls (see Chron Sagornini passim) and the successors of *Charlemagne would not abdicate any of their pre*rogative. But in general the names of consul and senator which may be found among the French and Germans signify no more than count and lord (Signeur Ducange Glossar) The monkish writers are often ambitious of fine classic words

33 The most constitutional form is a diploma of Otho III (A D 998) Consulibus senatus populique Romani but the act is probably spurious. At the coronation of Henry I A D 1014, the historian Dithmar (apud Muratori Dissert xxiii) describes him a senatoribus duodecim vallatum, quorum sex rasi barbâ alii prolixâ mystice incedebant cum baculis The senate is mentioned in the panegyric of Berengarius (p 406)

34 In the ancient Rome the equestrian order was not ranked with the senate and people as a third branch of the republic till the consulship of Cicero who assumes the merit of the establishment (Plin Hist Natur xxxiii 3 [8] Beaufort, République Romaine, tom i p 144–155)

35 The republican plan of Arnold of Brescia is thus stated by Gunther —

Quin etiam titulos urbis renovare vetustos
Nomine plebeio secernere nomen equestre
Jura tribunorum, sanctum reparare senatum,
Et senio fessas mutasque reponere leges
Lapsa ruinosis et adhuc pendentia muris
Reddere primævo Capitolia prisca nitori.

But of these reformations some were no more than ideas others no more than words

36 After many disputes among the antiquaries of Rome it seems determined that the summit of the Capitoline hill next the river is strictly the Mons Tarpeius the Arx and that on the other summit the church and convent of Araceli, the barefoot friars of St Francis occupy the temple of Jupiter (Nardini Roma Antica, l v c. 11–16)

37 Tacit Hist iii 69, 70

38 This partition of the noble and baser metals between the emperor and senate must however be adopted, not as a positive fact but as the probable opinion of the best antiquaries (see the Science des Médailles of the Père Joubert, tom ii p 208–211 in the improved and scarce edition of the Baron de la Bastie)

39 In his twenty seventh dissertation on the Antiquities of Italy (tom ii p 559–569) Muratori exhibits a series of the senatorian coins, which bore the obscure names of Affortiati Infortiati Provisini, Paparini During this period all the popes without excepting Boniface VIII abstained from the right of coining which was resumed by his successor Benedict XI and regularly exercised in the court of Avignon

40 A German historian Gerard of Reicherspeg (in Baluz Miscell tom v p 64 apud Schmidt Hist des Allemands tom iii p 265) thus describes the constitution of Rome in the eleventh century Grandiora urbis et orbis negotia spectant ad Romanum pontificem itemque ad Romanum Imperatorem sive illius vicarium urbis præfectum, qui de suâ dignitate respicit utrumque videlicet dominum papam cui facit hominium et dominum imperatorem a quo accipit suæ potestatis insigne, scilicet gladium exertum

41 The words of a contemporary writer (Pandulph Pisan in Vit Paschal II p 357 358) describe the election and oath of the præfect in 1118 inconsultis patribus loca præfectoria Laudes præfectoriæ comitiorum applausum juraturum populo in ambonem sublevant confirmari cum in urbe præfectum petunt

42 Urbis præfectum ad ligiam fidelitatem recepit et per mantum quod illi donavit de præfecturâ eum publice investivit, qui usque ad id tempus juramento fidelitatis imperatori fuit obligatus et ab eo præfecturæ tenuit honorem (Gesta Innocent III in Muratori tom iii P i p 487)

43 See Otho Frising Chron vii 31 de Gest Frederic I l i c 27

44 Our countryman Roger Hoveden speaks of the single senators of the Capuzzi family etc quorum temporibus melius regebatur Roma quam nunc (A D 1194) est temporibus lvi senatorum (Ducange Gloss tom vi p 191, SENATORES)

45 Muratori (dissert xlii tom iii p 785–788) has published an original treaty Concordia inter D nostrum papam Clementem III et senatores populi Romani super regalibus et aliis dignitatibus urbis etc anno 44° senatus The senate speaks and speaks with authority Reddimus ad præsens habebimus dabitis presbyteria jurabimus pacem et fidelitatem etc A chartula de Tenimentis Tusculani dated in the forty seventh year of the same era and confirmed decreto amplissimi ordinis senatus acclamatione P R publice Capitolio consistentis It is there we find the difference of senatores consiliarii and simple senators (Muratori dissert xlii tom iii p 787–789)

46 Muratori (dissert xlv tom. iv p 64–92) has fully explained this mode of government and the Occulus Pastoralis which he has given at the end is a treatise or sermon on the duties of these foreign magistrates

47 In the Latin writers at least of the silver age the title of Potestas was transferred from the office to the magistrate —

Hujus qui trahitur prætextam sumere mavis,
An Fidenarum Gabiorumque esse Potestas
(Juvenal Satir x. 99)

48 See the life and death of Brancaleone in the Historia Major of Matthew Paris p 741 757 792 797 799 810 823 833 836 840 The multitude of pilgrims and suitors connected Rome and St Alban s and the resentment of the English clergy prompted them to rejoice whenever the popes were humbled and oppressed

49 Matthew Paris thus ends his account Caput vero ipsius Brancaleonis in vase pretioso super marmoream columnam collocatum in signum sui valoris et probitatis quasi reliquias, superstitiose nimis et pompose sustulerunt Fuerat enim superborum potentum et malefactorum urbis malleus et exstirpator et populi protector et defensor veritatis et justitiæ imitator et amator (p 840) A biographer of Innocent IV (Muratori Script tom iii P i p 591 592) draws a less favourable portrait of this Ghibeline senator

50 The election of Charles of Anjou to the office of perpetual senator of Rome is mentioned by the historians in the eighth volume of the Collection of Muratori by Nicholas de Jamsilla (p 592) the monk of Padua (p. 724) Sabas Malaspina (l ii c. 9, p. 808) and Ricordano Malespini (c. 177 p. 949)

51 The high-sounding bull of Nicholas III, which founds his temporal sovereignty on the donation of Constantine is still extant and as it has been inserted by Boniface VIII in the Sexte of the Decretals, it must be received by the Catholics or at least by the Papists, as a sacred and perpetual law

52 I am indebted to Fleury (Hist Ecclés. tom xviii. p 306) for an extract of this Roman act which he has taken from the Ecclesiastical Annals of Odericus Raynaldus A D 1281 No 14, 15

53 These letters and speeches are preserved by Otho bishop of Frisingen (Fabric. Biblioth Lat. med. et infim. tom. v p 186 187) perhaps the noblest of historians he was son of Leopold marquis of Austria his mother Agnes was daughter of the emperor Henry IV and he was half brother and uncle to Conrad III and Frederic I He has left in seven books a Chronicle of the Times in two the Gesta Frederici I the last of which is inserted in the sixth volume of Muratori's Historians.

54 We desire (said the ignorant Romans) to restore the empire in eum statum, quo fuit tempore Constantini et Justiniani qui totum orbem vigore senatus et populi Romani suis tenuere manibus.

55 Otho Frising de Gestis Frederici I l i. c. 8, p 662–664.

56 Hospes eras civem feci Advena fuisti ex Transalpinis partibus principem constitui

57 Non cessit nobis nudum imperium, virtute sua amictum venit ornamenta sua secum traxit. Penes nos sunt consules tui etc Cicero or Livy would not have rejected these images the eloquence of a barbarian born and educated in the Hercynian forest

58 Otho of Frisingen who surely understood the language of the court and diet of Germany speaks of the Franks in the twelfth century as the reigning nation (Proceres Franci equites Franci manus Francorum) he adds however the epithet of *Teuto*nici

59 Otho Frising de Gestis Frederici I l ii. c. 22 p 720–72 These original and authentic acts I have translated and abridged with freedom, yet with fidelity

60 From the chronicle of Ricobaldo and Francis Pipin, Muratori (diss rt xxvi tom i p 492) has transcribed this curious fact with the doggerel verses *that accompan*ied the gift —

A e decus orb a e ... tus tib destinor ave!
Currus ab Augu to l eder co Caesare justo
Vae M ... olanum! jam sentis spernere ... anum
Imperii vires propria tib tollere vi es
Ergo triumphorum u ... bs potes m mor esse pr orum
Quo ... bi mitt bant reges qu bella gerebant

Ne si dee tacer (I now use the Italian Dissertations tom i p 444) che n ll anno 1727 una copia desso Carocio in marmo dianzi ignoto si scopri nel Campidoglio presso alle carcere di quel luogo dove Sisto V l avea falto rinchiudere Stava esso posto sopra quatro colonne di marmo fino colla sequente inscrizione etc. to the same purpose as the old inscription

61 The decline of the Imperial arms and authority in Italy is related with impartial learning in the Annals of Muratori (tom. x xi xii) and the reader may compare his narrative with the Histoire des Allemands (tom iii iv) by Schmidt, who has deserved the esteem of his countrymen.

62 Tibur nunc suburbanum, et æstivæ Præneste deliciæ nuncupatis in Capitolio votis petebantur The whole passage of Florus (l i c. 11) may be read with pleasure and has deserved the praise of a man of genius (Œuvres de Montesquieu tom iii p 634, 635 quarto edition)

63 Ne a feritate Romanorum sicut fuerant Hostienses Portuenses Tusculanenses Albanenses, Labicenses et nuper Tiburtini destruerentur (Matthew Paris p 757) These events are marked in the Annals and Index (the eighteenth volume) of Muratori

64 For the state or ruin of these suburban cities, the banks of the Tiber etc. see the lively picture of the P Labat (Voyage en Espagne et en Italie) who had long resided in the neighbourhood of Rome and the more accurate description of which P Eschinard (Roma 1750 in octavo) has added to the topographical map of Cingolani.

65 Labat (tom. iii p 233) mentions a recent decree of the Roman government which has severely mortified the pride and poverty of Tivoli in civitate Tiburtinâ non vivitur civil*iter*

66 I depart from my usual method of quoting only by the date the Annals of Muratori in consideration of the critical balance in which he has weighed nine contemporary writers who mention the battle of Tusculum (tom. x. p 42 44)

67 Matthew Paris p 345. This bishop of Winchester was Peter de Rupibus who occupied the see thirty two years (A D 1206–1238) and is described by the English historian as a soldier and a statesman (p 178 399)

68 See Mosheim Institut Histor Ecclesiast p 401 403 Alexander himself had nearly been the victim of a contested election and the doubtful merits of Innocent had only preponderated by the weight of genius and learning which St Bernard cast into the scale (see his life and writings)

69 The origin titles importance, dress precedency etc of the Roman cardinals are very ably discussed by Thomassin (Discipline de l Eglise tom i p 1262–1287) but their purple is now much faded The sacred college was raised to the definit number of seventy two to represent under his vicar the disciples of Christ

70 See the bull of Gregory X approbante sacro concilio in the Sexte of the Canon Law (l i tit 6 c 3) a supplement to the Decretals which Boniface VIII promulgated at Rome in 1298

and addressed to all the universities of Europe

71 The genius of Cardinal de Retz had a right to paint a conclave (of 1655) in which he was a spectator and an actor (Mémoires tom iv p 15-57) but I am at a loss to appreciate the knowledge or authority of an anonymous Italian whose history (Conclavi de Pontifici Romani in 4to, 1667) has been continued since the reign of Alexander VII The accidental form of the work furnishes a lesson though not an antidote to ambition From a labyrinth of intrigues we emerge to the adoration of the successful candidate but the next page opens with his funeral

72 The expressions of Cardinal de Retz are positive and picturesque On y vécut toujours ensemble avec le même respect et la même civilité que l on observe dans le cabinet des rois avec la même politesse qu on avoit dans la cour de Henri III avec la même familiarité que l on voit dans les collèges avec la même modestie qui se remarque dans les noviciats et avec la même charité, du moins en apparence qui pourroit être entre des frères parfaitement unis

73 Richiesti per bando (says John Villani) sanatori di Roma e 52 del popolo et capitani de 25 e consoli (consoli?) et 13 buone huomini uno per rione Our knowledge is too imperfect to pronounce how much of this constitution was temporary and how much ordinary and permanent Yet it is faintly illustrated by the ancient statutes of Rome

74 Villani (l x c 68-71 in Muratori Script tom xiii p 641-645) relates this law, and the whole transaction with much less abhorrence than the prudent Muratori Any one conversant with the darker ages must have observed how much the sense (I mean the nonsense) of superstition is fluctuating and inconsistent

75 In the first volume of the Popes of Avignon see the second original Life of John XXII p 142-145 the confession of the antipope p 145-152 and the laborious notes of Baluze p 714 715

76 Romani autem non valentes nec volentes ultra suam celare cupiditatem gravissimam contra papam movere cœperunt questionem exigentes ab eo urgentissime omnia quæ subierant per ejus absentiam damna et jacturas videlicet in hospitiis locandis in mercimoniis in usuris, in redditibus in provisionibus et in aliis modis innumerabilibus. Quòd cum audisset papa præcordialiter ingemuit et se comperiens muscipulatum etc Matt Paris p 757 For the ordinary history of the popes their life and death their residence and absence it is enough to refer to the ecclesiastical annalists Spondanus and Fleury

77 Besides the general historians of the church of Italy and of France, we possess a valuable treatise composed by a learned friend of Thuanus which his last and best editors have published in the appendix (Histoire particulière du grand Différend entre Boniface VIII et Philippe le Bel, par Pierre du Puis tom vii P xi. p 61-82)

78 It is difficult to know whether Labat (tom iv p 53-57) be in jest or in earnest when he supposes that Anagni still feels the weight of this curse, and that the corn fields or vineyards, or olive trees are annually blasted by Nature, the obsequious handmaid of the popes

79 See in the Chronicle of Giovanni Villani (l. viii c. 63 64, 80, in Muratori, tom xiii) the imprisonment of Boniface VIII and the election of Clement V the last of which like most anecdotes, is embarrassed with some difficulties

80 The original lives of the eight popes of Avignon—Clement V John XXII Benedict XII, Clement VI Innocent VI Urban V Gregory XI and Clement VII —are published by Stephen Baluze (Vitæ Paparum Avenionensium Paris, 1693 2 vols in 4to) with copious and elaborate notes and a second volume of acts and documents With the true zeal of an editor and a patriot he devoutly justifies or excuses the characters of his countrymen

81 The exile of Avignon is compared by the Italians with Babylon and the Babylonish captivity Such furious metaphors more suitable to the ardour of Petrarch than to the judgment of Muratori are gravely refuted in Baluze s preface The abbé de Sade is distracted between the love of Petrarch and of his country Yet he modestly pleads that many of the local inconveniences of Avignon are now removed and many of the vices against which the poet declaims had been imported with the Roman court by the strangers of Italy (tom. i p 23-28)

82 The comtat Venaissin was ceded to the popes in 1273 by Philip III king of France, after he had inherited the dominions of the count of Toulouse Forty years before the heresy of Count Raymond had given them a pretence of seizure and they derived some obscure claim from the eleventh century to some lands citra Rhodanum (Valesii Notitia Galliarum p 459 610 Longuerue Description de la France tom i p 376-381)

83 If a possession of four centuries were not itself a title such objection might annul the bargain, but the purchase money must be refunded for indeed it was paid Civitatem Avenionem emit per ejusmodi venditionem pecuniâ redundates, etc (iida Vita Clement VI in Baluz tom i p 272 Muratori Script tom iii. P ii p 565) The only temptation for Jane and her second husband was ready money and without it they could not have returned to the throne of Naples.

84 Clement V immediately promoted ten cardinals nine French and one English (Vita iv ta p 63 et Baluz p 625 etc) In 1331 the pope refused two candidates recommended by the king of France quod xx cardinales de quibus xvii de regno Franciæ originem traxisse noscuntur in memorato collegio existant (Thomassin Discipline de l Eglise tom i p 1281)

85 Our primitive account is from Cardinal James Caietan (Maxima Biblioth Patrum, tom

xiv) and I am at a loss to determine whether the nephew of Boniface VIII be a fool or a knave the uncle is a much clearer character

86. See John Villani (L viii. c. 36) in the twelfth and the Chronicon Astense in the eleventh volume (p. 191 192) of Muratori's Collection Papa innumerabilem pecuniam ab eisdem accepit, nam duo clerici cum rastris etc

87 The two bulls of Boniface VIII and Clement VI are inserted in the Corpus Juris Canonici (Extravagant Commun. L v tit ix. c 1 2)

88. The sabbatic years and jubilees of the Mosaic law (Car Sigon. de Republicâ Hebræorum, Opp. tom. iv l. iii. c. 14, 15 p 151 152) the suspension of all care and labour the periodical release of lands debts servitude etc may seem a noble idea but the execution would be impracticable in a profane republic and I should be glad to learn that this ruinous festival was observed by the Jewish people.

89. See the Chronicle of Matteo Villani (L i. c. 56) in the fourteenth volume of Muratori, and the Mémoires sur la Vie de Petrarque tom. iii p 75-89.

90. The subject is exhausted by M Chais a French minister at the Hague in his Lettres Historiques et Dogmatiques sur les Jubilés et les Indulgences la Haye 1751 3 vols. in 12mo an elaborate and pleasing work, had not the author preferred the character of a polemic to that of a philosopher

91 Muratori (Dissert xlvii.) alleges the Annals of Florence, Padua Genoa etc. the analogy of the rest, the evidence of Otho of Frisingen (de Gest. Fred. I l. ii. c. 13) and the submission of the marquis of Este.

92 As early as the year 824 the emperor Lothaire I found it expedient to interrogate the Roman people, to learn from each individual by what national law he chose to be governed (Muratori, Dissert xxii.)

93 Petrarch attacks these foreigners the tyrants of Rome, in a declamation or epistle full of bold truths and absurd pedantry in which he applies the maxims and even prejudices of the old republic to the state of the fourteenth century (Mémoires, tom iii. p 157-169)

94. The origin and adventures of this Jewish family are noticed by Pagi (Critica, tom iv p 435, A.D 1124, No 3 4) who draws his information from the Chronographus Maurigniacensis, and Arnulphus Sagiensis de Schismate (in Muratori, Script Ital tom. iii. P i. p 423-432) The fact must in some degree be true yet I could wish that it had been coolly related before it was turned into a reproach against the antipope.

95. Muratori has given two dissertations (xli. and xlii.) to the names, surnames and families of Italy Some nobles who glory in their domestic fables, may be offended with his firm and temperate criticism yet surely some ounces of pure gold are of more value than many pounds of base metal.

96 The cardinal of St George in his poetical, or rather metrical history of the election and coronation of Boniface VIII (Muratori Script Ital. tom. iii. P i p 641 etc.) describes the state and families of Rome at the coronation of Boniface VIII (A D 1295) —

> Interea titulis redimiti sanguine et armis

> Nomen in emeritos tantæ virtutis honores

The ancient statutes of Rome (L iii c. 59, p. 174, 175) distinguish eleven families of barons, who are obliged to swear in concilio communi before the senator that they would not harbour or protect any malefactors outlaws etc.—a feeble security!

99. Te longinqua dedit tellus et pascua Rheni, says Petrarch and in 1417 a duke of Guelders and Juliers acknowledges (Lenfant Hist du Concile de Constance, tom. ii p 539) his descent from the ancestors of Martin V (Otho Colonna) but the royal author of the Memoirs of Brandenburg observes that the sceptre in his arms has been confounded with the column. To maintain the Ro*man origin of the Colonna it was ingeniously sup*posed (Diario di Monaldeschi, in the Script. 42 The original letter in which Rienzi justifies his treatment of the Colonna (Hocsemius, apud Du Cerçeau p 222-229) displays in genuine colours, the mixture of the knave and the mad man.

43 Rienzi, in the above mentioned letter ascribes to St. Martin the tribune Boniface VIII the enemy of Colonna himself and the Roman people, the glory of the day which Villani likewise (l. xii. c. 104) describes as a regular battle The disorderly skirmish the flight of the Romans and the cowardice of Rienzi are painted in the simple and minute narrative of Fortifiocca, or the anonymous citizen (l. ii c. 34-37)

44. In describing the fall of the Colonna, I speak only of the family of Stephen the elder who is often confounded by the P du Cerçeau with his son. That family was extinguished, but the house has been perpetuated in the collateral branches of which I have not a very accurate knowledge. Circumspice (says Petrarch) familiae tuae statum. Columniensium domos solito pauciores habeat columnas Quid ad rem? modo fundamentum stabile solidumque permaneat.

45. The convent of St Silvester was founded, endowed and protected by the Colonna cardinals, for the daughters of the family who embraced a monastic life and who in the year 1318 were twelve in number The others were allowed to marry with their kinsmen in the fourth degree and the dispensation was justified by the small number and close alliances of the noble families of Rome (Mémoires sur Pétrarque tom i p 110 tom. ii p. 401)

46 Petrarch wrote a stiff and pedantic letter of consolation (Fam l. vii epist 13 p 682 683) The friend was lost in the patriot Nulla toto orbe principum familia carior carior tamen respublica, carior Roma carior Italia

> Je rends grâces aux Dieux de n'être pas Romain.

47 This council and opposition is obscurely mentioned by Pollistore a contemporary writer who has preserved some curious and original facts. (Rer Italicarum tom xxv c 31 p 798-804)

48. The briefs and bulls of Clement VI against Rienzi are translated by the P du Cerçeau (p 196 232) from the ecclesiastical Annals of Oderícus Raynaldus (A D 1347 No 15, 17 21 etc.) who found them in the archives of the Vatican

49 Matteo Villani describes the origin character and death of this count of Mino bino a man da natura inconstante e senza fede, whose grand father a crafty notary was enriched and ennobled by the spoils of the Saracens of Nocera (l. vii. c. 102 103) See his imprisonment and the efforts of Petrarch tom ii p 149-151

50 The troubles of Rome from the departure to the return of Rienzi are related by Matteo Villani (l. ii. c. 47 l. iii c. 33 57 78) and Thomas Fortifiocca (l. iii. c. 1-4) I have slightly passed over these secondary characters, who imitated the original tribune

51 These visions of which the friends and enemies of Rienzi seem alike ignorant are surely magnified by the zeal of Pollistore a Dominican inquisitor (Rer Ital. tom xxv c. 36 p 819) Had the tribune taught that Christ was succeeded by the Holy Ghost that the tyranny of the pope would be abolished he might have been convicted of heresy and treason without offending the Roman people.

52 The astonishment the envy almost of Petrarch is a proof if not of the truth of this incredible fact at least of his own veracity The abbé de Sade (Mémoires, tom. iii. p 242) quotes the sixth epistle of the thirteenth book of Petrarch but it is of the royal MS which he consulted, and not of the ordinary Basil edition (p 920)

53 Ægidius or Giles Albornoz a noble Spaniard archbishop of Toledo and cardinal legate in Italy (A D 1353-1367) restored by his arms and counsels, the temporal dominion of the popes. His life has been separately written by Sepulveda but Dryden could not reasonably suppose that his name, or that of Wolsey had reached the ears of the Mufti in Don Sebastian.

54. From Matteo Villani and Fortifiocca, the P du Cerçeau (p 344-394) has extracted the life and death of the Chevalier Montreal, the life of a robber and the death of a hero At the head of a free company the first that desolated Italy he became rich and formidable he had money in all the banks—60 000 ducats in Padua alone.

55 The exile second government and death of Rienzi, are minutely related by the anonymous Roman who appears neither his friend nor his enemy (l. iii. c. 12-25) Petrarch who loved the tribune was indifferent to the fate of the senator

56 The hopes and the disappointment of Petrarch are agreeably described in his own words by the French biographer (Mémoires tom iii. p 375-413) but the deep though secret, wound was the coronation of Zanubi the poet laureat by Charles IV

57 See in his accurate and amusing biographer the application of Petrarch and Rome to Benedict XII in the year 1334 (Mémoires tom i. p 261-265) to Clement VI in 1342 (tom. ii p 45-47) and to Urban V in 1366 (tom iii. p 677-691) his praise (p 711-715) and excuse (p 771) of the last of these pontiffs His angry controversy on the respective merits of France and Italy may be found Opp p 1068-1085.

26 In one MS I read (l ii c 4 p 409) perfumante quatro solli in another quatro fiorini—an important variety since the florin was worth ten Roman solidi (Muratori dissert xxviii) The former reading would give us a population of 25 000 the latter of 250 000 families and I much fear that the former is more consistent with the decay of Rome and her territory

28 Fortifiocca l ii c 11 From the account of this shipwreck we learn some circumstances of the trade and navigation of the age 1 The ship was built and freighted at Naples for the ports of Marseilles and Avignon 2 The sailors were of Naples and the isle of Œnaria less skilful than those of Sicily and Genoa 3 The navigation from Marseilles was a coasting voyage to the mouth of the Tiber, where they took shelter in a storm but, instead of finding the current unfortunately ran on a shoal the vessel was stranded the mariners escaped 4 The cargo which was pillaged consisted of the revenue of Provence for the royal treasury many bags of pepper and cinnamon and bales of French cloth to the value of 20 000 florins a rich prize

29 It was thus that Oliver Cromwell s old acquaintance who remembered his vulgar and ungracious entrance into the House of Commons, were astonished at the ease and majesty of the Protector on his throne (see Harris s Life of Cromwell, p 27–34 from Clarendon Warwick Whitelocke, Waller etc) The consciousness of merit and power will sometimes elevate the manners to the station

32 See the Epistola Hortatoria de Capessenda Republica, from Petrarch to Nicholas Rienzi (Opp p 535–540) and the fifth eclogue or pastoral a perpetual and obscure allegory

33 In his Roman Questions, Plutarch ([c 81 Opuscul tom 1 p 505, 506 edit Græc. Hen Steph) states, on the most constitutional principles the simple greatness of the tribunes who were not properly magistrates but a check on magistracy It was their duty and interest ὁμοιοῦσθαι καὶ σχήματι καὶ στολῇ καὶ διαίτῃ τοῖς ἐπιτυγχάνουσι των πολιτων καταπατεῖσθαι δεῖ (a saying of C Curio) καὶ μὴ σεμνὸν εἶναι τῃ ὄψει μηδὲ δυσπρόσοδον ὅσῳ δὲ μαλλον ἐκταπεινουται τῷ σωματι τοσουτῳ μαλλον αὔξεται τῃ δυνάμει etc Rienzi and Petrarch himself were incapable perhaps of reading a Greek philosopher, but they might have imbibed the same modest doctrines from their favourite Latins Livy and Valerius Maximus

34 I could not express in English the forcible though barbarous title of Zelator Italiæ which Rienzi assumed

35 Era bell homo (l ii c 1, p 399) It is remarkable that the riso sarcastico of the Bracciano edition is wanting in the Roman MS from which Muratori has given the text In his second reign when he is painted almost as a monster Rienzi travea una ventresca tonna trionfale a modo de uno Abbate Asiano, or Asinino (l iii c 18, p 523)

36 Strange as it may seem this festival was not without a precedent In the year 1327 two barons a Colonna and an Ursini, the usual balance, were created knights by the Roman people their bath was of rose water their beds were decked with royal magnificence, and they were served at St Maria of Araceli in the Capitol by the twenty eight buoni huomini They afterwards received from Robert king of Naples the sword of chivalry (Hist Rom l i c 2 p 259)

37 All parties believed in the leprosy and bath of Constantine (Petrarch Epist Famil vi 2) and Rienzi justified his own conduct by observing to the court of Avignon that a vase which had been used by a pagan could not be profaned by a pious Christian Yet this crime is specified in the bull of excommunication (Hocsemius apud du Cerçeau, p 189 190)

38 This verbal summons of Pope Clement VI which rests on the authority of the Roman historian and a Vatican MS is disputed by the biographer of Petrarch (tom ii not p 70–76) with arguments rather of decency than of weight The court of Avignon might not choose to agitate this delicate question

39 The summons of the two rival emperors a monument of freedom and folly is extant in Hocsemius (Cerçeau p 163–166)

40 It is singular that the Roman historian should have overlooked this sevenfold coronation which is sufficiently proved by internal evidence and the testimony of Hocsemius and even of Rienzi (Cerçeau p 167–170 229)

ambassadors against those of France. The latter contended that Christendom was essentially distributed into the four great nations and votes of Italy Germany France and Spain and that the lesser kingdoms (such as England, Denmark, Portugal, etc.) were comprehended under one or other of these great divisions. The English asserted that the British islands, of which they were the head, would be considered as a fifth and co-ordinate nation, with an equal vote and every argument of truth or fable was introduced to exalt the dignity of their country Including England, Scotland, Wales, the four kingdoms of Ireland and the Orkneys, the British islands are decorated with eight royal crowns, and discriminated by four or five languages, English, Welsh, Cornish Scotch Irish, etc. The greater island from north to south measures 800 miles, or 40 days journey and England alone contains 32 counties and 52 000 parish churches (a bold account!) besides cathedrals, colleges, priories, and hospitals. They celebrate the mission of St. Joseph of Arimathea, the birth of Constantine, and the legatine powers of the two primates, without forgetting the testimony of Bartholemy de Glanville (A.D 1360) who reckons only four Christian kingdoms—1 of Rome 2 of Constantinople 3, of Ireland which had been transferred to the English monarchs and, 4, of Spain Our countrymen prevailed in the council but the victories of Henry V added much weight to their arguments. The adverse pleadings were found at Constance by Sir Robert Wingfield, ambassador from Henry VIII to the emperor Maximilian I and by him printed in 1517 at Louvain From a Leipsic MS they are more correctly published in the Collection of Von der Hardt tom. v but I have only seen Lenfant's abstract of these acts (Concile de Constance, tom. ii. p 447 453 etc.)

76 The histories of the three successive councils Pisa, Constance and Basil, have been written with a tolerable degree of candour industry and elegance, by a Protestant minister M. Lenfant who retired from France to Berlin They form six volumes in quarto and as Basil is the worst so Constance is the best, part of the Collection

77 See the twenty seventh Dissertation of the Antiquities of Muratori and the first Instruction of the Science des Médailles of the Père Joubert and the Baron de la Bastie. The Metallic History of Martin V and his successors has been composed by two monks Moulinet a Frenchman and Bonanni an Italian but I understand that the first part of the series is restored from more recent coins.

78. Besides the Lives of Eugenius IV (Rerum Italic tom iii P i p 869, and tom xxv p 256) the Diaries of Paul Petroni and Stephen Infessura are the best original evidence for the revolt of the Romans against Eugenius IV The former who lived at the time and on the spot speaks the language of a citizen, equally afraid of priestly and popular tyranny

79. The coronation of Frederic III is described by Lenfant (Concile de Basle tom. ii p 276-288) from Eneas Sylvius, a spectator and actor in that splendid scene.

80. The oath of fidelity imposed on the emperor by the pope is recorded and sanctified in the Clementines (l. ii tit ix) and Eneas Sylvius who objects to this new demand, could not foresee that in a few years he should ascend the throne and imbibe the maxims of Boniface VIII

81 Lo senatore di Roma vestito di brocarto con quella beretta e con quelle maniche et ornamenti di pelle co quali va alle feste di Testaccio e Nagone might escape the eye of Æneas Sylvius, but he is viewed with admiration and complacency by the Roman citizen (Diario di Stephano Infessura, p. 1133)

82 See in the statutes of Rome the senator and three judges (l. i. c. 3-14) the conservators (l. i c 15, 16 17 l. iii. c. 4) the caporioni (l. i. c. 18 l iii c. 8) the secret council (l. iii. c. 2) the common council (l. iii. c. 3) The title of feuds defiances acts of violence etc. is spread through many a chapter (c. 14-40) of the second book.

83 Statuta almæ Urbis Romæ Auctoritate S D N Gregorii XIII Pont. Max a Senatû Populoque Rom. reformata et edita. Romæ 1580 in folio The obsolete repugnant statutes of antiquity were confounded in five books and Lucas Pætus a lawyer and antiquarian, was appointed to act as the modern Tribonian. Yet I regret the old code with the rugged crust of freedom and barbarism

84. In my time (1765) and in M Grosley's (Observations sur l Italie tom. ii. p 361) the senator of Rome was M B elke a noble Swede and a proselyte to the Catholic faith. The pope's right to appoint the senator and the conservator is implied rather than affirmed, in the statutes.

85 Besides the curious though concise, narrative of Machiavel (Istoria F orentina L vi. Opere, tom i p 210, 211, edit Londra, 1747 in 4to) the Porcarian conspiracy is related in the Diary of Stephen Infessura (Rer Ital. tom iii. P ii. p 1134, 1135) and in a separate tract by Leo Baptista Alberti (Rer Ital. tom xxv p 609-614) It is amusing to compare the style and sentiments of the courtier and citizen. Facinus profecto quo neque periculo horribilius, neque audaciâ detestabilius, neque crudelitate tetrius a quoquam per ditissimo uspiam excog tatum sit Perdette la vita quell huomo da bene e amatore dello bene e l bertà di Roma

86 The disorders of Rome, which were much inflamed by the partiality of Sixtus IV are exposed in the Diaries of two spectators Stephen Infessura and an anonymous citizen See the troubles of the year 1484, and the death of the protonotary Colonna in tom. iii. P ii p 1083 1158

87 Est toute la terre de l église troublée pour cette partialité (des Colonnes et des Ursins) comme nous dirions Luce et Grammont ou en Hollande Houc et Caballan et quand ce ne seroit

simple and persuasive (Senhum, l vii p 811–827 l ix epist 1 p 844–854)

59 I have not leisure to expatiate on the legends of St Bridget or St Catherine the last of which might furnish some amusing stories Their effect on the mind of Gregory XI is attested by the last solemn words of the dying pope, who admonished the assistants ut caverant ab hominibus, sive viris sive mulieribus, sub specie religionis loquentibus visiones sui capitis quia per tales ipse seductus etc (Baluz Not ad Vit Pap Avenionensium tom 1 p 1223)

60 This predatory expedition is related by Froissard (Chronique tom 1 p 230) and in the Life of Du Guesclin (Collection Générale des Mémoires Historiques, tom iv c. 16 p 107–113) As early as the year 1361 the court of Avignon had been molested by similar freebooters who afterwards passed the Alps (Mémoires sur Pétrarque, tom iii p 563–569)

61 Fleury alleges, from the annals of Odericus Raynaldus the original treaty which was signed the 21st of December 1376 between Gregory XI and the Romans (Hist Eccles tom xx p 275)

62 The first crown or regnum (Ducange, Gloss Latin tom v p 701) on the episcopal mitre of the popes is ascribed to the gift of Constantine or Clovis The second was added by Boniface VIII as the emblem not only of a spiritual but of a temporal kingdom The three states of the church are represented by the triple crown which was introduced by John XXII or Benedict XII (Memoires sur Petrarque tom 1 p 258 259)

63 Baluze (Not ad Pap Avenion. tom 1 p 1194, 1195) produces the original evidence which attests the threats of the Roman ambassadors, and the resignation of the abbot of Mount Cassin qui, ultro se offerens respondit se civem Romanum esse et illud velle quod ipsi vellent

64. The return of the popes from Avignon to Rome and their reception by the people are related in the original Lives of Urban V and Gregory XI in Baluze (Vit Paparum Avenionensium, tom 1 p 363–486) and Muratori (Script Rer Italicarum tom iii P 1 p 610–712) In the disputes of the schism every circumstance was severely though partially scrutinised, more especially in the great inquest which decided the obedience of Castile, and to which Baluze in his notes so often and so largely appeals from a MS volume in the Harley library (p 1281 etc)

65 Can the death of a good man be esteemed a punishment by those who believe in the immortality of the soul? They betray the instability of their faith Yet as a mere philosopher I cannot agree with the Greeks ὃν οἱ θεοὶ φιλοῦσιν ἀποθνήσκει νέος (Brunck Poetæ Gnomici, p 231) See in Herodotus (l i. c. 31) the moral and pleasing tale of the Argive youths

66 In the first book of the Histoire du Concile de Pise M Lenfant has abridged and compared the original narratives of the adherents of Urban and Clement of the Italians and Germans the French and Spaniards The latter appear to be the most active and loquacious and every fact and word in the original lives of Gregory XI and Clement VII are supported in the notes of their editor Baluze.

67 The ordinal numbers of the popes seem to decide the question against Clement VII and Benedict XIII who are boldly stigmatised as antipopes by the Italians while the French are content with authorities and reasons to plead the cause of doubt and toleration (Baluz in Præfat) It is singular or rather it is not singular, that saints, visions, and miracles should be common to both parties.

68 Baluze strenuously labours (Not p 1271–1280) to justify the pure and pious motives of Charles V king of France he refused to hear the arguments of Urban but were not the Urbanists equally deaf to the reasons of Clement, etc.?

69 An epistle or declamation, in the name of Edward III (Baluz Vit Pap Avenion tom 1 p 553) displays the zeal of the English nation against the Clementines Nor was their zeal confined to words the bishop of Norwich led a crusade of 60 000 bigots beyond sea (Hume s History, vol. iii. p 57, 58)

70 Besides the general historians the Diaries of Delphinus Gentilis, Peter Antonius, and Stephen Infessura, in the great Collection of Muratori represent the state and misfortunes of Rome

71 It is supposed by Giannone (tom iii p 292) that he styled himself Rex Romæ, a title unknown to the world since the expulsion of Tarquin But a nearer inspection has justified the reading of Rex Ramæ of Rama an obscure kingdom annexed to the crown of Hungary

72 The leading and decisive part which France assumed in the schism is stated by Peter du Puis in a separate history extracted from authentic records and inserted in the seventh volume of the last and best edition of his friend Thuanus (P xi p 110–184)

73 Of this measure John Gerson a stout doctor was the author or the champion The proceedings of the university of Paris and the Gallican church were often prompted by his advice and are copiously displayed in his theological writings of which Le Clerc (Bibliothèque Choisie, tom x p 1–78) has given a valuable extract John Gerson acted an important part in the councils of Pisa and Constance

74. Leonardus Brunus Aretinus, one of the revivers of classic learning in Italy, who, after serving many years as secretary in the Roman court retired to the honourable office of chancellor of the republic of Florence (Fabric. Biblioth medii Ævi tom 1 p 290) Lenfant has given the version of this curious epistle (Concile de Pise, tom 1 p 192–195)

75 I cannot overlook this great national cause, which was vigorously maintained by the English

§ Historia Arcana Alexandri VI sive Excerpta ex Diario Joh. Burcardi (A.D 1492–1503) edita a Godefr Gulielm. Leibnizio Hanover 1697 in 4to The large and valuab e Journal of Burcard might be completed from the MSS in different libraries of Italy and France (M de Foncemagne in the Mémoires de l Acad des Inscrip. tom. XVII, p 597–606)

Except the last all these fragments and diaries are inserted in the Collections of Muratori my guide and master in the history of Italy His country and the public, are indebted to him for the following works on that subject — 1 Rerum Italicarum Scriptores (A.D 500–1500) quorum potissima pars nunc primum in lucem prodit etc twenty-eight vols in folio Milan, 1723–1738 1751 A volume of chronological and alphabetical tables is still wanting as a key to this great work, which is yet in a disorderly and defective state 2 Antiquitates Italiæ medii Ævi six vols. in folio Milan, 1738–1743, in seventy five curious dissertations on the manners, government religion etc of the Italians of the darker ages, with a large supplement of charters chronicles etc. 3 Dissertazioni sopra le Antiquità Italiane three vols in 4to Milano 1751 a free version by the author, which may be quoted with the same confidence as the Latin text of the Antiquities 4 Annali d'Italia eighteen vols. in octavo Milan 1753–1756 a dry though accurate and useful abridgment of the history of Italy from the birth of Christ to the middle of the eighteenth century 5 Dell' Antichità Estense ed Italiane two vols in folio Modena 1717 1740 In the history of this illustrious race the parent of our Brunswick kings the critic is not seduced by the loyalty or gratitude of the subject In all his works Muratori approves himself a diligent and laborious writer, who aspires above the prejudices of a Catholic priest He was born in the year 1672 and died in the year 1750 after passing near sixty years in the libraries of Milan and Modena (Vita del Proposto Ludovico Antonio Muratori by his nephew and successor Gian. Francesco Soli Muratori Venezia 1756 in 4to)

Chapter LXXI

1 I have already (notes 50 and 51 p 760 vol. II) mentioned the age character and writings of Poggius and particularly noticed the date of this elegant moral lecture on the varieties of fortune.

2 Consedimus in ipsis Tarpeiæ arcis ruinis, pone ingens portæ cujusdam, ut puto templi, marmoreum limen, plurimasque passim confractas columnas, unde magnâ ex parte prospectus urbis patet (p 5)

3 Æneid VIII. 97–369. This ancient picture so artfully introduced and so exquisitely finished, must have been highly interesting to an inhabitant of Rome and our early studies allow us to sympathise in the feelings of a Roman

6. Liber de Mirabilibus Romæ ex Registro Nicolai Cardinalis de Arragoniâ in Bibliothecâ St. Isidori Armario IV No 69. This treatise, with some short but pertinent notes has been published by Montfaucon (Diarium Italicum, p 283–301) who thus delivers his own critical opinion Scriptor xiiimi. circiter sæculi ut ibidem notatur antiquariæ rei imperitus et ut ab illo ævo nugis et anilibus fabellis refertus sed quia monumenta quæ iis temporibus Romæ supererant pro modulo recenset, non parum inde lucis mutuabitur qui Romanis antiquitatibus indagandis operam navabit (p 283)

7 The Père Mabillon (Analecta tom. IV p 502) has published an anonymous pilgrim of the ninth century who in his visit round the churches and holy places of Rome touches on several buildings especially porticoes which had disappeared before the thirteenth century

8 On the Septizonium see the Mémoires sur Pétrarque (tom I p 325) Donatus (p 338) and Nardini (p 117 414)

9. The age of the pyramids is remote and unknown since Diodorus Siculus (tom. I. l I. c. 44, p 72) is unable to decide whether they were constructed 1000 or 3400 years before the clxxx. Olympiad, Sir John Marsham s contracted scale of the Egyptian dynasties would fix them about 2000 years before Christ (Canon Chronicus p 47)

10 See the speech of Glaucus in the Iliad (VI 146) This natural but melancholy image is familiar to Homer

11 The learning and criticism of M des Vignoles (Histoire Critique de la Républ que des Lettres tom VIII p 74–118 IX p 172–187) dates the fire of Rome from A D 64 July 19 and the subsequent persecution of the Christians from November 15 of the same year

12 Quippe in regiones quatuordecim Roma dividitur quarum quatuor integræ manebant tres solo tenus dejectæ septem reliquis pauca tectorum vestigia supererant lacera et semiusta Among the old relics that were irreparably lost Tacitus enumerates the temple of the Moon of Servius Tullius

ce differend la terre de l'église seroit la plus heureuse habitation pour les sujets qui soit dans tout le monde (car ils ne payent ni tailles ni guères autres choses) et seroient toujours bien conduits (car toujours les papes sont sages et bien conseillés) mais très souvent en advient de grands et cruels meurtres et pilleries

88 By the economy of Sixtus V the revenue of the ecclesiastical state was raised to two millions and a half of Roman crowns (Vita tom ii p 291–296) and so regular was the military establishment, that in one month Clement VIII could invade the duchy of Ferrara with three thousand horse and twenty thousand foot (tom iii p 64) Since that time (A D 1597) the papal arms are happily rusted but the revenue must have gained some nominal increase.

89 More especially by Guicciardini and Machiavel in the general history of the former, in the Florentine history the 'Prince' and the political discourses of the latter These with their worthy successors Fra Paolo and Davila were justly esteemed the first historians of modern languages till in the present age Scotland arose to dispute the prize with Italy herself

90 In the history of the Gothic siege I have compared the barbarians with the subjects of Charles V (vol i p 1125)—an anticipation which like that of the Tartar conquests I indulged with the less scruple as I could scarcely hope to reach the conclusion of my work

91 The ambitious and feeble hostilities of the Caraffa pope Paul IV may be seen in Thuanus (l xvi–xviii) and Giannone (tom iv p 149–163) Those Catholic bigots Philip II and the duke of Alva, presumed to separate the Roman prince from the vicar of Christ yet the holy character, which would have sanctified his victory was decently applied to protect his defeat

92 This gradual change of manners and expense is admirably explained by Dr Adam Smith (Wealth of Nations Bk iii ch 4) who proves perhaps too severely that the most salutary effects have flowed from the meanest and most selfish causes

93 Mr Hume (Hist of England vol. i p 389) too hastily concludes that if the civil and ecclesiastical powers be united in the same person it is of little moment whether he be styled prince or prelate, since the temporal character will always predominate

94. A Protestant may disdain the unworthy preference of St Francis or St Dominic but he will not rashly condemn the zeal or judgment of Sixtus V, who placed the statues of the apostles St Peter and St Paul on the vacant columns of Trajan and Antonine

95 A wandering Italian Gregorio Leti has given the Vita di Sisto Quinto (Amstel 1721 three vols in 12mo) a copious and amusing work, but which does not command our absolute confidence Yet the character of the man and the principal facts are supported by the annals of Spondanus and Muratori (A D 1585–1590) and the contemporary history of the great Thuanus (l lxxxii c 1 2, l lxxxiv c 10 l c c 8)

96 These privileged places the quartieri or franchises, were adopted from the Roman nobles by the foreign ministers Julius II had once abolished the abominandum et detestandum franchitiarum hujusmodi nomen and after Sixtus V they again revived I cannot discern either the justice or magnanimity of Louis XIV, who in 1687 sent his ambassador the marquis de Lavardin to Rome with an armed force of a thousand officers guards and domestics to maintain this iniquitous claim and insult Pope Innocent XI in the heart of his capital (Vita di Sisto V tom iii p 260–278 Muratori Annali d Italia, tom xv p 494–496 and Voltaire, Siècle de Louis XIV tom ii c 14, p 58 59)

97 This outrage produced a decree which was inscribed on marble, and placed in the Capitol It is expressed in a style of manly simplicity and freedom Si quis sive privatus sive magistratum gerens de collocandâ vivo pontifici statuâ mentionem facere ausit, legitimo S P Q R decreto in perpetuum infamis et publicorum munerum expers esto MDXC mense Augusto (Vita di Sisto V tom. iii p 469) I believe that this decree is still observed and I know that every monarch who deserves a statue should himself impose the prohibition

98 The histories of the church Italy, and Christendom have contributed to the chapter which I now conclude In the original Lives of the Popes we often discover the city and republic of Rome and the events of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries are preserved in the rude and domestic chronicles which I have carefully inspected and shall recapitulate in the order of time

1 Monaldeschi (Ludovici Boncomitis) Fragmenta Annalium Roman (A D 1328) in the Scriptores Rerum Italicarum of Muratori tom xii p 525 N B The credit of this fragment is somewhat hurt by a singular interpolation, in which the author relates his own death at the age of 115 years

32 Yet Charlemagne washed and swam at Aix la-Chapelle with a hundred of his courtiers (Eginhart, c. 22 p. 108 109) and Muratori describes, as late as the year 814, the public baths which were built at Spoleto in Italy (Annali tom vi. p. 416)

33 See the Annals of Italy A.D 988 For this and the preceding fact Muratori himself is indebted to the Benedictine history of Père Mabillon.

40 As for instance Templum Jani nunc dicitur turris Centii Frangapanis et sane Jano impositæ turris lateritiæ conspicua hodieque vestigia supersunt (Montfaucon Diarium Italicum p 186) The anonymous writer (p 285) enumerates arcus Titi, turris Cartularia arcus Julii Cæsaris et Senatorum, turres de Bratis arcus Antonini turris de Cosectis etc.

46 Muratori (Dissertazione sopra le Antiquità Italiane tom i p 427-431) finds that stone bullets of two or three hundred pounds weight were not uncommon and they are sometimes computed at twelve or eighteen cantari of Genoa each cantaro weighing 150 pounds

47 The sixth law of the Visconti prohibits this common and mischievous practice and strictly enjoins that the houses of banished citizens should be preserved pro communi utilitate (Gualvaneus de la Flamma in Muratori Script Rerum Italicarum tom. xii p 1041)

48 Petrarch thus addresses his friend who with shame and tears had shown him the mœnia laceræ specimen miserabile Romæ and declared

the fane and altar consecrated by Evander præsenti Herculi the temple of Jupiter Stator, a vow of Romulus the palace of Numa the temple of Vesta cum Penatibus populi Romani He then deplores the opes tot victoriis quæsitæ et Græcarum artium decora multa quæ seniores meminerant quæ reparari nequibant (Annal xv 40 41)

13 A U C 507, repentina subversio ipsius Romæ prævenit triumphum Romanorum diversæ ignium aquarumque clades pene absumsere urbem. Nam Tiberis insolitis auctus imbribus et ultra opinionem vel diuturnitate vel magnitudine redundans omnia Romæ ædificia in plano posita delevit Diversæ qualitates locorum ad unam convenere perniciem quoniam et quæ segnior inundatio tenuit madefacta dissolvit, et quæ cursus torrentis invenit impulsa dejecit (Orosius, Hist l iv c 11, p 244, edit Havercamp) Yet we may observe that it is the plan and study of the Christian apologist to magnify the calamities of the pagan world

14 Vidimus flavum Tiberim, retortis
Littore Etrusco violenter undis
Ire dejectum monumenta Regis
Templaque Vestæ
(Horat Carm 1 2)

If the palace of Numa and temple of Vesta were thrown down in Horace s time what was consumed of those buildings by Nero s fire could hardly deserve the epithets of vetustissima or incorrupta

15 Ad coercendas inundationes alveum Tiberis laxavit ac repurgavit, completum olim ruderibus et ædificiorum prolapsionibus coarctatum (Suetonius in Augusto c 30)

16 Tacitus (Annal 1 79) reports the petitions of the different towns of Italy to the senate against the measure, and we may applaud the progress of reason On a similar occasion local interests would undoubtedly be consulted but an English House of Commons would reject with contempt the arguments of superstition that nature had assigned to the rivers their proper course etc.

17 See the Epoques de la Nature of the eloquent and philosophic Buffon His picture of Guyana in South America, is that of a new and savage land in which the waters are abandoned to themselves without being regulated by human industry (p 212, 561 quarto edition)

18 In his Travels in Italy Mr Addison (his Works vol 11 p 98 Baskerville s edition) has observed this curious and unquestionable fact

19 Yet in modern times the Tiber has sometimes damaged the city and in the years 1530 1557, 1598 the Annals of Muratori record three mischievous and memorable inundations (tom. xiv p 268 429 tom xv p 99 etc)

20 I take this opportunity of declaring that in the course of twelve years I have forgotten or renounced the flight of Odin from Azoph to Sweden which I never very seriously believed The Goths are apparently Germans but all beyond Cæsar and Tacitus is darkness or fable in the antiquities of Germany

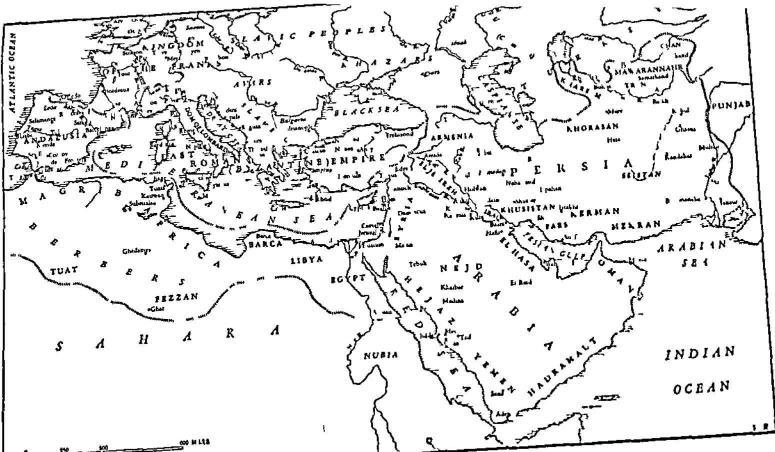
26 Eodem tempore petiit a Phocate principe templum, quod appellatur Pantheon, in quo fecit ecclesiam Sanctæ Mariæ semper Virginis, et omnium martyrum in quâ ecclesiæ princeps multa bona obtulit (Anastasius vel potius Liber Pontificalis in Bonifacio IV in Muratori Script Rerum Italicarum tom 111. P 1 p 135) According to the anonymous writer in Montfaucon, the Pantheon had been vowed by Agrippa to Cybele and Neptune and was dedicated by Boniface IV on the calends of November to the Virgin, quæ est mater omnium sanctorum (p 297 298)

27 Flaminius Vacca (apud Montfaucon, p 155 156 his memoir is likewise printed p 21, at the end of the Roma Antica of Nardini) and several Romans, doctrinâ graves were persuaded that the Goths buried their treasures at Rome, and bequeathed the secret marks filiis nepotibusque. He relates some anecdotes to prove that in his own time these places were visited and rifled by the Transalpine pilgrims the heirs of the Gothic conquerors

28 Omnia quæ erant in ære ad ornatum civitatis deposuit sed et ecclesiam B Mariæ ad martyres quæ de tegulis æreis cooperta discooperuit (Anast in Vitalian p 141) The base and sacrilegious Greek had not even the poor pretence of plundering a heathen temple the Pantheon was already a Catholic church

29 For the spoils of Ravenna (musiva atque marmora) see the original grant of Pope Adrian I to Charlemagne (Codex Carolin epist lxvii in Muratori Script Ital tom 111 P 11 p. 223)



30 I shall quote the authentic testimony of the Saxon poet (A D 887–899), de Rebus gestis Caroli Magni l v 437–440 in the Historians of France (tom v p 180) —

Ad quæ marmoreas præstabat ROMA columnas
Quasdam præcipuas pulchra Ravenna dedit
De tam longinquâ poterit regione vetustas
Illius ornatum Francia ferre tibi

And I shall add from the chronicle of Sigebert (Historians of France tom v p 378) extruxit etiam Aquisgrani basilicam plurimæ pulchritudinis ad cujus structuram a ROMA et Ravenna columnas et marmora devehi fecit

31 I cannot refuse to transcribe a long passage of Petrarch (Opp p 536 537) in Epistolâ hortatoriâ ad Nicolaum Laurentium it is so strong and full to the point Nec pudor aut pietas continuit quominus impii spoliata Dei templa occupatas arces opes publicas regiones urbis atque honores magistratuum inter se divisos (habeant?) quam unâ
